till next morning. The Lords spent Tuesday on proposing expedients in lieu of the Bill as effectual and more practicable. Many were brought in then and more since, but Monday next is appointed for them to be debated. To say truth, as many are pertinent so very many are otherwise, rather invented to obstruct than proposed as proper materials for a Bill. I perceive the wisest gape after a prorogation, if but for two days, which will once again bring either the old Bill or a worse on the stage, it being expected that many who were then resolute would now face about. But I neither believe they would find one changeling as to the Bill nor that they will be gratified with such a prorogation, whence an inclination in the King might be too naturally inferred should he administer such an opportunity for its reinforcement. As for the Commons' proceedings since, the printed votes publish them: they hotly ordered two addresses, one in answer to the King's message about Tangier, the other for the removal of my Lord Halifax out of the King's presence and Council, but coolly pursue those votes, which, tho' passed on Wednesday, are not yet perfected; all the allegation against the Lord arises (they own) only from common fame that he advised for dissolutions and prorogations, etc. Nor have the Lords done much since Monday, as if they took time to recover breath again. Public expedients and private trials have spun out most of their morning light; only this morning my Lord Peterborough (who was accused by Mr. Dangerfield's last evidence and that entered) craved his defence might stand entered also. After a long debate it was submitted to the consideration of a Committee. Their Lordships have also referred it to a Committee to exempt Protestant dissenters from the penalties of the Acts calculated against Papists. In the Commons House this day the Bill to inhibit Scotch cattle was carried but by four votes. They have also committed Sir Robert Holt and Mr. Stapley (both gowned men and Justices of Berkshire) for the heinous sin, discouraging petitioners and being abhorrers. They have also impeached Mr. Seymour (the quondam Speaker) of four articles, chiefly for embezzling and purloining the King's revenue, who hath till Thursday to put in his answer. He seems little startled at it. The foremen of several abhorring juries are sent for up in custody, some as far as Somersetshire and Devonshire. Where 'twill end, God knows.

EARL OF LONGFORD to ORMOND.

1680, Nov. 20. London.—Since my last to your Grace the House of Commons have voted an address to His Majesty for the removing my Lord Halifax for ever out of his presence and Council. But the address has not yet been presented to his Majesty, nor that against Sir George Jefferyes. This day there were articles of high misdeameanour given into the House by Sir Gilbert Gerard against Mr. Seymour, who is ordered a copy of them and has time till Thursday next to make answer to them. Those who are his friends say he can make a very good defence for himself and doubt not of his coming off and justifying himself against the accusation.

The obstructors of the petition for the meeting of the Parliament are every day called to an account for their proceedings in that affair, but none yet have had the judgment of the House passed upon them, but Sir George Jefferyes and Sir Francis Wythens. I have reason to fear 579 446 64 725 566 86 27 552 582 59 240 551 736 681 206, our letters to Ormond are opened on that side for I am sure I have taken care to prevent it on this, ever since I have been here, therefore it is worth your Grace's care to look into it. I confess my wife's being now well has encouraged me to stay a few days longer here than I intended, in order to the serving your Grace and my friends there, and having done now all within my poor sphere towards it, I resolve on Wednesday next to set forwards for Ireland.

STATEMENT by Mr. SERGEANT JOHN OSBORNE.

1680, November 20.—When Patrick Fleming, the Tory, was killed, which, to the best of my remembrance, was in the beginning of Lent, 1677, I was in Dublin. Soon after I went to Stacallan, in the county of Meath. There I heard of a letter found in the pocket of the said Fleming at his death which did contain several things very observable, but I remember not at this present from whom I heard the same. I remember that after, but the time I cannot now call to mind. I had discourse with Sir Wm. Tichborne and told him it was fit my Lord Lieutenant should have this letter; that some time after, I being then very shortly to go to Dublin, the letter was brought me to Stacallan by one John Banks, a horseman of Sir Wm. Tichborne's troop, at which time I caused the said John to endorse his name upon it, that suddenly after I went to Dublin, that with the first opportunity after I came there I delivered the said letter to my Lord of Ormond, but neither the time when it was delivered to me nor that in which I gave it to my Lord of Ormond I can by no circumstances yet call to mind. When I gave it my Lord, he seemed to read it and said words to this effect, as I apprehended, that he thought it would have been to the advantage of the country if Fleming had gone out of it, but that there were assurances in that letter he had given no direction for. My Lord gave me back the letter, but before I went out of the room he demanded it again and I returned it, and saw him lay it in a window in his closet in the Castle of Dublin. I never affirmed anything concerning the above related passages materially different from what is here set down.

EARL OF LONGFORD to ORMOND.

1680, November 23.—I am so well settled in my resolutions for Ireland that this day I waited upon His Majesty to kiss his hand in order to it, and I am now so far advanced in it that I stay now only for a letter which His Majesty promised to write to your Grace, which I hope to receive to-morrow, and on Thursday to begin my journey.

This morning was the first day of the Duke of Buckingham's appearing in the House of Lords, when he moved that a committee of their Lordships might be appointed to meet with a committee of the House of Commons to consider of the expedients proposed and the state of the nation in relation to Popery, which, being debated for at least two hours, upon a division of the House it was carried in the negative, for which were 45, and only 32 for the affirmative. The House of Commons yesterday passed their address against the Earl of Halifax upon a division for the recommitment of it, 101 being for the affirmative and 213 for the negative, but it is not yet presented to His Majesty. I am told this severe proceeding does not abate his Lordship's mettle. This day the House of Commons [sat] where upon the consideration of those Judges who dismissed the Grand Juries were the 14 Lords [who] would have indicted the Duke for a Papist, and 'tis said they have voted them betrayers of the privileges of the people of England. For the rest I must refer your Grace to the journals which are sent your Grace by Mr. Mulys. My Lord Shaftesbury being disabled from attending the House by the gout, which is fallen into his shoulder, the consideration of the Queen's divorce, which was appointed for this day, is put off sine die I suppose by this packet my Lord Chamberlain gives your Grace an account how obligingly His Majesty has this day interposed in the treaty for my Lord Ossory's marriage, and I have another obliging story to tell your Grace when I have he honour to kiss your hands. This day His Majesty had an account from Sir Hen. Goodericke, resident at Madrid, that three boats arriving at Malaga from Tangier brought news of a smart encounter between the English and the Moors, wherein the Moors lost 2,000 men killed upon the place, that we lost only 150, that we had taken nine colours, retaken six guns, got the possession of Monmouth fort, which was rebuilding, and that we had filled up all the Moors' trenches, and were then absolute masters of the field the night after the fight when those boats left Tangier; but there was fresh shooting heard the next morning. This happy victory was effected by the conduct of Col. Edward Sackville, who commanded in chief (Sir Palmes Fairborne having been killed by an accidental shot the day before), and the assistance of some Spanish horse who landed from Spain but a day or two before and behaved themselves with great gallantry in the engagement. But there is no advice of this come yet from Tangier. On Saturday His Majesty had advice that the 1,200 men sent to Tangier under the command of Col. Percy Kirbe sailed on Saturday morning by Plymouth, and the wind being for them it is hoped they will arrive there by the end ot this week.

It is believed the Earl of Plymouth is dead there of a bloody flux.

ORMOND to EARL OF SUNDERLAND.

1680, Nov. 23. Dublin.—It is a good while since I was directed to send over two letters said to be put into my hands, the one by Sir Hans Hamilton sent from a Popish priest or friar in Portugal and found amongst one Dr. Hickey's papers after his death, the other by Mr. Serjeant Osborne; the former by great chance I found and sent to Mr. Secretary Coventry with my letter of the 12th of April last, but the latter I neither could nor can yet find. Both were given me before there was any discovery of the plot. The Portugal letter I made small account of, judging it ridiculous rather than dangerous, and I think it was so esteemed when it was read at Council. Of the other said to be written by Plunkett, the titular Primate, under the name of Cox, to one Quin, found in Fleming, the Tory's, pocket after he was killed, and therefore and for the matter of it conceived to be intended for the said Fleming, I took as little care, supposing it concerned nothing but the sending away of Fleming, who with others his followers and associates did much mischief in those parts they infested. The matter of Fleming's departure by connivance or passport out of the kingdom was in agitation by the means and interposition of Plunket before I came last into Ireland, and, as I suppose, it was in order thereunto that Fleming himself was brought to my Lord of Essex by the present Lord Chief Baron Hene, but Fleming and seven of his accomplices being killed in February, 1677, there was a good end put to that negotiation, and there seemed to me there was no further use of that letter, yet for the further satisfaction of His Majesty and of my Lords of the Council I have caused all the circumstances of finding and disposing of the letter with an attested copy of it to be set down and sworn by those that had any part in it, all which your Lordship will find herewith enclosed to be disposed of as His Majesty shall command.

Postscript.—I have for two or three posts forgot to acquaint your Lordship that Peter Talbot, the titular Archbishop of Dublin, is dead, and that care was taken to have the body looked upon by some that knew him. I have received His Majesty's command for suspending certain payments for a year, signified in your Lordship's of the 13th instant, as also what my son Arran had order to write to me. In both His Majesty's pleasure shall be obeyed in the best manner I can.

EARL OF ARRAN to ORMOND.

1680, Nov. 23. London.—I expected that yesterday and this day would have produced great matters, but my Lord Shaftesbury being ill of the gout, as he apprehends, could not attend the House this day, and therefore the business relating to the Queen is put off. Our great debate this day was whether a committee of both Houses should be desired as you will see in the journals. 45 and 32 was the division, only one bishop in the affirmative, and that was Bath and Wells. The affairs relating to Ireland stand as they did when I writ on Saturday. You may find by this letter that it is more to show your Grace that I will not spare my pains than anything that I have to say worth your trouble. I think I can assure you now that my Lord Longford will leave this place on Thursday next and he will rectify all that I have writ in cypher if you cannot make it out. I wish I had a better.

Mr. Buck cannot hold out long, and I am afraid by what he told me this day, having sent for me on purpose, that he will leave his children in a very ill condition. He spoke of 400*l.* your Grace owed him this many years; he really deserves well from you. He will leave three sons and one daughter; the sons are very ingenious youths, and the daughter a modest young woman.

Col. Edward Cooke to Ormond.

1680, Nov. 23. London.—Though the Lords had appropriated yesterday merely for the receiving and debating expedients instead of the D. Y. Bill, and in order to so serious an employment had adjourned but till 8 o'clock, yet it so happened that the more diligent members keeping their hour punctually and finding their House too empty for the beginning a work of so great importance, to prevent idleness possessed themselves of a private cause between the widow of Sir Ed. Turner, the late Chief Baron, and his son (on an assurance it would be very short), which lasting till one o'clock, the business of the day was necessitated to be put off till this morning to the great regret of many whose palates were set to relish the discourses of the Queen's insufficiency. His Grace of Buckingham now first appeared, whose miserable looks betray his uncured indispositions. The effect of this disappointment hath antidoted all such removes for the future by an order that all private causes shall only be heard in afternoons. The Lords being met afterwards at the Committee of Examinations had this doubt presented them by the Attorney General. The case thus: upon new evidence old Mrs. Cellier is to be tried anew, the witnesses Mr. Dangerfield and Mr. Lewis (once Sir John Morton's rakehell footman); but the former lying under a conviction of perjury, the only crime the King refuses to insert in pardons (as most unqualifying for a credible witness), the Attorney General had not dependence on his testimony, wherefore Lewis brings one Seale to support his testimony, who he had hid in the room to witness the bargain Mrs. Cellier should make with him, which he doth to a tittle of what evidence Lewis had given in, but just before the trial (if I mistake not) when the jury was empannelled, the Attorney General happening to consider that as Seale was so secretly hid as not to be seen, so neither could he see, and therefore demanding of Seale how he knew it to be Mrs. Cellier, answered, only by her voice and the series of her discourse; but this not coming up full to a proof satisfactory to a jury to take away one's life he craved their Lordships' direction whether he should proceed to the hazard of Mrs. Cellier's second escape or to respite the trial, but I do not find their Lordships thought it reasonable to take the thorn out of the Attor[ney's] foot to put into their own, so left him to his own discretion, who I hear respites the trial. Upon complaints made against the late changing of Justices, in most cases the abhorrers ousting the petitioners, the committee (to whom it was referred) have curiously scrutinied into that matter in all counties, but not yet finished their report to be presented to the King. In Lancashire my Lord Macclesfield complained against one Justice for this crime, that he had divided the nation into three parts, knaves, fools and wise men; that the former made plots, the second believed them, but the third believed them not; this was more crafty than criminal, but to fill full his measure of iniquity he was rendered an abominable abhorrer, to which even my black friend could reply, that this was not a tribunal to judge of that crime, they must go somewhere else to do it, which some ill eyes looked on as reflective on those who had been so severe against abhorrers in the other House.

This day their Lordships began with expedients, that relating to the Q. was with modesty laid by, not to be resumed again, I hope, the King giving no encouragement to it, but much the contrary. What is agreed by way of expediency is contained under these five heads :—1. That an Act of Association such as was in Ed. 3 and Queen Eliz. reigns shall now be passed a part. 2. That all dispensation for the Duke taking the oaths and tests shall be expunged. 3. That he shall be divested of all those trusts and dignities he yet retains, whether relating to Ireland, Tangiers or the Indies. 4. That if any Parliament shall be then in being at the time of the King's demise, or if not, the surviving members of the last Parliament shall resume and sit six months indissolvable to settle the great affairs of the nation. 5. That neither the Duke nor any Popish successor shall ever have so much as any negative voice or be capable of conferring any honour dignity or employment, spiritual or temporal (whether military or civil). This is the furthest they have yet gone, according to my best intelligence, and all their Lordships did this day, saving joined with the Commons in an address to be presented to the King to appoint a public fast.

As for the acts and monuments of the Commons, their printed votes (which, I presume, are constantly transmitted to your Grace, or on the least hint to the contrary I shall (during my uncertain residence in these parts being tempted by my doctor to the experiment of country air to shake off the loose corns of my distemper) constantly inclose to your Grace, those printed votes (I say) prevent all pens. To which I shall only add these short remarks :—That address against my Lord Halifax cost four hours' debate, the only avowed foundation on which it was built being common fame, and the crime alleged was giving the King evil counsel, which was aggravated by these two expressions,, clandestinely and secretly. Most of the best speakers in the House argued against it ; particularly my Lord Cavendish is reported to have spoken much beyond himself in this business, urging it as mere nonsense that common fame should publish what counsels were clandestinely and secretly delivered. At last those words were left out ; but the address was carried to be presented to the King to remove that evil Councillor both from His Majesty's counsels and presence for ever. This day I take myself to be concerned to be accountable to your Grace for what passed in the House of Commons, because the printed votes appear not till to-morrow. They have all day long been sifting the behaviour of two Judges, Scroggs and Weston. The former they have found to be so chaffey as to be fit to be removed out of all public employments, and accordingly have ordered an address to His Majesty. The latter's crime being only words tending to discountenance petitioning and to encourage abhorring (the nature of this new guilt amounting to that old unintelligible crime of being a betrayer of the liberties of the people,) and not yet fully proved, his doom is respited.

And thus having done with the public affairs in Parliament I shall present your Grace with an account of the great success this day's letters assured us of at Tangier, where the Moors were reintrenched some 15,000 strong; Sir Pal. Fairbone had the ill luck the day before to be killed with a chain shot, so that Col. Sackville commanded in chief. They entirely routed the Moors, killed 2,000 on the place, took all their cannon, three good pieces, and filled up all their trenches with the loss of 200 men. The Spanish horse (sent for our assistance) are much commended for their forward behaviour in this action. The Earl of Plymouth is dead of a fever in Tangier.

Now to what is more private. If your Grace will part with your interest in Needwood I can help your Grace to a chapman, whose interest when he hath purchased it will equally intitle your Grace to a command there as your own land. If you please to bite at this bait, be pleased to let me know the nature of your Grace's interest, both as to the title and its advantages.

I am importuned beyond my power of denial to recommend the case of a kinsman of mine to your Grace, one Sir Geo. Herbert, Bart., who it seems hath obtained a reference on some petition of his to His Majesty to your Grace. All I shall presume to ask is what I know I need not ask, as speedy a despatch with as much favour as the nature of the thing and the merit of that family will deserve.

My Lord Arran last night did me the favour to give me a visit, but the access of company shortened the visit, and so interrupted our discourse that his Lordship hath promised shortly to repeat that honour and lengthen our conference, that by comparing notes we may the better understand what is to be re[ ]st and what to be prevented.

I have enclosed the charge against Mr. Seymour, who is to give in his answer next Thursday; he seems to slight his charge, though Miles Fleetwood hath undertaken the proof of two articles and Mr. Vernon, of Derbyshire, the others. I confess I understand not how those two gentlemen come to be inspired with the knowledge of his accounts.

ORMOND to EARL OF SUNDERLAND.

1680, Nov. 24. Dublin.—Though Geoghegan, otherwise called Dalton has been in this kingdom from the 6th of this month, yet I heard nothing from him nor received your Lordship's letter of the 6th of October sent by him till the 20th, and then your Lordship's letter and passport and the order of Council concerning him were sent me by the Mayor of Waterford, after he had committed Geoghegan upon the information of one White and found those papers about him.

What course has been held by the Council here with the persons accused by Geoghegan and with himself will be transmitted to your Lordship in our joint letter. All I shall in the meantime observe is that Geoghegan has not so punctually as I conceive he ought pursued the orders which he brought, for they seem in the first place to direct him to receive directions, protection and assistance from the Government here, and I am by the order of Council required to cause such as shall be apprehended upon his information to be examined. But he has spent all the time since his landing in accusing of persons before the Mayor of Waterford and other Justices of the Peace in the country, without giving me notice of his landing or of the work he was upon; and how much longer he would have proceeded in that way and kept up your Lordship's letter and the order of Council if they had not been taken from him and sent me by the Mayor of Waterford I cannot tell; and if what he now says be true, namely, that one or two of those that were to have killed the King be near this place, I conceive he should have given the apprehending of them the preference before any other service he had in hand.

This intimation of what hath hitherto been done in relation to Geoghegan I thought necessary to send your Lordship, that it may appear that if he hath not or shall not succeed in his undertaking to the satisfaction of His Majesty and my Lords of the Council he may not impute his want of performance or the delay of it to the want of protection or assistance from this Government, having never applied to it till he was constrained by his imprisonment.

COL. EDWARD COOKE to ORMOND.

1680, Nov. 24. Wednesday.—The Lords did nothing; they met late and rose early on this occasion. After they were bodily setting to the consideration of expedients, my Lord Shaftesbury made a surprising motion to lay them by on the table, it being too late to enter on them, and adjourn. It being a motion from him so zealous for the expedients was unresisted by any, and so both the expedients were deposited on the table and the House adjourned; all the rest of the expedients standing now as that particular one relating to the Q. did formerly, laid by sine die, to the amazement of many. I question not ere I conclude this paper (began on Wednesday) I shall be more able to unriddle the matter.

The Commons' votes will till Saturday's proceedings give an account of their transactions in that of their severe scrutiny against the Attorney General this day; he is observed to have contributed something to it by his indirect evasive answers to all their questions; but particularly when they demanded of him whether he drew up the proclamation against petitioning, confessed being newly entered into his employment he wanted experience to do it himself, but for his excuse why he could not mention the person who assisted him offers that it was against his oath, but when called in again and pressed to declare he owned it was my Lord Chief Justice North, though just before he had declared it against his oath to reveal it. Some excuse him by saying that when he was withdrawn he sent for and obtained both the King's and my Lord Chief Justice North's consent to name him. The consequence of that address is in print.

Nor doth Thursday, the 25th, prove a busy day with their Lordships. They resolved to join in that request this afternoon to address to the King for a public fast. They also address to the King for a general pardon for all witnesses against Tuesday next, the day of my Lord Stafford's trial, praying they may be copious enough to comprehend perjuries, which I believe the King will scarce grant, it being as it were to unperjure a witness, though one told me he heard the King say that even the evidence of a perjured person might be accompanied with such pregnant circumstances as to convict a malefactor. But the busiest concern of this day was to make up the Committee of Privileges, not only to regulate and resolve some doubts in cases of privilege, but chiefly to adjust all circumstances in order to my Lord Stafford's trial next Tuesday, when most think it will go hard with him, and that no other expedient (confession excepted) can save his Lordship, which lesson it is believed he hath learnt perfectly.

The Commons spent all this day on Mr. Seymour and his articles (which were inclosed in my last); they say he made an excellent defence, but that there is none against a House of Commons Flayle. The great question was whether he should be impeached without any more ado, taking it for granted that Mr. Vernon of Derbyshire and Miles Fleetwood (Gustavus' half brother) can make good the articles because they have said they can; or whether they should be referred to the scrutiny of a Committee; the debate lasted so long (the best speakers and most thinking men arguing for that safe way to look before one leaps, and so keeping up the ball) till the hour of three was come (appointed for both Houses to attend the King in the Painted Chamber with the address for a public fast), that so both House and debate were necessitated to be adjourned to the morrow, so that the quondam Speaker is sure to live one day longer.

The 26th.—The Lords spent a whole day on a remnant of a cause between my Lady Dacre's and her grandchild Chute. At last their Lordships have referred those heads for expedients in lieu of the D. Y. bill to have them framed into an Act by the learned Judges; also to them is referred to frame the Bill of Association to resemble the form in Queen Elizabeth's days. I had almost forgot the King's answer to the Commons' address against my Lord Halifax. He advised them not to give too much credit to common fame, that he knew of no unlawful act that he had been guilty of, but if he had he referred him to the law, for he would neither protect him nor anyone else in the breach of any law. If I mistake in this the print will rectify me, as also inform concerning the other addresses and their answers, which if I thought others did not I would constantly enclose.

Nov. 27.—This day the Lords ordered a committee of these five: Salisbury, Essex, Ailesbury, Wharton and Howard of Escrick to meet with ten commoners to make up a committee of both Houses to adjust things in order to Tuesday's trial, though I vehemently suspect that the time is so short that some delay will be put upon the hearing. My Lord Ailesbury came in my Lord Shaftesbury's room, who, to the wonder of many, excused himself, which my Lord Ailesbury had also done, but that he happened to be out of the House for the debate, for the having such a committee of both Houses was not without heat, and my Lord Ailesbury was one of the opponents. This new committee met at three, though created after 12, to show their zeal to serve my Lord Stafford.

The matter of most moment in the House of Commons this day (and that not small) was an address brought in by Mr. Hamden. It is not to be wondered that it consisted of two sheets of paper, when 'tis considered what it contained, all the miscarriages past and grievances present, in its close an assurance to the King that if he pleased to apply remedies not only Tangier but all other His Majesty's necessary wants should be satisfied. I mention not Mr. Seymour's doom, because the printed votes saves that labour, nor have I anything more to add at this time, but that Captain Richard Bertie told me that accidentally meeting with Sir H. Ingoldsby, amongst other discourses he told him when the Parliament were at leisure he had a pretty story (as he termed it) to relate to them concerning the Duke of Ormond. Incensed Rich. was so nettled to hear his general so very disrespectfully mentioned that had not Sir H. been silenced by the company it had proceeded to a quarrel. This I thought it my duty to insert. I shall be constant in giving the best account I can of all things during my stay here, but Monday sennight I go hence to my Lord Poulett's to a meeting of all the trustees for that young Lord, if I am able, for I cannot yet say I am recovered, but as soon as I return to this city I will also return to the performance of this duty.

ORMOND to SIR L. JENKINS.

1680, Nov. 25. Dublin.—By what comes to us of public affairs it is very possible that when the bearer, Sir John Davys, shall arrive there may not presently be an opportunity given to vindicate himself against the calumnies thrown upon by him by some of the witnesses that went hence and were heard at the bar of the Lords' House. Yet he chooses rather to undergo a very inconvenient voyage than to lie under the ill impressions those persons may have left with the Lords of him. I can assure you upon more than three years' experience that the gentleman is beyond question faithful to the King and very capable of discharging the duties of his place, and that he hath been as diligent in promoting the discovery of the Plot as it was possible for him or anybody in his station to be and when you shall have time to discourse with him, you will receive satisfaction from him in what concerns this kingdom.

ORMOND to THE KING.

1680, Nov. 25. Dublin.—Sir John Davys, Your Majesty's Secretary here, finding it convenient for him to pass into England to justify himself against some very unreasonable reflections cast upon him in the examinations of some discoverers and witnesses that went out of this kingdom, I hold it to be part of my duty to inform your Majesty that to the best of my observation he hath always carried himself with great diligence and ability in such things relating to your service as were incident to his office or required from him, and more particularly I am able to say that in the examination of all things and persons relating to the discovery of the Plot he has been as industrious and faithful as it was possible for any man in his place to be. I must therefore beg leave to believe that those who do or shall prosecute him have some other end than your Majesty's service wherein I think him very faithful and zealous.

FRANCIS GWYN to ORMOND.

1680, Nov. 27. London.—I have herein inclosed the votes of the House of Commons yesterday, their address for removing the Earl of Halifax, the articles of impeachment brought in against Mr. Seymour, and a letter from the Privy Council of Scotland to His Majesty concerning the Duke, which are the most considerable things of news in this age of printing. This afternoon the committee of Lords and Commons met to adjust matters in order to the trial of the Lord Stafford, which is to be on Tuesday next.

We lately received a confirmation of the great success that His Majesty's forces had at Tangier, with some farther particulars, that our men, horse and foot, were not above 1,800 that sallied out, who killed 600 or 700 of the Moors there in their trenches, regained two great guns, and pursued them above a mile into the country. We lost about 70 men on the place, 100 more dangerously wounded, and 100 horses slain and made useless. Sir Palmes Fairbone, the Governor, was killed the day before the engagement, as likewise was Mr. Forbes, son to the Lord Granard. The Earl of Plymouth's body is very shortly expected home, he having died this month agone of a bloody flux.

Earl of Arran to Ormond.

1680, Nov. 27. London.—I have found out since I wrote on Tuesday some of the printed narratives made use of by my brother last Parliament. They give an account of proceedings there down to the 7th of April, 1679, and the narrative sent after me makes out the rest, but there has been no use of them yet. Lt. Col. Kennedy, whom your Grace had so long in gaol, I am informed, is to be a great informer against you and the Government. My Lord Longford has been troubled with a sore throat, which has delayed his journey; but he is already pretty well recovered.

Mr. Ellis is put into the execution of the Baly's place of Westminster, but it has cost him a great deal of money to Stroud; he is to give him a thousand pound, and pay you the 500*l.* due upon Stroud's bond. Sir James Butler having satisfied me that it was no way justifiable or honourable for you to receive money upon this account, made me, on your behalf, refer the matter to the Bishop and my Lord Chancellor. Mr. Thomas Butler will be satisfied also.

You will find by the printed account from Tangier that my Lord Granard's son is killed, and your page that was, Fitzpatrick; Cap. Porce and Lieut. Gilbert Butler wounded.

Sir John Davys to Earl of Arran.

1680, Nov. 28. Mostyn.—I was resolved neither adverse winds nor any other consideration should detain me longer at Dublin, and, therefore, I put to sea the other day to try my fortune, which has proved so good that I landed here the last night late, and this morning Sir Roger Mostin did send one to Chester on purpose to secure the Thursday's coach there to carry me, my wife and children for London, for that higher power called a wife will not suffer me to go without her and the rest of our appurtenances, she being resolved we shall stand or fall all together. So as your Lordship sees how many of us are coming under your protection, for which confidence I have nothing else to offer besides my innocence and your Lordship's own nobleness, and they, I hope, will be every way as prevailing as they are great. My wife gives your Lordship her service and both of us lay ourselves at my Lady's feet.

Ormond to Earl of Arran.

1680, Nov. 28. Dublin.—Yours of the 16th and 20th came together, and now we are impatient for those of the 23rd, supposing that every three days must produce something extraordinary. Your former letters said some things by command from the King. The chief was the recruiting of the Scotch Regiment, the intention of sending men hither to supply the place of unserviceable soldiers, and that of ammunition. You know Lieut. Col. Monro is gone for Scotland in order to get recruits, and he is daily expected with them. The men are to be sent hither as promised, as you will see by the copy of the King's letter, but how they shall be raised and conducted to us or when we shall have them is not expressed ; and it will be necessary we having warning enough to make room for them, but of that I doubt there is but little fear.

I saw it in a letter from a Parliament man that it was affirmed more than once in the House of Commons that in this army ten of fifteen were Papists. I hope such as take the oaths of supremacy and allegiance and that receive the sacrament after the use of the Church of England go not under that imputation, and then nothing could be more impudently false than such an assertion.

The matter offered by my Lord Chamberlain and you to my consideration is much too hard for me to resolve on. If the King answers addresses to the satisfaction of those that make them in the cases before him, I have little reason to expect an exemption in mine, when the like shall be made concerning me ; and against accusations as they may be brought, I know not how to be defended from appearing to answer, so that I think it best to leave myself to God and the King. I cannot so much as suspect upon what ground capital things can be laid to my charge, and of such commonly impeachments are composed.

Clerk of the Pells' Certificate of Treasury Receipts and Payments, 8–29 Nov., 1680.

1680, Nov. 29.—Receipts in His Majesty's Treasury from the 8th of November, 1680, to Monday, the 29th day foll. exd.

The remain in the Vice-Treasurer's hands upon the last certificate ending the said 8 Nov.				303	09 01½
Leinster ..	New Patent Rents....	471	17 02¼
	Rents on Decrees, etc..	086	08 11
	Old Crown Rents	262	02 11⅛
	Casualties	051	17 06¾
Munster ..	New Patent Rents....	101	12 07⅜
	Rents on Decrees, etc..	024	07 06½
	Custod Rents	006	18 00
	Old Crown Rents	006	18 09
	Quit Rents	000	08 09¾
	Casualties	001	05 00
Connaught	New Patent Rents....	082	11 04¼
	Old Crown Rents	012	07 01¼
	Quit Rents	000	10 01½
	Casualties	011	14 04
Ulster	New Patent Rents....	001	03 05
	Old Crown Rents ...	055	15 04⅛
				1177	19 00⅜
Farmers ..	By money paid into the Treasury..			808	08 00
	By orders of assignments into the country			8975	01 00½
				11264	17 02⅜
Payments made within the said time
Civil List..	Court of Exchequer ..	170	00 01
	Chancery	030	05 00
	State offices.....	210	00 00
	Incidents	026	05 00
	Creation Money	017	10 00
	Perpetuities	036	03 04
	Temporary Payments..	569	07 00
	Concordatums	588	15 02
				1648	05 07
Military List	Officers of the Ordnance			150	00 00
	List of Pensions.....			263	00 00
Payments made pursuant to His Majesty's letters of the 20th of June, 1679.....				619	15 07½
				£2681	01 02½
So remains in the Vice-Treasurer's hands....				8583	16 00⅛
				£11264	17 02⅜

Ex. p. Ja. Alexander, Dept. Cler. Pell.

Earl of Sunderland to Ormond.

1680, Nov. 30. Whitehall.—I received upon Sunday several letters from your Grace and the Council of Ireland of the 19th and 23rd instant, together with several informations, examinations and papers relating to the accusation against the Earl of Tyrone, and the proceedings and discoveries which have been given or made to the Government of Ireland concerning the horrid Popish Plot, all which were by His Majesty's command yesterday morning sent to the House of Lords, who have transmitted them to the Commons. I must observe to your Grace that amongst the papers relating to the Earl of Tyrone two were wanting, though mentioned in the list sent with them, vizt., the Earl of Tyrone's examination taken before Justice Jones, March 20th, 1678, and the further examination of Laurence Sullivan, dated Novem. 8th, 1679.

Col. Edward Cooke to Ormond.

1680, Nov. 30. London.—The Lords yesterday were so intent on the work of this day (the trial of my Lord Stafford) that they admitted of no divertive debate, but only received reports from the committee of both Houses of agreements in order to the methods and proceedings at the trial, which they having confirmed proceeded to consider what was to be their parts apart. The Commons resolved to sit at the trial in the nature of a committee (not House), not so much out of humility as to have a plausible excuse to sit bare. The Chancellor took public notice in the House that there were thirty-five witnesses to be examined against my Lord Stafford. The Commons, to employ their idle hours till their Committee returned to make their report, read over two Bills, one to repeal a Bill surreptitiously obtained last Parliament very injudiciously to restrain our Severn fishery; the other was a second reading of a Bill for the taking away my Lord Worcester's Ludlow Court for Wales, which I thought would not have passed that House; but I am very sure it will not meet with the concurrence of either King or House of Lords. In the afternoon the Commons attended His Majesty in the banqueting house, with their long address, which had been much more voluminous had not the more moderate party overruled it, to expunge all other miscarriages and grievances, and singly to insist on Popery, its progress and consequence, taking notice of all circumstances that could expose it, so much as Coleman's secretaryship. I presume it will be so soon in print that it will not need description. This being in answer to the King's message about Tangier was sweetened in the close with an assurance that as well the King's other wants as Tangier should be supplied, when the jealous minds of the subject could be secured in that most important particular. Two things many members took great notice of, the one that the King took the paper without giving one word of answer, which he never did before, the other that the Duchess of Portsmouth who used to speed her gracious salutes over all the members, tho' where she used to be, diverted herself with the King's dogs as more preferable, not heeding any one member, tho' expected by many; whether or no she took herself concerned, though not mentioned in the address, or saw further in relation to what is to be than others, is conjectured variously, but certainly known by none, as it is that this hath exasperated many. But I understand this day her Grace hath endeavoured to redintegrate herself with the members by treating them most bountiful with sweetmeats at the trial, the manner where of was thus.

The Commons met early, and fondness of the show made them moulder away and slip into the hall, that at last the Speaker was left almost all alone, wherefore for decency sake the Mace was sent to remand them, that so in due decorum, though but as a committee, they might descend into the hall. The Lords thought proper to read the High Steward's commission in the House, not hall, which Prince Rupert opposed, for that would intitle the Chancellor to take place of him, going to the trial; the expedient was that the commission should be read in the House, but he should retain his place but as Chancellor till the staff was delivered him in the hall, and so their Lordships proceeded thither, where my Lord Chancellor directed a short speech to the criminal, advised him seriously to consider his condition, which looked very desperate, 1, considering the nature of his accuser, the Commons of all England in their representatives. 2. The heinousness of the accusations to no less than the highest of treasons. 3. The considerableness of his judges, the nobility of England, that it was strongly to be presumed that so great and so wise a body as the House of Commons would not appear there unless they were well assured of making good their charges, but withal assured him he should have fair play, all civility in the proceedings, and justice at the end. Then the managers of the evidence proceeded, Maynard began to open the charge, Winington most eloquently aggravated the circumstances, Treby proposed the six witnesses now to be examined. Their method was first to prove that there was a Popish plot, and that not only to subvert religion, but also to take away the King's life. The six witnesses to make that out were, 1 Smyth, 2 Dugdale, 3 Prance, 4 Oates, 5 Bernard Dennis, who owned himself not only a Papist but also a priest (at which my Lord Chancellor, (Lord High Steward) was uneasy to take his testimony till he understood he was pardoned), 6 Janeson; all six, they say, have cleared it so far. And that was all the work of this day. To-morrow comes on the use of application, the intitling this person of my Lord Stafford to that guilt of those highest treasons, and more of it in my next, for I presume two or three days will end this business. My Lord Norreys commands me in all my letters to repeat him your Grace's most humble servant.

Wednesday, Dec. 1st.—This day, as soon as the Lords met, the Lord High Steward acquainted them that he had received intimation that the Lord Stafford would make his complaint, that though their Lordships had allowed him counsel, he could have no benefit of it, all Counsel were so terrified by the House of Commons that none durst appear. The Commons at first opposed the motion, but at last yielded it, provided they might be permitted only to speak to points in law, and not to matters of fact, and that they might be kept at such a distance as not to be able to prompt the prisoner, all which being accorded to, the managers called their evidence.

1. Dugdale.—My Lord moved he might look him in the face whilst he was giving his evidence, but according to constant practice he was ordered to turn to the Court, he told of three several times that my Lord Stafford had vehemently pressed him to kill the King, promising great rewards sometimes and once a pardon; it was thought the pardon was to have been granted by the D. Y., which made the Commons much more inquisitive who was to grant it, but he answered the Pope. My Lord Stafford asked many ensnaring questions, but he at least had his lesson so perfectly as not to be ensnared by them, but was very clear in his evidence.

2. Dr. Oates was next, who craved leave to be left to his own method and be uninterrupted; he spoke positively as to my Lord Stafford having received his commission, and his owning and encouraging the killing of the King, with many shrewd circumstances, nor could any cross-questions discompose him.

3. Lastly Turberville was examined, who positively swore his Lordship, after he had exacted secrecy from him and prepared him to expect the most glorious employment in the world, told him in plain terms it was to kill the King. He being asked how long he had known the Plot, said four years, and then why he did not discover it sooner, replied because he durst not for his life, till the time of trial. One thing was remarkable, that as my Lord had disowned the knowledge of the other two, so did he as to this, till he offered to prove that my Lord kept a yacht on purpose to bring him over from France. Then he confessed that when he had cowardly run away from his colours he merely out of charity received him, but Turberville appealed to the Duke of Monmouth and Lord Feversham to justify his behaviour, who did so.

Then my Lord Stafford in a long immethodical speech (for it seems his behaviour did not answer expectation) endeavoured his vindication, and at last moved for copies of all records, and particularly of Turberville's depositions before the Commons, but no such things were owned by that House, who had no power to give an oath; it seems a circumstance of time my Lord Stafford thought to take advantage of. The Lords withdrew to appoint the time for the next appearance which was ordered Thursday morning, and directions given to furnish his Lordship with all records, but as for the depositions in the Commons' House they made no order, but the Commons have consented that the Justices who took them shall give my Lord copies that he may have fair play in all things. It seems the Lord High Steward on a note he received from my Lord Shaftesbury gave encouragement to the prisoner to insist on Friday, but he not desiring of it when the Lords returned into the Lords' House, my Lord Grey and Lord Lovelace severely arraigned the Lord High Steward for proposing anything without the order of that House till my Lord Shaftesbury owned the crime, and then it ceased to be one.

Thursday, Dec. 2.—My Lord Stafford produced his witnesses to invalidate the testimony of the three had been examined the day before against him. But I hear my Lord's defence was very weak. First he read a long speech, written by his counsel so imperfectly that in many places he made it unintelligible, and then in his counterproofs he had always the ill luck or ill skill to place most emphasis upon things least important, so many were examined that they rose not till after four, and yet his Lordship was sorry to leave four till to-morrow. When the Lords were returned to their House they appointed the next morning to meet again, and when the Commons were returned again to adjourn their House Mr. Secretary Jenkins delivered them this message from the King that one Dr. Lamplew had examined three witnesses on oath and all three gave in evidence that they heard one Pickering (brother to the priest who was executed) swear God damn him, that if the King should suffer any one of the five Lords to be put to death, he himself should not live six months to an end. His Majesty desired their advice what to do in the matter. They returned superabundant humble thanks and appointed early the next morning to meet to consider of it, and then to address to his Majesty.

Friday, Dec. 3.—Both Houses and the prisoner met in the court, where my Lord Stafford's business was to examine the rest of his witnesses, to assert his own innocence and criminate the King's evidence, but his witnesses were so reproached by the managers that they proved ineffectual in either case. One of his witnesses, on which much stress was laid, when he heard the questions were to be demanded of him, ran away out of the court and was never seen since; and another, called a person of quality and learning, a fellow of King's College in Cambridge and a Protestant, but he was detected in open Court to be an arrant Papist, and for eight years last past secretary to my Lord Castlemaine, his name Ledcot. To say truth none of the witnesses did answer expectation, either by reason of the meanness of their quality or their labouring hard some small circumstances not pertinent to the business; besides a cloud of witnesses called by the managers to support the credit and testimony of Dugdale and Turberville. Mr. Treby (chairman of the Committee of Elections) is chose Recorder of London in the room of Sir Geo. Jeffreys, against whom the Commons had addressed to the King to have had him turned out of all employments. It seems many are disgruntled at it who (if they might be Judges) would give preference to their own merit, Sir Fran. Winington for one and Mr. Trenchard for another, and many others all expecting and desiring it. Last night after eleven these quarters were hotly alarmed by a fire happening in Westminster Hall, which discovered itself by the smoke; the hurt might have been much more than it was, they were so long ere they could overcome the strength of the door; as soon as ever they were got in the fire was soon quenched, it having only burnt down a corner of a shop, kindled by a soldier's lighted match, who, in the hurry of the Courts rising, forgot to take his match with him. The King in person was just coming to the Hall as he met an assurance that the fire was out. The Lieut. of the Tower (Tom Cheeke) had yesterday a severe clash with Dr. Oates, who had so crowded the room that was designed for the witnesses with his own friends, who under his shelter came to see the show that Tom Cheeke took notice of it to him, who bade him cease his prating, that he was but a gaoler. The other seemed to resent it. He then called Tom rogue and rascal, etc., which grew to that height that the Lords overheard them and when Oates was rebuked by the Lord High Steward replied the law was open and Mr. Cheeke might take his remedy. There it stops at present. Pickering, who I mentioned on Thursday, is sent for up.

This day the 4th of December was appointed for my Lord Stafford to finish the examination of his witnesses, he pretending at the rising of the Court last night that he had eight material witnesses, who he could not name, because others had found them out for him. The Court was uneasy to deny his Lordship anything, but desired that his Lordship would weigh the evidence before he offered them to the Court. This morning after the examination of two, who disowned any knowledge of what they were asked, my Lord attended with great symptoms of sadness, resigned up the other six witnesses, and, as it were, his cause with them, for he made a most insipid defence, pretend [ing] he durst boldly look death in the face, and plied his tears on the account of his wife and children. Then Sir Tho. Jones, mighty sweet in words, but sour enough in sense, not leaving anything to be addable by any should speak after. Yet then my Lord Stafford craved to be answered to these four questions and that he might make them by his counsel, being all points in law: 1, Whether two several persons deposing to several actions, though both amount to treason, may be allowed for two lawful witnesses by the act that enacts two witnesses in all treason. The Judges all gave this judgment, which was that both proving the same treason were good enough. 2. Whether an indictment could be valid in this which was brought in the last. It was over-ruled in the affirmative. 3. Whether a Grand Jury ought not to find the bill proved. Answered his Lordship knew to the contrary. The last article was that the witness swore for reward and had it. Answer, What the King gave was nothing, or any one else unless they could prove the prosecutors gave them anything. So his Lordship is to come on Monday, I presume to receive sentence. The proclamation for a public fast the 22nd of this month, being Wednesday.

EARL OF ARRAN to ORMOND.

1680, Nov. 30. London.—Though there came in three packets on Sunday night last, yet I received not yours of the 16th and 19th until late last night, and before I had received them Mr. Bridgeman had given the narrative to the Clerk of the House of Commons without reading or keeping a copy of it. I hope Sir John Davys will bring a copy with him. I shall keep by me the answer to the objections against disarming the Protestants in '63, but I cannot yet with certainty learn what will be laid on your charge. I am told that one article will be that you sent Sir George Lane some years ago to a meeting of Irish clergy and that he sat in council with them by your direction; to which I have no answer, but that I believe it not true.

This day has been taken up upon the trial of my Lord Stafford, which has sufficiently tired me. I shall the first opportunity prepare His Majesty in the business you mention concerning Rolls, and will know his pleasure before the next post in the affair of the Commissioners of Appeal. The managers took up our time in proving a plot in general, and to-morrow they come to the particular charge. I observed that Oates did not mention you in his deposition.

FRANCIS GWYN to ORMOND.

1680, Nov. 30. London.—The trial this day begun of the Lord Stafford took up the eyes and minds of all people. The Lord Chancellor sat as High Steward, but without commission. The managers of the House of Commons who this day appeared were Serjeant Maynard, who first opened the matter, Sir Fra. Winington, Mr. Treby, Mr. Hambden, and Sir John Trevor. The method that was taken was to lay open the plot in general, Dr. Oates, Mr. Dugdale, Mr. Smith, Mr. Jenison, Mr. Prance, and Mr. Barnard Dennis (at this time a Dominican Friar of the county of Sligo, in Ireland), upon oath gave an account of a general design of murdering the King and subverting the religion and Government; after which were produced several copies of the records of the convictions and condemnations of Langhorne, Coleman, Pickering, Grove, etc., all which were brought as proofs, and they concluded this day with summing up the evidence that there was a general plot in England, Scotland and Ireland carried on by the Popish faction. The particular proofs against the Lord Stafford was deferred till to-morrow, and his Lordship hath put off his answer to the general plot as well as to his own particular concern in it till the witnesses against him have ended their evidence.

ORMOND to EARL OF ARRAN.

1680, Dec. 1. Dublin.—Yours of the 23rd of November is received, which is all the answer it requires. Upon my motion a new proclamation for disarming of Papists without excepting those that had licences is set forth, but it will be liable to the same exception the other was of giving of warning, no other so good a way being found upon long debate at Council, where this course was unanimously agreed upon. I am sorry that after all I have done for Buck he should be in danger of dying in so ill condition. I am sure he has raised good sums of money upon places he had here, and upon one I gave him in the household, besides above 100*l.* a year he has long made and still makes of a farm he has from me, of which, perhaps, 40*l.* may be the interest of the 400*l.* he speaks of. This is not to avoid the doing all the good I can to his children, for whom I shall be much concerned in consideration of his long and faithful service to me and my family.

MINUTE OF A COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL IN THE COUNCIL CHAMBER OF DUBLIN.

3 December, 1680. Present :—

Lord Granard.	Sir Oliver St. George.
Lord Blessington.	Sir Wm. Stewart.
Sir Wm. Flower.	Col. Cary Dillon.
Sir Theoph. Jones.	Capt. Rob. Fitzgerald.
	Capt. Edw. Brabazon.

There are quartered in the province of Leinster.	Munster.

Horse, 10 Troops; Foot, 15 Companies.	Horse, 5 Troops; Foot, 24 Companies.
Ulster.	Connaught.
Horse, 6 Troops; Foot, 19 Companies.	Horse, 3 Troops; Foot, 12 Companies.

There may be drawn to do duty at Dublin :—

Two troops of horse out of Leinster. One troop of horse out of Ulster. One troop of horse out of Munster. None out of Connaught till all the rest have taken their turns, because there are so few horse there. Two foot companies out of Leinster at present. One company out of Ulster. Two companies out of Munster. One company out of Connaught. To be upon duty two months. To begin immediately or at what time his Grace shall think most convenient.

EARL OF BURLINGTON to ORMOND.

1680, Dec. 4. Dublin.—I had sooner acknowledged the the receipt of the honour of your Grace's letter, but that I was for some days kept in by the gout, which treated me more favourably than it usually does, and left me just when my Lord Stafford's trial began, which has tied us to such long and strict attendance that we have scarce had time either to eat or rest. Last night the examination of the witnesses on both sides was finished, as this day will be, I believe, the summing of the evidence and then judgment will be pronounced within a day or two after. A weaker defence I have not observed than was made by his Lordship, nor evidence better ordered than was that of the House of Commons, which your Grace will easily believe when Sir William Jones, Serjeant Maynard and Sir Francis Winington were three of the principal managers. Many are of opinion that nothing can save his life but a full discovery of the Plot, since the evidence is so full against him as they conceive it to be, and it was last night affirmed in the House that he was very inclinable to do so, if the importunities of his daughter, the Marquisse of Winchester, did not keep him from doing of it, upon which it was moved that she might be kept from him, but that being thought to be an act of so much harshness, that motion was quashed.

I must with great thankfulness acknowledge your Grace's favour to me in the commission you were pleased to grant me lately of the government of the county of Cork, and in making upon my request Lieutenant Supple sheriff of that county, and 'do wish that I had any occasion to evidence the sense I have both of these and those other favours your Grace has placed upon me.

Francis Gwyn to Ormond.

1680, Dec. 4. London.—This day being the fifth of my Lord Stafford's trial was taken up by Sir William Jones, Mr. Powle, and Sir Francis Winington, appointed managers by the House of Commons in summing up the evidence against the prisoner. The method they observed was, as in the beginning of the trial, first to speak to the Plot in general and then to come to the particular proof against the Lord Stafford and to disprove the witnesses produced in his behalf, which by his Lordship's ill management of his evidence he had given them great opportunity to do. My Lord concluded with three points of law, which he desired his counsel, Mr. Wallop and Mr. Hunt might speak to, the first was whether a Bill ought not first to be found by a Grand Jury before a peer came to be tried by his peers, which was over-ruled by the Court by reason that an impeachment of the House of Commons was in the same nature with a Bill found by a Grand Jury, and therefore counsel not allowed to speak in that matter. My Lord Stafford likewise asked the judgment of the Court concerning the method of impeachment, whether one being brought in one Parliament could be tried in a succeeding Parliament, which was affirmed by the Court to be the constant practice of all Parliaments. The second matter of law the prisoner insisted upon was that there was no overt act of treason proved against him, and that the witnesses speaking to discourses he had with them at several times could not be said to be witnesses to the same fact, and so there were not two witnesses against him. This my Lord Stafford insisted upon, and that his counsel should be heard to that point. Mr. Wallop, his Lordship's counsel assigned, said that he was not prepared to speak to that point, but desired the Court to determine therein. Whereupon the Court rose and went to the House of Lords, where after a very short debate the Lords returned again, and my Lord Steward told the prisoner at the bar that their Lordships had ordered the Judges to give their opinions in that matter. They declared unanimously their opinions that the receiving a commission, the proffering Dugdale money and speaking to Turberville to kill the King was an overt act, and that the witnesses swearing all to a treason of the same nature, though it was at several times and places were sufficient evidence of the treason. After which the Court adjourned till Monday, and then it is believed judgment will be given against my Lord Stafford.

The trial hath so taken up the Lords that there hath been no Council this week, only five or six met on Wednesday last, where Mr. Secretary Jenkins brought a letter just then received by the post from Dr. Lampleigh, a Justice of Peace of Oxford, which gave an account that three sufficient men of the neighbourhood had deposed before him that one Pickering, brother to him that was hanged for designing to shoot the King, had said that if the King tried the Popish Lords in the Tower he should not live half a year after. Mr. Secretary acquainted His Majesty therewith, who ordered it the next morning to be transmitted to the House of Commons. Pickering is in custody, and the House have sent for him up.

Earl of Arran to Ormond.

1680, Dec. 4. London.—Since my last I have your Grace's of the 19th and 28th of the last month, and was very glad to find the latter writ in your own hand for by Mr. Secretary Gascoigne's of the 23rd I had reason to apprehend your being laid up of the gout. Ever since Tuesday last we have sat until night upon the trial of my Lord Stafford, and now all is heard, and upon Monday next sentence is to be given after we have debated some points amongst ourselves. Sir William Jones summed up the evidence and did it with great dexterity, and his Lordship made his defence with very little, yet it is uncertain which way it will go, for though three witnesses have sworn point blank against him as Oates, Dugdale, and Turberville, they are not thought so credible witnesses by some of the Lords as the managers of the evidence would have them pass for. But let this trial go one way or other it must needs be of infinite consequence.

The King, I believe, will determine himself on this side the business of the Commissioners of Inspection, and for what relates to the Scots Regiments recruits I have spoken to the parties most concerned in it long since.

I hear every post of great apprehensions and new discoveries from Munster and that from Lords Essex and Burlington. I wonder your Grace sends me no account of it; and yesterday Lord Shaftesbury informed the House of a titular Bishop that would make great discoveries. I wish you had an abler man than I am upon the place to act in these intricate times and affairs, for I wish with all my heart that I were in some quiet retirement; yet my comfort is that I find many whom you account wise men as much to seek as myself.

I hear from Matt. Anderson that my Lord Tyrone will be here on Wednesday next, and from Sir John Davys, who is now at Mostyn, that he will be here the Saturday following the Thursday's stage coach, being taken up by my Lord Tyrone.

Earl of Longford to Ormond.

1680, Dec. 4. London.—I presume my wife has acquainted your Grace with a sudden indisposition which has detained me here a fortnight longer than I intended, but being (I thank God) now pretty well recovered, if I find no alteration in my health between this and Wednesday next I resolve then to begin my journey, for I have stayed here so long to find that I can be no further useful to your Grace, since the world does not desire to be informed so much of the truth and convinced of the innocency of those upon whom scandals are cast, as it does to have persons of the best quality and most known loyalty represented criminal. This I intimate only with relation to your Grace, against whom your enemies are maliciously industrious to cast all aspersions imaginable to prepare the way for those riff-raff articles are designed to be brought in against you into the House of Commons, who are not yet at leisure to receive them, having for the present work enough upon their hands. I am told, to raise the clamour greater, there is a collection made of all my Lord Meath's articles, of all those libellous reflections Peter Talbot made upon your former Government, as also of what stuff has been gathered together since your Lordship's going into Ireland; and the sum of all is to remove your Grace from the Government, which is not thought secure, but in a confiding hand or with a thorough English Protestant (which is now the phrase in mode).

These four last days have been spent in the evidence against my Lord Stafford and his Lordship's defence, both which are this day concluded, and the Lords have taken time till Monday morning to give sentence, which, 'tis generally believed, will be against his Lordship. But my Lord Arran, who was present upon the place, and a witness of the whole transaction, is better able to inform your Grace than I who have been confined to my chamber. My Lord Shaftesbury has got a pardon for a titular Bishop and another ecclesiastic who are to come in as discoverers of the Plot from beyond sea.

ORMOND to EARL OF ARRAN.

1680, Dec. 6. Dublin.—I have received yours of the 27th, of the last and hope my Lord Longford will be soon here to help my defect if the gout takes me in my right hand as it threatens. Sir John Davys, I suppose, will be with you before this letter. He carries with him all that this place can furnish for the vindication of the Government, one of the greatest omissions whereof was the not hanging of Kennedy. Sir James Butler's last letter to me concerning the bailiwick of Westminster seemed rather to justify the steward's taking money for the place as a thing practised in all times, but in the present case I know not how it could be since there was not a clear vacancy, but would have been as glad you had told me more particularly what was referred to my Lord Chancellor and the Bishop and what was determined. I send you a printed copy I set forth by advice of a Council of War. The penalties, by whomsoever it shall be incurred, will be strictly inflicted, which it were good might be known to all the officers that are on that side the water.

EARL OF ARRAN to ORMOND.

1680, Dec. 7. London.—This day my Lord Stafford was found guilty of treason; the peers were 86 in number, 32 not guilty, 54 guilty. I suppose Mr. Mulys will send your Grace the names of those who voted for and against him. I shall only observe that of five peers in his family or name four found him guilty, and all the gentlemen of His Majesty's bedchamber, but my Lord Bath, were for guilty.

My Lord Suffolk desired me to write to you about the money due from you to Churchill, which I find is assigned to him. It seems I mistook his letter to me when I was in Ireland, for I thought by that he had been satisfied another way.

My Lord Tyrone will be here to-morrow, and I believe he will go the same way my Lord Stafford is like to go, for we are in a way now of making precedents, and following none but such as make for the present purpose.

COL. EDWARD COOKE to ORMOND.

1680, Dec. 7. London.—This morning I begin my tedious western journey to do that young Lord Poulett the best service I can, carrying along with me the remains of this new fever. I hope to be back again next Saturday fortnight. All I can now say is my own conjectures only, that my Lord

Stafford will at length be acquitted, many being dissatisfied at different circumstances. The learned scruple of the legality of an impeachment being turned over from one Parliament to another. Others are not well satisfied how mean words without any overt act should extend to treason, making this nice distinction,—had money been produced and promised to be the reward of him that should kill the King, that had been an overt act, but a mere promise are but words, and many others cannot reconcile themselves to the witnesses, who it seems have been guilty of shrewd mistakes in circumstances of time, and many believe the better of my Lord for his weak management, for never was a poorer defence made. On the whole matter every scruple looks a voice of theirs who make it, so that I foresee his Lordship will this day be acquitted, though I shall not stay to see it, nor the consequence of it. It seems the managers for the House of Commons have three fresh witnesses, but are not willing to make them threadbare, concluding two witnesses to fall in the same particular that they conclude him as good as condemned already, that I apprehend the consequence of this disappointment.

John Fell, Bishop of Oxford, to Sir Robert Southwell.

1680, Dec. 9. Oxford.—I missed the opportunity which I desired of kissing your hands at London and welcoming your safe return from your embassy, and therefore am the more concerned to lay hold of the opportunity which your kinsman now gives of addressing to you. Your client my Lord Courcy now grows up towards a man, and is desirous to look abroad into the world; he has few friends, and scarce any one who with so much charity and honour looks upon his broken fortunes; and therefore I must recommend him to your favour, which he has long experimented, that thereby he may either be placed in some military employment or attend my Lord Ossory in his travel, or be some way disposed of as may be for his future advantage; for I perceive he thinks his longer continuance here a disparagement; and when men are once weary of an University life it ceases to be useful. If Sir John Percival be with you I desire you would be pleased to recommend my service to him.

Earl of Arran to Ormond.

1680, Dec. 11. London.—I have your Grace's letter of the 1st inst., and with it one of the proclamations you have lately agreed upon for the disarming anew the Papists, which shall be given about, tho' I know 709 will say he is the occasion of that. Since my Lord Stafford's trial our House has been chiefly taken up with hearing causes upon writs of error and appeals, and the House of Commons with the examining Mr. Secretary Jenkins and examining and punishing Mr. Thomas Sheridan, as you will find by the printed votes.

I cannot learn what is intended to be brought in against you, nor when that which is collected will be delivered, but I am told that something is drawn up, but not intended by way of impeachment. Mr. Mulys has engaged to my Lord Chamberlain to look about, and what charge he may be put to and his pains I have promised shall be considered, for it will be of great use to have a copy early of the charge, and people will not now take pains in another body's business for nothing.

Ned Vernon is in trouble yet about his business. He intends after next term to go over, and then he will plead any way rather than be so troublesome to you as he has been. Mr. Buck is yet alive, but past hope of recovery. He told me when I was last with him that he sold a place at Court you gave him to lend you 400*l*., but perhaps his memory failed him. I beg your pardon for writing in matters of this kind. I shall only tell you that Ned Fitzharris is in a very low condition. He has been very serviceable to you.

Sir John Davis is just come to town, and I find by him who it was that informed my Lord Shaftesbury that Levallin was not looked after in three days after notice that he was in the country.

Ormond to Earl of Arran.

1680 Dec. 13. Dublin.—I have yours of the 30th of the last and 4th and 7th of this month. The last was under my Lord of Longford's cover, and so was one directed to his lady, which I suppose gives an account of his coming away the next day. I know not what can be meant by my sending Sir George Lane to a meeting of the Irish clergy and sitting with them, but sure I am there could be nothing like it this thirty year. All that is yet come to me of discoveries and fears in Munster you will find in the copies of examinations and letters herewith inclosed. The Council do not think that matter driven far enough to be transmitted. What this day's letters out of the country may bring us I do not yet know. If anything material comes before the post goes you shall have notice of it, for I write early in the morning, this fit of the gout being, I hope, over. I thought the heat and frequency of alarms in that province had been much abated since my Lord of Orrery's death, but his sister has correspondents here as zealous as he was, but not so inventive. It is painful to live under the apprehensions the wisest and the best men must have about them. The best remedy is submission to God's pleasure, owning His justice, and dependence on His merciful providence. I have long wished for that retirement you would be pleased with for yourself, as much more suitable to my age, but the importunity of friends and their flattery that I might be of use to the public prevailed against my inclination, and now I am found in suspicious times, in an envied and slippery station which I cannot quit with honour against the command of my Master, nor hold with safety. My Lord of Longford writes of collections preparing to make up articles against me, but if I knew from whom he has this information some guess might be made of the importance of the design.

Francis Gwyn to Ormond.

1680, Dec. 14. London.—I did not give your Grace the trouble of any letters the last two posts, having nothing but public news concerning the Lord Stafford's trial, which I presume your Grace received from better hands, I being at that time engaged in a solicitation to preserve myself from the effects of the late order of suspension in Ireland, which remains as yet undetermined, but with your Grace's favour I may have some hopes of it, though I find myself pressed very hard by my Lord of Essex. This day the House of Commons proceeded upon the inquiry into the matter relating to Sir Robert Peyton and have proceeded to expel him the House. They have not yet made any further progress upon Mr. Secretary Jenkins since the vote on Friday, but it at present stands sine die, and in the meantime he refrains coming to the House, as Mr. Seymour likewise hath done ever since the articles of impeachment put in against him. I do not yet hear the day of execution of the Lord Stafford is appointed, though there being a motion made this day in the House of Lords for the expediting it, my Lord Chancellor answered there had been some consideration had of that matter already.

One of the Judge's places being vacant in the Court of Common Pleas by the death of Sir William Ellis (it is said) will be supplied by Sir Creswell Levinge, His Majesty's Attorney General, and it is likewise reported (though I believe not with so much certainty) that Mr. Williams, Speaker of the House of Commons, is to be Attorney General in his room.

I have herewith enclosed the Lord Chancellor's speech upon the condemnation of the Lord Stafford, together with yesterday's votes.

Earl of Arran to Ormond.

1680, Dec. 14. London.—I have nothing to say this post more than what you will find in the prints and journals, but that it's believed the House of Commons will proceed no farther against Sir Lyonel Jenkins and that the King has sent orders for us to be in our robes to-morrow. It is not to prorogue the Parliament, but as I am informed it is to mind the Parliament again of the ill posture of his affairs and of the ill condition Tangier is in. I brought Sir John Davys to His Majesty this morning, and he was very gracious to him. My Lord Sunderland is not so easy to be found, but I will watch a proper time. It is thought best he should not bring the business upon the carpet himself, but be ready if he should be called upon. My Lord Burlington's talking of a letter he had from his brother Shannon about some arms he seized upon, and saying it at the Committee has made a report about the whole town that Ireland is in rebellion.

EARL OF LONGFORD to ORMOND.

1680, Dec. 14. London.—Though I cannot say I am quite recovered of my cold, yet (I thank God) I am so well of it that I had begun my journey to-morrow had not my Lord Chamberlain desired me last night so to order my journey that I might meet my Lady Ossory on Monday night at Stony Stratford after she has made her visit at Mr. Bennett's, that from her mouth I might be fully instructed to give your Grace an account of the young lady, which my Lord Arlington thinks so necessary a point for your Grace's satisfaction that he easily persuaded me to it.

Since the severe vote of the House of Commons on Friday last against Sir Leollyn Jenkins there has been nothing further done, though the debate of it was adjourned to yesterday, when it passed sub silentio, and it is believed there will be nothing further stirred in it. Mr. Sheridan is still a close prisoner and for aught I can find like to be so while the Parliament sits; for since they cannot make him confess the author of the letter and to whom it was written, they will proceed against him as the only criminal in it. They have also his nephew Mr. Wilson in custody (but not in the same House), who confesses the transcript of the letter to be his handwriting, but knows not by whom or to whom it was written.

This day the Commons have expelled Sir Robert Peyton out of the House, and he not attending to receive his sentence at the Bar, they have ordered him to be taken into custody. Col. Vernon tells me that by the last post he had an account from his agent in Dublin that Peter Reade, your Grace's agent, has orders the next term to prosecute in your Grace's name the suit against him for the lands of Ruskoe, which if true seems somewhat hard, your Grace having by my Lord Arran commanded him from Tydberrye hither and diverted him by that means from his journey into Ireland, whither he was going to defend himself against Mr. Butler of Ruscoe. And to my knowledge he has not been an unuseful servant to your Grace in this conjuncture since his being in town; nay, this very morning he had an occasion of rendering your Grace some service amongst some members of the House of Commons, whom he undeceived in a story they were prepossessed with to your Grace's prejudice. Therefore I hope your Grace will have some regard to your old servant, notwithstanding any importunities may be used there to the contrary. Sir John Davys came to town on Saturday, and this morning was presented by my Lord Arran to the King, who received him very graciously. I have for some time kept Captain Eastland here to accompany me into Ireland, which I hope your Grace will pardon both to him and me. A story of a letter which my Lord Burlington is said to have received out of Ireland has for these two days filled the town with a report that the Irish are in arms in Ireland.

JOHN VESEY, ARCHBISHOP OF TUAM, to ORMOND.

1680, Dec. 17. Tuam.—It would be a very great comfort to me and the few Protestants in this desolate part of the country if your Grace were pleased at this time, when men's minds are possessed with I know not what fears of evils which I hope will never come upon them, to order a foot company to quarter in this town. The security of it would be great to the English that are very thinly and insecurely planted, if any danger (which God forbid) should arise in conveying them to the next place of strength; whereas in the posture they now are in they have no place of refuge between the County of Mayo and Galway in case of a sudden storm, and must consequently perish as many did in the beginning of the late rebellion for want of a timely foresight or just provision. Should your Grace's wisdom think fit to consider what is here humbly offered it would much settle the minds of men here and greatly add to the honours your Grace has already done me in making the enjoyments I have here by your Grace's favour more assured and valuable.

SIR JOHN DAVYS to ORMOND.

1680, Dec. 18. London.—I did not reach this place until Saturday night last, neither could I rig myself out fit to appear, and to be able to give your Grace an earlier account of my having delivered the recommendatory letters which your Grace honoured me with hither, and which have caused my affairs here to move very prosperously hitherto, for the King received me most graciously upon them; and they did and still do produce extreme civil treatments from his ministers to me, so as I do every day meet with fresh occasions of acknowledging your Grace's favours for me.

I was told by Mr. Gwyn, the clerk of the Council in waiting, that the letter from your Grace and the Board and your Grace's private one to my Lord Sunderland in my favour were read yesterday in Council, and that they gave such full satisfaction concerning me that there was no room for objection, neither was any other made but that I took a very unnecessary journey, which for my part I think was a necessary one if it were to no other end than to have such a solemn declaration made of me, so as I am amply justified there and don't doubt but by the blessing of God to meet with the like success if I should be summoned before the Parliament, where my Lord Arran (who next your Grace is the kindest person upon earth to me) and all my friends besides do utterly disadvise my officious producing of myself and entering the list with my little adversary until I am called to it by a greater and better authority than their narrative, which as yet is not; and it is questioned, now I am upon the place and having such materials for my defence with me, if it ever will be done, for there has not yet been the least step made towards it since my coming, and therefore all I have now to do in that particular is to be watchful whether any motion happen to be made against me and, lest there should, to endeavour the softening of some seeming hard hearted people, wherein I have already made a considerable progress.

Neither am I alone vigilant as to myself, but careful also to hear what is said concerning your Grace, for evil tongues do now make bold with the greatest as well as with the meanest of men. All worthy and honest persons I meet with do speak with great honour of your Grace's person, and with great certainty of your Grace's loyalty to the King and sincerity to the Protestant religion and look upon both to be abundantly safe under your Grace's administration, and for those who are differently qualified and evilly inclined as to your Grace, and ready enough to speak, I cannot learn any material things they have to put against your Grace. That which I hear they place the greatest weight upon is the business of Levallin, and your Grace not issuing earlier orders for apprehending of him, and this is mentioned here in the very words that worthy Councillor did use who refused to sign the narrative, so as this arrow did most assuredly come out of that quiver, which your Grace may please to make your own use of without mentioning me in it, and if your Grace would also please certainly to recollect the time when and the manner how your Grace first had the notice of that business of Lavallin and how soon afterwards orders were issued for taking him, and who of the Council were attending your Grace and advising concerning it (for I'm mistaken if the aforesaid Councillor was not one) and transmit a narrative of all this to my Lord Arran, I humbly conceive it would not be inconvenient, especially since such a stress is put upon that matter; neither would it be inconvenient in my humble opinion if your Grace thought fit as any account is sent to authority here either from your Grace alone or from the Council Board that a copy thereof may be at the same time sent also to my Lord Arran, for I find nothing kept more a secret in certain places here than those accounts whereby people abroad do either see nothing of the proceedings in Ireland or understand nothing of them but by the clandestine misrepresentations of some private and false hands, whereas by the other way of proceeding truth will appear and in the end will no doubt prevail and justify itself, your Grace and all the rest of its followers.

EARL OF ARRAN to ORMOND.

1860, Dec. 18. London.—I had on Wednesday last your Grace's letter of the 6th, with a printed order for all the officers of the Irish army to repair to their commands under a severe penalty. I hope peers are excepted, though the order is not clear in that point. I have got Mr. Ellis to acquaint all the officers that are in town of your commands in that matter, and he has writ to those who are out of town, and Sir Cyril Wyche has writ to Col. Butler, whom I find the King much concerned for, but not so much as to give him any more licences to stay from his command, but would have him have leave to sell. If that which I have propounded in behalf of Captain Hayes by Lord Longford is not approved of by your Grace, I desire he may sell to Mr. Foord. Vere Cromwell is ill of the scattick, and Captain Gilbert Talbot of an ague, of which they will have certificates.

As to the business of the bailiwick of Westminster, whatever Sir James may have writ I am sure he told me both that place and yours of High Steward were forfeited if proof could be made that money was paid, and the thing is true. The matter now stands thus. Mr. Ellis has paid or has secured to pay Stroud 1,000*l.* and is to pay Sir William Boreman for your use the 500*l.* due to you from Stroud and Stroud's bond is given up.

My Lord Longford will tell your Grace at large what was done this day in our House concerning my Lord Stafford.

HENRY COVENTRY to ORMOND.

1680, Dec. 18. Piccadilly.—I have been so long under an indisposition that I have not been able to pay my accustomed duty to your Grace; neither indeed had I anything that I could take any delight in writing, or you in hearing. My letters have been for some years a little melancholy, but should I write you my mind now they would be desperate. The Government seemeth in a kind of derout; neither can I see how it can well rally again, nor guess what use those that have done it will make of it. The ways to disorder are much easier than to settlement. This nation hath once found it, and I pray God it do not so again. My Lord Longford will give your Grace ample detail of what passeth here both in relation to the public and your private concerns, and when he hath done it I believe you will think my conceptions proceed not barely from the spleen, but I will detain your Grace no longer with my thoughts that have nothing but melancholy, not being able in this mist so much as to see my way, much less make it.

EARL OF LONGFORD to ORMOND.

1680, Dec. 18. London.—My Lord Chamberlain understanding by Mr. Mulys that my Lady Ossory did not intend to set out from Knowsley till Tuesday last, by which means she cannot be at Northampton till Monday and consequently cannot call at Mr. Bennett's till Tuesday, when I design to meet her at Stony Stratford and from thence shall hasten to the waterside. My Lord Chamberlain desired me to stay here till Monday, thinking it will be much for your Grace's satisfaction to have a full account of that affair.

This day my Lord Carlisle acquainted the House of Lords that my Lord Stafford begged the favour of their Lordships that he might be once more admitted into their presence to acquaint their Lordships with all that he knew relating to the Plot. Upon which their Lordships sent my Lord Carlisle to fetch him and to tell him beforehand that if he made a full and ingenuous discovery of the Plot they would intercede with His Majesty for his pardon, but if he trifled with them in not making a material discovery they would be so far from interceding for him that they would make it their request to the King that the sentence should be executed upon him with the utmost rigour and severity. His Lordship being brought to the House and called in, he did with tears acknowledge he was guilty of a great crime in endeavouring to overthrow the government of the Church as it was established by law, and in order to it had waited upon the King at Breda before his restoration to solicit him for indulgence to the Catholics; that he had often repeated his solicitations in that particular very frequently since his restoration, and that to incline His Majesty to it he had two years after his restoration laboured to persuade the Papists to raise amongst themselves 100,000*l.* by way of present to His Majesty, which not succeeding by reason of their unwillingness to part with money he was forced to desist; that sometime after the Catholics had a meeting at my Lord of Bristol's house in order to the obtaining from His Majesty a relaxation of the penal laws and had entered into an oath of secrecy, with which he being after dissatisfied came the next day to my Lord Bristol, acquainted him with the dissatisfaction he had to their method of proceeding, and told him he would not be obliged by that oath they had taken, and therefore renounced it. That a little before the late Long Parliament (as it is now styled) was dissolved my Lord Shaftesbury came to him and pressed him to persuade the Duke to effect the dissolution of that Parliament, by which means a Parliament of another genius would probably be chosen who would grant indulgence to Dissenters, and then the Papists might hope for their share of it. Upon this my Lord Shaftesbury moved my Lord Stafford might withdraw, which being done his Lordship told the House that it was evident my Lord Stafford trifled with their Lordships, for instead of making a discovery he justified his own innocency and abused their Lordships, therefore he moved their Lordships would hear him no more, but that he might be carried back to the Tower, which was ordered accordingly.

This day the House of Commons took His Majesty's speech into consideration, and after two hours resolved to supply His Majesty for the support of Tangier, for the setting out his fleet, and for the maintenance of his alliances abroad, upon condition that His Majesty would consent to the cutting off the Duke from the succession to the Crown, that a Bill of Association might pass, and that a Bill might pass for having frequent Parliaments, and this was referred to a Commitee to be drawn up into an address to be presented to His Majesty. The Parliament will not meddle with our Irish affairs till after Christmas.

Sir L Jenkins to Ormond.

1680, Dec. 18. Whitehall.—Mr. Secretary Davys delivered me the letter that your Grace did me the great honour to write to me by him. I should be intolerably vain if I should think myself, especially in the circumstances I am in at this time, capable to render him any service. I cannot imagine he will want any, his case is so clear, and his testimonials so strong. However, I shall not be wanting to the utmost of my power; a common calamity as well as his own worth obliging me to it. This day seems to me a critical day in the House of Commons, for they were upon the speech they had lately made to them by His Majesty. I think there is no more upon their books but a vote for an address to His Majesty in answer to his speech, which is to be prepared by a committee upon the debate of the House. The debate ran :—

1. For the Bill of Exclusion and that it do pass the Royal Assent before other things be taken into consideration.

2. For an Act of Association, without which the other (they say) will be of no effect.

3. The purging and regulating of Westminster Hall and that the Judges have their places, quamdiu se bene gesserint.

4. For the regulating of Lords Lieutenants and Deputy Lieutenants, where the Marquess of Worcester was personally named as having too great a trust.

5. For regulating and restoring the Justices of Peace.

6. For putting the Navy into such hands as may be trusted.

7. For taking away standing forces, and inland garrisons, and then they will give money as the necessity of Tanger and the fleet shall require, and if it shall appear upon enquiry that our alliances prove to be useful for the perservation of the Protestant religion and the interest of this Crown, they will encourage such alliances.

Thus your Grace, my Lord, sees what the King is to trust to. I beseech God to direct and preserve him.

Sir Hans Hamilton to Ormond.

1680, Dec. 18.—About a fortnight ago one Owen Murphy brought me an order from your Grace and the Council requiring all officers, civil and military, to be aiding and assisting to the said Murphy in apprehending and sending to Dublin all such persons as the said Murphy should think fit to apprehend in order to the discovery of the Popish Plot in Ireland. Having perused the order, he desired my warrant for apprehending all such, and also an order to the several officers and soldiers who are in this country appointed to prosecute the Tories to be aiding and assisting to him in the said service. In your Grace and Council's order was recited an order or letter from the House of Lords in England for giving the said Murphy all assistance, which made me the more cautious how to act in so general a warrant, for by it he might apprehend all persons in the country against whom he had any prejudice as well as those concerned in the discovery of the Plot; but I got him to give me a list of such as he desired to apprehend, being about sixteen in all. He left one McGennis to execute the warrant I gave him, who since brought me several of them, and at his desire I have bound them over to appear in a short time before the Lord Chief Justice in Dublin. I thought it my duty to acquaint your Grace with this lest a clamour might come to your Grace's ears of so many being apprehended by my warrant, and perhaps little to be said to them or by them in reference to the Plot or aught else. As I was writing this to your Grace these inclosed came to me, which I trouble your Grace with; if under pretence of discovering the Plot such bloody murderers shall be pardoned, it will be good encouragement for others to turn Tories. These letters* were found in the hands of Redmond O'Hanlon's mother-in-law by one Mullan, who I employed to prosecute the Tories; and having apprehended some of Redmond's receivers in whose hands they found goods robbed from some travellers on the road the said woman was in one of their houses, and seeing Mullan come in she went to hide these letters; he believing it to be money went to her and took them from her; the letters and the receivers he brought to me, but not the woman, and now your Grace sees that a small sum of money of monies given to the son-in-law (for so it is probable to be) will prevail with that B. to procure pardon for so bloody murderers as these are known to be by one means or other.

Copy.

Rev. James Callaghan to Henry Gardner.

1680, Dec. 18. London.—You may understand that I and the rest of my company are very well, hoping that you are likewise and all the rest of our well-wishers. As for Papists, it was enacted and established by both the Houses of the Lords and Commons that no Papists or suspected may live in the cities of London and Westminster Hall or within twenty miles of the same. My Lord Stafford, who has been a great peer of this realm, is to be executed next Monday for being impeached to have a hand in the plot against His Majesty. There is several other great Lords in the Tower who are like to suffer also, for there are several evidences ready to swear positively against them. Your friend Sir John Davys, who was Secretary of State in Dublin, is here in custody and is impeached with high treason. Moreover inform my loving friend Mr. Denis Raverty that his worthy friend, Oliver Plunkett, Primate and Metropolitan of all Ireland heretofore so titulated, is upon the Newgate of London to his great woe, and let Mr. Denis be sure not to fear any suborned evidence against the next Assizes of Ardmagh, for there are as many priests, friars and other chief members of the laity out of Munster, Leinster, Connaught, Italy, England and other parts as might hang him and a thousand more if they had been as much concerned as he is. As for our part, notwithstanding our great report in Ireland is nothing in comparison to the rest of his adversaries. Pray be sure to assist my cousin Edmond concerning the business that you know of, and let me understand that you shall be careful of himself and pray do not neglect to forward him the way that you know yourself, which I know you may very well do (and God willing) there is no kindness that you shall shew him, or any other of my friends, but shall be requited ere it be long, if I be a living man; and let my cousin Edmond send to Neale Callaghan who was in trouble concerning the Tories, when I came out of Ireland, and if he or any other of my friends be in any such trouble, let them come to you that you may send me an account of all their businesses, and be sure to direct your letters to Mr. Jones' coffee-house near the Royal Exchange. As for your rent doubt it not, and let my cousin Thomas McDonnell and my curate pay you whatever is behind of the old debt, and if you or my cousin Edmond can have tenants to plough the land now, let them not fear the rent, for if I did continue here in London I might discharge them of all troubles whatsoever, and much more I trust in Jesus Christ that they shall see me in those parts with a merry meeting towards Candlemas next. Pray be pleased to inform Sir Toby Poyntz that I have not forgotten his request of me the time we were together, and let him understand that I did not rest until I got it done to his own desire, and if any of my friends shall occasion for him, let him use them as his accustomed favour was towards myself always. The most part of the gentry of the west parts of Ireland is impeached with the Plot, but none out of the north; as for Red. Laughlin and Ed. Kane their protection is ready drawn, signed and sealed without the least impediment, only expecting some moneys to bear their charges, though with much ado, yet let me beg of you as a trusty friend to keep this very private, until it shall be publicly known unto all others, not only this but several things I did expect to inform you with, but that I am called immediately before King and Parliament. Therefore I trust all to your own discretion until further liberty, only remembering my dutiful respects to yourself, to all my well wishers and especially to my most noble and worthy parishioners in general. My boy Terence Kelly desires to be remembered to his mother, to his brother, sisters, and all the rest of his friends, and I thank God he is in a better condition now than he was when he parted with them last, for he wants for neither clothes or meat, and has as many books of both English and Latin as he can make use of, studying both day and night in his chamber, but when I am abroad myself then of necessity he must wait upon me, and they shall see him shortly in a better condition than they expected.

* See pp. 535, 536 infra.

Endorsed :—To Henry Gardner, Innkeeper at Newry.

ORMOND to EARL OF ARRAN.

1680, Dec. 18. Dublin.—By yours of the 11th I find you had seen Sir John Davys. By this time I suppose you have produced him and he has acquainted you with all he carries with him in paper or in memory. We have since had additional informations taken in the county of Limerick, which seem to corroborate Mr. David Fitzgerald's first information and to make good David Nash his information in spite of his and Lynes retractions and criminations. These new witnesses applied themselves to Captain Odell, who took to his assistance two other Justices of Peace to prevent his being again calumniated for a suborner. His letter to me and the informations he sent with it of Maurice Fitzgerald and Murtagh Dowling are transcribing to be sent to my Lord Sunderland and the two informers are sent for according to their desire. The name of the latter I may mistake, the information not being by me, but, I think, I am near the sound of it. If any notice be sent of this matter and noise made of it before we can send them, this may serve for an account of it as it yet stands. Orders are sent by this night's post to commit eight gentlemen to safe custody and to take bonds of four or five more in the country of Limerick, against which latter the evidence is not so full as against the others. If these eight shall be sent for into England, as the Lord Brittas, Sir John Fitzgerald, Lacy and Brady have been and must go to London on the charge of this revenue, it will be a great burden to it and therefore it may be fit again to mind the King of our former desire that we may be no further charged with sending prisoners than to Chester, for I can see no end of informers, and such as must be taken into custody upon informations. The Lord Brittas is not yet to be found. His fellows are much troubled at his evasion, supposing it may prove an argument of their guilt.

EARL OF ARRAN to ORMOND.

1680, Dec. 21. London.—I had yesterday your Grace's of the 13th, but have none of the enclosed papers you mention, but the matter, is not great for the last alarum out of Munster is grown cool again. I am glad to hear you are in hopes this fit of the gout is over, the exercise your Grace used in the summer has without doubt lessened your fit; there is an oil to be bought of one that was a servant to Sir Philip Howard which my Lord Suffolk and Lord Shaftesbury commend as a very sovereign thing, both when the gout is upon one and for strengthening the part after the fit is over. I know not whether my Lord Longford has remembered to carry any with him. His Lordship went away early this morning. He will show your Grace some of the heads intended to be put in against you, and your answers to them will come soon enough, for I believe you will not be meddled with, if at all, until Christmas be over, but I believe I can myself answer all the particulars I have yet seen or heard of, if I may affirm Sir George Lane never met with the Popish clergy by your order or approbation since His Majesty's restoration. I have it from two persons severally that the parties who were active in this are Mr. Hayes, Mr. Roberts and one Morley, whom you have had often before you at the Board, and I believe Sir James Shaen, though my informers deny his having any hand in the matter, they being his friends. I forgot in the two or three last letters to assure you of the certainty of Fitzpatrick's having a command at Tangier. My Lord Inchiquin made him an ensign in his regiment before his Lordship's leaving Tangier. Mr. Buck died this morning.

Your Grace will find by the last address from the House of Commons that within a short time we shall know how matters must go.

Ormond to Earl of Arran.

1680, Dec. 21.—Your next will inform us to what purpose robes were put on as yours of the 14th mentioned. Geoghegan, one of the discoverers sent over with ample recommendation from the Council, has carried himself so extravagantly and insolently that it was yesterday resolved at Council he should be stopped in his career and brought hither to answer the many complaints brought against him. You may be sure they were palpable and enormous when we all agreed they were no longer to be endured. I believe one Owen Murphy sent to provide witnesses against Oliver Plunket, titular Primate, will be found faulty also, but there are yet no complaints of him. In a search made for Tories, their stolen goods and harbourers, by warrant from Sir Hans Hamilton, the originals of the enclosed copies were found, with whom and in what manner will appear to you by the copy of Sir Hans, his letter to me. You may guess who the Lord in England is that is depended on to get the pardon of Hanlon and his accomplices, and it appears upon what terms. If you find a fit opportunity it may be fit to show them to the King who can best judge what use may be made of the originals and when; in the meantime they shall be safely kept. I know not whether it may be safe to say it, but it is a truth that there seems to be as great a disposition to quietness in this kingdom as ever I observed. Here and in other parts parts of the kingdom I find that arms are brought in very fast upon the proclamation, and some who had leave to have arms but never had any, or not so many as they had leave for, are constrained to buy them and bring them in. I know not of so much ground for the report of this kingdom being in rebellion as the taking of any arms in Munster. Informations upon oath indeed there are of some powder and swords said to be lodged in a house and thence conveyed to O'Sullivan More's who was easily and quietly apprehended and is in custody at Cork to give an account of himself and, what is laid to his charge, tho' the taking of him was represented hither as a service of difficulty and danger. When a man of so great dependance living in a wild mountainous country, and not restored to his estate, is so easily brought in as he and O'Sullivan Bere's eldest son (who is in all circumstances like the other) have been, I know not who else is able to stand out; evade they may as divers have done in England and the Lord Brittas here. Whoever thinks it necessary for the good of England that Ireland should be made and kept poor may wish for a rebellion here, there being nothing but a war that can do it. I can tell who maintained that maxim in the politics, and possibly, so it were done, cares not how many Protestants may be destroyed by it. Neither the order of the House of Lords here or ours here did give so large authority to Owen Murphy as Sir Hans apprehended. [Encloses the two following letters.]

Deborah Annesley to Mrs. Katherine O'Hanlon.

1680, Dec. 7.—I am extremely troubled that I cannot give Mr. O'Hanlon no better account of what I was assured to prosper in. My Lord Lieutenant was overruled by the Council, who would not hear of his coming in, but has put 200*l.* on Redman [Redmond] O'Hanlon and 100*l.* on Loling, so that all the arguments could be used by my father could do no good; the proclamation will be out on Saturday against them, but my father is finding out a way in England for all those poor men, of which you shall know more from Mr. Annesley; because letters are opened I can say no more of that, but that way without doubt will secure them and bring them in, of which I desire you to send away immediately to Mr. Annesley who will inform you, and desire to hear from you concerning it and let them know that no means shall be left unsought to do them good, for my father will have them in, and let them not take it ill, for I could do no more if it had been for my own life. I shall stay here till I hear from you concerning what I wrote about them to Mr. Annesley, and no stone shall be left unturned to bring them in, which I question not but we shall find all will be well concerning them.

There is nothing set on Edmond Ban and Hagan.

FRANCIS ANNESLEY to MRS. KATHERINE O'HANLON.

1680, Dec. 9. Clough.—Mrs. Hanlon, I was directed from above to give you this account, that affairs in relation to your friends are in a worse condition than was expected. There is 200*l.* set on the head of one, and a hundred pounds as the price of the other, and a pardon had certainly been obtained for them if in so enormous a case it could have been done without violence to justice. I can tell you (if you come over to me, and possibly it may be worth your while) where the shoe pinches. I have only this to add (for it is not convenient to write my thoughts to you), and I beg your speedy answer to it, that I may return it to my Lord Bishop of Meath, who will acquaint the Council with their resolution in these two points :—

1. Whether Redman O'Hanlon will be a discoverer of the design for the French invasion here, and who in Ireland are the principal abettors ; if he doth this he need not doubt of countenance, pardon and reward also for himself and his two brothers.

2. If he will be at the charge of procuring and passing his own and his brothers with Neill O'Hagan's pardon in England : if so my Lord Bishop of Meath will draw up the petition for them and send it to a sure and honourable hand that will get it done without control. I also will improve my interest with the Earl of Anglesey and other friends there for their advantage.

This I do that they may know their condition here and what is purposed to be done in England for them by my assistance and kindness ; and the consideration of the misery they are in, and the inclination they ought to have to their own interest should prevail with them above all other advice how preferable is a quiet and peaceable life to that which you now lead. Therefore you should resolve to become honest men, and prove firm to the King's interests, and never deviate again from their obedience to the King if you can obtain once more his gracious pardon, which I question not may yet be obtained, though new difficulties are started.

Endorsed :—For Mrs. Katherine O'Hanlon, These

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER OF T. SAVAGE.

1680, Dec. 24. Dingle.—On the first of this instant parted from Bilbao, in Spain, the ship called Daniel of Garcia, now in this harbour laden with fruit, Peter Bally, master, who affirms that the current news in that place was that from Algiers there were ready to set sail thirty Turks men-of-war for the coast of England and Ireland, and that he was much advised to make all the despatch he could for the same reasons ; he further saith that the post brought constant news that the plague was very rife at Algiers ; he saw the comet nine days ago very plain at sea ; these things, pray, if you think fit, communicate to his Grace.

Earl of Arran to Ormond.

1680, Christmas Day. London.—Tho' the Lords adjourned on Thursday last to the 3rd of next month and acquainted the Commons with their intentions, yet they sat yesterday, and in the afternoon Sampson, Morley, Murphy, Moyer, Macnamara, Burke, and Eustace Comyn petitioned the House against Sir John Davys. The House heard only Sampson and Murphy, whom they could not understand. The former was very sharp upon Sir John, and did not spare my Lord Chancellor. The whole matter is referred to the Committee of Examinations, of which Col. Birch is chairman. I believe they have introduced this accusation only to usher in one against you. I have so laid out that I am confident I shall have a copy of the articles designed against you, and Kennedy is like to get them, for my Lord Barkley, who is his Gideon, has engaged him, and he is ready to swear that he was offered money to be a witness against you, but refused it.

My Lord Conway professes great kindness for you, and is very friendly to me upon all occasions, but he has desired a thing (and I find he sets much stress upon it) which you formerly refused my Lord Granard and me, and that is that Sir George Royden should part with his troop to his son, who, my Lord Conway says, is a very vigorous lusty young man. The denial will very much dissatisfy him, and it is not prudent at this time to lose him. He thinks he could be sure of the King's letter on his behalf, but will not seek for that out of respect to you. He desires me to tell you also that Landy Bolton goes in the next stage coach and hopes you will be favourable to him at his arrival. Cap. Gilbert Talbot is sick of an ague and has been so this great while, as your Grace may see by his physician's certificate. I have just now received your Grace's letter of the 18th and a paper from Mr. Gascoigne, about one Geoghegan, but I have not time to read it nor to go to Court and give you an account afterwards what His Majesty's answer will be about the prisoners you send over, but His Majesty I am sure will take them off your hands at Chester, for I spoke to him about two or three days ago, and he said he would give order in it.

Earl of Arran to Ormond.

1680, Dec. 28. London.—I had last night your Grace's letter of the 21st instant and the enclosed copies of the Bishop of Meath's letter, etc., and I hear the informations mentioned in yours of the 18th are come to my Lord Sunderland's hands, but I am never the wiser for I shall not see them; therefore it were well that duplicates were made and one copy sent over either to Sir John Davys or me, but his head is so full now of his own business that he cannot mind the public's. The Committee were to sit upon him this day. The papers you sent me were too long for His Majesty to peruse, but I read your letter to him this morning and he was very well pleased with it. I told him also what was contained in the other papers, but he was so much troubled with other business, that he gave no advice in the matter. You will do very well in my opinion to keep the originals safe until use may with prudence be made of them; I think the time not proper yet. I attended all yesterday morning whilst the Council was sitting, in hopes to have got some order about taking the prisoners off your hands at Chester, but they had, it seems, business of greater moment. By Saturday's post I hope it will done.

I find the Irish witnesses do not agree amongst themselves, for they say Hethrington has cheated them of the allowance the King has given him for them, and Mr. David Fitzgerald broke Sampson's head the other day, of which he complained to the House of Commons, but they thought Fitzgerald in the right, he having given Fitzgerald ill language before.

If you have not very enormous things against Geoghegan, you have done a very bold action as the world now goes, for the little great man said not long since at the committee that he thought in his conscience Eustace Comyn was an honest witness; but since you have done it I shall be bold to give the history of his life to some members when you send over the second part, which will contain what his transactions have been since his last journey thither. I leave Sir John himself to give an account of what is done with him. I wish his overmuch concern may do him no hurt at the Committee. I am sure all people without doors to whom he has told his story are very well satisfied with the account he gives in his justification. I have not hitherto interposed in a business you have been transacting, which is of so great concern that I can hold my tongue no longer, and that is the marrying your grandchild. For the friendship I have to my Lord Chamberlain, you being so far engaged before I knew anything of the matter I could not but approve of it and discourse with him in the matter, though I never liked it, and much less the going a-begging for a rich match, tho' of mean education, for it seems the mother flatly refused to let her daughter see my sister Ossory upon the road. You have a good opportunity to take the matter high, and upon that usage to break off the match. I am sure my sister Cavendish is of the same opinion with me, but you know best what is fit to be done. Betty Stanhope is just now come to me, and desires to have her duty presented to you.

Ormond to Earl of Arran.

1680, Dec. 29. Dublin.—I have yours of the 18th and 21st of this month, and shall have all that my Lord Longford can show or say in a few days, if the wind holds as it is, and if he has made no long stay by the way. In a former letter,

I have assured you, that Sir George Lane was never with any congregation, or convocation, or any other meeting of Popish clergy from me, since the King came in; nor, I think, ever in his life. The meeting that I am charged with, and all the transactions at it, are at large set down in a great book set forth by Peter Walsh. My aim was to work a division among the Romish clergy, and I believe I had compassed it, to the great security of the Government and Protestants, and against the opposition of the Pope and his creatures and Nuncios, if I had not been removed from the Government, and if direct contrary counsels and courses had not been taken and held by my successors, of which some were too indulgent to the whole body of Papists, and others not much acquainted with either of them, nor considering the advantage of the division designed. I confess I have never read over Walsh's book, which is full of a sort of learning I have been little conversant in; but the doctrine is such as would cost him his life, if he could be found where the Pope has power.

I cannot find any entry of the orders that were sent for the taking of Lavallin, whose escape would seem to be imputed to my negligence. But I remember well that the first and only notice I had of such a man's being charged with being one of the ruffians was in a printed diurnal, and that having heard of Captain Lavallin's dissolute course of life, and of a base and treacherous action of his in Holland, I suspected he might be the man; and thereupon the orders for his apprehension were sent to persons and places most like to have it done. It is said this was not done time enough; but if it had not been done at all the omission would not have been very criminal; considering that there are many Lavallins besides him now taken for the man, and that I had no intimation where to look for him or any other of the four, though three of them are Irishmen. Besides, I find in the late journals that somebody at Bristol is accused of helping them all away, so that either he must be wronged, or else Lavallin made not his escape from hence. But without doubt he went out of this kingdom, and the Bristol man is not guilty of the escape of all of them. Having leisure enough I thought it not amiss to say thus much in those two points.

You have already sent you a part of Mr. Geoghegan's life and achievements till he left Ireland, and was re-converted by the Bishop of Durham under the name of Dalton. His exploits, since he came over with authority from the Council to take plotters, are many and remarkable, and shall be sent to my Lord Sunderland as soon as the story is completed to his committal to Newgate, where he now is. But since he came over armed with such authority, upon such an employment, his commitment to Newgate may be misinterpreted, I send you authentic copies of so many examinations as have yet been taken concerning the abuse of the authority he had from the Council in England, and pursuant to it, from us here; which will satisfy anybody that it was not fit to let him go on to plunder, beat, and imprison who he pleased. English and Irish, Papist and Protestant, as his fancy, supported by strong ale and wine, should direct him.

Here is also one Owen Murphy, authorised to search for and carry over witnesses, I suppose, to give evidence against Ol. Plunket. He carries himself with much more modesty; but he has been as far as the county of Tipperary, and brought thence about a dozen people, not like to say anything material as to Plunket; so that I believe he takes them upon account of Eustace Comyn's mad narrative. Perhaps before the letters go away I shall say more of him, or Mat. Barry shall, to Sir John Davys, to whom I pray make my excuse for not making any other return than this to his letter of the 18th.

I know not what may become of Tangier or the troops there, so that I am not willing to give Fitzpatrick's certain place till we see the issue. The poor youth was shot through the body and may be dead.

How could anybody imagine Lords in Parliament could be meant in the proclamation calling officers to their duty? If all the officers of the army were of the House of Commons I hope I have more wit than to call them from that service.

Ormond to Earl of Arran.

1680, Dec. 31. Dublin.—I have yours of Christmas Day and we hope before night my Lord Longford will be landed. If he was at sea last night he had a rough passage. I think by this time Sir John Davys believes his journey well undertaken. I cannot conceive how the petition of those fellows should be an introduction to a complaint against me otherwise than as it brings the affairs of Ireland in play, for they have hitherto made no reflecting mention of me. I do not believe Kennedy refused money to accuse me or any man. He is a notorious thief and liar, so that no belief is to be given to anything he shall say or swear any further than there shall be some other concurring testimony or pregnant circumstance. I had the heads of an accusation sent me, whereof a copy goes with this that you may compare them with any that shall be brought you. I offered Sir George Rawdon by my Lord Granard that he might have 400 guineas for his troop, but his return was that having received that command from the King he was desirous to die with it, but if he thinks he can make more of it I shall refuse no fit man to whom he will resign it; but if my Lord Conway wishes rather that he should resign it to his Lordship's nephew I will comply with it upon notice from Sir George. It will be a mighty ease to us to have all such as shall be sent for taken at Chester.

EUSTACE COMYN to RICHARD DENISON at Clonmel.

1680–1, Jan. 1st. London.—I must beg of you that you will certify that I was refused a warrant to take John Brenan, titular Bishop of Cashel; Oliver Plunkett, Primate of Armagh, and Robert Power, pretended Deacon of Waterford, in your own house in Clonmel by Robert Lowe and Charles Alcock, in the presence of Mr. Stephen Moore and others, and what you can certify besides for the public good in order for the further detection of the plot I desire you send me by the next post and direct it to me to the Earl of Shaftesbury's in Aldergate Street, otherwise I must summon you hither as a witness.

FRANCIS GWYN to ORMOND.

1680–1, Jan. 1st. London.—I suppose Sir John Davies will give your Grace a more perfect account of the proceedings of the Committee of the House of Commons appointed to inquire into the allegations of Sampson and the rest of the witnesses against him than I am able to do, but I find upon the whole matter they seem resolved on these two points, to vindicate the reputation of the witnesses and receive nothing that shall contradict them, and to throw all the dirt they can gather together upon the Government of Ireland. On the last Council day my Lord Sunderland brought to the Board four letters from your Grace and Council of Ireland; those letters which related to the examinations were ordered together with the examinations to be transmitted to the Committee of Examinations of the House of Lords.

On Sunday last there happened some angry discourse between my Lord Chamberlain and Mr. Hyde upon the occasion of the King's receiving and returning no New Year's gifts this year as formerly, and it grew to such a degree that Mr. Hyde the last Council day complained of it to the King in Council. They were both thereupon ordered to withdraw, and after some time called in again, at which time His Majesty acquainted my Lord Chamberlain that what Mr. Hyde had done in that matter was by his order, and therefore he ought not to have given him that occasion of complaint.

The town hath lately been very full of some proposals made in private to His Majesty to explain more particularly the last paragraph of the House of Commons' address concerning the certain sum of money that some of the leading men of the House of Commons would undertake should be given in case the Duke's Bill should be passed and some of themselves put into employments which they desired, and it is said that His Majesty being expected at the Lord St. Albans' lodging on Monday night last at supper, Mr. Ralph Montague and Mr. Will. Herbert came thither with inentiont to have met the King, but His Majesty came not thither that night. This discourse occasioned the vote of the House of Commons on Friday that no member of that House should receive anything from the King without leave of the House, and that those who did contrary should be expelled the House. It is said that my Lord Chief Justice Scroggs hath lately surrendered his employment, but I do not know the certainty of it.

Sir John Davys to Ormond.

1680–1, Jan. 1st.—I am at last brought upon the stage or rather to the stake by the Irish witnesses' petition against me to the House of Commons, which was referred to a Committee where I have been baited for six or seven hours a day these two days last past, committee men and evidences, even Eustace Comyn himself, saying what they listed to me. At last, being demanded immediately to answer, I observed that the examinations against me were diverse, the things charged upon me in them various, the times they were laid in several, and those times far distant, that I was not conscious of any occasion ever given by me for them, so as they were the more surprising upon me, and therefore for the Committee's easier and my certainer method I desired I might be allowed a copy of my full charge and competent time allowed me to put in my answer to it; which being debated among them they at last resolved on this only, that they will upon Monday acquaint the House with my motion, and according to their sense govern themselves in it. Upon the whole matter, considering what sort of committee it is, Col. Birch in the chair, who took occasion in private among them, as I heard, to compare your Grace and me to the Lord Strafford and Sir George Ratcliff; and after what manner they used me, only admitting me to speak when the witnesses would give way to it, and not only suffering them to say what they pleased as they saw occasion by way of invention and addition to their examinations before given in, but leading them and encouraging them to it, and to criminate at their wills your Grace and the whole body of the Government in Ireland as well as me, and all this in the hearing of crowds of people of all sorts that thought fit to come, the doors being laid open for that purpose, I expect little better but that my request will be rejected and the Chairman report ex parte against me, and thereupon an impeachment to the Lords, where I confess I had rather be, and where my materials for my justification, I don't question, will be regarded, which in the place I am at present I find would be looked upon but as trash, everything there offered against what the evidences say proving to be no more; and therefore I yet reserve from being blown upon what I have for myself, even the Bishop of Meath's certificate also, until a properer opportunity for producing them. Thus your Grace sees in what a position I am, being here in the hands of false witnesses and the mighty encouragers of them, from whom, Good Lord, deliver me. Edmond Murphy, the priest, took occasion at the Committee to affirm that when he appeared before your Grace against the Tories he was well used, but when he discovered the plot he was ill treated by your Grace and other reflections of that kind were placed by him and others of the witnesses, from whose hands I am confident mischief is intended your Grace by as wicked but higher people. God preserve your Grace from them, which shall be my daily prayer.

Earl of Arran to Ormond.

1680–1, New Year's Day. London.—Yesterday morning the Council sat and turned out the clerks. What the business was I have not yet learnt, but I suppose it was about an answer to the House of Commons' last address, for His Majesty is to speak to both Houses on Monday.

I have at last got a copy of some of the articles drawn up against you. It is likely they will be mended before they are made use of. I copied them because the hand they were written in might be known if intercepted to the prejudice of the person. Your Grace will easily judge by some of the articles who were the persons that furnished the materials as in 16th article, 20th and 22nd.

Major Hallkett, Toby Purcell and several other officers are come hither from Tangier. They tell me that Fitzpatrick is dead of his wounds. The King told me yesterday that he intended to send home again that part of the forces there that belong to Ireland. Sir John Davys has been twice before the Committee, who, I suppose, will give your Grace an account of their proceedings with him.

Ormond to Earl of Arran.

1680–1, Jan. 1. Dublin.—Since mine of yesterday, which I think is not yet gone, I have seen from a better hand than Kennedy's another article that is said to be prepared against me, and that it will be sworn. The article is that I have been seen to receive the sacrament the Romish way at my sister Clancarty's. Now though it may be as truly sworn that I was circumcised at Christ Church, and that few of any brains that know me or have but a superficial account of my life will give credit to so incredible a forgery; yet if it get into a narrative thousands will swallow it as truth; and against this there is no fence. The credulous that trust in prints will never hear or consider, whether it be material or no, that I could have as many masses and sacraments as I had a mind to brought me, and more secretly, into my lodging, than to go anywhere abroad for them; that the laity never have the sacrament given them (unless they are sick) but at Mass; that Masses are never said but in the morning; and I defy anybody to prove that ever I was to see my sister this twenty years but in an afternoon. Above all, let Mr. Oates his depositions be examined, and it will clearly appear that it was designed by the conspirators that I should be killed; and sure if I had been a Papist it would have been known to them ; and as sure it is that they would not have contrived the death of one that might in such case have been useful to them. I have caused Oates his depositions to that point to be extracted out of a reprinted copy here, which it may be fit for you to have by you. It is not in the same volume of that printed in England, and therefore the directions to pages and sections will not serve.

SAME to SAME.

1680–1, Jan. 3. Dublin.—My Lord of Longford and yours of the 28th of the last arrived here yesterday, but both what you write and what he says leave us under the uncertainty we were and are like for some time to continue in. It is true that the sending of duplicates of what went hence to my Lord Sunderland in confirmation of David Fitzgerald's discovery was omitted. It shall be now supplied, and that course constantly held for the time to come. I am obliged to my Lord Burlington for advice he gives me in a letter of his to my Lord Primate, tho' the matter of fact be mistaken, for my Lord Brittas was not bailed by me but by the Judges, and if he appears at the next Assizes he saves his bail, tho' by evading till then he makes his guilt more probable. Against O'Sullivan More there is not one witness yet appearing, nor was there any order from hence to take bail of him or of O'Sullivan Bere when my Lord's letter was written, nor I think is yet; so that his information, I mean my Lord Burlington's, is not authentic from whomsoever he had it. The originals of the copies I sent you shall be safely kept, and I am promised more of the kind the next week. You will have a copy of my letter to my Lord Chamberlain, which I mean should import that I give over any further thought of the proposition concerning his kinswoman.

EARL OF ARRAN to ORMOND.

1680–1, Jan. 4. London.—The Committee have made no report yet in Sir John Davys his business, but it is believed they will make one nothing favourable to him, and that the House will vote an impeachment against him. He was so much concerned at the Committee's proceeding with him when he was last before them that he was disordered to such a degree I was afraid he would do his business much prejudice, but he is better settled now. The deposition of Maurice Fitzgerald and Downy were read this day in our House, and Sir John Fitzgerald and Col. Lacy were before us, and denied what was laid to their charge, but we were so satisfied with what was sworn that we passed a vote that there was and is a dangerous plot in Ireland, as your Grace will see by the journals. Your constant friend there happened to say upon this occasion that Papists were better armed in Ireland than the Protestants, but I cleared that point and satisfied the House to the contrary, which he made no reply to.

Sir Thomas Wharton was but a while ago with us. He desires to be remembered to you and promises his endeavours to justify you whenever he meets with anything said against you There is one Cornet Colt yet here, but he goes away next week. He has made his brother, who is a leading man in the House of Commons, to be Sir John Davys his friend; therefore he desires if he should outstay his furlough a little that you would be favourable to him.

ORMOND to EARL OF ARRAN.

1680–1, Jan. 6. Dublin.—Mr. Geoghegan's history is brought so far that we have thought it time to transmit it to my Lord Sunderland, and we hope his villainies will appear to be such as will justify his sending to Newgate. Murphy, sent hither to gather witnesses by virtue of an order of the House of Lords of an old date, is ready to embark with those he has picked up. His authority bore no direction to the Government, nor was any address made to the King, as in other cases, to command me anything in that matter. So I have in no degree interposed; only when Murphy complained of want of money I furnished him by the advice of the Council with fifty pounds. In Hetherington's letter produced by Murphy he was advised to good husbandry; and particularly to take none with him but material witnesses; and yet he has taken some from Carrick that profess here that they are able to say nothing of the plot or plotters. So that I should have saved the charge of ten or twelve persons, and prevented the ruin of so many poor men taken from their trade and labour if they had been any man's tenants but my own. In Hetherington's mention is made of a Popish Bishop, who, as it was supposed, might be prevailed with to make a full discovery of the Plot upon assurance of pardon. Murphy persists to be of the opinion still, and says he has fresh reason to be so. Thereupon I have given a safe conduct to the Bishop, and put it into the hand desired by Murphy. If he comes to me upon it, I make no doubt but that he will make such discoveries as will well deserve a pardon and ample reward; which I will in that case undertake to him for. The safe conduct is given since the Council sat; and so I could not have their concurrence, nor did I think it fit to delay a matter of this moment (if it falls out right) till the next meeting. I have not time to write this day to my Lord Sunderland, but you may let him see this letter.

ORMOND to EARL OF ARRAN.

1680–1, January 6. Dublin.—Since my letter to my Lord Chamberlain importing that any further prosecution of any pretence to Mr. Bennet's daughter should be laid aside, Mrs. Brabazon was with my wife and told her that she found by the Duchess of Albemarle that an address in behalf of my grandson for a younger sister of hers would not be displeasing.

I know nothing of the person of the young lady or of any other circumstance considered in such cases, but am abundantly satisfied of the advantage of the alliance in reference to birth and the honour and constant loyalty of the family. Yet in regard to both sides, and that instead of contracting a stricter friendship by an alliance we may not lessen that which is already betwixt us (as it sometimes falls out when a treaty of this kind is entered into and broken off) it were good that some knowledge were had of the fitness of the match as to the persons first and then as to the conditions of marriage, and this I desire you to discourse with the sister of and to make such inquiry as may be proper. I will mix this affair with nothing else.

Sir John Davys to Ormond.

1680–1, Jan. 8.—Since my last to your Grace all that passed in the House of Commons concerning me was Colonel Birch's reporting the examinations taken against me and making this disingenuous addition, that I had answered at the Committee, as your Grace will find by the printed votes of Thursday, whereas the last thing that passed there was a desire from me of copies of the examinations and time to answer to them according to the account I formerly gave your Grace thereof, a way of proceeding some of my friends who are members and were at the Committee will, I believe, take notice of and rectify that mistake when the business comes to be debated in the House, which is ordered to be upon Monday, and at the same time some things that Sampson and McNamara gave in the other day to involve my Lord Anglesey in my Lord Tyrone's plot are to be considered also to see whether they will bear an impeachment of treason against him. Sir Robert Clayton and some other vassals of my Lord S., and consequently patrons of my accusers, would endeavour to bring me in for treason also, but I don't in my own opinion and by better judgments at all perceive that the matters against me can warrant any such thing, but if they should run them up to so unreasonable a construction in the lower House I am very confident such is the justice of the Lords, before whom the articles must come at last, they will upon hearing of them be of different minds and proceed accordingly as to me, for they have done the like already, and no later than yesterday, in the case of my Lord Chief Justice Scroggs, impeached before them by the Commons of high treason upon articles of a higher nature than mine can be, which their Lordships declared to be but misdemeanours and therefore have bailed the Chief Justice, and won't as much as give way to his suspension from his employment until they see reason for it after he has received his trial. The other day Mr. David Fitzgerald and Oates being together and holding a discourse concerning me, wherein the former speaking in my favour the latter took occasion to give him very abusive language and met with a suitable return, which has produced no good effect, as such garboils seldom do. For to-day a gentleman came to me and told me for certain that Oates the last night carried Bernard Dennis (who your Grace may remember came over hither from Ireland with Moyer and the other priests) with him to my Lord Mayor, where Dennis has given in an examination against Fitzgerald and named therein your Grace, my Lord Chancellor and myself, but to what purposes that gentleman could not tell, but he is a-scouting to learn them, and when I hear what they are I will send your Grace an account of them. Just as I am writing this the gentleman is returned to me and tells me that all that examination was that David Fitzgerald should be endeavouring to persuade some of the witnesses not to prosecute me, which he has denied at a Committee. Though none of the printed votes have yet named me under any ill character, my adversaries have notwithstanding written and scattered intelligences as if I had been voted a notorious stifler of the Plot in Ireland, with other wild and false things which no doubt will be dispersed about in Ireland to blacken me; while I am forced to be patient, until by my innocency and the help of friends who are satisfied of it, I can extricate myself out of my unfortunate circumstances; and since I mention friends I crave leave to acquaint your Grace that here is one Mr. Colt, a member of the House, who appears mightily my friend, though otherwise a hot, disobliged and fierce speaking man against the Court, and therefore of good interest with the contrary party. Him his brother, who is cornet to Captain Aungier, has made for me, and by that means altogether of Launty Bolton, whereby I have free access to and such good credit with him and by him with others as I hope it may not be useful alone to me, but to your Grace also, for the effecting whereof I have been the occasion of detaining the Cornet and Launty Bolton longer indeed than they would otherwise have stayed from their colours since your Grace's last proclamation for recalling officers, and therefore I humbly beseech your Grace's pardon to me, in the first place and in the next to them, and that your Grace will be pleased that no inconveniency may light upon them as to their commands or pay for their staying so necessarily here upon my account hitherto. This week they go from hence over.

Earl of Arran to Ormond.

1680–1, Jan. 8. London.—Our House has sat so late this night that I shall not have time to say so much as I intended, but Sir John Davys will write more at large. My Lord Burlington, upon the account of friendship to your Grace desires me to advise you not to let bail be taken for those persons who are accused of the Plot there, tho' but one witness against them, for he is informed the O'Sullivans, who are, as he says, very dangerous people, are out upon bail.

I am commanded by His Majesty to let you know that by the next post you will have orders to send over Maurice Fitzgerald and Murty Dowling, and he will give directions to have the charges borne here from Chester.

The House of Commons have voted as you will see against four Lords and one Commoner, so that it is to be hoped that they will let Ireland alone for a while, and that Sir John Davys will be safe, they having more considerable work of that nature upon their hands than his.

LORD COURCY to DUKE OF ORMOND.

1680–1, Jan. 8. Kingsweston.—I have been here keeping my Christmas at Sir Robert Southwell's, and we have often joined our hearty prayers and wishes for your Grace, especially considering how many troubles are spoken of. I am sure I have sorrow enough, not only in gratitude to your Grace for the good that is past, but for fear of the evil which may befall me if any change should be made in that kingdom.

I have been now five years at Oxford, which I esteem my great happiness, not only about my religion but other good things, by the care and goodness of my Lord Bishop. But I am often sorry that I cannot study so hard as he and other friends have desired me, which I acknowledge as my fault or unhappiness. I shall be sixteen year old in May, and my wishes are to travel and if it could be when my Lord of Ossory goes, I should think that a most happy occasion, and I should strive to make good in some other things what I fal short in about my studies. After this the next thing I think of is the getting some employment in the army in Ireland: and besides these two ways I cannot tell what to think of for one in my condition. I would be glad, if I could, to begin with the first of these ways, which is travel, but I fling myself upon your Grace for help and advice.

ORMOND to EARL OF ARRAN.

1680–1, Jan. 9. Dublin.—Sir Joseph Williamson likes this country so well and has so much interest in it by his lady that he resolves to stay here for some time. I know not perfectly how he and his place of secretary were separated, nor consequently how he stands in the King's opinion. But in all his discourse with me he appears to be zealous for his service. So that I am of opinion his being of the Privy Council in this kingdom may be useful. I am sure I should wish it during my being in the Government if it have no objection on that side. If His Majesty think fit to have him sworn the form of a letter requiring it may easily be found.

ORMOND to EARL OF ARRAN.

1680–1, Jan. 9. Dublin.—I have yours of the 1st with the inclosed abstract, and am of your opinion that they will be better polished and put into method before they can with credit to the composers be made use of. But though all that is material in them is utterly false and all that is true wholly impertinent, yet as they may be dressed they may serve for an accusation or impeachment, and produce all the preliminary inconveniences from which I know not who can be exempted. If the speech we have here in print was really spoken in the Lords' House as it is printed, and shall pass without any reprehension, or so much as an explanation, I know not why any subject should wonder at anything said of him or to him. It is plain out of whose shop the articles you marked came, and it is visible here that the merchant has still great credit with his partners.

This westerly wind has carried over Murphy with a number of witnesses; and Geoghegan since his imprisonment has accused my Lord Carlingford, Col. Garret Moore, and one Nugent of treason. That the title of the King's evidence may not only defend him from punishment here but help him into England, where he hopes for more favour than here, where he is best known, and to make his presence there the more necessary, he now desires to be examined against the Lord Molyneux. This is evidently his drift, but how safe it may be to find or affirm it to be so I cannot judge. You have duplicates sent you of all that is transmitted to my Lord Sunderland concerning him, Murphy, Fitzgerald and Dowling, which make a large packet. This shall be all of this letter. Copies of two letters sent from the Board to my Lord Sunderland about Ja. Geoghegan and Murphy, dat. 8 Janry., 1680. Four copies of safe conduct, etc., for Tyrrell, titular Bishop of Clogher, to come in and declare what he knows of the Plot at the instance of Owen Murphy.

Earl of Arran to Ormond.

1680–1, Jan. 10. London.—I stopped the bearer's journey one day, having notice that the Parliament was to be prorogued this day, which it accordingly was this morning until the 20th instant. The House of Commons took it so high that they have passed several angry votes, and those of the other hand who were against the Bill of Exclusion are afraid this is an expedient to have that Bill brought in again, and those who venture to oppose it to be ruined. I cannot learn whether the King intends that or a dissolution, and therefore I will not stay Poule any longer, my desire in it being that I might write the more freely without troubling your Grace with cypher. I had some discourse the other day with my Lord Essex, and thinking it a convenient opportunity I told him I heard there were articles drawn up against you and that his Lordship was acquainted with them and promoted the thing, which I thought was not very fair play. and that if I would make it my business I could find miscarriages in his government. He disowned absolutely his having any hand in such a thing or that he knew of anybody else that had such a design, which put an end to our discourse.

My Lord Chamberlain showed me a letter from your Grace of the 3rd instant, but I have had none since the 21st of the last.

Earl of Arran to Ormond.

1680–81, Jan. 11. London.—Since I writ yesterday by Poule I had altogether four letters from your Grace, and with them several papers relating to Geogheghan, whose actions, when one compares what was sent here before and came to me yesterday, will in my opinion exceed all that Clancy ever did; yet if the Parliament were now sitting and knew how you have proceeded with him, I am confident they would have resolved it a discouraging of the King's evidence, especially in the humour the House of Commons were yesterday in. It is believed generally this Parliament will sit no more, and those who are great at Court in a manner declare as much, and therefore the answers to the articles intended against you may rest awhile; besides, upon comparing together what I hear of all sides, I conclude the House of Commons intended only an address against you, and that for not being vigorous enough against the Papists occasioned by the many relations you have amongst them, for none of the sober men will allow of any article of your being either a Papist or in the Plot. A great part of the extract you sent of Dr. Oates his examinations I had collected out of the narrative that lies entered in our books, which he having sworn to there makes it matter of record, or else the printed narrative if occasion had happened would have done no good, as it was found upon my Lord Stafford's trial, Turbervill's printed deposition and what he swore before the Court differing in a material part. Therefore I was very glad to find what related to you entered there. Upon the whole matter there is scarce anybody that knows you, though never so much your enemy, thinks you guilty of anything criminal, and therefore if you are to be given up to them all that can be said for you or said by you will not avail. What to advise you to in this conjuncture is past my skill. My Lord Chamberlain is of opinion to have you set on foot again the calling of a Parliament in Ireland, and to that purpose will inform you himself of his mind. He is very fond of going on with the match still, though he showed me your letter to him of the 3rd, which I had not then received a copy of, my letters coming later to hand than those at Court. His lady, I suppose, has made my sister Ossory much for it, too, for she seemed very much to approve of the matter two days since.

My Lord Brittas as it happens has played the wisest part, now the Parliament is prorogued, for the other gentlemen being committed for treason by the peers, and my Lord Tyrone being impeached before the peers, cannot have the benefit of the Habeas Corpus Bill. Cornet Colt, as he was walking in the streets yesterday, was chosen second by Mr. Oglethorp, who killed his man, one Captain Richardson, and the Cornet hurt his man, Captain Churchill, which makes him post away. I find Colt justified by everybody. Lord Hounsden was another, for they fought three to three, he was likewise ill hurt; he was of the same side with the principal that was killed.

Thomas Fairfax to Earl of Arran.

1680–81, Jan. 11. Dublin.—I writ to your Lordship two or three posts about Ensign Muschamp and Ensign Forbes, and therein begged your Lordship's pleasure concerning that affair, and I do now again, if your Lordship thinks fit, desire the same favour. The good company I am often with remember your Lordship continually and ask me almost every post some tidings. Therefore (though I know your Lordship must be very busy in such a hurry of affairs as now are), yet if I may have now and then a line it would not be amiss. My Lord Duke went yesterday to the Exchange and bought a whole cupboard of plate, which cost at least 50*l*., for Lady Charlotte. Lord Tullow says positive your Lordship has forgot him, and bid me put Papa in mind on't. God be thanked, he is very well and the finest little Lord in Christendom, and my Lord Duke and Lady Duchess are exceeding fond of him, as they have all the reason in the world; he is very fond of a match, but it had need be a strong one. We are expecting from you every day what will become of us, God send all go right; but let it go which way it will I shall for ever be, etc.

Earl of Arran to Ormond.

1680–81, Jan. 15. London.—I had your Grace's letter of the 6th on Thursday last and one by Mr. Coote of the same date, which I shall answer by him, who tells me he returns within two days. I showed your letter to my Lord Sunderland according to command, but he has now as little interest at Court and is as little regarded as ever any fallen minister was, and seems exceedingly mortified; yet I think it proper your dispatches should be directed to him until His Majesty order the contrary, though I intend in any matter of moment to speak to the King myself, since his Lordship intends not to peruse any papers relating to Ireland before he send them to the Council.

I find my Lord Conway does still insist much upon his nephew's having the troop resigned to him, and believes him one of the finest gentlemen in Europe, and nobody dares undeceive him. I showed him that paragraph which concerned that matter in yours of 31 December, and he is much satisfied with it, and has upon it writ to his brother, who it seems writ his Lordship a discontented letter, grounded, I believe, upon some mistake of my Lord Granard's; and it seems there is another mistake amongst the officers there, which is that the King gives leave to any officers of horse to sell their employments. If you have any such letter it is contrary to His Majesty's intentions, and you may choose whether you will conform to it or no. All that His Majesty ordered was that those officers, both horse and foot, who resolved not to make their residence in Ireland chiefly should have leave within three months to sell their employments to such as His Majesty or you approved or else to lose them. I have been twice at the office to see a copy of the letter, but could not find it, matters are so managed there; therefore I shall trouble the office but little. I have been several times with my cousin Hamilton about her son before we could agree upon what was fittest for him to do, and yesterday she is come to a fixed resolution that her son should buy an employment here, so that the colours you intended for him your Grace may dispose of elsewhere. It is my desire that gentlemen of the best quality should supply such vacancies. I have employed one to Col. Russell to deal for my cousin, for I hear he has a command or two to sell, and the price rises and falls as in other markets, for a brother of Mandeville's, of the county of Tipperary, who is a Protestant, and served well abroad, I recommended to him but a fortnight since, and his money could not reach one. I think I writ above six weeks ago on behalf of Mr. Buck, who had sold his Clerk of the Dockets place to Mr. Ellis upon engagement to change the lives. If the matter be not done accordingly Mr. Buck's executors must pay 1,000 guineas back to Ellis, which will be great inconvenience to them. I will not interpose too far lest it may concern your faithful and honest servant Hen. Gascoigne. As I was making up this I had brought me yours of the 9th with all the remaining copies of examinations which should have come last post. These, with what has been sent me before, swell to such a bulk that the perusing them has made my head turn round almost as much as the Commons have made Sir John Davys's. I will next opportunity find how the King stands inclined towards Sir Joseph. My Lord Lanesborough writ upon the same subject to my Lord Chamberlain a pretty while ago, which letter he showed me, but it seems he chose a wrong man, for my Lord thinks he has not behaved himself towards him as he ought in gratitude due have done, and therefore would give Sir George no encouragement in the matter. I doubt not but you have found long ere this that the speech you mention was burnt by the hand of the hangman, and the printer ordered to be proceeded against at law. The Lord who was suspected to have spoke did not say all that was there, but took liberty enough. Toby Purcell is gone from hence in the stage coach, he is very much commended by all the officers for his diligence and courage, therefore pray be kind to him and do me the favour to let him know I have writ on his behalf, for I promised to write by him, but was not at home when he called for his letter the night before he went away, though I had one for him. I have so much work upon my hands now and have nobody to help me that I hope my Lord Longford will not persecute me with cipher. Hethrington and David Fitzgerald are at open wars before the Board, and I take part as much as I do appear with the latter, whom I am sorry has not all the proofs against that fellow he might be furnished with on that side, but he will prove him rogue enough.

ORMOND to SIR JOHN DAVYS.

1680–81, Jan. 15. Dublin.—I have received two of yours from London; your last of the 28th of December left you in such a condition as gives me much impatience to know what was reported to the House of Commons in your affair, and what resolution it produced. I do not conceive that your case can receive determination in that place, or that there can be matter sufficient alleged and proved against you for either address or impeachment, which are or should be acts of solemnity and well grounded, else they may lose much of their weight. There comes to us every post some new offers of discovery, most of them from the county of Limerick, yet they begin to spread into the county of Galway; as fast as they are brought to any maturity they are and shall be transmitted to my Lord Sunderland and copies of them to my son Arran, who will impart them to you as he finds you at leisure. Our last letters out of England bear date the 1st of January. Much change there may be since then, upon which our peace and proceedings will depend. I know nothing I can do here or write from hence that can be of use to you; if I did you should not want it or anything that may manifest my being, etc.

EARL OF CONWAY to ORMOND.

1680–81, Jan. 15. London.—My Lord of Arran hath acquainted me with your Grace's favour in consenting that my brother Rawdon shall transfer his troop to his son, by which your Grace hath laid the greatest obligation upon me in the world, and I believe my nephew is as hopeful a youth as any in that kingdom, and will be as ready to serve the King and your Grace.

I know your Grace hath heard of the late prorogation and intended dissolution, and what is to be done next. I told my Lord of Arran that I thought nothing so necessary in this juncture for the King's service and the good of Ireland as the present calling a Parliament there. 'Tis certain they will be loyal, though my Lord Shaftesbury and my Lord Essex will influence some, and my Lord Burlington, who hath not gone with them this session in English affairs, will go with them in Irish affairs. But if the King should call for any of his forces there I do not see how your Grace can keep up an army, which is only capable to secure that kingdom, without a Parliament that must give money, and will certainly provide for the peace and safety of Ireland. I have discourse of this with others who are conversant in the King's affairs, and when the King hath made a regulation in his Court and Council, I believe it will find no difficulty here. In the meantime if I receive any commands from your Grace I shall obey them and as long as I live I shall study by all manner of service to shew your Grace that I esteem myself obliged to be, etc.

JOHN FELL, Bishop of Oxford, to ORMOND.

1680–81, January 15.—It is not forgetfulness of my duty which has withheld me from making frequent addresses to your Excellency, but the fear of being rude and troublesome. At present the King having declared his purpose to meet his Parliament in this place, which is under your Excellency's patronage, I conceive it may not be undecent to give your Excellency an account thereof, and withal to assure you that all possible care shall be taken to do everything that may become us upon the occasion, and suit with our concern that your Honour may not suffer in our miscarriage. My Lord Ossory, I hope, does everything that may give your Excellency satisfaction and alleviate your cares for the public by the comfort which you receive from his virtue and industry, and prospect of your families flourishing in future generations. My Lord Courcy, who has long depended upon your Excellency's charity for his support, is now grown up to be capable of a farther instance of it by being brought into the world. I the rather mention this now, because I understand that he has several Papist relations in the Court, and possibly there may be others whose example may be as pernicious as their opinions. I beg your Excellency's pardon for this freedom.

EARL OF ARRAN to ORMOND.

1680–81, Jan. 16. London.—Mr. Coote informing me this night in the drawing-room that he was to go for Ireland to-morrow, I would not let him go without a letter, though I writ at large last night, and have not much to say in answer to the letter he brought me from you concerning my nephew. I have been with my sister Cavendish since I received it and she tells me that the Duke of Newcastle has four daughters unmarried and none of them tolerably handsome but one; the estate it is likely will be divided amongst his five daughters, but then my Lord Devonshire will think he has hard measure, for there was a promise betwixt the two fathers that their paternal estates for want of heirs males should fall to the surviving heir, and my Lord Devonshire's is so settled. My Lord Chamberlain, notwithstanding what you writ, will, I am sure, take it ill if any overture should be made until he has spoken with his kinsman, and he says and has satisfied my sister Ossory that advances now will be made of their side. You may be sure of the Duke of Newcastle's daughter when you please. I cannot learn yet whether the Parliament will meet or no, but by Tuesday's post without doubt we shall know.

FRANCIS GWYN to ORMOND.

1680–81, Jan. 18. London.—This day His Majesty, having ordered the calling an extraordinary Council, was pleased to declare his resolution of dissolving this present Parliament and calling another, and thereupon gave order for a proclamation for the immediate dissolving this and for the appointing a new Parliament on the 21st of March next to meet at Oxford. The Earl of Salisbury debating against it was silenced by His Majesty, upon which his Lordship desiring leave to withdraw himself, the King answered he could not make any request that would be more easily granted, and ordered his Lordship's name to be struck out of the Council Book.

This day three letters with several enclosed examinations from your Grace and Council of Ireland were communicated to the Board by the Earl of Sunderland. To that which concerned Geoghegan, alias Dalton, their Lordships have ordered a letter to be writ from the Board to your Grace to proceed against him there for his misdemeanours with the utmost severity of the law, and to the examinations contained in the other two letters they have appointed a day for the Committee of Examinations to meet to consider them. I do propose myself the honour of very speedily kissing your Grace's hands in Ireland

EARL OF ARRAN to ORMOND.

1680–1, Jan. 18. London.—This day the King has ordered in Council that this Parliament should be dissolved and that another should be called the 28th of March next to meet at Oxford, upon which, as I am informed by a Privy Councillor, my Lord Salisbury has quitted his place in Council. What measures will be taken after this I will learn as well as I can. Sir William Courtenay was at the Council door to prefer a petition to His Majesty for the sitting of the Parliament at the time appointed in behalf of the county of Devon, but the sudden dissolution hindered the delivery of it. I believe I shall send over this post a letter for Sir Joseph Williamson's being of the Council in Ireland, for the King has consented to it with a great deal of kindness to him, and Secretary Jenkins has promised to set His Majesty's hand to the letter this night and have it entered at the Signet Office before the post goes away. The Irish witnesses brought over lately by Hethrington's orders were this day attending the Board, but were not called in; to-morrow they will be examined, as I am informed by a Committee of the Board., I cannot yet tell what course to steer myself by, but shall follow your directions, though you are at such a distance.

LORD CLARE to ORMOND.

1680–81, Jan. 18. Carrigaholt.—Having lately had some discourse with Mr. Donough O'Brien of Dogh, my cousin german, and one of the most solid and considerablest gentlemen of this county, I endeavoured to persuade him to tell me what he knew of the Popish designs these years past, assuring myself that if they had any in our country he must needs know it. But I could find no more from him than what is in the enclosed copy, which, however, I thought fit to send your Grace; in regard I know Brady to be the most eminent, zealous and most knowing man of his order in this kingdom, and that nothing of the Papists' designs here could be hid from him, and that I believe had he not an opinion of my cousin to be a man that loves his quiet and the world as he calls it, he would have told him more, his work being to be carried on only by men elevated in the spirit or desperate fellows. His saying there were Papists in every county to characterize the faithful and the disposition of the people shows plainly there was a Popish design in hand to be executed either at the King's death or before. This being my opinion and that really there was a design to subvert the government, as I intimated to His Majesty about ten year ago, made me send this little information to your Grace, being likewise persuaded that many considerable gentlemen of our country will be ingenious, and discover the particulars of it if the Parliament continues sitting in England, for I am certain nothing dissuades them but the daily hopes they have to hear it is either dissolved or prorogued, and that their Popish favourites will return again to Court, which makes me humbly pray your Grace to move His Majesty for the continuance of this sessions in England; that now or never Popery may be extinguished in this kingdom for good and all.

I am certain that if the course I presumed to propose ten years ago to His Majesty were taken, most of the youth of Ireland had ere now conformed with the Church. I was then well hampered for my pains by the Popish party as your Grace knows, yet I will never cease to urge that matter at all times I see hopes of being heard. It is in vain to think that we and our posterity can live with safety under a Protestant Government in this kingdom, if Popery be not wholly extinguished in it; the doing of it by halves will not secure us, it leaves us exposed to all Popish Princes that quarrels with England. And yet this mischief may in few years be prevented by banishing of their priests, which with the loss of all hopes of their favourites becoming again great at Court would soon bring them to conform. But while they have such hopes no law or punishment will bring them to it. Nay, few magistrates will be forward to see the law executed, as we find by experience. We are in greater danger than they are in England; yet if they clear the fountain we shall have wholesome streams, which makes me again most humbly beg your Grace to move His Majesty that the Parliament may continue sitting until we find out to the full this infernal Popish conspiracy which hath been in this kingdom, and which doubtless will be made out clearly if the Parliament sits for some reasonable time longer in England.

My Lord, I was hitherto silent like the burnt child that dreads the fire. I despaired of the Parliament's sitting long, and of the suppression of that strong party of Papists I saw in England (I fear them still), and I was glad to draw in my horns and retire to this solitary shell, being very sensible I have not parts to represent the danger I saw and I see still we are in, having had scarce two words of English at the King's restoration; however, my zeal to preserve the interest I profess hath put me long ago upon showing my weakness in writing to His Majesty, as it does now to your Grace. But no man will be more ready to venture his life in the Kings' service than I will be whenever your Grace is pleased to command.

Ormond to Earl of Arran.

1680–81, Jan. 18. Dublin.—Three of yours came this day, the last was of the 11th, but Mulys if he went not out of the way to Knowsley rides not fast, else he might have been here with the packets. There is no return to be made to anything you have writ, nor anything new from hence. Some additional account of Geoghegan's extravagances you will soon have; whether credit will be given to them or to him I know not, but truth shall be told; and yet I dare not, though it be manifest, say that most of our new discoverers give more discredit than confirmation to the plot. It is well that I am not like to be charged for a plotter or a Papist. That I have Popish relations is no more my fault than it was the first Reformers that they had so, and I suppose that the vote that there has been and is still a horrid Popish plot on foot is so resolved from the examinations and witnesses I sent over. And when what has been done against the Papists both clergy and laity shall be considered (as possibly it never will), I know not what could be done more. An address is a softer way than an impeachment; but being commonly in general terms it affords no means of vindication, and in that respect is worse than an impeachment, but since I am not to choose I submit to either as it shall please God to order it. I am sorry Cornet Colt makes haste hither upon the account he doth. You may assure Sir John Davys that neither he nor Bolton shall suffer by their absence. My Lord Sunderland by the King's command hath written for two witnesses, Fitzgerald and Downey, who were well on their way to London before I received the letter; but I yet hear nothing of leaving such as shall be sent for at Chester. It is too early yet to think of, at least to propose what my Lord Chamberlain mentions. The proper season has been unhappily slipt over against all the representations I could make, and I have suffered undeserved mortifications for making them, and that from those that have shown themselves to be unworthy of the credit that was given them. The dispositions of men here are much changed from what they were, and yet I think steadiness on that side would do much towards bringing us here to our former temper. But if the Court, the Papists and the fanatics drive one way he must be mad that stands in their way, and this has been the case. As to the match for my grandson it must come very fairly and with great present advantage, if I entertain any further motion concerning it.

ORMOND to LORD CLARE.

1680–81, Jan. 22. Dublin.—I have received you Lordship's of the 18th inst., and the information of Mr. Donough O'Brien, of Dogh, and though the information would of itself seem to be of small moment, yet in conjunction with other evidence and circumstances and considering the quality of Mr. O'Brien and the temper you say he is of, it may confirm the truth and reality of a plot, and therefore I earnestly desire your lordship to make use of your utmost interest and industry to make a further and more particular discovery of the Papists' designs against His Majesty, his Government and the Protestant religion. In the meantime I shall make the best use I can of the other parts of your Lordship's letter, tho' before you can receive this letter you will have heard that the Parliament is or was prorogued, and that it is probable it is by this time resolved when it shall meet again. Your lordship mentions not whether Brady the Friar be in Ireland or no; if he be it would be of the greatest importance to have him apprehended, and I recommend it to your Lordship's care. I shall represent your zeal and diligence in this conjuncture to His Majesty.

ORMOND to the KING.

1680–81, Jan. 22. Dublin.—Yesterday I received the original of the enclosed copy from my [Lord of] Clare,* together with the information of Mr. Donough O'Brien; the contents of the letter are of such a nature that I hold it my duty to transmit the copy of it immediately to your own hands, supposing it probable that the Lord of Clare may have sent another to somebody else. Your Majesty best knows what use to make of the original (which in the meantime shall be safely kept) and what further to command me concerning it. I send your Majesty likewise a copy of the information, and of my answer to that Lord. God direct your Majesty through all the difficulties before you.

* See p. 556 supra.

EARL OF ARRAN to ORMOND.

1680–81, Jan. 22. London.—I sent your Grace by the last packet Sir Joseph Williamson's letter to be sworn a privy councillor there, but sent it after my other letters were gone, the Signet Office having not dispatched it till after nine at night. The talk about the town is that my Lord Sunderland is to part with his secretary's place; the candidates are Sir William Temple, Mr. Finch and Sir Thomas Littleton, and some say Mr. Seymour. I have spoke to the King several times about recruiting the Scots companies that are in Ireland, and he still promised to send his commands to raise them in Scotland by beat of drum, without which they are not to be had, and it is not certain whether they can be raised that way neither; so that I inclined to have them rather supplied out of the north of Ireland, for the beating drums in this conjuncture may be of bad consequence, and the being without their complement is ill also.

His Majesty has commanded my attendance this next Parliament and continues the same commands to you as he gave me for you at my first coming hither, and sent your Grace since by my Lord Longford. Mr. Gwyn goes next week for Ireland, and my Lord Chamberlain; he and I are to meet the day before he goes to discourse of matters, that he may inform you that by word of mouth which may be difficult for his lordship or me to write. I have thoughts whether I stay the Parliament's meeting or no to take a trip into Ireland if you approve of it; yet whatever you may conclude on that side, matters may so alter when my back is turned as may make those measures you may prudently take impracticable when I return. There came the other day about 25 witnesses out of Ireland under the conduct of Owen Murphy and the messenger Wilks brought Maurice Fitzgerald and Murtagh Dowling; the former, I am told, disowns the printed information upon which we made that brisk vote concerning there being a plot in Ireland.

ORMOND to EARL OF ARRAN.

1680–1 Jan. 25. Dublin.—I have received yours of the 18th and this morning that of the 10th by Mulys. If it was good to dissolve the last Parliament and so soon to call another I think the place of sitting well chosen; but for the present I suppose it determines the question of calling a Parliament here. I desire you to deliver the packet enclosed herewith into the King's hands as soon after you receive it as you can have an opportunity, and let the seals be well observed, for I find a packet of mine was opened in December last and a ring of 50*l.* taken out of it, for which I am to pay. I think you ought to stay till the Parliament meets, then you may expect fair weather without doors whatever it may be within; but this with submission to the King's pleasure, which you may inform yourself by desiring to know it. If you come away whatever my Lord of Shaftesbury shall say in the House touching Ireland upon the falsest information will pass for current truth, and hasty resolves may be made upon it such as may be of considerable prejudice to the King's service, if my reputation or continuance in this Government be of any importance to it. In case His Majesty would have you stay, if you can have any tolerable conveniency I think you should take your wife with you, Oxford being so far in your way hither. There is time enough to think of the match for James; that my Lord Chamberlain proposed is in a good posture. If it comes on from the other side I will not say but that the advantages may be such as I may close with it.

If the King have a mind to gratify any of the officers of his army here with leave to stay longer in England than my order allows, let it be privately signified to me by one of the secretaries, and it shall be complied with; but a formal public letter will draw importunity upon him and prejudice upon the discipline of the army.

Toby Purcell is not yet come; when he arrives he shall know of your kindness to him. A notorious Tory in Munster being ready to be sent by my lord of Orrery to prison, and at last actually perhaps too hastily sent thither by his lordship, offers at great discoveries and names many persons as guilty of the Plot, but orders will go this night for his setting at liberty and for protecting him in his way hither. The fellow's name is Henaghan, as I think in times past an attorney in the Presidency Court, but since that was suppressed turned robber. He has put his tale as well together as any of this country.

Anonymous to Ormond.

1680, January 25.—The quality your lordship has in this monarchy and the place you hold in Ireland obliges me to give your Grace a short and true account of our condition here that you may the better know how to take your measures. How the Parliament came to be prorogued and afterwards dissolved I suppose your Grace may be informed by other hands, but it may not be inconvenient to take things a little higher, that your Grace may know as well the foundations wherein our babel was built as the form and figure of the building itself. In the Parliament preceding the last there was a Bill offered for the exclusion of the Duke in the House of Commons which was contrived, managed and prosecuted by the Earl of Shaftesbury and a party of his in that

House, but the dependents of the Duke of Monmouth did so visibly appear in it that a just jealousy was thence taken of him by His R.H., but in that Bill there was an acknowledgment of his highness being the presumptive heir of the Crown, which was innocently inserted by those that knew not the mystery, but the cabal were well enough contented to have that Parliament broke to mend that flaw in another. In the meantime several traverses happened which will take up too much time to repeat. The Duke had heard of some practises set on foot by the Monmouthians to prove a marriage betwixt the King and the Duke of Monmouth's mother, and he unnecessarily thereupon put His Majesty upon declarations against it in Council, which rather animated than discouraged the party, for the people had conceived such a terror of the approaches of Popery, and consequently of the Duke's succeeding to the Crown, that they were apt enough to embrace any title to be secured against them. The Duke of Monmouth was suffered without check to go from place to place and county to county and was met and caressed like an heir apparent, whilst some thought the King by being so passive at it was not therewith displeased. In the meantime the Court became much divided. The Duchess of Portsmouth upon some resentment against the Duchess of York for a conceived slight of her was resolved to ruin the Duke. Godly Godolphin being enamoured and intoxicated with Mrs. Buckly was trusted to manage the intrigue. Sunderland in opinion of the omnipotent power of the Duchess closed in it, and by means of Sir William Temple (the chief statesman of them all) Sir H. Capel was the instrument to beget correspondence betwixt them and Shaftesbury, Montague, Lord Russell, Titus, Sir William Jones, Wil. Herbert and Sir Francis Winnington, who were the chief managers of the Commons in the last Parliament. They had others fell in with them, as Sir Nich. Cary, Boscawen, Vernon of Derbyshire, Hamden, Hotham, and other hot and violent conductors, Garaway, Sacheverill, Clarges, Birch, Hawell [? Stawell] and others, who were men thought warm enough at other times had now no vogue. A Bill was brought in to exclude the Duke, wherein no mention was made of his being presumptive heir of the Crown, nor would it be admitted to be added to it by amendment, nor any salvo to his children by name as was moved and pressed, but all left so ambiguous that the Duke of Monmouth, if the King died before him, might make his pretensions. The Bill passed the Commons with scarce two negatives, not any of those of the Privy Council in that House except Lionel Jenkins and Lory Hyde having courage to oppose it. The Lord Cavendish was for it, but took occasion sometimes to shew his dislike of the violence and virulence of the prosecutors, and once he inveighed against French mistresses, and said he doubted of the success of their endeavours, because they ought not to prosecute any actions though in themselves just, by unjust means. When the Bill came to the Lords it was there rejected. Sunderland appeared for it and so did Privy Seal, but Halifax withstood all opposition and answered all objections made to support it, and in this conflict Essex, who had hitherto been his friend, went over to Shaftesbury and voted for the Bill, and the Duke of Monmouth contrary to the advice of his friends spoke against it in terms too indecent for his circumstances. This miscarriage of the Bill exasperated the party so much that an insurrection was feared, but the party were encouraged by Portsmouth to persist with assurance of success, and then there was a private bargain struck, Jones was to be Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, Winnington Attorney General, Montague an Earl or Marquis, Lord Russell the Government of Portsmouth, Hamden a Privy Councillor, Titus Secretary of State, Capel restored to the Admiralty, and Holms (?) Secretary to that Commission. Shaftesbury was left out, which made him arraign and protest against the whole business ; Halifax and Seymour were no parties to this matter, and to be removed from the Court, the first by an address and sharp votes, the other by an impeachment. These proceedings were aggravated by by the daily alarms of the dangers of Popery and the progress of a plot in Ireland to massacre the English and introduce the arms of France. Your Grace had occasionally many reflections on your Government and the Lord Chancellor talked of as a great favourer of the Romish religion. They said that when the King was restored there were but forty Popish priests in Ireland, and these removed to the Islands of Arran and no blood shed to effect it, but only a resolute proclamation to give 5*l.* to any that discovered a priest (which was also the price of a wolf's head) and a strict practise of sending them when discovered to Arran Isles made them all rather quit that kingdom than go thither ; but upon your Grace's first admittance to that Government seventeen or eighteen years ago above ten thousand of that brood flocked thither and are still there, which does not only give life to all their plots, but so weakens and impoverishes the people that they are almost in a starving condition. They said moreover that in Cromwell's time, when the priests were put from the people, and Protestant ministers were found out to preach to them in Irish, and the statute of ninepence a Sunday imposed on all that avoided the Church, Popery began so much to decline that in seven years there would have been little of it left in that kingdom, and the like proceedings again would have the like effects. The great heat in the House of Commons made many hope the King would have sent to command the Duke to be informed in the Protestant religion, but it was not done, and some (upon, I hope, groundless opinion) said privately in Court the King had so encouraged him in it and was himself heretofore so well persuaded of that religion that he durst not do it. Friday, the 7th of January, was a hot day in the House of Commons, the leaders there had purpose to vote the Chancellor, Privy Seal, Radnor, Halifax and Hyde evil counsellors and to be removed from the King's presence. They began with Halifax and Hyde, but others were by accidental motions introduced against the sense of the managers, whereby the three first escaped, but it was pleasant to see how the faction writhed when Portsmouth was named, and Sir William Jones was fain to use more art than honesty to save her; but if it had not been very late at night and the members had been fasting she had been irredeemably routed. This day's debate produced a resolution in the King to prorogue the Parliament on Monday following, which was the 9th, to the 20th. And on the 18th, two days before it was to sit, His Majesty declared in Council that it should be dissolved. The Earl of Salisbury stood up in Council to speak against it, but was not admitted to it, and when he desired to withdraw it was not only permitted to him, but he was struck out of the Council also. Essex muttered and Sir Robert Carr stood up to move, but would not be suffered to speak. Halifax was not there, and the next day all the advice of this counsel was imputed in the city to him, Arlington and Hyde, but the contrary afterwards appeared, and Seymour has the honour to be the sole patron of it, in conjunction, as some think, with Danby, whereby the mediation of old St. Albans is thought to be closed with him. The late leaders of the Commons think Portsmouth betrayed them. Sunderland was yesterday put out of the Council, and Essex and Sir William Temple with him. Conway is made Secretary of State; what will be the fate of Godolphin I know not. I pray God there be no money from France.

Earl of Arran to Ormond.

1680–1, Jan. 25. London.—I had yesterday your Grace's of the 18th and thought it proper in this conjuncture to show to the King, who was pleased to say upon the latter clause of it that I might see by what he did and intended to do that the Court should not drive any more that way. My Lord Sunderland is turned out of his employments and my Lord Conway is believed to be the man that will succeed him in his secretary's place. My Lord Essex and Sir William Temple were dismissed the Council; it seems I was much mistaken in my last letter in my intelligence concerning Sir William.

There was this day an address or petition delivered to His Majesty by ten of the peers and signed by fifteen. If I can remember the names I will enclose them. The address was much to the purpose the City's was, only they desired the Parliament might meet at Westminster, or else they could not freely give their advice. It will be in print without doubt before the next post, and then it will be sent you; it is much higher than ever the peers went in the Long Parliament. Within a few days they say the King will turn out some of his bedchamber, but I cannot write this for a certainty. My Lord Halifax went this day into the country, and said he intended not to leave it until the meeting of the Parliament. Sir James Butler desires me to put you in mind of the business he wrote to you about concerning Sir John Poyntz, for some answer or other will be expected from you this term. I mentioned something of the same business upon the widow's desire above a month since.

ORMOND to the KING.

1680–1, January 28. Dublin.—Sir Robert Walsh has ever since I last came into this kingdom attempted to provoke me to a correspondence with him, but I have still declined it by making no return to very many letters I have received from him. He then betook himself to my secretary, Henry Gascoigne, and many letters he directed to him with desire they might be imparted to me, but neither that way had he any encouragement to give himself that trouble, yet by the last post he directed one to [Gas]coigne, which seems to me to give some light to my Lord [of Clar]re's letter to me, of which I sent Your Majesty a copy with mine of the 22 of this month. If Sir Robert being with Mr. Secretary Jenkins was to inform him of what he came to know I presume the intelligence is or will be driven as far as it is fit it should go. However, I thought it fit for me to send your Majesty a transcript of so much of the letter as relates to my Lord of Clare's correspondence. [Encloses the following letter.]

SIR ROBERT WALSH to HENRY GASCOIGNE.

1680–81, Jan. 22—You see I cannot leave still giving you the trouble of my scribbles, yet perhaps the tenents of the enclosed may not be disregarded. The best of your kingdom, I am confident, will not for the most part disallow therein. It's not yet cried, as most prints be. Everything having its time, I only excepted.

Here happened lately an accident: a letter from the country addressed unto Lord Shaftesbury and one therein to Lord Salisbury. The letters dropt in the carriage, and being found and taken up by a porter, being opened they were brought unto a neighbour the next door to me, one that lived in the King's Head in the Budge Row, a cook, in whose house I often in those days waited upon a great good man at the eating of many good leg a mutton. You wonder why I bring this story sur le tapis; but to come to our former chapter. These letters as formerly addressed were brought to be read unto one Dutton, the son of him of the King's Head in Budge Row, who lives right over here against my lodging in the White Friars. He coming to see me and used to receive any letter addressed to me, as sometimes some are to his house, the Bull Head in White Friars, he comes to communicate unto me these letters writ from Ireland by the Earl of Clare, wherein he declares some things as being plottish, which I touch not now upon; he much wonders how slowly he hears from their lordships projected games are coming into play. I was yesternight, after Dutton's going from me, with Sir Leonell Jenkins, a most civil, well understanding bred man and a person fit to be a State Secretary. If ever I had got the report on the King's reference unto you there I am confident that this secretary would have served me. He knows civility, and when justice is in the case requisite. I cannot say as much of some upstarts, for whom, if I could from that country have but my own or fair dealing from them of that your nation I would not value at a f. some that out of nothing are raised to something, and now would hardly acknowledge him that made them. So God bless his Grace. If you may think of favouring me with a line, address it to Mr. Dutton at the Bull Head, in White Friars, for S.R., Janry. 22th.

Postscript.—The last post day I sent you a packet in which was one for my Lord Ossory, and one for H.G. And a particular little one for yourself in order, as so was superscribed, for His Majesty's Service, which I hope you have observed in a bumper. If you would say by a line I have received yours you would do yourself no wrong, and would do me right, my honest dear Harry, so I bid you good-night. My duty unto her Grace pray present, and service to your good lady. Lord Stafford's trial and circumstances I wish I could as easily send you. It's 40 sheets in folio.

Earl of Arran to Ormond.

1680–1, Jan. 29. London.—It is not yet declared who will succeed my Lord Sunderland in his employment of secretary, but it is still generally believed that my Lord Conway will be the man. He professes the greatest kindness imaginable to your Grace and myself, but most do think that my Lord Ranelagh will have that employment in time thrown up to him. I have nothing worth your trouble this post, but what you will find in the prints. The answer to my Lord Essex's speech and the Lords' petition in my judgment is very well writ. My Lord Burlington desires very much that the Scots Companies should be removed from his town of Youghal; what his quarrel to them is I can't imagine. I told him that the time of year was very improper, so that he does not expect it until spring. Jack St. Leger is the busiest man about the Irish witnesses next to Hethrington in all this town, as I am very credibly informed, and I believe the messengers at their return into Ireland will inform you as much. I desire that you would hereafter order your letters to me to be directed to Secretary Jenkins his office, for I shall receive them sometimes twenty-four hours sooner that way than the other. When the other secretary is declared I will receive His Majesty's commands to whom your Grace should direct your dispatches.

FRANCIS GWYN to ORMOND.

1680–81, Jan. 29. London.—I intended to have had the honour of kissing your Grace's hands in Ireland instead of this letter, but the uncertainty of affairs here persuaded me (together with my Lord of Arran's opinion) to stop my journey till I might be better enabled to give your Grace an account of the posture we are in; but the more particular reason was the discourse of my Lord of Conway's succeeding my Lord Sunderland in the office of Secretary of State, which though all conclude will be, yet is not yet done. Mr. Weld is upon his journey into Ireland and brings with him the order of Council appointing myself and him the other two commissioners for managing the revenue, who are to be continued with salary upon the establishment, which for my part I should have not so heartily pressed but that I had assurance of your Grace's kind inclinations towards me.

I suppose your Grace hath received an account of my Lord of Essex delivering the petition against the sitting of the Parliament at Oxford, with his Lordship's success therein, which was being removed out of the Lord Lieutenancy of Hertfordshire, and the Lord Bridgewater's being put in his place, his Lordship, the Lord Sunderland and Sir William Temple being before that removed out of the Council, and their places supplied by my Lord Oxford, Lord Chesterfield and Lord Ailesbury. Here is likewise great discourse of the removal of the Earl of Macklesfeld, Earl of Manchester and Earl of Suffolk out of the Bedchamber; but till my Lord Sunderland hath the seals taken from him men seem not to believe it, and in short everybody seems at present more in suspense than they were four days agone. Here hath lately happened a great quarrel between Sir Henry Ingoldsby and Mr. David FitzGerald, which upon complaint of Mr. Justice Warcup was referred to the Lord Ailesbury, executing the place of Earl Marshal, to compose and prevent any further inconvenience.

Mr. Williams, likewise Speaker of the late Parliament, making oath in the King's Bench that Sir Robert Peyton had lately been at his chamber and demanded satisfaction of him in discourse for a paper (which was dispersed abroad in the coffee-houses under the title of Mr. Speaker's speech to Sir Robert Peyton when he was discharged the House), which he did interpret was intended a challenge, and transmitting the said oath to Mr. Secretary Jenkins, who brought it before the Board yesterday. The Council was pleased to send Sir Robert Peyton to the Tower by their warrant expressing for giving a challenge to Williams, Speaker of the late Parliament.

I do propose to myself as soon as matters are in any settlement here to wait upon your Grace in Ireland, and in the meantime humbly beg your Grace's favour in relation to my employment there.

Ormond to Earl of Arran.

1680–1, Jan. 31. Dublin.—Sir Phil. Lloyd gave me notice that upon what was represented hence concerning Geoghegan I should have order to proceed against him with all the severity the law would allow; but though there be a post since arrived I have no such order. I hope their mind is not changed, if it be it were well they would direct how he shall be treated. If the above mentioned order be not sent away inform yourself upon what account it is stopped, for though the fellow be not worth a rope, yet something may be collected from what shall be ordered concerning him. I have hitherto suffered no check to be imposed upon the defective men in the remaining five Scotch companies, intending that by the benefit of allowing it to them they should at their own charge fill up their companies. But I can hear of no progress they have made towards it, though the Lt. Col. has been a good while in Scotland, and I begin to doubt that men will not be had thence with or without beating drums till the rest of the regiment be returned from Tangier, nor yet in the north of Ireland for fear of being sent thither. But it seems hard that when a plot is voted to be here, and whilst out of Munster we are so hotly alarmed, and whilst really the Protestants of this kingdom may be in greater danger than ever from the exasperation of the Papists, and their apprehension that it is intended to extirpate them and their religion, I say it is hard that in such a case and conjuncture we may not have means to fill up the army to the establishment with English or with Scotch Protestants, since if it were filled it is too little to secure all the important places in the kingdom.

As far off as the meeting of the Parliament is, I thought it not amiss to send over authority to some Lords to administer the usual oaths to the members of the House of Commons. You may cause it to be delivered to the Secretary of State or to one of the clerks of the Council, I know not which is most proper. I have recommended a concern not of the Archbishop, but of the Archbishopric of Dublin to my Lord Sunderland, wherein upon occasion I wish you would interest yourself.

Earl of Derby to Ormond.

1680–81, Jan. 31. Knowsley.—Though your Grace has been troubled of late with several letters from me, yet I cannot refrain this time because I must give your Grace my humble thanks for the present of wine you were pleased to make me, which is extraordinary good, and which I esteem as much as I ought to do, and I hope personally by the next summer to assure your Grace I will always study to deserve your good opinion, for I really intend with my wife to pay you a visit if affairs here will give me leave. I am sure I should be much concerned upon a double account if I am prevented writing upon your Grace not only because we are not so well here as I should wish to be, but that I must be hindered having the honour and the satisfaction of being with your Grace, which I without compliment or affectation do desire, but what is less, yet I hope I may be pardoned if I say I extremely long to see Kilkenny, which I have heard so much of. My wife is now with me as I am writing, she presents her duty to you, and she desires me to assure your Grace from her that she really believes I speak my mind in what I have now said, which though without her assurance I hope I have given your Grace no reason to question, yet I know her assurance will strengthen what I have writ.

Francis Gwyn to Ormond.

1680–1, Feb. 1. London.—I troubled your Grace by the last post with the reason of my not attending your Grace in Ireland myself, instead of that letter in expectation of my Lord Conway's succeeding my Lord Sunderland in the office of secretary, which was last night made an end of ; His Majesty then delivering the seals to his Lordship without allowing any recompense to be given to my Lord Sunderland. My attendance at this time on his Lordship will prevent my intended journey at present; but in the meantime I hope I may be more capable of serving your Grace on this side the water, which I shall do with the greatest diligence and sincerity in my power.

Upon my resolution of kissing your Grace's hands in Ireland I received commands from Mr. Seymour which, by reason of the delaying my journey, I will give your Grace an account of here. He doth with the greatest frankness and sincerity desire the continuance of your Grace's friendship, and hath commanded me to assure your Grace that he shall upon all occasions be very ready to obey your Grace's commands whenever you shall please to think it fit to lay them upon him. Upon the prospect of my not going Mr. Seymour was pleased to mention something of the same kind to Sir John Davys, which he will be able to deliver better in discourse when he waits on your Grace than I am able to do in a letter.

His Majesty hath been pleased to order that the former method should be observed in direction of affairs out of Ireland to the senior secretary, but I am assured there will be a concurrence both in Mr. Secretary Jenkins and my Lord Conway for your Grace's service at all times.

Mr Justice Warcup and three of his brethren, Justices of Middlesex, are ordered to examine the last twenty-three witnesses that came out of Ireland, four other (of whom Morish FitzGerald and Murtagh Downey are two) have been examined by them already and desired leave to return again into Ireland, which is given them with an allowance to bear their charges.

Earl of Arran to Ormond.

1680–1, Feb. 1. London.—This afternoon I had your Grace's letter of the 25th of the last and the enclosed packet for His Majesty, which I delivered to him within an hour after I received it. He had not time to read over then the enclosed papers, so that if he has any commands for you upon them they must be deferred until the next post, for the letters are sent constantly from this end of the town at nine a clock at night. Yesterday the seals were given to my Lord Conway, and he still professes great service for your Grace and desired me to let you know that Mr. Seymour will serve you faithfully in anything that concerns you or the affairs of that kingdom if you think fit to acquaint him with them, therefore I think you would do well in answer to this letter to make some compliment to this letter to make some compliment to him and give me directions to apply to him, for he is now in great favour at Court. I expected that my Lord would have said something concerning begetting a better understanding betwixt my Lord Ranelagh and you having occasion to discourse of him, but he said as good a friend as he was to him he would not pass his word to your Grace for him. Your dispatches henceforth the King would have you direct to Secretary Jenkins, who is very much your friend, and so is Mr. Cook, who is next in the office, and is a very honest man, therefore I desire you would allow him the 100*l.* a year you gave before to one Benson, who has deserved very little what has been given him. Secretary Jenkins will take it very kindly, but in modesty will not write himself. Mr. Gwyn will be employed in my Lord Conway's office, and therefore he hopes you will dispense with his coming over as he intended.

Sir L. Jenkins to Ormond.

1680–81, Feb. 1. Whitehall.—His Majesty hath been pleased to command me to remove into another province. Though no province at this time affords anything of satisfaction, yet I reckon it as a great comfort I have in my removal that I do thereby enter into your Grace's more immediate service, there being no man living that hath a deeper veneration than I have for your Grace.

You will, my Lord, receive (probably by this post) a petition of the Earl of Sussex to His Majesty with a reference upon it to your Grace. His Majesty recommends it in consideration of the equity of it to your Grace's favourable report. His Majesty hath likewise declared himself very graciously in favour of Mr. George Weld. He would have him have the next captain of foot's place that shall fall in the army there. My Lord Arran, I doubt not, hath already given you His Majesty's pleasure in this particular. His Majesty commands me to send your Grace the transcript enclosed, 'tis part of a letter writ from Holland and addressed to His Majesty himself. The King says the writer is of no manner of credit with him; however, since he names certain persons and places, His Majesty would have your Grace see what is writ and leaves you to do as you see cause.

Here is a wonderful deal of art and industry used to stir up the seamen, the watermen, the hackney coachmen, the suburbs men, to petition that the Parliament may sit here and not at Oxford. The faction is enraged that the bulky I mean the wealthy part of the city, is not more forward in imitating and writing after the Lords Petitioners.

My Lord, I most humbly beg leave to insert here my humble and thankful acknowledgement of my Lord Arran's nobleness and favour towards me. I shall study to deserve it in some measure by my zeal in every thing wherein I may serve him.

VISCOUNT MASSEREENE to ORMOND.

1680–1, Feb. 2. Antrim.—Out of a deep sense of that duty I owe your Grace and the King's service I presume most humbly to acquaint you that I have been informed since I came out of England that there are many Roman Catholic natives lately crept into the army of Ireland, particularly some of those who were recalled from foreign service. And in regard I understand it hath pleased your Grace and Council to order that such Justices and officers of the militia who give ground of suspicion and have wives of the Romish persuasion should be thereby rendered incapable of places in either of those commissions; I do in the greatest humility mention this to your Grace, whether you will not also please (by your own power as general) to give the same rule concerning the officers and soldiers of His Majesty's army here, and for better discovery of such appoint and command persons in each province and garrison (as you may please to approve) who may as the Lord Lieutenants and Deputy Lieutenants of each county of England usually do from time to time (and now or in a short time by you limited) make inquiry and [ ] of these and other particulars tending to his Majesty's service, and the truth of the premises, to the end that thereby it may be demonstrated fully that such transgressions are contrary to your Grace's knowledge and special command, so that in all the particular importances of the Government (in this juncture of affairs) you have had a strict regard, which with my humble application for pardon is submitted.

FRANCIS GWYN to ORMOND.

1680–1, Feb. 5. London.—Yesterday at the Council appeared Silvester, Castle and five other, who came out of Ireland on the account of being witnesses to the Popish plot in Ireland, they all having been examined before by Mr. Justice Warcup and two other Justices of the Peace, declared upon oath they knew nothing of any kind relating to the plot, which they then again swore and desired leave to return again into their own country with money from His Majesty to bear their charges, both which requests are granted them. Two of them likewise deposed that Eustace Comin had told them they should have clothes and money if they would make out what he had sworn, Comin being called in made some excuses and evasions that he only persuaded them to tell all they knew to be truth, but notwithstanding his pretences it did visibly appear he had been tampering with them. Amongst other things this was thought remarkable in the proceedings that Comin producing some letters lately sent out of Ireland to vindicate his reputation, they were all directed to be left for him at Sir Thomas Player's house.

Mr. David Fitzgerald and Mr. Hethrington likewise yesterday brought in their accusations against one another and have copies reciprocally ordered them with time till next Council day to bring in their answers.

A hearing was yesterday intended at the Board between Mr. Edmund Waller (who pretends a promise from the King to succeed Dr. Alestree, lately deceased, in the Provostship of Eton College) and the Fellows of Eton who oppose him as being a layman and not qualified. Counsel appeared on both sides, but neither party being sufficiently prepared with precedents, the cause was put off till Friday sennight next.

My Lord Conway Wednesday last took the oaths of Secretary of State and Privy Councillor, and being at this time both in possession and execution of his office, hath done me the honour to appoint me to attend his lordship, for which reason I humbly beg your Grace's favour to excuse my coming into Ireland to wait upon your Grace according to my intentions and duty and have taken care to prevent any complaints which might be made to your Grace from this side of the water for my absence.

I suppose Mr. George Weld will take care to wait upon your Grace with the order of Council for appointing him and myself to be continued in salary with Sir Charles Meredith, and therefore have not given your Grace the trouble to send my order, it being only a duplicate of that which Mr. Weld hath with him and concerns us both.

Ormond to Viscount Massereene.

1680–1, Feb. 5. Dublin.—I am obliged to your lordship for the information contained in yours of the 2nd of this month concerning the cre[ep]ing of many Roman Catholic natives into the army, but the obligation would have been more useful if you had been pleased to let me know who gave your lordship that information and instanced at least some officers or soldiers of that kind who have been received into the army, which I conceive you might the more easily have done for that a considerable part of the army is garrisoned and quartered in that province and in your neighbourhood; nor can I doubt but that when your Lordship received the information you required some instances from the informer, and not receiving satisfaction therein I suppose you would not have given yourself the trouble of the representation you have made, but looked upon it as a calumny cast on the army and Government, as I must believe it to be till instances shall be given. The order of Council mentioned by your lordship concerning Justices of the Peace and militia officers is not yet in writing, and was resolved upon upon occasion of a person then before us, and we were judges of the ground we had to think him unfit to continue a Justice of Peace or a militia officer, and I think we shall reserve that judicature to ourselves, but we shall be always ready to receive any information concerning any man in employment, civil or military, that may tend to the discovery of his disaffection in point of religion, nay we have [long since] encouraged such informations by proclamation, which promises a reward to any whoever shall discover any officer or soldier [of] the army to be a Papist, which we thought might move the Protestants in every troop and company as well as others to detect their officers and fellow soldiers tainted in religion. This is an additional provision in that point to the directions the Commissaries of the Musters have to pass no officer or soldier that shall not produce an authentic certificate of his taking the oath of supremacy and receiving the sacrament within the times required. True it is there may be negligence, collusion, and corruption in the bishop or minister that certifies and in the commissary that musters, but so there may also be in anybody else that shall be employed. In conclusion, I beseech your lordship to make use of your uttermost industry and interest to find out any Papist trusted in the civil or military part of the Government, wherein you will besides serving the King infinitely oblige your lordship's, etc.

Earl of Arran to Ormond.

1680–81, February 5. London.—There came in yesterday letters from Ireland dated the 30th of the last, but none from your Grace, which I do not much wonder at since my Lord Longford was forced to pump hard to write a short letter, though the news continues still here of great risings in Munster. I know not what was enclosed in your last letter to His Majesty, but he told me the substance of them is very idle. I thought the seal might have been opened, because there was a little scorching of the paper on one side of the seal, but the seal itself was whole enough. I do intend to stay in this kingdom until I see the issue of this Parliament, but the charge will be too great to carry my wife to Oxford, for now we live here cheaper than I have done anywhere else, and were it not for the family I am forced to keep in Ireland this journey would do me little hurt as to my purse. I intend to send for my coach horses over, for I find I save nothing by their being there, when I compute the charge of hackney coach and chair, which is not to be avoided by myself and my wife, besides the indecency will appear more in the spring than it does now. The Secretaries will take care hereafter that no licences for officers shall be offered to His Majesty's signing, but it shall be as you desire. They discourse still of alterations in the Bedchamber, but that matter has cooled, so that I believe nothing will be done in it. Captain Murray, of the Scots Regiment, goes from hence on Monday next, and if any thing happen to-morrow you shall hear from me by him, for all persons that relate to Ireland, if they have any command or employment there, will scarce be satisfied without my letter to your Grace by them. Justice Warcop has very friendly given me the copies of the examinations he has taken of the witnesses brought over by Owen Murphy, eight of them swear home against Plunkett and some against one Tyrrell, a titular bishop, and that is the sum of what they have deposed.

ORMOND to EARL OF ARRAN.

1680–1, Feb. 7. Dublin.—You will judge by the copy I send you of my Lord Massereene's letter to me that it is intended to proceed in aspersing the army here as if it had received many Papists, but I hope the time will come when general and false reflections will not take place. If the matter of his letter shall be spread there, possibly my return to it ought to encounter it in as many places as may be. All the marks we have to know and find out Papists by are the oath of supremacy and the sacrament. If they take them and frequent the Church service it is more than most of my Lord Massereene's neighbours, pastors or family will do, which I was about upon occasion of his letter to put him in mind of, but I considered that recrimination is seldom a convincing defence, and that I had a much better at hand. Our latest letters out of England were of the 22nd of January, so that three packets are due and much expectation there is of what that time has produced in Court and city and country elections. In the meantime many reports are raised and invented by conjecture. It will shortly be time to send James into France, but unless I can have for him an approved governor I had rather keep him with me. Much good I have heard of one that travelled with my Lord of Bath's son; his lordship and Sir C. Wyche can give an account of him.

EARL OF ARRAN to ORMOND.

1680–1, Feb. 7. London.—I have this day your Grace's of the 28th and 31st of the last, and when Col. Hungerford comes hither I don't doubt but I shall get His Majesty's order for the precedence he desires in behalf of himself and his under officers. The enclosed letter I have delivered to the King, which he slights very much upon the account of the person that informs; but my Lord Conway being near, His Majesty has given the paper to him, and will give him the former also, which it seems he neglected. My Lord Sunderland being out of employment, I have given Mr. Secretary Jenkins the letter directed to him and the warrant for swearing the members of the next Parliament. Your Grace will within a short time have an account of what is done in reference to the Scots recruits, the King's orders being sent about them into Scotland a fortnight since. The King has also by his letter given you directions what post they are to have, being allowed when they were here the next place to the Guards. I spoke this day and several times before to His Majesty about filling up our army there, and he still says it shall be done; but now the two Secretaries have promised to be helping in it, and they shall not want the being put in remembrance of it. The remaining part of the Scots Regiment now at Tangier the King does again say shall be speedily sent for. My Lord Burlington has very alarming letters out of Munster from his brother and nephew, Mr. Boyle, which has occasioned the strange printed papers that are published. He desired me to let you know that the English are in great apprehensions in those parts and want powder. I told him that if they did it was their fault, for they might buy out of the stores what proportion they pleased, the officers of the ordnance having sent for powder from hence for that purpose. It will not be amiss to inquire into that matter. There is a print sold about the town wherein you are chiefly concerned and myself next, but it is so ridiculously false that I intend not to make any noise or use endeavours to find out the printer; but if you have a mind at any time to have any letter put out here in print relating to Ireland or yourself I can get it put into one of those news books by the favour of an active Justice of the Peace here who is much your friend; but he has a handsome youth for his son, which son he expects some employment for in Ireland. He is a very likely young man.

Sir L. Jenkins to Ormond.

1680–1, Feb. 8. Whitehall.—This serves for a covert to two of His Majesty's letters to your Grace. We (though I had the honour to receive from my Lord of Arran this day your Grace's commission to divers peers) do find the warrant that goes herewith necessary to introduce it. We have also prepared and sent a commission for your Grace's hand. The alteration that you will find in the names of the Commissioners is made by His Majesty's special directions. The other letter is in favour of Mr. George Weld for a company of foot.

I cannot by this post send your Grace the remaining part of the Irish depositions, there being an order made to lodge them in the hands of the Attorney General (who is gone off this day to be a Judge in the Common Pleas, Sir Robert Sawyer succeeding to the place of Attorney) in order to make his report upon them, which are material and which not, that the useful witnesses may be retained and the others sent home. The faction is deliberating how to attack His Majesty's Guards, and yet have the laws of their side. They intend to indict them the latter end of this term, then upon their not answering to apprehend some of them, as they walk singly in the streets, and if they give not bail for their good behaviour as well as appearance to let them lie in jail. 'Twill be assigned for a breach of their good behaviour to ride or go in the head of companies or troops of illegal men that go armed in terrorem populi. This is their design, besides many more that they still invent and bring forth.

ANONYMOUS MEMORANDUM ON OFFICERS IN IRELAND.

Undated. I landed in Ireland, 27th Sep., 1679, and first I was in the King's and Queen's Counties, where I am much esteemed and known (but not by my own name). I am deemed and taken here to be a Catholic, all whom I found in a very quiet posture, only much grieved at the persecution in England (as they term it). Then I came back into the counties of Wexford and Waterford, where I am a right Independent and so habited, deemed and taken above these ten years (but they know nothing of my late troubles nor my own name), and I have the intrills of all their actings. Here I found the great ones of them in a very confident posture, and after many a prayer, long grace, feasts and, I think, fuddling, too, Major Dennis, of Wexford, asked me plainly if I'd make one with them. I answered when I knew it they should hear my opinion, but obliged myself before them all to secrecy. I shall here beg Your Majes[t]y's pardon as to all degrees of circumstances to avoid tediousness. But in fine I had an oath given me or mighty like an oath, and find that on Wednesday, the 4th of May, next, all the fanatics, which are Oliver's old breed, and most of them in command (which I much wonder at), are all to rise and by a design (layed on purpose) with some few ignorant Irish to fall upon all the Irish and to give out strange things against them as of theft, idolatry, promiscuous marriages, etc., and then to proclaim themselves the Protestant protectors. Now I much and many times have wondered at one thing, that all the Lieutenants of Ireland have continued or rather confirmed and settled such commands of military forces upon those that were notoriously known to be Oliver's only creatures and his immediate officers. This Major Dennis, of Wexford, has had a company of foot this many years and was a captain in Col. Pierson's Regiment that refused to march with General Monk into England, saying Monk had a King in his belly. And this Dennis and Col. Scott (son to Scott that was hanged), Capt. Tench, one of Oliver's captains, who now commands the country troop, and one John Mitchell, lately taken in and steward to this Duke of Albemarle, are the ringleaders in this county of Wexford. Then for the county of Waterford there are enough, but the chief of them are the two Olands who said once (as 'tis publicly enough known) that they would wash their hands in the Stuarts' blood; and a most grand one is one Capt. Nicolls, who had a troop of horse under Oliver, who professeth openly he will have t'other bout yet, yet is lately made Justice of the Peace, etc. These are the prime leaders and rulers in that county, who backed with infinite of their sect keep a due correspondence with those of the north of Ireland, who are most Scots and Scotch breed and are the northern Presbyterians and fanatics., lusty, able-bodied, hardy and stout men, where one may see three or four hundred at every meeting-house on Sundays ; and all the north of Ireland is inhabited with these, which is the populest place of all Ireland by far. They are very numerous and greedy after land. These things have I traced and complied withal to find out the depth and truth of their designs. And further, too, I would have waded and travailed herein had I not suspected a warrant for my apprehension from Dublin ; but whether there was one or no I did not stay many days longer in the country, but taking my leave upon pretended business with promise of a timely return I shipped for France 4th, April, 1680, and going to Rouen found a wonderful number of English Roman Catholics, among whom I was very conversant, but heard not one word of any plot, which I much admired at. And in June I shipped for Holland.

Endorsed :—Information given to the King. Received from Mr. Secretary Jenkins, 9 February, 1680–1.

Ormond to Earl of Conway.

1680–1, Feb. 11. Dublin.—Having received so many fresh demonstrations of your favour and friendship, you cannot doubt but that I very heartily congratulate your Lordship's entrance into the management of affairs for my own sake, for this kingdom's and for the King's. When anything of more than ordinary moment shall happen here or be sent hence I shall write immediately to your Lordship, and I must ask your leave that things of less importance may also be sent you in copies or duplicates, that you may be ignorant of nothing that passes where you have so much interest and knowledge, I wish your lordship all possible satisfaction in your employment.

Ormond to Earl of Arran.

1680–1, Feb. 11. Dublin.—Yours of the 25th and 29th of the last and 1st of this month came all at once, and a whole cargo of prints of all sorts are scattered here; the most important and the most extraordinary is the petition of sixteen Lords and the speech made at the delivery of it. Some have taken upon them to write over the substance of the King's verbal answer, but there is yet no written one of His Majesty come to us. I wish they had come together, since I believe there was ground for a good answer and that the opportunity was not lost. By young Buck I received a letter from Sir James Butler, and something wrapt about with greenwax, and the copy of a Bill put into the Court of Exchequer by my Lady Poyntz, to which I am made a party and must answer. After I have consulted some lawyer Sir James shall have a return from me. When my Lord Burlington was here he desired the remove of the Scottish companies from his town of Youghal; the reason, I think, was that the quartering of so many officers and so few soldiers was more troublesome than profitable to his tenants. But though the rent be his lordship's, yet since the town is the King's and that I am answerable for the security of it, I shall neither now nor in the spring leave it without a competent garrison; and methinks his desire to have it without soldiers agrees not well with the danger, I hear, he says that whole province is in of surprise and invasion. Jack St. Leger's assiduity about the Irish witnesses is a stratagem to be too hard for Barret in the House of Lords if the cause should come to determination there. All dispatches of public importance will from henceforth be directed to Sir Lyonell Jenkins and your letters with them, but when any of moment shall be sent my Lord Conway shall have copies, that he may be the better prepared against their being brought to the consideration of of the Council. I write to him myself this post upon occasion of his being secretary, as I remember his grandfather was. The packet I sent the King shows that we also have a Lord of Clare in this kingdom, and that he has set up for a zealous Protestant influenced no doubt from that side, and if he will be loud and violent enough it will not be remembered or taken notice of that since he became Protestant he made his wife a Papist and left her in a nunnery in France, that he has been in Spain and there went to Mass, that his son is or was page to the French King, with whom he treated when he was in the Prince of Orange's service, and shamed me that recommended him. I give you this account of that packet, finding by a letter from Sir Robert Walsh that by accident letters from my Lord of Clare to my Lord Shaftesbury came to his hands or his sight. Whereunto I should not have given credit upon Sir Robert's affirmation if Clare's letter to me had not rendered it more than probable. In short it is marvellous to me that there should be a Popish Plot founded upon French assistance (as no man dares doubt but there was) and that his Lordship should have no hand in it, no knowledge of it. He was in Spain and France if I mistake not about the time Oates says he was at Salamanca. He left his wife in a nunnery and his son in the French King's domestic service. He came over hither, as I think will appear, just when the design was to be put in execution. He is a man of known courage, conduct and intrigue, of a broken and indeed desperate fortune, burdened with a title very unsuitable to it. He is of a noble family, of great esteem and numerous dependance among the Irish Papists, and he is seated on the county of Clare side, a transplanted country, and therefore full of Irish, upon the mouth of the river of Limerick, the most proper place in Ireland to introduce an enemy and their fleets, who being in that river may choose on which side to land. Let all this be put together and let any reasonable man judge whether a fitter person or a more likely in all qualifications could have been created to enter into such a conspiracy than my Lord of Clare, and whether his present ostentation of zeal to the Protestant religion, when the Plot is discovered and frustrated, can mitigate the just suspicion that may with charity be had of him. Perhaps he is not worth all those remarks. Yet if his letter to me shall come to be made use of in order to asperse the King, these qualifications and transactions of his may not be impertinent. Which, therefore, you may impart to His Majesty at his leisure, and by his permission to Mr. Secretary Jenkins, the matter being so written that it may be severed from the rest of the letter.

LORD CLARE to ORMOND.

1680–1, Feb. 11. Tarbert.—I had the honour of your Grace's letter of the 22nd of the last month, and I will not fail to obey your Grace's commands in using my uttermost endeavours to discover the Papists' designs against His Majesty and Government. I find that the friar Brady is yet in this kingdom. I have employed people to apprehend him, and if they do take him I know it will not be to much purpose as to any discoveries he will make, for he will sooner burn than discover anything which may prejudice the interest of the Roman Catholic religion; and to my knowledge they have taught the generality of their people to deny the truth (though upon oath) when the asserting of it may be destructive to the interest of their religion. This doctrine joined with their advantage in concealing what plots they had afoot these years past keeps many of the chiefest among them from making discoveries. They have yet hopes to be the prevailing party, and whilst such hopes do last it is not likely any considerable person of them will discover. I find the people are possessed with an opinion that the King, your Grace, and Council, do issue what proclamations soever to suppress Popery, yet both Papists and most Justices that should put the laws in execution do believe them to be but matter of form. Nothing can undeceive them but His Majesty's appearing to be advised by his Parliament, which will frustrate for ever all hopes of Popery's reigning, and I doubt not but many of their gentry here will immediately thereupon be ingenious and discover what by the threats of their priests and prosperous opinion of their party was kept secret hitherto. I give your Grace with all humility and submission this information, as I can judge of the temper of the people in this part of the kingdom, with whom I converse in all humours. And as I conceive it the interest of all Protestants in Ireland to petition your Grace to move His Majesty for the sitting of the next Parliament in England from the 21st of next month until an effectual course be taken to secure us and our posterity in this kingdom from the designs of Papists, so I make it most humbly my particular petition to your Grace, to whose great wisdom and commands I shall ever submit.

Ormond to Earl of Arran.

1680–1, Feb. 11. Dublin.—I have writ to my Lord Conway upon the subject of his access to the Secretary's office to the effect I told you I would, and but that I thought it not proper upon that occasion to intermix anything else I would have desired him to assure Mr. Seymour that as I have long had a great value for him, so I have now as great a desire to entertain a particular friendship and all proper correspondence with him. The times and difficulties we are in require steadiness and industry, and if those qualifications be taught us from those most concerned to have them there may be hope of getting out of the briars. In short assure Mr. Seymour of my concurrence in the service of the Crown and of my service and friendship to him.

Sir L. Jenkins to Ormond.

1680–1, Feb. 12. Whitehall.—I continue to trouble your Grace with the depositions of the Irish witnesses as they lie before the Council. Sir Robert Sawyer is made Attorney General in the room of Sir Creswell Levinge, who is preferred to be one of the Justices of the Common Pleas. The elections are generally the same that they were last Parliament; where they have changed 'tis for the worse. We expected this day, being the last day of this term, some bloody presentment either against his R.H., or against the King's Guards, but none was made. Sir Gilbert Gerard and some few gents. more did yesterday present themselves to the Grand Jury of Middlesex attending the King's Bench, beseeching them to give the thanks of the gentry and freeholders of the county to the petitioning Lords. The day is not yet set for His Majesty's moving for Oxford.

Francis Gwyn to Ormond.

1680-1, Feb. 12. Whitehall.—Yesterday Mr. David Fitzgerald and Mr. Hethrington brought in their articles against one another to the Council in due form; the second article against Hethrington being for casting an odium upon His Majesty and Council in not taking notice of a Bull formerly produced by him to the Board, which he reported did discharge some Irish priests from their allegiance to His Majesty, but was not minded either by His Majesty or Council; this was fully proved upon him, to which he endeavoured to make excuses and evasions, but was severely reprimanded by my Lord Chancellor. Barnard Dennis had likewise proved upon him that he had sworn before Justice Warcup, and at several other times with oaths and imprecations, that he knew nothing relating to Her Majesty or the Duke, and after that by an information taken before the Lord Mayor, accused the Queen and Duke with knowledge of the Plot. These were the material things proved, though a great many wrangling and harsh words were used on both sides. Mr. Hethrington would have gone upon the proof of his accusation, but the Board, being tired with their quarrel, it is ordered they shall both answer one another at Westminster Hall. It is referred to Mr. Serjeant Maynard and the rest of the King's Counsel to peruse the informations of the witnesses, prepare the evidence and adjust all things in order to the trial of Oliver Plunket and other gentlemen which came out of Ireland, and to consider whether the raising money with an intent to levy war be an overt act of treason within the Statute of Edward the 3rd, and to report their opinions therein to His Majesty in Council.

Sir Creswell Levintz, Attorney General, hath his writ to be a Serjeant, in order to succeed Sir William Ellis in the place of Judge, and Sir Robert Sawyer is to be Attorney General in his room. The Lord Wooton's patent is under the seal for the title of Earl of Bellamont in Ireland. My Lord Bodmin is likewise to be called up to the House of Peers by writ; some others are named, but I do not find any certainty in it. Sir John Davies acquaints me he is very shortly leaving England, who will give your Grace a more full account of what I mentioned in my late letter concerning Mr. Seymour.

Postscript.—Since the making up my letter to your Grace I received an information that the Grand Jury of Westminster have this day brought in their verdicts upon the persons following for these crimes:

High Treason.—Robert Ely, John Butler, Paul Strange, Lawrence Sulyvane, Wm. Bradley, Sir John Davies, Wm. ffinch, John Shatall.—Witnesses.—Capt. Shirley, Macnamara, Sampson, Ivy, etc.

Misdemeanours.—Da. Fitzgerald.

Ignoramus.—Primate Plunket, Sir John FitzGerald.

Earl of Arran to Ormond.

1680-1, Feb. 12. London.—All that I have to trouble your Grace with this post is that I was informed by Justice

Warcop that the Grand Jury have found the bills this day against my Lord Tyrone, Plunket, and the others that are in prison upon David Fitzgerald's account. They have also found a bill against Sir John Davys for treason, though all that he is accused of can amount to no more than misdemeanour if proved. It was the intention of the leading men of the jury, Sir William Waller being one, to have indicted you and me together with the Queen and the Duke, but the witnesses would not be prevailed with to swear home to that point, though David Fitzgerald proved yesterday at the Board that they had been tampered with by Hethrington and one Dennis. What to advise Sir John Davys to I am to seek in, and he is much confounded at the proceedings, as I cannot blame him for, the like having never been done to anyone before in his station. I am told there is a committee appointed to take the state of Ireland into consideration. Upon the discourse I had with the secretaries before His Majesty, your Grace will, I hope, make some observations upon what my Lord Anglesey has writ in answer to my Lord Castlehaven's memoirs.

PRIMATE BOYLE to ORMOND.

1680–1, Feb. 12.—Your Grace have been so infinitely obliging by that handsome character you have been pleased to recommend Sir Wm. Davys, that I doubt not of its success by the appearance of my Lord Arran. I have, therefore, presumed to send you enclosed draught, if your Grace shall think fit to transmit it to Mr. Secretary Jenkins with your Grace's letter, which I return to your Grace here inclosed.

Directions shall be sent over for the attendance on this business and to discharge the fees.

ORMOND to EARL OF ARRAN.

1680–1, Feb. 12. Dublin.—Upon the death of Sir Robert Booth I have once more ventured to recommend Sir William Davys his promotion, my Lord Chief Justice Keating declining the preferment, and I have done it in the terms you will find in the inclosed copy of my letter to Mr. Secretary Jenkins. If the letter should come to be imparted further than I mean it should, and that perhaps some I do not mean to reflect upon should take themselves to be concerned, you have liberty to declare that I mean my Lord Privy Seal and my Lord of Essex and no other. My concern for Sir Wm. Davys is out of my steadfast belief of his loyalty and mettle as long as he shall be supported, and he that looks for more from much the greater part of lawyers will be disappointed, and as the world goes it is well if they may be depended upon so far.

EARL OF ARRAN to ORMOND.

1680–1, Feb. 15. London.—I was yesterday and this morning before a Committee of Council appointed to look into the posture of affairs in Ireland, and was desired to bring along with me such papers as I had by me relating to the condition the army and stores were in. I told them that when I was before them above two months ago I informed them all I knew, which was that the stores were in an ill condition, and that many of the soldiers of the army were unserviceable, all which you had several times represented to the Secretaries and Lords of the Treasury. The report they intend to make to the King is that 1,000*l.* barrels of powder should be sent over, and that orders should be sent by His Majesty for your raising in Ireland a thousand men to supply the vacancies of the army, and that you should send over such officers as you think properest for to be employed about such an undertaking, at the cheapest rates you can. The money for that purpose must be had out of the reducements lately made, for there cannot one penny be had from hence, and for the powder it must be paid out of that fund too, but a competent time and instalments will be granted for that. Much fault was found that no authentic account of the stores was to be had. George Legge produced one of the 31st July last left him by my Lord Longford, but signed by nobody. Complaint was also made that the militia was not enough looked after and that they wanted arms, etc. That arose from letters out of Munster. Pray let as brief an account as the matter will bear be sent over in relation to proceedings in that affair; for my Lord Privy Seal is very brisk upon that point, saying that the Irish did pretend there was a massacre intended upon them when they began theirs in '41. It was also observed that you did not answer all the points of the letter His Majesty writ to you (or was writ by his command) when the committee sat last upon those affairs, the proclamation or printed order being all that they know was done upon it.

There are some of the Irish witnesses now that will swear that Mr. Hethrington and Sir William Waller would have tempted them to swear against the Queen, Duke and your Grace and Lord Chancellor, with reflections also upon His Majesty. A great deal of this was proved already at the Board against them, upon which His Majesty has ordered my Lord Chancellor here to look into the matter and give order for the prosecution of them, and I am advised by some to bring an action of conspiracy against them in your name, but I dare not venture upon it, the persons I must deal with to prove this being men that I dare not rely upon, but if the King's Attorney prosecute the matter keenly, it will in my judgment do the business as well, and I will give him a fee if necessary.

Sir L. Jenkins to Ormond.

1680–1, Feb. 15. Whitehall.—The Committee for the Affairs of Ireland sat this day in order to dispose of the money that will accrue by the suspension made in November last as shall be best for His Majesty's service. Among other things that lay before my Lords they found a letter of his Majesty's of the 16th of November last directing your Grace to call the military officers to their commands, with several other intimations of His Majesty's intention and pleasure. The letter goes herewith enclosed, and my Lords have commanded me to desire your Grace to let them know with your best convenience what you have done upon it. I was able to tell their lordships that I had seen a proclamation in print relating to the execution of the first part of His Majesty's letter; and that I doubted not but that your Grace had done or was doing your part in the other points of it. I will not anticipate your Grace's answer to any things that my Lords of the Committee are like to lay before you for your advice, as, first, how to make the militia on that side more useful; and, secondly, what you will judge to be the best course for levying the recruits intended, and for conducting and defraying of them till they be got over? Their lordships will desire an authentic account of the remains of stores, we having none perfect since '74. The Commissioners of the Ordnance were present, and are ordered to bring in their proposals for furnishing the stores. They say they have already 9,000*l.* worth of stores in Ireland, and have not reimbursed themselves of above 800*l.* all this while. My Lord of Arran assisted at the debate, and will (I doubt not) give your Grace a more perfect account of it than I can.

ORMOND to VISCOUNT MASSEREENE.

1680–1, Feb. 15. Dublin.—I have received your lordship's of the 9th instant with the enclosed informations of dangerous words spoken at several times by Cormack O'Hagan and other persons. I desire your lordship would either yourself take the examination of the said Cormack and of such others as were said to have been in his company and may be found, or direct the Justices of Peace next adjacent to do it; and, having examined the persons accused, to confront them with the accusers, whereby possibly further discovery may be made, or what is deposed confirmed, and then to send me the examinations and what further information may be given. Particularly I conceive Alexander Brenan and his wife should be examined touching the words spoken by Cormack O'Hagan and such others as there shall be cause to suspect may be secured either in jail or upon good bonds for their appearing at the next assizes, as your lordship or the Justices of Peace shall judge to be most proper. Having again perused your lordship's of the second of this month I conceive the expression you used does not restrain the Roman Catholic natives that were said to have crept into the army to such as were recalled from foreign service, but that Roman Catholic natives in general and particularly some of them that served abroad were gotten into the army, which seems to me to imply that other

Roman Catholic natives were likewise got in beside those that were recalled from foreign service. That all such as served in foreign parts or even in France are disaffected to the Protestant religion may be too hasty a judgment, nor will the suspicion of any city justify it, much less will it follow that because they came in great numbers to Chester that therefore they are received into the army here. The single instance your lordship gives of Marcus O'Conlan, though it be not absolutely convincing, being but the bare assertion of a person accused for a spy, yet that there might be no colour for calumny I would have given order to have him turned out of the army if I had sooner known he had been in it; and I shall be the more careful and strict herein, in regard it appears that Jesuits can get into pulpits in meeting houses and conventicles, and that it may be as easy for Popish lay soldiers to get into armies if great care be not taken to prevent it. It will, therefore, behove your lordship, and it is your proper work to be careful in general as you are a Privy Councillor, and particularly where you have authority to govern and command, to call upon the Commissioners of Array and the officers of the militia to put and keep themselves in a readiness to serve the King and preserve themselves according to their respective commands and instructions, and to be very vigilant that none be of the militia but such as have taken or shall take the oaths of supremacy and allegiance and the blessed sacrament according to the use of the Church of Ireland, whilst I and the subordinate officers of the army do the same on our part: these duties being on all hands carefully observed and performed we may by the blessing of God hope to keep the Government in safety and the kingdom in peace, notwithstanding suggestions and general rumours.

SIR L. JENKINS to ORMOND.

1680–1, Feb. 19. Whitehall.—His Majesty's letter that goes herewith enclosed was first intended to come from the Council to your Grace, but upon second thoughts of the importance of it I was commanded to prepare it for His Majesty's hand. The proceedings to contrive an indictment of treason against Sir John Davys begin to appear very enormous. They will come to light in a few days; when the discovery is perfected I shall transmit it to your Grace. In the meanwhile I am extremely concerned that Sir John Davys cannot be relieved against the processes that go out upon such occasions but by a nolle prosequi. His Majesty expressed this day a gracious sense of his displeasure at this insolence that was acted upon his servant. Our elections are in a manner the same. I do not find we diminish in that small number of good men we had. Here and there we add to them rather than lose them. One would imagine that the humour does something abate; as it is, and indeed must be, in violent motions, a good hearty reform with us at Court would work a strange turn to a settlement and a security to our religion and the monarchy.

ORMOND to COL. JOHN FITZPATRICK.

1680–1, Feb. 19. Dublin.—I have seen yours of the 8th of this month to my wife, wherein are two particulars most proper for me to say something to. That there have been arts and endeavours sued to raise distrusts and the ill consequences of them betwixt the person you mention and me we have both been sensible of for a good while, and advantage to that end has been sought for from the observation that friends and enemies have not been common to us both, as often it does not fall out that they are to men that have lived so long in the world as we have, and in such changeable times and considerable employments. I am sure the attempt has had no success with me, and I persuade myself not with him. The two persons you named on my part have never yet gone about to give me ill impressions of my friend, discouraged perhaps by a belief that it would be in vain. If they declare themselves unsatisfied with him on their own account I would help it if I could, but it cannot be reasonably expected I should declare war against them, and the same justice and no more I expect on his part. My son Arran forgot to give me any notice of your éclaircissement with the other person you mention, but the knowledge of it comes time enough, since having once offered at a good understanding and correspondence betwixt us when he was in a station more proper for me to seek it than he is now, and having received no kind of return, I conceive the repetition at this time would have no better success and therefore I do not desire to be named to him unless he gives the occasion.

ORMOND to JOHN FELL, Bishop of Oxford.

1680–1, Feb. 19. Dublin.—Yours of the 15th of the last month came not to my hands till the 18th of this. By what accident it was so long in the way I cannot tell, but so many other things being out of order it is not strange the post office should be so too.

That University has been the residence or retreat of Kings and Parliaments in time of war and pestilence, and tho' (God be praised) neither of those judgments drive them thither at this time, yet I hope their meetings there may tend to the preservation of peace and the establishment of future prosperity. I do not doubt but that their reception will be suitable to the good affection, conduct and renown of the place, your lordship having so much of direction in it.

My grandson improves visibly in his person. He grows taller and leaner, and I keep him to college hours of rising. I can brag little of his proficiency in letters, in exercises he does tolerably well. Till I find a governor to my mind I mean as well as I can to perform some part of the office myself and keep him with me. I am in great care to serve my Lord Courcy; in times so unsettled, the circumstances of his age and fortune considered, I was inclined to have brought him hither, but here he will find or be found by more and by nearer relations than at Court ; and in travel, if he had means for it, he will be more exposed to perversion. All the resolution I can for the present come to is that he stay at Oxford till the end of the first session of Parliament, upon the resolution of which much more depends than what concerns him or your Lordship's most affectionate and most humble servant,

ORMOND to EARL OF ARRAN.

1680–1, Feb. 19. Dublin.—Yours of the 5th, 7th, and 12th, came all together. There is no doubt but that my Lord of Clare or anything he can say, as he has carried himself in the world, would at any other time signify little, but I am deceived if in this conjuncture some pernicious use be not made of him and of his letters. My Lord Chamberlain knows him well and I wish he might see what he has written. I take it for a good sign that no more is made of it. I suppose the Grand Jury had not before them the examinations taken against O. Plunket ; if they had, sure they would not have returned Ignoramus upon his bill. You shall do well to cherish the good inclinations of the Justice. I confess I wonder how my Lord Burlington thinks it his interest to procure and spread abroad such hot and incredible alarms out of Munster, and in the meantime is so ill informed as that the English in those parts cannot furnish themselves with ammunition, for so his intimation implies, or it can signify nothing, when it is well known to his brother that the enclosed proportions have been at Cork above a year and half and were sent thither for the use of the militia and other Protestants. It were good to know if he would tell from whom he had his information, but I doubt he will not.

Capt. Murray is landed but without any letter from you. He has brought a list of officers to be some placed and some advanced in the regiment. I wish there were soldiers in proportion. I will do all I can to have those companies filled. I have read over my Lord of Anglesey's remarks on my Lord Castlehaven's memoirs, and to my thinking never saw antagonists met upon more equal terms for the seasonableness of the argument, the mistakes in matter of fact (to give it a soft name), and for the incoherent deductions. I confess I am afraid to enter into a contest in print with such a man as my Lord of Anglesey, a man I have seen detected in public of misinformation and mean artifices for sordid sums and yet never blush at the matter, but appear the next day as brisk and confident as his favourite Thornhill when convicted of forgery in an open full court. But, since it is the King's sense, something shall be said ; though I can hardly vindicate my own actings but I must reflect upon those of a numerous and considerable party in conjunction with whom he was in rebellion.

EARL OF ARRAN to ORMOND.

1680-1, Feb. 19. London.—I have your Grace's of the 7th with the enclosed copy of a letter from my Lord Massereene and your answer. Your report of the army's having Papists in it has been here a good while ago and has been sufficiently answered upon all occasions, but I believe that lord was the occasion of the report then, tho' his advice to you is but lately. I am infinitely troubled for Sir John Davys upon a double account, first because he is persecuted chiefly upon your account, next because he thinks that if he had not come over upon my letter the Parliament would have let him alone, and consequently the Bill of Indictment had not been found against him; but I am sure if I had not answered for him in the House that he would come over upon my intimation of what was then moved in the House, he had been sent for by order of their Lordships, and that perhaps in custody. We have some hopes that the indictment against him will be quashed, the King having given direction to his Attorney General and others of his learned counsel to look well into the matter, for his Ministers of State here may be served in the same kind, if indictments of treason be found for the King without any of his learned counsel's prosecution. So many of your nephews and near relations going for France at this time makes a great noise with us here, for what is published in Harris his news book is from a letter writ by Mr. Boyle to his uncle Burlington, though his Lordship never intended, as he says, it should appear in print. I herewith send your Grace a copy of a petition given me yesterday by one of the parties concerned. It is against Sir William Davys and aimed at you in the bottom. My Lord Ward ordered the sending it to me, because he was informed I had somewhat to do in the county palatine. I knew not how better to inform him of the designs against him than by sending this under your cover.

Ormond to Earl of Conway.

1680–1, Feb. 20. Dublin.—I understand by my son Arran that some letters and papers concerning our Irish Lord of Clare have been by His Majesty put into your lordship's hands. I therefore think it proper for me to send you his last, which is a reply to the answer I sent to his first. Your lordship will observe that he persists in his advice to have me interpose with the King for the sitting of the Parliament in order to those popular ends he mentions. Now tho' he has sufficiently shown that he is a man prepared for any change that he hopes to mend his condition by, and so may of himself put on the zeal he professes, yet I am persuaded he proceeds not at this time without direction out of England, from whence I conclude it is intended that some use shall be made of him and his letters in a fit conjuncture. In this I am confirmed by what Sir Robert Walsh writ to me, not because he writ it, but because what he writ is of itself very probable, and that the persons he speaks of are like to be the correspondents. I have sent my son Arran some remarks upon that lord's course of life which your lordship may call for; more may be found upon inquiry. If the trouble I have given the King and now your lordship be impertinent let it be imputed to the constitution of the times, when things more frivolous and persons much more inconsiderable have great weight laid upon them, of which the finding of a Bill of indictment of high treason against our Secretary of State, Sir John Davys, is an extraordinary instance. My Lord Granard read a few but very obliging words to me out of a late letter of your lordship's to him. What I have said upon the first notice given me of your access to the employment I can but repeat, what remains being only to make it good, as I shall by all the manifestations I can give of my being your Lordship's, etc.

EARL OF CONWAY to ORMOND.

1680–1, Feb. 22. Whitehall.—I have ever acknowledged myself infinitely obliged to your Grace for your favours upon all occasions, and must now do it particularly for the honour of your letter of the 11th instant. If the King hath placed me in a station that can make me any way serviceable to your Grace I am sure it is one of the chiefest satisfactions I shall receive by it. My inclinations were such in the privatest capacity, and the earliest of my endeavours were to give your Grace assurance of it by my Lord of Arran when I entered upon my present employment. 'Tis true the affairs of Ireland do always pass by the eldest secretary, but the good correspondence that is and ever will be between Mr. Secretary Jenkins and myself will at least give me the opportunity of being your Grace's solicitor in all your affairs and all your commands.

EARL OF ARRAN to ORMOND.

1680–1, Feb. 22. London.—I had late on Saturday night your Grace's letters of the 11th and 12th instant and showed His Majesty that part of your letter which concerned the Irish Lord, a copy of which I have left with Mr. Secretary Jenkins by his order, that when occasion serves proper use may be made of it, for I find the King has no great reverence for that noble peer. My Lord Burlington's desire was to have the Scots companies removed from his town, and any other sent in their room, but he is not fond of having above two companies at most. Mr. Seymour is not yet come to town, but I showed your letter to my Lord Conway, who will bring us together when he arrives. Jack St. Leger, I am afraid, will be found to have tampered farther with the witnesses and Ingoldsby than was necessary for that work he has in hand against Barrett.

The King has complied with your recommendation of Sir William Davys and the warrant is already signed by His Majesty as the Secretary will inform you. I told His Majesty that he might remember who they were that hindered his preferment before, and that was no small inducement to him to do the matter now with expedition, but your Grace will find by the petition I sent over last post that he will be attacked in Parliament, and this preferment, I believe, will hasten it rather than hinder it; I hope you have your eye upon some able man to succeed him in the County Palatine, for I am much against his keeping both, or having Mr. Herbert in his place.

SIR L. JENKINS to ORMOND.

1680–1, Feb. 22. Whitehall.—I no sooner laid your Grace's recommendation of Sir Wm. Davys before His Majesty, but His Majesty was graciously pleased to declare it was sufficient to satisfy him, and to give order that a letter should be drawn for his Royal signature, which letter was signed the same day (that is Sunday) and goes herewith enclosed. His Majesty, when he was told upon what interest it was that Sir Wm. Davys was not promoted when your Grace recommended him last, was pleased to infer that that was a good reason why he should now be considered and sped.

My Lord, I take leave to forbear addressing myself to His Majesty about the Post Office till I have first spoken with several persons (as my Lord the Earl of Arran, Mr. Hyde and Mr. Frowd) from whom I may possibly learn some particulars that may be fit to propose by way of remedy. I will at the same time inform His Majesty of your Grace's reflexions upon that extract of a letter that had been writ to His Majesty and that I sent you some while since by his command.

Mr. Attorney's report to the King is not yet perfected, the rest of the King's Counsel having not had time enough to attend it, but it seems that it will affect some men (their names I cannot yet tell) with having entered into a downright conspiracy to impeach the Queen, the Duke and your Grace with high treason. By the stat. of 35°H. VIII. c. 2 the King hath his option in trying treasons committed out of the realm, either to try them at the King's Bench or else by Commission of Oyer and Terminer in any county that he shall limit. It is Mr. Attorney's opinion that the King should in Sir John Davys's case proceed to an option and choose the latter way; that is direct the trial to be before Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer in Surrey, Oxford, or any other county where an impartial jury may be had. This course appears hitherto to be most advisable for Sir John Davys, for whom all good men are very much concerned, and I should think myself very happy if I were able to serve him in this present occasions, nor shall I (as long as I am free myself, which I do not expect should be long) omit any occasion to do right to his innocency. The King's letter for Sir Wm. Davys is taken up by a person particularly employed to take care of it, so that it comes not (as was intended) in your Grace's packet.

FRANCIS GWYN to ORMOND.

1680–1, Feb. 26. Whitehall.—I am in dispute whether I should beg your Grace's pardon for my not writing oftener, or for troubling your Grace so often with letters that have so little of importance in them, that being my particular case at this time. The last Council day there was a debate concerning the means of giving relief to Sir John Davys in the present persecution that hangs over him, at which time, though His Majesty and the Board were all sensible of the many hardships he lay under in relation to his trial, yet no way could possibly be found out other than to expedite his trial here at the King's Bench the beginning of the next term.

John Moyer, Duffy, and Gormly came to the Council to accuse Hethrington of endeavouring to persuade them and others to swear against the Queen, the Duke, and your Grace. They made oath of it, but coming late the full hearing was put off till the next Council day; His Majesty and the Board inclining after the full hearing the matter to order Mr. Attorney General to prosecute Hethrington upon the said informations. There was likewise a long hearing at the Board between the inhabitants of Bermudas and the company in defence of their Governor, Sir John Heydon, the result of which was a quo warranto is ordered to be brought against the charter of the company.

His Majesty hath declared his intention of leaving London on the 14th March, and yesterday in Council had the Justices of Peace of Middlesex before him, to whom he gave in charge to be very careful in his absence of the peace within their limits and to see the laws put in execution, and particularly that of the 15th of his reign, wherein it makes it præmunire to say the King is inclined to Popery, with other words which are by that Act made treason, and yet are too often made use of.

EARL OF ARRAN to ORMOND.

1680–1, Feb. 26. London.—Sir John Davys his friends have attempted twice in Council to get His Majesty to do something on his behalf, but I find the Privy Council will not venture the advising any thing extraordinary; so that he must either undergo his trial in the common way or else within two terms will be outlawed of treason, if he submit not himself; and what to advise his lady on his behalf is very difficult, though without doubt if he appeared and were sure of justice the indictment ought to be quashed, for if all that is sworn against him were proved, as we are informed of the matter, it cannot amount to more than misdemeanour, but by law an indictment can't be quashed but by the party's pleading to it himself. Thus to my great grief stands his business. Sir Robert Stephens has already got such an interest in Hampshire, where he has purchased an estate, that he stands for Parliament man for the town of Portsmouth against George Legge, and Legge is afraid he will carry it. I have sent my Lord Longford a paper concerning Needwood Forest. Pray let me have your commands about the matter, for tho' I find the King has no great reverence for Ned Vernon, yet he deserves well from your Grace. Little Drake has a petition ready to put in to the House of Commons when they meet, complaining of yours and the Board's injustice to him, and arbitrary proceedings in the matter in difference between him and the Farmers. It were necessary a brief of those proceedings should be transmitted.

Earl of Arlington to Ormond.

1680–1, Feb. 26. Whitehall.—I did not make haste to acknowledge the honour of your Grace's of Jan. 3rd, because I have met nothing since that you could read or I write with any sort of satisfaction. On the 12th March His Majesty goes to Windsor to pass two nights there, and on the 14th overtakes the Queen upon the road to accompany her into Oxford. What we shall do there or how long we shall stay there God only knows. I am persuaded neither of the parties does, and I think as little whether we shall agree or fall out for a further time, there being reasons and transactions on both sides capable of making either conclusion probable. Things bearing this aspect towards my eyes, your Grace will forgive me if I affirm nothing.

My cousin Bennet was in town this last term, but came not at me, neither would he let Mr. Charlton know where he lay, which is a sign he is yet under correction at home. Our part is to expect what will be said to us the next time, instead of asking or proposing, which if it be worth the considering your Grace shall be troubled with it.

My Lord of Bath tells me Mr. Durel is not desirous to engage in any new governments, but considering the man is very valuable in that capacity I have desired the Dean of Windsor to write to him. When I have that answer we shall know what we have to trust to, and if it be a perfect negative cast about for another.

Sir L. Jenkins to Ormond.

1680–1, Feb. 26. Whitehall.—I am very much concerned that I can write nothing to your Grace that can be acceptable touching the proceedings relating to Sir John Davys. 'Tis the general opinion that he should undergo his trial, and if the ordinary precautions be used in calling for the sheriff's book, we cannot but have a reasonable jury. The sessions for Middlesex are this day over without presenting either the Guards or His Royal Highness. The King sent for the Justices of Middlesex to appear before him in Council last night. They were all reckoned upon by the King as very worthy men. The King spoke excellently to them.

ORMOND to EARL OF ARRAN.

1680–1, March 1. Dublin.—Yours of the 15th, 19th and 22nd I have not answered. In the enclosed copy of mine to Mr. Secretary Jenkins you will find much of what I can for the present say to the matters spoken of at the committee, and by that time I shall be able to say more, I doubt they will not be at leisure to consider it. However, the best account I am able to give shall be prepared. Your mentioning my Lord of Anglesey's being of the committee puts me in mind to ask whether he may not deny the little book to be his, or say that it was printed without his order or consent, and in the last place whether His Majesty desires it should be answered. If he does it cannot be made so soon nor so short as may be thought, for I had rather say nothing to it than not enough to stop his mouth. Mr. Secretary Jenkins in his last letter tells me the discovery of a conspiracy to accuse the Queen, the Duke and me of high treason was in the hands of the Attorney and others of the King's Counsel, but could not then tell me the names of the conspirators or of those that detect them. I do not expect that credit will be given to it by the prevailing party, much less that justice can be had. If anywhere complaint is to be made I think it should be in the Lords' House, for to expect reparation from a London jury in such a case I take to be vain. I have heard no more from my Lord Massereene upon the old subject since my last to him, of which, I think, there was a copy sent you. But it is now found that many of the common soldiers among the foot have Popish wives, and I believe it to be true. It were better it were not so, but so it has been in all Lieutenants' times, and how now to help it or prevent the clamour it may occasion I know not, unless we had the recruits mentioned, which might do it for a time. But unless there were English women to be had for them it would not last long, for those recruits would get them some women or other in a short time.

It was impossible to foresee what has befallen Sir John Davys. His staying here would not have prevented it, for we see divers that are here are in the same case, and by the way I wonder nothing is said of them from the King and Council, because I am of opinion when the Parliament meets they will not be forgotten. I find the bringing Sir John off is under consideration. I knew only of my nephew John Butler's going out of the kingdom, who, having quit his command in France upon expectation of serving the King against the French, and having nothing to live upon, is gone again to begin his fortune. As I remember it passed into a vote that something should be prepared to banish all considerable Papists out of England, and sure if it were good for England it is more so for Ireland. There was a good despatch in the promotion of Sir Wm. Davys. His letter came last night, and I signed his warrant this morning. I presume it will not stay long at the Seal. He is in his circuit. I agree that it is not fit he should hold his place in Tipperary, but I cannot put Mr. Herbert by the succession without affronting him in a high degree. I design Mr. Worth to succeed Herbert, and Turner him. I suppose the negotiation managed by Mr. Charlton with Mr. Bennet is wholly mortified, having heard nothing of it, and I am told my Lord of Bath's son and his governor are not yet returned. Till he comes, or till I find one I may upon sight and discourse approve of, I mean to keep James with me and execute the place myself.

Buck's son came hither with a very unreasonable expectation and request. I own his father was a very honest faithful servant, and that I thought so may appear by the enclosed computation of what he got by being so, which I send you that you may satisfy anybody that may doubt it.

PETITION OF GRAND JURY OF CLARE TO LORD LIEUTENANT.

1680–1. March 1.—To his Grace the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. The humble petition of the Lord Viscount Clare and of the Justices of the Peace and Grand Jury at the Assizes held upon the first of March in the county of Clare in Innish, 1680.

That your petitioners do find the dissolution of the last Parliament in England has encouraged the Papists in Ireland to as great insolence as the sitting of the Parliament gave them terror and reason to submit to the Government.

That whilst there is not a Parliament sitting in England it cannot be expected any great discoveries can be made of the Popish horrid Plot, which was to destroy His Majesty and all His Majesty's subjects of this kingdom as well as in England; the Papists having taken an opinion (how unjustly soever it is) that they are favoured, and that what orders or proclamations are issued to suppress Popery are but matter of form not to be executed, as the world has seen hitherto, and as if the magistrates were likewise of their opinion, for who will be forward to punish those he thinks are favoured or who will leave a party he believes will govern.

Therefore, that our magistrates may be encouraged to do their duty and that all discouragement may be given to Popery, we most humbly pray your Grace to move His Majesty that the Parliament may sit in England upon the 21st of this month and continue until an effectual course be taken to secure the Protestants of this kingdom and their posterity from Popish designs, which will be easy when by that resolution of His Majesty the fountain is made clear, most of the youth in Ireland will undoubtedly receive wholesome streams and soon conform to the Church and laws, which will secure us and our posterity from the apparent dangers we now are in.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

Clare.

W. Hickman, Henry Lee, Hen. Ivers.

Grand Jury.

John Gore, foreman; John Colpoys. Tho. Hickman, Tho. Boucher, Mountyfort Westroppe, Robert Cole, Don O'Bryen, D. O'Bryen, Augustine FitzGerald, Hen. Hickman, Rawley Newdegate, Ja. Fitzgerald, Nicho. Devereux, Ja. McDaniell, Joh. Bennis.

SIR L. JENKINS to ORMOND.

1680–1, March 1. Whitehall.—I have the honour of a letter from your Grace of the 19th past, which His Majesty was pleased this morning to hear distinctly read to him.

It is a Justice of Peace named Mr. Warcup (a very active man) that gave His Majesty the extract I sent your Grace of a letter pretended to be written (by no ill-willer of your Grace) out of Ireland. He received it from one Manning that belongs to the Six Clerks' Office in Chancery, to whom it seems it was addressed from that side. Warcup I know, and by him I'll endeavour to trace it to the writer. However, His Majesty is very well satisfied with the answer you are pleased to give upon the several calumnies. The depositions I took leave to send your Grace were transcripts of what I found in the hands of the Clerks of the Council; seeing the omission I'll endeavour to supply it.

The alarms that come hither out of Ireland are very extravagant and (which makes them less heeded) are very frequent, but whether they come (most part) out of Munster, or from elsewhere, I cannot yet tell; but here is a great family that those alarms are said to come from and that they have it in letters out of Ireland. His Majesty is pleased to leave your Grace wholly to yourself as to the pretensions of Mr. George Weld, and is very well contented those engagements you are under should be complied with in the first place. In the meanwhile Mr. Weld must have patience, but whether he should have notice of this His Majesty's pleasure from your Grace or from me is a matter of form that I must beg your Grace to direct I may be instructed in.

Your Grace's suit that His Majesty's pleasure for the exempting of some particular persons from bearing their share in the suspension intended may be declared and ordered in full Council as the suspension was, is taken by His Majesty to his particular consideration, and so are the cases of the persons named in your letter, but I hope that excellent expression in your Grace's letter will have that weight with it as it deserves in His Majesty's present deliberations. I mean that, that no private person can be in greater need of the King's bounty than the public is of His Majesty's providence at this time.

Fitzharris, a son of Sir Edward, is found to have been tampering with one Everard (formerly a prisoner in the Tower) to embroil the King with his people by seditious libels. They hammered (as it appears by Sir Wm. Waller and Smyth, the convert priest of Durham, whom Everard had so posted in the room they met in as to overhear what passed between him and Fitzharris) a most pernicious black-mouthed libel between them. Everard, Smith and Sir Wm. Waller will prove that Fitzharris gave the first lines by way of instruction for the libel, and made several amendments to it. This will be of extreme danger to Fitzharris's life, yet I am persuaded there are some ingredients of refined malice in it, that I do somewhat doubt they were masters enough of their art to mingle so much venom together with so much skill, so that I think there is some evil spirit behind the curtain that is not yet seen.

Lord Chief Justice Keating to Ormond.

1680–1, March 1.—Being this day assured that His Majesty had signified his royal pleasure for making Sir William Davys Lord Chief Justice of his Court of Chief Place, I conclude thence that Serjeant Osborne will succeed Sir William in his place of Prime Serjeant, and thereupon make bold to mind your Lordship of your servant Sir Richard Stephens to come into the room of Serjeant Osborne.

Earl of Arran to Ormond.

1680–1, March 1. London.—Though the packet came to town on Saturday last I had your Grace's letter of the 19th of the last month but this day. The enclosed papers will convince the Board and those who have a mind to know the truth that arms and ammunition are to be had in Munster by any that want and are willing to pay what is reasonable, provided they are persons qualified. My Lord Anglesey is at present very ill of the gout, but before he was ill I took notice to him of the letter he had put in print which reflected so much upon you, and he knew to be false. He protested he gave no leave for the printing it, neither did he design to reflect on you, but the contrary. I told him I believed he thought to save himself by aspersing you at this time, but it would do him no good. The papers you sent over relating to my Lord Clare I am afraid are not to be found, they were so little regarded by His Majesty; but if I can retrieve them I will have His Majesty's leave to let my Lord Chamberlain have a sight of them.

Captain Henry Boyle to Ormond.

1680–1, March 1. Castlemartyr.—I had the honour of your lordship's last night of the 26th of Feb. and am very glad that together with my most humble acknowledgment for it I can give your lordship an account that some of the rogues who were guilty of the late robberies have been so well pursued that they are taken, and from them we hope to know the whole gang of them. I am very confident if they be not discovered and taken it will not be the fault of any gentleman in this county either English or Irish, for such villains make no distinction either of religion or countrymen; but the militia of this country, which your lordship is pleased to call so great, tho' they are indeed a considerable body of men, yet bad horses and the want of arms and ammunition renders them less valuable than they might otherwise be. And how to mend these defects without money, and how to get money without a sufficient authority to levy it, which most think cannot be done without an Act of Parliament, is what the Commissioners of Array have often met about, but to no purpose.

There is a report as if complaints should be sent out of this country by letters for England setting forth that the militia of this country had been denied necessaries for their money, and that an account of this is come to Dublin; they must be very ignorant of the condition of this country that do not know arms, etc., have been long lodged at Cork for the militia to buy them at certain rates, and that besides several merchants have by licence from the Lord Lieutenant and Council brought over arms, etc., for the militia, some of which have been sold for that use; and I am confident hardly any man of any sort throughout the whole province but knows we are to be supplied for money either by the storekeeper or by the merchant of sufficient arms for the use of the militia; but we hope at this assizes at Cork to find some expedient if possible to be better provided than now we are.

My cousin Supple's wife died yesterday morning, to his great trouble, and not without reason. She was a very good woman and died with as little concern and as much religion as ever I saw anybody.

My uncle Burlington writes to me that care is taking in England to put Ireland into a good posture, that one thousand young men are raising to recruit the foot companies, and orders coming to mount the great guns in several places and other good things for the advantage of this kingdom, which if it please God to accompany with a good correspondency on all sides in England will end to the great happiness of all people.

Petition of the Grand Jury of Co. Clare to the Lord Lieutenant.

1680–1, March 1.—The humble petition of the Grand Jury of the county of Clare held at the assizes the first of March, 1680. Your petitioners being awakened by the votes of both Houses of Parliament in England as well as by our own observations into a sense of our danger by the horrid designs of the enemy of the Protestant religion by law established, we in the first place think ourselves very happy by your Grace's great care and vigilancy, but since we have not any settled guards of the standing army nor militia yet formed in this county, we humbly beseech your Grace to have that favourable regard for us as to put us into such a posture of defence that if we be at any time assaulted by foreign or domestic enemies we may be always able to give that account that may become His Majesty's loyal and faithful subjects.

And we your petitioners shall pray.

John Gore, foreman; John Colpoys, Thomas Hickman, Mountyfort Westroppe, Rawly Newdegate, Robert Cole, James FitzGerald, Don. O'Bryen, D. O'Bryen, Augustine FitzGerald, Hen. Hickman, Thomas Boucher, Nicho Devereux.

SIR WILLIAM DAVYS to ORMOND.

1680–1, March 2. Clonmel.—Having received a copy of a petition of the Lord Ward and others against me from his Grace the Lord Primate, and finding that the matter thereof relates to your Grace's Court of the Palatinate, I hold myself in duty bound to acquaint your Grace with the true state of that case, which cannot be contradicted, because it is drawn from the several orders from time to time conceived in that case by the Court. The thing mainly desired by the Lord Ward, etc., was the dissolving an injunction which now happens to be granted to them before I received the copy of their petition against me, which yet troubles me lest it may seem on the other side as if gained by threats and menaces; but whether they will be satisfied or not with the last rule of Court my principal aim is your Grace's satisfaction. My Lord, I have now served your Grace near three apprenticeships in that Court, and I do not remember that in all that time any one complaint of me has come before your Grace, as no question the Lord Ward, etc., had complained to your Grace (which they ought to have first done if oppressed in your Grace's Court before they should appeal to any other judicature) had they known me faulty in any arbitrary proceedings or unjust oppressions of any man in your Grace's Courts there.

WILLIAM WORTH, Recorder of Cork, to LORD PRIMATE.

1680–1, March 4. Cork.—This day I received the honour of your Grace's letter about Mr. Sealy's having a militia foot company in this city, and his arming that company at his own charge, which proposal of his, although it is very fair and handsome, yet, my Lord, there is already so many companies and troops raised within the liberties of this city that it is almost impossible to raise more, and so sensible the people of this place are thereof that they intend to petition my Lord Lieutenant to reduce the Militia already raised to five companies of foot and one troop of horse, and these they will arm

very suddenly; for we have already taken course for the arming most of the militia of this city, and therefore I humbly beg your Grace to desire my Lord Lieutenant that no more militia may be raised in this city, for both the Mayor and several others of this place desired me to write to that purpose to your Grace. Before I received your Grace's letter since my return home I have examined narrowly into the business of Major Hore's, who was likely to be robbed in the west, and the story thereof made a great noise here, but upon strict enquiry I cannot find there was above four men that attempted to rob him, and to break into his castle, one of which is thought to be a serjeant of the Scotch Regiment, and formerly under the command of Sir James Murray, who, when he was commanded to Tangier, ran away from his colours and has ever since been skulking up and down the country; and some of the rest, if not all, are such kind of fellows as ran from their colours when the Scotch companies were commanded to Tangier, and are this country men, but because they speak French the people of the country will not believe but they are French men sent over to cut their throats. But for the other robbery which was committed on Mr. Murrogh near Castlelyons it is found out that those who committed it were all Irishmen and great cow-stealers; one of them being apprehended has discovered his confederates. I have here enclosed sent your Grace a copy of a petition which was found on ship board by some of the officers of the Custom House of Youghal in search for papers in a ship which lately came from France. Some people here has got it translated into English, but it was found written in Latin, but whether the thing is real I cannot tell. But upon the perusal thereof your Grace will find it agrees pretty near with their common notion of their own affairs, penned in excellent Latin, and a foreign style not usual to this country, but when your Grace has perused it your Grace is best able to judge thereof, and therefore it is humbly submitted to you by, etc.

Earl of Arran to Ormond.

1680–1, March 5. London.—I have given my Lord Longford an account of proceedings relating to Fitzharris, and my Lord Conway told me to-day he had informed you of the particulars he stands accused of. He has directions from the King to recommend Mr. Henry Progers to your Grace for the reversion of the Serjeant Porter's place, Sir Edward Brett's nephew, who had the reversion before being lately dead I suppose he was father to your page. Mr. Progers is a very honest gentleman, and I promised this morning to write on his behalf but I must do right to everybody, and therefore at Sir Edward's desire I asked the King whether he had not first promised to recommend one Mr. Brett upon my Lord Dorset's application before he gave order to my Lord Conway for the other. His Majesty said it might very well be, but he did not remember it, but spoke very kindly of Sir Edward. I have heard by several credible persons that the Lords of the Cabal say this letter my Lord Anglesey has printed must either do your work or his, but from whence they ground that opinion I can't guess, for they must go back many years before the Act of Indemnity, and if that be laid aside your adversary will be in a very ill condition himself.

Sir L. Jenkins to Ormond.

1680–1, March 5. Whitehall.—The King will be on Monday sennight in Oxford. I wish our preparations for that meeting did bear proportion with the diligences of the adverse party. Yorkshire and Wiltshire have had the ordinary instructions obtruded upon them as the act of the gentry by a mere surprise, that is one man handing a paper to be read in a crowd while all was in a hurry and nobody heeded what it was. But at the Assizes at Salisbury the Grand Jury presented the paper as seditious, and the author to deserve punishment. Fitzharris confesseth nothing, tho' 'its morally impossible but he must know the author of that pestilent libel. The city is quiet at this time, I mean the fermentation ceases working, having spent itself very much. His Royal Highness's youngest daughter, the Lady Isabella, died on Wednesday last.

Ormond to Capt. George Mathew.

1680–1, March 5. Dublin.—I spoke this day with my nephew Anthony Hamilton concerning Nenagh and I find him ready to comply with my desires. In order to it he tells me he will send for a rent roll of that farm, for he says a part of it is let, but he cannot tell for what, to whom, or for how long. When that is known it will remain only to know and value what is stocked and of all this I suppose you may get some account, that if it be possible we may get into possession by May.

My Lord of Anglesey, in answer to a foolish and unseasonable book of my Lord Castlehaven's, has made many scandalous reflections upon me for my actings in the cessations and peaces. I have caused one of them concerning my acquisitions to be transcribed and send it you because you can best instruct me how to confute him ; the rest I am providing for. There is yet come over but one printed copy that I know of, and that I keep by me. If more come one shall be sent you.

Lord Clare to Chief Baron Hene.

1680–1, March 5. Ennis.—Having considered since I parted with your lordship that the Parliament in England is to meet upon the 21st of this month, and that it is to be feared some evil members that wish not well to the Protestant interest might advise His Majesty to prorogue or dissolve it, I thought fit humbly to pray your lordship to send under your lordship's cover by the next post the petition, which I with some Justices of the Peace and the Grand Jury of this county delivered your lordship for my Lord Lieutenant, if your lordship be not of opinion that it will do as well to deliver it when your lordship goes to Dublin.

Tho' we be very inconsiderable, yet being the first county of the circuit of this province and that we have not a fanatic or factious man a dweller among us (if he be not a Papist) it may show His Majesty the sense of the rest of the kingdom and convince him that the Papists have not that power in it which some persons to my knowledge have endeavoured to persuade him to twelve years past. As for any expressions in the letter, our meaning is good and our condition requires we should speak now somewhat feelingly. There is nothing in it but what I will justify to be most necessary for the preservation of the Protestant interest in this kingdom.

CAPT. HENRY BOYLE to PRIMATE BOYLE.

1680–1, March 8. Castlemartyr.—I had the honour of your lordship's of the 5th instant, wherein you are pleased to say that you acquainted my Lord Lieutenant with what I had writ to your lordship concerning the reports spread of the Militia in this county, and that his Excellency was very well pleased to see what I had writ. I most humbly thank your lordship for the trouble you gave yourself in it, but I hope my Lord Lieutenant did not think I was the author of such a report, for if ever it should be my misfortune to be so far engaged in public business as to appear upon the stage, I shall never have cause, I am confident, to complain of the Government, or if I had it should be for what I might be very well able to prove, and not for such things as everybody are able to contradict, which may be done in this case very notoriously. Your lordship is pleased to observe that the Militia of this county is in a very ill condition, and it is very certain they are so, but that which renders them most despisable is their want of arms, which we have hopes to supply them with, and to mend our condition at this next Assizes. My uncle Shannon is now here and has received his Grace my Lord Lieutenant's letters concerning Mr. Dudley Fitzgerald. His lordship tell me he hath another evidence about the business of Macroom, and such as I believe will not be favourable for Mr. Fitzgerald. Since the robbery at Castlelyons we have heard of no other attempt, which makes us hope that those villains being taken such rogueries will cease in these parts.

COL. THEODORE RUSSELL to EARL OF GRANARD.

1680–1, March 8. Galway.—I have in obedience to my Lord Duke of Ormond's command followed the directions of Mr. Robeson, Surveyor General, and sent enclosed to him the value and charge of the necessary repair for the two citadels. That being done, in one of them will be found lodgments for two companies and four companies in the other. In this nothing is said of the defects of the town walls or gates or drawbridges, which are in no small disorder. The copies of the charge as the workmen have computed it, being the same I sent to Mr. Robeson, is here on the other side set down for your Lordship's view, the cheapest that it is possible to be done, as the workmen do declare to this, if your lordship can hasten the matter it will be of no small consequence to the King's service.

CAPT. JO. FFOLLIOTT to ORMOND.

1680–81, March 6. Cork.—In obedience to your commands (may it please your Grace) I humbly present you with some affairs and passages in this county. At my coming to Cork I found the people under a great consternation, fearing the French invading aud the Irish rising, though upon no probable measure I can meet with, but by what they hear from England (I hope 'tis not first transported from hence). For my Lord of Cork and Lord of Winchelsea, young Jack King, my Lord Kingston's brother, being on his travels for France went to receive his lordship's commands, they being together told him that Ireland was inevitably lost past recovery by a combination of the French and Irish, and their lordships often repeated the sense they had and sorrow they lay under for so great and certain a destruction. My Lord Shannon (one that saw it tells me) had lately a letter from his brother Cork dissuading him from his resolution of leaving Ireland for some time. I humbly suppose (my Lord) till after next rent day, for should my Lord Shannon leave this kingdom before, I fear his lordship looks on't as lost, and so my lord no more rent to be paid, which to some it may be were as heavy a burden to sustain as a wounded conscience. I most humbly refer the meaning of these things to your Grace's wisdom. I only beg leave to say that I am of opinion the fathers of some have eaten sour grapes, and their children's teeth are set on edge. My Lord, most of our principal men believe that a settled Militia would much contribute to our present quiet, and preserve us for the future, yet I am assured at the last meeting of our Commissioners of Array some of our grandees opposed the raising money to arm our Militia, for fear of a Parliament. This humour was first broached by the late Lord Orrery and still pursued. My Lord, one Mrs. Townsend wrote a letter to her husband, Col. Townsend, being here, that a priest on his death-bed wrote to her that (being afflicted in mind), by such a day all the Protestants were to be murdered, which did much alarm this country I find, but the day being past and nobody killed and all quiet but a few robberies committed by common thieves, that hubbub is over. The report of two barrels of powder found in a tree is quite false, nothing but old rotten barrels found in an old rotten tree. I most humbly beg your Grace's for this presumption.

Earl of Conway to Ormond.

1680–1, March 8 (received).—I have shewed His Majesty your Grace's letter of the 20th past and the copy of my Lord Clare's to your Grace of the 11th. It is the same which His Majesty finds himself surrounded with from all parts by contrivances and are to strike terror into him, as if he were beset on all sides. But His Majesty doth not look upon it as very terrible from my Lord Clare and thinks it would become him better to meddle only with his own business.

Sir John Davys's case is the hardest in the world, and yet His Majesty can give him no relief without great inconvenience. It hath been often debated in Council, considered and reconsidered by Mr. Attorney and Mr. Solicitor, and the result is that they can propose no way but to have him tried by the King's Commission of Oyer and Terminer in some other county, and not in the county of Middlesex. Upon which I said all the witnesses that can come in to clear him were in Ireland, that your Grace, my Lord Granard and the Bishop of Meath were the chief, and that it was impossible your Grace could be there, and great difficulties I thought would be upon others; to which there was no other answer but that as many as could come must come, for they could do nothing else.

We have had no less than eight witnesses before the King and the Council, who have deposed upon oath how they were tampered with to swear against the Queen, the Duke, your Grace and my Lord Chancellor of Ireland as the contrivers and carriers on of the Popish Plot. I suppose your Grace will hear from others the story of Mr. FitzHarris, the son of Sir Edward FitzHarris. It hath given the King the trouble of three Council days extraordinary, and I believe Mr. FitzHarris will go near to be hanged.

I humbly beg your Grace's pardon for troubling you with these affairs, which are foreign to those wherein I desire to serve your Grace, but in all things I shall be ever ambitious to shew my inclinations and my zeal to be esteemed, etc.

Earl of Arran to Ormond.

1680–1, March 8. London.—I had yesterday your Grace's of the first with the copies of your letters to Sir Cyril Wyche and Mr. Secretary Jenkins, and I find you judge very right, for the Court is in such a hurry that there will be no time to mind the affairs of that country, but I put the Secretary in mind to show your letter to the Council before their going to Oxford, towards which place the King sets out on Saturday next, but stays at Windsor on Sunday. I believe His Majesty has not taken the pains to read my Lord Anglesey's book, and therefore I did not think it proper to know his pleasure whether he would have you answer it or no, but I am of opinion that an answer should be made (tho' not put but during the sitting of Parliament) to vindicate you as to the world, for either of the Houses would be glad to find a fault in one of you, and I think you will do yourself no honour in contending with him. He owns writing the contents of the book, but not the giving way to the printing of it.

Before I received your letter I had discountenanced the prosecuting of the business of the conspiracy so far as it concerned you for the reasons you mention in your letter, and I believe as little good is to be expected in the Parliament as matters now go, or are like to be carried, when we meet. I intend for Oxford with my Lord Chesterfield on Friday sennight and I believe we shall lodge together.

I hear Fitzsharris owns nothing farther of the business he was imprisoned about, but that he will be a farther discoverer of the Plot. I find the prints say nothing farther of him. The first letter you writ on behalf of the Archbishop of Dublin is mislaid, but I have this day given Mr. Cooke a letter I had from his Grace upon that subject, it were well the form of a letter should be sent over from thence, for Mr. Cooke can't tell how to draw one here. The Bishop of Down was to see me this morning and desires for his health sake a longer licence of absence.

Francis Gwyn to Ormond.

1680–81, March 8. Whitehall.—The great affair that hath of late taken up the Board hath been the examination of Mr. FitzHarris. The occasion of his being first brought thither (I suppose your Grace hath already heard) for endeavouring to publish a most treasonable libel, and upon his examination it did appear that though he was the compiler and director of it himself, yet he intended to have charged one Everard (who was a very busy man in discovering the Plot) and some of his gang as the contrivers of it, but Everard being beforehand with him discovered first, and the foul draught appearing to be mended in several places with FitzHarris' own hand, and an addition to it all writ by himself, with three witnesses to prove his discourse with Everard, was to press him to print it, and encouraged him by hopes of a reward from the French Ambassador, laid it so close upon FitzHarris that the matter being treason almost in every line, there was no probability but FitzHarris would have incurred the penalty of a traitor. So the matter rested the last time FitzHarris was before the Council, but on Sunday night the Sheriffs of London, who had been in Newgate with him, waited upon His Majesty and acquainted him that FitzHarris had something more to discover. Whereupon His Majesty commanded both the Secretaries and Mr. Attorney Gen. to go to Newgate on Monday morning to re-examine him. When they came to him they found he then came in with a new discovery concerning the Plot, speaking in general words only, and to-day again upon the Secretaries and Mr. Attorney being with him he says more in relation to the general Plot in England and Ireland, much of the same nature with some of the witnesses that went before him. What will be the consequence of it I submit to your Grace. His Majesty intends to remove on Saturday next to Windsor and on Monday to Oxford.

Sir Cyril Wyche to Ormond.

1680–1, Tuesday, March 8. St. James's Square.—I think myself extremely happy in the opinion your Grace is pleased to express of me in yours of the 1st instant upon your hearing I am one of this Parliament, and I must needs say this for myself, that were it in my power as well as it is in my prayers there should be that perfect good understanding between the King and his Parliament that no artifices on any hand should be able to diminish. But what is in no man's single power to effect is not only in every man's, but every one's duty too to endeavour, and in my humble station I will do my utmost to promote it. I am very sensible that we live in a time when 'tis almost impossible to preserve the character of an honest man, and the most exact circumspection that can be used is seldom able to preserve one from very hard censures on one hand or other, and sometimes on both. It was therefore against my sense and intention to have come yet upon the stage again, but to have waited a time when moderate counsels had been more likely to have succeeded; but having submitted my judgment to that of my friends, I have resolved too not to quit those principles of loyalty and honesty and zeal to the true Protestant religion, which I have hitherto preserved and will carry to my grave, for any fear of being misconstrued or misrepresented. If my utmost diligence can be of any use to your Grace, 'twill be my honour to be found doing you service. If you shall be pleased to send me any particular instructions I will carefully follow them; if not, I will in general do what is in my mean capacity to vindicate your Grace from those aspersions which none but very distempered times could cast upon your actions.

Sentence of Court Martial upon Captain Thomas Bridges, March 8, 1680–1, Dublin.

At a court marshal held in Dublin the 8th of March, 1680.
Arthur Lord Viscount Granard, Field Marshal. President.
Sir Wm. Flower, Sir Tho. Newcomen, Sir Cha. Feilding, Maj. Rupt. Billingsley, Capt. Oliver Long, Capt. Rich. Coote, Sir Oliver St. George, Col. Carey Dillon, Capt. Robt. FitzGerald, Lord Viscount Blessington, Sir John Peyton, Capt. Cha. Murray.
Assistants.

Upon information given by the Advocate General against Capt. Thomas Bridges, capt. of a foot company in His Majesty's Army, that the said Capt. Bridges having made deductions from several of the soldiers in his company of a considerable sum of money due for their quarters at Ballymoney in the county of Antrim some years since, which was not paid to the inhabitants, notwithstanding he had received several positive orders to discharge the same from his superior officer; and that the said captain had used great fraud, practice and deceit in procuring counterfeited a certificate that many of his company had received the holy sacrament of the Lord's Supper, when in truth the whole certificate was forged in order to deceive the Mustermaster and his commissaries. And upon examination of several witnesses and perusing the muster rolls and certificates aforesaid, and upon hearing of all that can be offered by all parties, it was ordered and adjudged by the Court aforesaid that the said captain shall satisfy and pay unto the inhabitants of Ballymoney aforesaid what shall appear to be deducted by him or his clerks from the soldiers towards the discharge of the quarters aforesaid, and that he shall likewise pay unto the officers and soldiers of his company such sums of money as by a report delivered to the said Court by Capt. Oliver Long and Capt. Richard Coote doth appear, and it was likewise ordered and adjudged that the said Capt. Bridges for his disobedience, neglect and practice aforesaid should be cashiered his command in His Majesty's army aforesaid. And the said captain was cashiered accordingly.—Jo. Topham, Advocate General.

Capt. Richard Eustace to Ormond.

1680–1, March 9. Lisburn.—Since my return to my quarters I find the people more decent in their expressions of the Government and Governors. I wish it were as sincere as they would have it thought, but the contrary appears with their presumption, for on Sunday last was seven night one of their preachers, Streton by name, and a stranger in this country, preached in a barn near this town, to whom many of the inhabitants resorted, a thing never before attempted in my Lord Conway's town nor country of Kilulta, for he always vigorously suppressed them upon their first appearance. Sir G. Rawdon sent my ensign with a party to the place, who (after the parson had done) brought him to Sir George, who thought fit to reprove, but not commit, him; which soft usage gave him encouragement to make application to Sir George to build a meeting house in this town, which he, Mr. Adare the Presbyterian preacher of Belfast, and Mr. Hutchinson another preacher (but esteemed a moderate man) pressed with so great importunity that nothing would satisfy them but a compliance, which they missing of went away dissatisfied, but was heard to declare that they did not doubt in a little time to establish their desires by authority. Their presbytery has of late enjoined a general fast, which on Thursday last was kept with great strictness and abstinence from all labour (though on Christmas Day they'll plow), the whole day being employed in preaching, fasting and praying for deliverance from all Papists and their adherents, of which number they declare our Church in general. I have this week put myself in the way of several gentlemen at their landing from Scotland, as Lieutenant Colonel Monro and others, who say that his Royal Highness his behaviour (in appearance) pleases most of the nobility and gentry, but all agree that the fiery dispositions of the kirk and people is rather smothered than extinguished. The most loyal of that nation amongst us here are of that opinion. I dare not venture to recommend any man in our parts for the purpose your Grace mentioned, but if your Grace will be pleased to honour me with any trust I do promise all the faith that can be expected from a loyal subject, a true Churchman and a passionate lover of your Grace and family which firmly binds me to seek all occasions of proving myself, etc.

Postscript.—It will never be known to nor suspected by any that I am sent, for I have often declared my resolution (if I could get leave and a licence) to wait on His Royal Highness. I will not presume to trouble your Grace any further, but do humbly offer myself with all willingness and sincerity to your Grace's disposal.

JOHN ROAN, BISHOP OF KILLALOE, to PRIMATE BOYLE.

1680–1, March 10. Limerick.—When I was last in Dublin I had some discourse with my Lord Lieutenant concerning Bishop Moloney, whom his Grace believed was in France, whereas I then was and am still of opinion he is in this kingdom, besides other I have this reason that in the beginning of November last the parish priest of Tullagh died and the parishioners chose of themselves one Grady to succeed; where he had scarce continued three weeks, but there came an order from Bishop Molony under his own hand for the induction of one White. The original order I expect this week to be brought me, so that it is evident he could not be in France.

I thought fit to acquaint your Grace of what I presume your Grace may have some notice of before this can arrive at Dublin, which is concerning a petition of our grand jury at Innish [Ennis]. The Archbishop of Tuam (who had a trial for some lands, and now knows what discouragement a Bishop hath to be tried by a Popish jury, that is the common jury in that county), he with myself lay at the house of Mr. Gore, the foreman of the jury, who, on Friday night at 11 a'clock, was pleased to impart first to me, and we both to the Archbishop, what a petition was presented to the jury, the Lord Clare being the chief promoter. I told them my sense, which the Archbishop did likewise, that it was a petition scandalous to the Government, and of such a nature as could not be well resented, etc., therefore advised them (for besides the foreman there was another of the jury with him) to suppress that petition that it might never see light, and truly those two persons, Mr. Gore and Mr. Thomas Hickman, were convinced, and promised they would endeavour to suppress it, at least never to promote or join in it. But they told me they now being so far engaged must needs have some petition to offer, that they may stop the mouths of their fellows, and therefore desired I would dictate one for them, which I was loth to be known in such matters. One of them took pen and paper, and I confess the Archbishop and myself did help them to draw a petition (a copy of which is endorsed on the back of this) and those persons early the next morning got it engrossed and presented it to their fellows, who all but three were convinced of their folly in the former, and adhered to present this, which accordingly was done by the foreman. But the Lord Clare and the other dissenters were earnest for the presenting the Lord Clare's petition, for he was foreman in that, and would not cease their clamour till that petition was also presented to the judge, which the foreman at last did, but with this reserve declaring to the Judge that he did not present it as from the grand jury, and desired his Lordship not so to receive it, but only to satisfy the others' importunity, and for his Lordship's own satisfaction in the nature of the thing it was delivered, which his Lordship might make what use of he pleased. After our coming to this place I found that there were many copies of that factious petition dispersed abroad and, as I understand, by the Lord Clare. I thereupon demanded of my Lord Chief Baron whether he had given any copies of it, he replied he had not nor shewed it to any but his brother Judge, so that I am satisfied my Lord Clare hath dispersed them, and I hear that my Lord Lieutenant hath one sent him. I was therefore the more willing to satisfy your Grace in the whole proceeding, in regard my Lord Chief Baron will not be in Dublin to give an account for some weeks longer. The petition endorsed on the back of this letter runs as follows :—

"To his Grace the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. The humble petition of the Grand Jury for the County of Clare, held the first of March, 1680, Your petitioners being awakened by the votes of both Houses of Parliament in England as well as by our own observations into a sense of our danger by the horrid designs of the enemies of the Protestant religion by law established, We in the first place think ourselves very happy by your Grace's great care and vigilance, but since we have not any settled guards of the standing army, nor militia yet formed in this county, we humbly beseech your Grace to have that favourable regard for us as to put us in such a posture of defence that if we be at any time assaulted by foreign or domestic enemies we may be always able to give such account as may become His Majesty's loyal and faithful subjects."

ORMOND to EARL OF ARRAN.

1680–1, March 12. Dublin.—I think I have made no return to yours of the 26th of the last or 1st and 5th or this month, and possibly this may find you at Oxford or ready to go thither. Something I have said to each of the Secretaries upon the case of Sir John Davys, as it may affect any of the King's servants and in consequence himself if the edge of those laws that ought to protect his person and prerogative may be turned against both by perversion and combination. Sir John Davys carried with him, as Mat Barry tells me, the papers that relate to the proceedings against Drake, and since he may not appear before there may be use of them, it may be fit to get them into your hands, but I believe the Parliament will not begin so low as with his complaint.

What I now send Mr. Secretary Jenkins will not only shew that there was no ground for the suggestion that arms and ammunition could not be had in Munster for the Protestants, but that Mr. Boyle gave no countenance to the report, and by the extract of another it will appear what the opinion of sober Protestants is of the danger of that province from a single Irish insurrection. I have made some progress in an answer to my Lord of Anglesey's foolish libel, which would be short if I intended only his confutation, but the occasion being given I am advised to enlarge to other purposes.

I cannot imagine why my Lord of Clare is so much despised, when we have experience that every little insect that will be a villain has power to sting. I send my Lord Conway by this post the copies of two addresses gotten by him to be presented to the Judge in the County of Clare, praying that I would interpose with the King for the sitting of the Parliament, and I believe copies of these addresses are sent into England and to other counties here. The petitions are not so come to me as that I need to take any notice of them, but when they do I shall not know what to say to them. I know what should be said and done, but cannot judge of the season; you shall do well to look out my letters concerning that Lord and impart it to my Lord Conway. I have given his Lordship my sense concerning the reversion of Sir Edward Brett's place, but have received none from him or any other of particulars concerning Fitzharris, but I wonder to find him a libeller against the King and Sir Wm. Waller a discoverer. My Lord of Longford tells me you had the ill fortune to dine with him the day he was apprehended. I, without further information, cannot judge of the consequence; but whatever it can be, if it produce what you say it shall I cannot wish it had not happened. I suppose order will be taken that the posts shall pass by Oxford as long as the King is there. I have received a letter from the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury concerning the revenue, but it is too hard to understand what is driven at by it, and it is so perplexed, contrary to their style in other matters, that it is impossible anybody could contrive it but Sir James Shaen. All I can collect out of it is that he would make show as if the Farmers were more ready to pay the Civil List than the Army are to receive, and then to hook in a permission, whilst they are in arrear, to pay Rider's and other debts, and maintain themselves out of the growing revenue.

Earl of Arran to Ormond.

1680–1, March 12. London.—The King went early this morning to Windsor and last night he had Fitzharris before him in Council. He owns the plot in general, but will not come to all particulars until he is assured of his pardon, which the King says he will not give him tho' twenty Parliaments should address for him, but it is likely his mind may alter. He accuses Father Patrick and Col. Richard Hamilton with most of the officers of his regiment; he was sent to the Tower after his examination at the Board, but the night before he was examined by the Sheriffs and Sir Robert Clayton, which, I suppose, will be given to the House of Commons. In that examination I believe he enlarges more than in his others. My Lord Burlington has still, as he says, more alarming news out of Munster, that a Castle was taken by force, and that the Irish continue in a great body in arms.

Sir Edward Brett desired me to send his petition and reference to you. I need say nothing on his behalf, for you know him better than I do. There is an ensign here who is of the army of Ireland or rather an ancient who is afraid he shall not overtake the muster. His name is Banting, as I take it an ensign to Beversham; he could not get a recommendation from the Secretary because the Court was in such a hurry, but I desire he may not suffer. I believe I shall have nothing to write until I go to Oxford.

Ormond to Earl of Conway.

1680–1, March 12. Dublin.—I have two of your Lordship's to answer, one without date, the other of the 5th of this month. It is certain that in calm and settled times my Lord of Clare's interest and contrivances would have little effect, but in this conjuncture men of less quality and industry have been able to contribute much to our disquiet. By the papers I send your Lordship you will find how busy he has been in the county he lives in, and that it is suspected copies of the petition of the grand jury there are dispersed, that some of them may be sent into England and others into other counties, in hope that the example will be followed. How to carry myself upon so surprising an occasion I am to seek. The Judge, I think with more prudence than he received the address, keeps it in his hands till his return hither, which will not be till the Parliament has sate some days, and by that time I hope by your Lordship to receive the King's directions how to receive and what answer to give it.

I have great kindness for Sir John Davys and compassion for his sufferings, but I look upon the King's part in the case with greatest trouble, in that he cannot find a way to protect his servants from danger and disgrace when they are attacked by palpable contrivance and conspiracy by very incredible witnesses and accused of a more incredible crime. My Lord Primate and I could do him little service if we were upon the place, because we were not by when he is said to have discouraged the witnesses and undervalued their information. It is not strange that his Grace and I should be accused for contriving and carrying on the Popish Plot there, that amongst the shoal of witnesses that went hence none could be found that would swear it.

The reversion of the serjeant porter's place is most humbly laid at His Majesty's feet without dispute, but if the doctrine be true that he should in this case grant a reversion, His Majesty will infallibly be importuned to grant reversions of all places, and what then signifies the steward's privilege of giving places in the household when they shall be void. It was at my suit that the King granted Sir Edward Brett's kinsman, that is now dead, the reversion of his place, and I did it for nothing but to oblige a gentleman that had served His Majesty and his father long and gallantly, and if reversions come to be given at the instance of any other he so far puts himself into my office.

QUAERES.

[Undated.] Whether the Irish Parliament, which in my Lord of Strafford's time gave His Majesty with so much cheerfulness ten subsidies, were not the same which was in being when the rebellion broke out and so loyally declared against the rebels? And whether it did not consist of more Catholic than Protestant members?

Whether the army raised by my Lord of Strafford with those subsidies did not consist of more Protestants than Catholic officers and soldiers?

Whether His Majesty's consent to the disbanding of that army were not extorted from him by the Long Parliament in England? And whether he received not the Lords Justices' advice from Ireland to do it?

Whether was Sir Henry Tichborne joined in commission with Parsons and Borlase, Lords Justices?

What party did they all take when their Commission was superseded? Or what became of them?

Whether was Sir John R[ead,] whom they put to the rack, a Protestant or a Catholic?

Whether the now Earl of Anglesey were not a member of the Long Parliament and of the Committee for Irish Affairs, when the insurrection happened in 1641, and whether he did not constantly attend the House in England from their first meeting until he was amongst the 40 members excluded in 1648 ?

Whether he took the covenant or any other oath against the Government and religion established in England by law ?

Whether the Protestants which fought under the Duke of Ormond's Commission from the year 1646 to the year 1648, and from 1648 to 1650 were equal in number with those who with arms opposed him in those times and would not acknowledge the King's authority ?

Why did not the Earl of Castlehaven engage with his Grace at Kilrush ? and if under suspicion of disloyalty why was he not secured ?

What authority had Glamorgan to treat about a peace with the Irish ? and what peace did he make ? and with whom ? and when ?

What advice is that which the Earl of Anglesey insinuates to have been given by the Earl of Castlehaven to his Grace when he asked which of his enemies he should treat with ? vide page 69 of the Letter from the Person of Honor &c.

Ormond to Lord Derby.

1680–1, March 13. Dublin.—I have two of your Lop's and one from your wife since I writ to you. That from Chester was brought me by a servant of mine. I suppose you were in that place upon the election of Parliament men, and that you have contributed towards the choice of men of moderation and temper, true lovers of their religion, King and country. I am sure there was never more need of men so disposed. If it please God to give good success to the meeting at Oxford, it will produce many advantages to all honest men and I may hope to see your Lop. here to my great satisfaction, being with great reality, my Lord, your Lop's most affectionate grandfather and most humble servant

Ormond to Earl of Conway.

1680–1, March 14. Dublin.—The Lord Primate received this morning an account of the county of Clare petition in a letter from the Bishop of Killaloe. Some of the subscribing persons by their names I suspect to be Papists, or at the best such Protestants as the Lord of Clare, who is said to have gone to Mass in Spain since his conversion, whose lady is in a nunnery in France, and his eldest son page to the French King. If it be true that the Bishop Molony be still in Ireland I cannot but suspect a correspondence betwixt the Lord of Clare and him, for all his Lordship's pretended zeal for the Protestant religion and to suppress Popery, since nothing in my opinion can more conduce to the Papists' ends than dividing of Protestants, which is endeavoured by that petition. When I had written thus far I received from the judges of that circuit a copy of the Lord of Clare's letter to the Chief Baron, of which I send your Lordship a transcript. It no way lessens the suspicion I had before. Your Lordship by the second short and more dutiful petition will observe that most of the gentlemen, Justices of the Peace and of the jury, would have retracted the first, but my Lord of Clare having engaged them was able to hold them to it.

DONOGH O'BRIEN to LORD BLESSINTON.

1680–1, March 15. Limerick.—Although I presume your Lordship has an account before now of the Lord Clare with some other Justices of the Peace and the juries' proceedings on a petition at the late assizes held at Ennis, yet I hope it is not too late for me to acquaint your Lordship that I was not only against it, but that I am not any of the Donoghs O'Bryen among the subscribers to the petition, the one of them being the grandson of Bryen of Newtowne, whom his Grace your father knew, and now to be married to Ivers' daughter, that is Lord Clare's steward, by whose influence and his own ignorance, this being the first jury he was ever upon, he assented to that rude and unparralleled petition. The other Donogh O'Bryen so called, though I know not why, because he is not of any family known amongst us, and in himself a poor mean man, having no other calling or subsistence but a minister's proctor for gathering and setting his tithes and other dues; and although these two to the scandal of the name of O'Bryen, and the rest of the jury-men, may be thought to be the authors of this petition, yet from my own observation I can assure your Lordship that they were ignorant of the design till that unfortunate Lord brought the petition to them, and by frequent importunities and ill grounded suggestions prevailed upon most of them to agree to it; some of them I will not say by my persuasion being to this day dissenters to it. This I will not affirm for them who signed to it as justices and not jury-men with him, because by their forwardness in the matter and going with him to persuade the jury to join in the address I am induced to believe they were privy to his design, which by some remarks I took before assizes I observed did put him upon having such a jury impanelled as would join with him in this matter, and now that I have troubled your Lordship with an account of the truth of this affair, I entreat your Lordship to acquaint my Lord Lieutenant and his Grace your father with it, that I may not fall under their displeasure, nor by any misrepresentation be deprived of the character of a true and loyal subject to my King in their esteem.

Since my Lady Catherine hath told your Lordship that she will refer our difference I am very free to it, and that your Lordship shall be the sole judge of it, and shall wait upon you the next term or sooner if you appoint it.

Annexed to this I send you the copy of the petition.

Sir William King to Wm. Ellis.

1680–1, March 15. Limerick.—In obedience to his Grace's commands I ordered the officers commanding the several companies here to inquire after and make return to me of the names of such soldiers in their respective companies as are now married to women of the Popish Communion, a list of which I here enclosed send to you to be presented to his Grace. Some of the soldiers contained in this list are so old that I fear if they be dismissed before some other provision be made for them they will starve, they not being now able to betake themselves to any other way of livelihood, and many of them married before the companies were under our commands, and being withal men of English birth and extraction, and are fit objects of his Grace's mercy and consideration. The Tories I formerly acquainted his Grace I hoped I had got set twixt the counties of Limerick and Tipperary could not be found, though I had full assurances they should, but instead of them the officer brought me two persons suspected for harbouring such, but their being no proof against them, and I on the whole examination finding many faults in my informer, I thought it not fit to put the poor men to unnecessary troubles. Some of those lately suspected for robberies committed near this place being apprehended and tried, were found guilty and executed, and among them that soldier of mine I formerly gave his Grace an account of, which is all that offers at present.

Encloses a "List of Soldiers within the Garrison of Limerick that are married to women of the Popish Communion."

Earl of Longford to Ormond.

1680–1, March 17.—The bearer, Mr. Hamilton, happening to be at Ennis when my Lord Clare and the Grand Jury delivered their petition to the Judges (a copy whereof his Lordship gave him), I thought it my duty to acquaint your Grace with it and to let your Grace know that his Lordship values himself much upon this exploit, having in discourse with the bearer told him that while the Parliament was sitting there were several gentlemen in that country ready to make further discoveries of the Plot, who since the dissolution of it have been discouraged to do it. How far your Grace will think fit to take notice of his Lordship's proceeding before the return of my Lord Chief Baron I most humbly submit it to your Grace's judgment. But if my Lord Primate pursue his resolution of turning all those out of the Commission for the Peace who have Popish wives and breed their children Papists, I hope his Grace in that general rule will not make an exception of his Lordship, who takes such liberties of reflecting upon the Government. The bearer knows nothing of the intimation I have given your Grace of this whole matter.

LORD CHIEF JUSTICE KEATING to ORMOND.

1680–1, March 18. Longford.—On my arrival at this place I understood from the Earl of Longford and Lord Granard that the Lord of Clare (which I thought almost impossible) had to his many former indiscretions added one folly more. But neither of their Lordships could tell me certainly what the substance of his Lordship's desires are; however, it brought fresh into my thoughts a complaint which the Lord Clare made the last time I saw his Lordship, when pointing out the causes of his misfortunes he ascribed them all to this, that he having offered to His Majesty in a long letter which he took the boldness to write unto him his advice for settling this kingdom in a firm and lasting peace; amongst many other expedients conducing in his judgment to that end he proposed the seizing of all the Popish clergy as well regular as secular, this to be done in one night, which he undertook should be done in that part of the country and to ship them all for Spain. This letter he saith the King gave the Lord Arlington and the Lord Arlington to Father Patrick, who took a copy, and shewed the original to his Royal Highness, and from thence he dates all his misfortunes, and told me (as I remember) that he had written to the Lord Arlington to demand reparation or that he must acquaint the Parliament with the whole proceeding. I was immediately on my guard, and discoursed the matter but very slenderly with his Lordship, being then bound for Court, but I now plainly perceive that his design is to make a noise with that matter, which ought to alarm Lord Arlington for his defence. This may it please your Grace is what I thought my duty to let your Grace know.

SIR L. JENKINS to ORMOND.

1680–1, March 18. Oxford.—The hurry of my removing to this place hath hindered me these two last posts from giving your Grace an accompt of your commands in your two letters of the first of this month, which are the last yet come to hand.

Both those letters were read in Council, and His Majesty was pleased to approve of what your Grace hath already done, and is now doing, in execution of His Majesty's orders of the 16th of November last relating to the army there.

His Majesty likes well of your Grace's admitting such officers of foot as are past service or otherwise cannot attend to part with their commands; so he does your Grace's thoughts of drawing into the field as soon as the season is proper for it. The way you are in, my Lord, for recruiting the Scotch Regiment is to His Majesty's liking, tho' some thought the officers have too good a bargain to be in full pay till they do fill up their companies, which they will be in no great haste to do. However, it was His Majesty's judgment that the course taken by your Grace was the best. My Lord of Longford's state of the stores was ordered to be sent (as it is) to the Commissioners of the Ordnance, and the arrears that the Revenue there is in to the Establishment was referred to the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury. As to the prosecuting of the Earl of Ranelagh, His Majesty's pleasure was that the suspension should be taken off, only his accompts are now depending before the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury; and my Lord of Ranelagh begins now to be in that good condition of health as to be able (in a short time) to attend them, in order to have a state and a report made of his accompt, and then proceedings may and will be had at law as cause shall require.

Your Grace's other letter of St. David's Day consisted of two points, the one for a letter to your Grace to issue out a commission for taking the Vice-Treasurer's annual accompts, the other about the fast indicted by the Scotch Presbyterians in that kingdom. When the clause about the letter was read it was moved by the Lords of the Treasury that they might have a sight of that letter, and leave to alter it if need were before it should be presented to His Majesty. Your Grace will find they have added a clause in the latter end, which being presented to His Majesty he was pleased to approve of and to sign. The draught that your Grace sent us was upon the ancient forms; if this addition happen not to be to liking I suppose your Grace will not proceed to issue out the commission till His Majesty's pleasure be further known. That letter comes to your Grace by Mr. Cooke's packet, who sent me the Lords Commissioners' amendment.

As to the Presbyterian fast His Majesty is pleased so far to take notice of it as to direct your Grace and the Council to do what may lawfully be done to prevent for the future and to suppress such meetings, and to send for the ringleader Alexander to answer for his part in the offence, His Majesty being resolved not to suffer this encroachment upon his regal authority, since it is in order to some further insolencies. I must beg your Grace's pardon for that His Majesty's letter to that effect does not come by this post, His Majesty being now out of this town at Cornbury, and not expected back till this day's post be gone.

I have a third letter to account for to your Grace, that came by the same ordinary with the two former, though this be dated the 19th February. It is in favour of the see of Dublin. His Majesty was graciously pleased to say that no grant should pass of Russell's lands but to my Lord Archbishop of Dublin and his successors, and this is the scope of your Grace's letter. My Lord Archbishop, in a letter to my Lord of Arran, desires that a letter to this effect may be procured from His Majesty. It is my humble opinion that the draught must necessarily come from that side, for it does not appear (to me at least) that the King hath such an estate in the land hitherto as he can convey legally and validly to that see, and possibly the seals on that side will not move to convey the estate when it shall fall to the King, upon a letter hence that is writ before the estate come to be the King's. For this difficulty I have not brought either your Grace's letter or the business itself before the Council or the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, where certainly it must go, and therefore I humbly conceive it would not be amiss that there were a petition drawn by my Lord Archbishop that might be referred if His Majesty should so please to the Lords Commissioners here, and from them, if need should be, to your Grace, but all this I submit.

His Majesty hath been here ever since Monday; only went out yesterday to a horse-race near Burford, lay last night at Cornbury, and is expected here this evening. We have no Lords of the Parliament (those that followed the Court excepted) come to town, and but very few Commoners, nor is it known what the angry men will begin with. I pray God to make the session calm and healing.

Capt. A. Douglas to Ormond.

1680–1, March 21. Tanger.—There is no doubt but you have heard by the public letters what hath passed betwixt us and the Moors, who are very well satisfied to make peace, which we believe will be shortly concluded. The ambassador was very well received by the King at Meckenez, who promiseth us the same freedom and liberty of the country as the Moors have. I would write to your Grace more particularly of the circumstances of our affairs here, but I refer it to the bearer, Ensign Power, who hath carried himself very civilly amongst his comrades, and in the King's service with all the conduct and courage could be desired. We hope to return shortly to our old station in Ireland, for we have no pleasure here in time of peace and without money, and our agents have never written to us. I hope your Grace will pardon the freedom I have taken to assure you that we all here are with greatest respect imaginable, etc.

Earl of Arran to Ormond.

1680–1, March 22. Oxford.—I got here on Saturday last, but had not your Grace's of the 12th instant until yesterday in the afternoon. I was so lame with a fall that I got at tennis the day before I left London that I could not stir abroad before this morning. In my last I gave an account of Sir John Davys, who, I suppose, is by this time in Ireland; he has carried along with him the papers relating to Drake's business.

My Lord Burlington is much concerned at the report that he should have said the Militia could not be furnished with powder and arms and denies he ever said so, and desires me to set him right with you as to that particular. My Lord Conway told me this morning in the House that he sends you directions to turn out my Lord Clare from the Commission of the Peace and his militia troop. I had not time to have any long discourse with him. The post goes from hence every day at one of the clock in the afternoon. The King's speech I conclude will be sent you by other hands, but lest it might be omitted for want of our being settled yet, I send you one. It's believed the House of Commons will be very high upon it when they are a House; this afternoon at three they present their Speaker. This is all I have to say or have time to write, therefore pray excuse me to my Lord Longford for not answering his of the 13th.

LORD LIEUTENANT ORDER to the MUSTER MASTER-GENERAL.

1680–1, March 23.—Whereas by the sixty-fifth Article of the Laws and Ordinances of War published by us for the good conduct of His Majesty's Army in this kingdom it is provided that the Mustermaster General or his deputies shall not suffer any officer or soldier in any troop or foot company to pass muster, unless he shall produce a sufficient certificate under the hand of the Bishop of the diocese, upon a certificate made to him under the hand and seal of the lawful minister of the parish wherein they were quartered or garrisoned that they had received the blessed Sacrament of the Communion, according to the discipline of the Church of Ireland, the Easter or the Christmas next preceding the said muster. And whereas divers officers and soldiers of the army do frequently neglect the due observance of the said article and occasion thereby the stop of their pay, when the same would otherwise issue of course with the pay of the troop or company to which they belong, and afterwards make application to us for the removal of such stop and further time to perform the duty by the said article required, we have thought fit for the prevention of the like neglect in future and the trouble given us by petitions on that account hereby to declare that if any officer or soldier shall hereafter omit receiving the Holy Communion once every year at Easter, Whitsuntide or Christmas, and producing certificate thereof according to the said article, his pay at any time stopped on that account shall stand checked without remission, and such officer or soldier shall lose the same. And we hereby require you or your deputies at the next muster of the troops and companies of the army to make known this our pleasure at the hand of each troop and company, and you are to give it as an instruction to the Commissaries of the muster at least once a year in their several circuits to do the like at the head of each troop and company they shall muster, that all concerned may take notice thereof and return certificate as aforesaid by the last day of Sept.

And for so doing this shall be a warrant given at His Majesty's Castle of Dublin, the 23rd of March, 1680–61.

To our trusty and wellbeloved Abraham Yarner, Esq., Muster Master General.

[Endorsed] Draught of an Order to the Muster Master.

COL. EDWARD COOKE TO ORMOND.

1680–1, March 24. Oxford.—The 14th the King came hither. His handsome reception, first by the Lord Norreys as Lord Lieutenant of this county (and one perfectly your Grace's servant), next by this Corporation, and lastly by the University, hath been so amply gazetted that I shall decline repetition. Tuesday and Wednesday following His Majesty graciously spent in receiving the addresses of all gentry presented by the Lord Lieutenant, knighting two, Sir George Pudsey and Sir Rich. Crooke, this City's Recorder, and a very loyal person (tho' brother to Upton Crooke, once in Ireland), and in tiring the courtiers in trying all the walks in and about this city, and early on Thursday morning took coach for Burford, where His Majesty's Plate (formerly given to Newmarket) was removed, and that day to be run for. At the park at Witney Townes End, once Lenthall's (your Grace's quondam landlord) now my Lord Clarendon's, Will Chiffinch met His Majesty with his little devil black beagles (slower than your Grace's were) and his hawks; but to show His Majesty's partiality to the latter, tho' the former brought their new started hare into his view, he cried let them go and went a hawking. His Majesty deemed the heats worse than Newmarket, but the hawking hunting country much better. As he came into that town he was met by the reverend magistrates, welcomed with a hearty speech and a rich saddle, and so eat his own dinner at your Grace's old quarters. That ended, he hastened to the course, where he saw these four horses dispute for the two silver salvers he gave. A bay horse of Sir Ralph Dutton's, rode by Mr. Viner, His Majesty's 'querry, who having just saved his distance the first heat in despair ran no more. The next a famous black gelding of Mr. Wharton's (eldest son to the Lord of that name). A bay horse of Mr. Rowe's called Bullethead, bought by him of my Lord Suffolk for 150 guineas, designed to win all the plates, he offered to bet six to four he won the place against all the horses in the field, and my Lord Secretary Conway offered him for his horse and his share in the plate 300 guineas, but was refused. He rode his own horse, but the winning horse was Mr. Gristin's roan bred by my Lord Exeter and rode by Nick Baynton. There being money laid between the black gelding and roan they tied for the first heat, whilst Bullethead saved himself by only saving his distance. But Roan at ease won that heat. The second Bullethead strove for, but in vain, Roan having feld him ere half the course was run over, so that by the laws of the course two heats being won, nothing less than a distance the third heat could win the plate from him. It was resigned to him. And the King that night supped and lay at Cornbury, and dined there next day, being splendidly treated by its worthy proprietor. In the Friday afternoon it fell to my share to guide His Majesty hawking towards Oxford, at which he had very satisfactory sport, tho' quite tired with it, on Campsfield took coach and returned to Oxford. Monday both Houses met ; His Majesty's speech I presume your Grace hath. The Chancellor's was only directions to the Commons to go choose their Speaker and present him at three in the afternoon on Tuesday. Williams, the former Speaker, was unanimously chosen and approved by His Majesty. I found the character of His Majesty's speech different in the Commons' mouths. Many allowed it to be an excellent gracious one, all the rest a subtle crafty one, and so unexpected that they should be put upon taking new measures. Their Lordships have only possessed themselves of a Bill for repealing that Act made in Queen Elizabeth's reign calculated chiefly against Popish recusants, but since most severely extended against Protestant Dissenters, who one party would fain greatly indulge ; but if I miscalculate not they are weakened since last Parliament in that House, and I believe this Bill will scarce pass there, because so hotly pursued. Their Lordships have also read several addresses on appeals (one from Jack St. Leger) and appointed days for hearing. The Commons have burnt all their daylight in taking the oaths hitherto, a task will take up part if not all of this day. So that I have nothing more to be accountable for at this present.

INDEX.

A

Abhorrers, 497, 502.
Academy. See under Faubert,
Acheson, Sir George, J.P., 232, 440, 441.
Ackland, Sir Hugh, 159,
Act. See under: Association,
French, Indemnity,
Navy Office, Pacification,
Parliament, Purging, Settlement.
Adair, Alexander, 237.
Adamson, [Humphrey] appears before House of Lords, 2.
Adare, Mr., Presbyterian preacher, 605.
Adderbury. See Atterbury,
Addresses to the King:
Ordered by House of Commons q.v.
,, ,, ,, ,, Lords q.v.
,, ,, Houses of Parliament q.v.
Presented by Scotch Lords, 133, 135.
Admiralty, the, 122, 285, 339, 352.
Chief Commissioner of, 55, 270.
——, made Privy Councillor, 55, 56, 58. See also Brouncker.
Commissioners of the, 275, 278, 309, 310. See also Lea; Littleton; Vaughan.
Secretary to Commissioners, 562. See Pepys.
Adventurers, the, 403.
Ahadda, co. Cork, 207.
Ailesbury:
Robert Bruce, first Earl of, Privy Councillor, 97, 103, 108, 234, 270, 506, 566.
——, letters from, 313.
Aland, Captain, 252.
Albemarle:
Elizabeth Cavendish, Duchess of, 545.
Christopher Monck, second Duke of, 331, 475, 481.
——, commands King's troop, 247.
——, greyhound match of, 74, 75. 239, 240.
——, representative Duke on Privy Council, 55, 58.
——, steward of, see Mitchell, John.
Alcayde. See Tangier.
Alcock, Charles, 541.
Aldersgate Street, London, 541.
Aldrich, Rev. Henry, D.D., of Christchurch, letters from, 11, 46.
Aldworth, Sir Richard, company of, 144. 323.
Alestree, S., Provost of Eton College, 571.
Alexander, 615.
James, Clerk of the Pells, 510.
Alford, bell founder, 293, 296.
Algerines, 309, 332, 352.
Algiers, 536.
Alington:
William, third Lord, Constable of the Tower, 112.
——, regiment of, 120.
Allegiance and Supremacy, Oath of. See Oath.
Allen, Sir Joshua, Commission presided over by, 207.
Ambassadors:
in England, private chapels of, 256, 282.
in London, list of households of, 256, 282.
English. See under Constantinople.
French, 119.
Amory, John, 451.
Ampthill, 449.
Anderson, Math, 520.
Andrewes, Tho., 451.
Anglesey:
Arthur Annesley, first Earl of, Lord Privy Seal, 21. 32, 34, 51, 97, 101, 103, 108, 116, 135, 193, 232, 241, 257, 266, 270, 272, 298, 307, 319, 456, 459, 467, 488, 536, 546, 562, 563, 581, 582, 592, 595, 599, 610. 611.
——, accusations against, 461, 462, 477, 481, 485.
——, corrupt practices of, 586.
——, member of Long Parliament, 610.
——, reply to Castlehaven memoirs, 581, 586, 599, 602, 608.
——, orders, signed by, 278.
——, letters from, 137, 152, 163, 187, 198.
——, letter to, 219.
——, mentioned, 241.
Anne, Lady, Princess Anne, daughter of James, Duke of York, afterwards Queen Anne, 184.
Annesley:
Deborah, letter from, 535.
——, letter to, 473.
Francis, letter from, 536.
——, letter to, 473.
Mr., 535.
Anonymous letters, 119, 194, 302, 372 376, 378, 385, 386, 465.
Antony, 195.
Antrim, co., 368, 605.
letter dated from, 570.

Appeal, Commissioners of, 484, 486, 516.
Aran or Arran, James Hamilton, Earl of, afterwards 4th Duke of Hamilton, 495.
Archbishops. See Rome, Church of.
Ardee, 491.
Portrive of. See Banks.
Ardfert, Dean of. See Bladen.
Ardmagh, 138. See Armagh.
Arlington:
Isabella, Countess of, 361.
Henry Bennett, Earl of. Lieutenant of Tower of London. Lord Chamberlain. Privy Councillor. 37, 48, 54, 60, 73, 79, 90, 94, 111, 116, 117, 120, 144, 153, 154, 158, 160, 163, 165, 166, 167, 175, 176, 177, 181, 220, 222, 230, 232, 253, 261, 284, 301, 305, 307, 345, 355, 356, 357, 858, 359, 361, 362, 367, 372, 373, 381, 382, 383, 384, 387, 388, 389, 390, 395, 398, 402, 405, 409, 410, 412, 413, 418, 422, 431, 469, 470, 473, 476, 478, 484, 489, 494, 499, 509, 523, 525, 528, 529, 538, 541, 550, 552, 555, 558, 559. 560, 563, 586, 595, 614,
——, letters from, 175, 257, 353, 359, 375, 385, 399, 416, 465, 591.
——, letter from, mentioned, 438, 479.
——, letters to, 354, 392.
——, letters to, mentioned, 420, 544. 545, 550.
House, letters dated from, 353, 359, 375, 385.
Armach, Armagh, Archbishop of. See Boyle, Michael.
Armagh, 138, 440.
Assizes of, 532.
Condition of, 138.
County, 254.
Diocese of, 170
Armorer, Sir Nicholas, Governor of Kinsale, 36, 57, 166, 258, 313, 328, 351.
——, letter from, 176.
Armstrong, Sir Thomas, 165, 174, 314.
Army, 100, 127.
accounts of, 49.
appointments in, 329.
disbanding of, 11, 49, 51, 56, 69, 70, 71, 76, 77, 85, 136, 530.
illegality of standing, 22, 136.
improvement of, 38, 48.
members of Church of England only allowed in, 17.
officers' commissions, 551.
Paymaster of, 76, 239.
to preserve order at trials, 110, 112.
quarters for refused, 136. See also Southwark, Westminster. report on, 38.
See also under Ireland.
Arnold:
John, M.P. for Monmouth, attempted murder of, 306, 307, 310, 461.
Arran:
Dorothy Ferrars, Countess of, 331, 343, 485, 509, 560.
Richard Butler, Earl of, son of James Butler, 1st Duke of Ormond, Marshall of Army in Ireland, 4, 72, 165, 177, 192, 257, 295, 381, 384, 413, 416, 432, 434, 439, 453, 457, 458, 466, 467, 468, 474, 476, 479, 480, 485, 487, 496, 500, 504, 520, 525, 527, 553, 566, 570, 574, 581, 583, 585, 587, 588, 589.
——, accusations against, 462.
——, created Marshal, 424.
——, King commands to, 559.
——, King's favour towards, 467.
——, member of Irish Privy Council, 24.
——, proposed as Deputy Lieutenant of Ireland, 72, 73, 74.
——, State letters and memos signed by, 23, 24, 29, 53, 189, 250.
——, letters from, 269, 455, 462, 469, 472, 477, 483, 486, 489, 494, 500, 508, 516, 519, 521, 522, 524, 528, 533, 537, 543, 544, 547, 549, 550, 551, 554, 555, 559, 563, 565, 569, 572, 573, 580, 581, 586, 588, 590, 595, 598, 602, 609, 616.
——, letters from mentioned, 461, 500, 537, 574.
——, letters to, 154, 159, 178, 195, 202, 205, 218, 223, 274, 295, 330, 331, 357, 373, 386, 387, 401, 454, 457, 478, 483, 489, 493, 508, 509, 517, 521, 523, 533, 534, 538, 540, 543, 544, 545, 548, 551, 557, 559, 567, 573, 576, 579, 581, 586, 592, 608.
——, mentioned 278, 416, 615.
Isles of, 562.
Array, Commission of. See Ireland.
Arthur, Daniel, 25.
Articles of War. See Ireland.
Artillery Company, 227, 228.
Arundell of Wardour, Henry Lord, 1, 31, 68, 237.
accusations against, 488.
Ashbury, Joe, 195.
Assizes. See Ireland.
Association, Act of, 488, 502, 506, 530.
Aston, Walter, 3rd Lord Aston of Forfar, trial of, 339.
Atherdee, Ardee, q.v.
Athlone, 29.
Atholl, John Murray, 2nd Earl and 1st Marquess of, 135, 235.
Atkin, John, wool licencee, 162.
Atkins:
Sir Jonathan, Governor of Barbadoes (till 1680), 330.
Sir Robert, Justice of Court of Common Pleas, 273, 275.
Attainder, Articles of, 33.
——, Bill of, See Danby.
Atterbury, a messenger, 314, 317.
Attorney-General:
See under Jones, Sir William; Levinz or Levinge, Sir Cresswell, Sawyer, Sir Robert.

Attorney-General—contd.
Essex desires Sir John Temple as, 301.
Winnington promised appointment as, 562.
Attorney, King's. Attorney General, q.v.
Audley End, letter dated from, 416.
Augeau, Marquis d', 350.
Aungier, Capt., 547.
Austria, Court of, 325.
Aylmer, a minor, probably Sir FitzGerald Aylmer, Bart., grandnephew of Duke of Ormond, 190, 198.

B

Baden, Prince of, 325.
Baker, 477.
Lieut. Henry, 315.
Thos. Jr., wool licencee, 162.
Ball, Edward, 334.
Henry, letter from, 138.
John, wool licencee, 162.
Ballast, the, 264.
Balliroe, 320.
Bally, Peter, master mariner, 536.
Ballye, Conventiclers in, 125.
Ballymackeine, 251.
Ballymoney, 605.
Ballywalter, Conventiclers at, 125.
Baltic, 422,
Ban, Edmond, 535.
Bandon, 171.
Banenaskarty, 251.
Bangor, Conventicler at, 125.
——, Dean of. See Humphrys.
Banks, John, 493, 498.
——, examination of, 491, 492.
Samuel, Portrive of Ardee, 492, 493.
Banqueting House. See under Whitehall.
Bansted Downs, horse racing at, 102.
Banting, 609.
Bantry, 163.
Barbadoes, Governor of. See Atkins; Dutton: Barbarini, Cardinal, 36.
Barbary, 346.
Barclay, Judge, 327.
Barnardiston, Sir S., 96.
Barnesly, Mr., J.P., 297.
Barnett, 327.
Barnstaple, 158, 159.
Barons, represented on Privy Council, 56.
Barret or Barrett, Mr., 577, 588.
Barrow, Isaac, Bishop of St. Asaph, 343.
Barry, Mathew, 467, 474, 540, 608.
Barrymore, Richard Barry, 2nd Earl of, letter, from, 432.
Barton, Charles, 96.
W., letter, from, 257.
Barwicke, rebels at, 135.
Basset, Colonel John, M.P. for Barnstaple, 159.
Bastille, The, 265.
Bath:
Wm. Grenville, 1st Earl of, Privy Councillor, Gentleman of the Bedchamber, 307, 521, 591.
——, son of, Charles Grenville, after. 2nd Earl of Bath, 573, 593.
Bath and Wells, Peter Mews, Bishop of, 33, 371, 500.
Batty, Dr., 119.
Bavaria, Ferdinand, Duke of, 119, 424.
Maximilian, Elector of, 424.
Baxter, Captain John, letter from 292.
Baynton, Dick, 618.
Beale, Captain, 495.
Bealing, Dick, 486.
Beare, 163.
Beaumaris, 474.
Bedford:
Duke of. See under Cavendish, Henry.
William Russell, 5th Earl and afterwards 1st Duke of. 1.
——, family of, 475.
Bedloe or Bedlow, William, the informer, 10, 31, 32, 51, 68, 98, 122, 136, 394.
plot to kill, 461, 462.
brother to, 32.
Belasyse, John, Lord Belasyse of Worlaby, 32, 49, 51, 67, 68, 185.
Belfast, 28, 126, 605. arms seized at, 151.
Baron of. See under Chichester, Sir Arthur.
Belings, Sir Richard, 279.
Bellamont, 202.
Earl of. See Wotton.
Bellasis see Belasyse.
Bell Yard, 307.
Bence, Alderman, 374.
Bennet, Simon, secretary to Prince of Orange, 38, 321, 466, 467, 525, 529. moves thanks to His Majesty, 74.
Mr., 591, 593.
Mr., daughters of, 321, 466, 545.
Bennis, John, 594.
Benson, 297, 569.
——, Francis, letters from, 324.
Bentinck, Mrs, probably wife of William Bentinck, 1st Duke of Portland, 273, 274.
Bere Haven, 453.
Bere, O'Sullivan. See O'Sullivan.
Berkeley:
John, 1st Lord Berkeley of Stratton, 12, 60, 537.
——, and the Government of Ireland, 99, 264, 414, 477, 480.
——, letters to mentioned, 264.
Mr., son of John Lord Berkeley, 12, 13, 46, 47, 141.
Berkenhead, Mr., 449.
Berkshire, J.P. for. See Holt, Stapley.
Bermuda:
Governor of. See Heydon.
Company, 590.
inhabitants of, 590.
Berlin, 451.

Berry [i.e. de Feria], secretary of Portuguese Ambassador, an informer, 461, 462.
Bertie, Charles, secretary to Lord Danby, 41, 91, 100.
Capt. Richard, 506, 507.
Bethel, Slingsby, Sheriff of London, 339, 349, 350, 356, 403.
Betty, Lady. See Plunkett.
Beverley, 473.
Beversham, Mr., 171, 609.
Bigglesmouth, 234.
Bilbao, Spain, 536.
Billingsley, Major, godson of Prince Rupert, 321, 332, 333, 604.
Birch, Colonel John, Chairman of Com. of Examinations, 37, 537, 542, 546, 561, Bishops. See England, Church of.
Black Box, letter to a person of honour concerning a pamphlet, 329.
Black Rod, see under House of Commons.
Bladen, Thomas, Dean of Ardfert, 446, 447, 448, 460.
Bland, 373.
Blayney, Henry Vincent, 5th Baron, letters from, 195.
Blechington, letters dated from, 198, 200.
Blenerhassett, Capt. Arthur, Commissioner of Array, Kerry, 320.
——, letter signed by, 320.
Blessinton or Blessington, 178, 206, 210, 216, 370, 441.
letters dated from, 131, 163, 169, 199, 200, 211, 213, 370, 391, 397, 400, 402, 406, 437, 446, 447.
Viscount, Murrough, son of Roger Boyle, Primate of Ireland, ——, Constable of Limerick Castle, 230, 517, 604.
——, letters from mentioned, 172.
——, letters to, 53, 612.
——, letters and memo signed by, 23, 24, 29, 53, 160, 162, 216, 250.
Anne Coote, Viscountess, 2nd wife of 1st Viscount, 206, 413, Blood, Col. Thomas, 340. conspiracy or plot of, 81, 244, 275.
Mr. Mark, 455.
Princes of the, 58, 67.
Blue Mews, 245, 247.
Blythe, John, constable, 37.
Board, Privy Council or Revenue, 240.
Bodmin, Robert Robartes, Viscount Bodmin, eldest son of John, 1st Earl of Radnor, 580.
Bodney, Norfolk, 113.
Boffin, [Inisboffin], 28.
Bohemia :
Elizabeth, Queen of, daughter of James I., 400.
Rebels in, 325.
Bolton :
Landy (Launty), 537, 547, 558.
Captain Richard, 315.
Bonell, 142.
Booth, Mr., 112.
Sir Robert, Chief Justice of Common Pleas in Ireland, 83.
——, death of, 581.
Booth—contd.
——, removal of, 65.
——, State letters and memos signed by, 162, 186, 189.
Boreman or Borman, Sir William, 528.
——, letter from, 261.
Borlase, Sir John, Lord Justice of Ireland, 610.
Boscawen, Edward, M.P. for Truro, 111, 561.
Bouillon, Duchesse de, 265.
Boucher, Thomas, 594, 597.
Bourke :
John, of Cahirmee, 464.
Hubert, an informer, 299, 306, 474.
Richard, a Jesuit, 25.
Bowerman, Edward, 82.
Box, Mr., proposed as Sheriff of London, 349, 350, 356.
Boyle :
letter dated from, 223.
Capt. Henry, letters from, 595, 600.
Michael, Archbishop of Armagh, Primate of Ireland, Lord Chancellor of Ireland, 18, 21, 24, 39, 59, 62, 72, 77, 80, 94, 116, 149, 160, 165, 167, 220, 221, 226, 228, 229, 255, 258, 269, 272, 289, 293, 318, 327, 329, 332, 335, 341, 351, 365, 388, 389, 394, 396, 405, 414, 468, 471, 474, 478, 481, 484, 508, 567, 603, 610, 611, 612, 613.
——, accusations and complaints against, 39, 43, 45, 46, 60, 287, 288, 290, 332, 454, 468, 470, 478, 479, 484, 488. 537, 547, 562, 582, 602.
——, declines Deputy Lieutenancy of Ireland, 73.
——, impeachment of, 471.
——, King favours, 454.
——, petition from, 616.
——, salary of, proposed reduction, and suspension of, 381, 389, 394, 396, 405, 406, 431, 484.
——, State letters, etc., signed by, 23, 24, 29, 53, 160, 162, 186, 189, 250.
——, signs memo. on state of Ireland addressed to Mr. Secretary Coventry, 29.
——, wives of, 43.
——, letters from, 42, 73, 124, 131, 163, 169, 178, 184, 185, 199, 200, 205, 207, 211, 213, 216, 342, 369, 370, 391, 397, 400, 402, 404, 406, 413, 437, 446, 447, 581.
——, letters from mentioned, 460, 597, 615.
——, letters to, 121, 124, 171, 173, 182, 206, 208, 210, 212, 353, 421, 440, 597, 600, 606.
——, letter to mentioned, 544.
Richard, of Shannon Park, 207. 574, 587, 608.
Richard, 2nd Earl of Cork and 1st Earl of Burlington, q.v.
Boynton, Christopher, 10.
Brabazon, Capt. Edward, 230, 517.

Brabazon—contd.
——, State letter, etc., signed by, 189.
Mrs., 545.
Bradley :
Lt., 476.
a messenger, 314.
William, bill for high treason against, 580.
Bradshaw [George], appears before House of Lords, 2.
Brady, 533, 556, 558.
Bramston, Colonel, company of, 160.
Brandenburgh, 143, 281.
Frederick William, Elector of, 277, 422, 423, 424.
Braye's Building, Clonmel, 203.
Breda, 529.
Brenan :
Alexander, 583.
John, R.C. Bishop of Cashel, 541.
Mrs., 583.
Brent, Mr., 32.
Brest (France), 28.
Brett :
Sir Edward, Serjeant Porter in King's Household, 598, 599, 608, 609, 610.
——, nephew, 598.
Mr., 598.
Bretby, letter dated from, 419.
Brewers, 245.
Brewster :
Sir Francis, Commissioner of Array, Kerry, 184, 320.
Brians, And., 240.
Bridgeman, Mr., 60, 226, 516.
Bridge Row, 564.
Bridges, 148.
Capt. Thomas, court martial on, 604, 605.
Bridgewater :
John Egerton, 2nd Earl of, Privy Councillor, 307.
——, appointment as Lord Lieutenant of Hertfordshire, 566.
——, representative Earl on Privy Council, 55, 58.
——, orders signed by, 278.
Bridport, 11.
Brisban, Mr., 21, 59.
Bristol, 62, 299, 539.
George Digby, 2nd Earl of, 280, 529.
——, his house, 529.
Brittas :
Theobald, Lord, afterwards 3rd Baron Bourke, 278, 305, 317, 318, 463, 476, 478, 533, 535, 544, 550.
——, trial of, 281, 291.
Brody, a friar, 578.
Broghill, Roger Boyle, Lord Broghill, afterwards 2nd Earl of Orrery, letters from mentioned, 206.
Brooke, Fulke Greville, 5th Baron, 247.
Brouncker, William, 2nd Viscount, appointment as First Commissioner of the Admiralty, 270, 275.
Browne :
Richard, 451.
High Constable of Waterford, 240, 242, 246.
Thomas, 463.
Brownsworth, Rev. Jonathan, curate to Vicar of Clonmel, 295, 296.
Bruce, Michael, 125.
Brussels, 184, 190.
Bryen, Mr., of Newtowne, 612.
Buck, 517, 523, 577, 593.
Mr., Clerk of the Dockets, sale of office by, 552.
James, 501, 534.
——, letter from, 331.
Buckingham :
George Villiers, 2nd Duke of, 275.
——, accusations against, 296, 297, 301, 324, 340.
——, proposals to French King, 242,
——, reappearance in House of Lords, 107, 108, 110, 499, 501.
Buckinghamshire, 466.
Buckley, Mrs., 242, 561.
Bullethead, a horse, 618.
Bull Head Inn, White Friars, 565.
Bullinbrooke, John, 451.
Bulls. See Pope, The.
Burch, Mr., 471.
Burford :
King's plate at, 616, 618.
Charles Beauclerk, Earl of, afterwards 1st Duke of St. Albans, 246.
Burgh, Rev. William, 320.
Burke or Bourke, Hubert, an informer, 299, 306, 431, 432, 433, 438, 477, 478, 481, 488, 537.
Burlington :
Richard Boyle, 1st Earl of, and 2nd Earl of Cork, Governor of co. Cork, 14, 46, 62, 225, 229, 230, 236, 264, 404, 474, 478, 486, 518, 520, 525, 526, 547, 553, 565, 574, 586, 587, 601, 609, 616.
——, requests removal of Scotch troops from Youghal, 565, 577, 588.
——, letters from, 71, 93, 221, 381, 445, 517.
——, letters from mentioned, 470, 544, 596.
——, letters to, 88, 155, 353, 470.
Burnett, Col. Cooke's horse, 7.
Butler :
Lady Charlotte, dau. of Earl of Arran, 551.
Lady Elizabeth, daughter of Earl of Arran, 331.
Lord. See Ossory.
Lt. Gilbert, 508.
Lord James, succeeded his father, Thomas, Earl of Ossory, afterwards 2nd Duke of Ormond, 12, 13, 39, 40, 47, 117, 120, 129, 141, 152, 156, 160, 165, 167, 173, 176, 182, 183, 190, 194, 195, 217, 261, 277, 301, 317, 333, 335, 338, 345, 347, 358, 359, 360, 367, 374, 375, 378, 379, 387, 399, 413, 417, 418, 426, 435, 522, 573, 585.

Butler—contd.
——, becomes Earl of Ossory, 361.
——, mentioned as Earl of Ossory, 361, 373, 385, 416, 419, 466, 471, 475, 499, 548, 554, 565.
——, Governor of, 117, 416, 450, 451, 573, 585, 593.
——, matrimonial arrangements for, 317, 321, 328, 372, 405, 424, 436, 449, 466, 483, 495, 499, 545, 558, 560.
——, title of, doubtful, 379.
——, letters from, 201, 261, 374, 468.
——, letter to, 214.
——, mentioned, 565.
Sir James, Deputy Justice of the Forests, 5, 167, 349, 387, 443, 462, 468, 486, 494, 508, 564.
——, letter from, 374, 468.
——, letter from mentioned, 443, 521, 577.
Major John, 104. of Westcourt, Col. John, son of Richard Butler of Kilcash, 580, 592.
John, Bill for high treason against, 580.
Colonel, 528.
Richard, eldest son of 4th Lord Mountgarret, 15, 25, 26.
Mr., of Roscoe (Ruskoe), 412, 468, 525.
Mr. Thomas, 508.
Byrne, Owen, 27.
Bysse :
John, Chief Baron of the Exchequer, 266, 269, 270, 274, 275, 286.
——, State letters and memos signed by, 162.

C

Cabal, Lords of the, 599.
Caddowes [i.e. pillows], 482.
Cadiz (Cales), 342, 394.
Cahirmoyle's Estate, 464.
Callaghan :
Rev. James, letter from, 531.
Neale, 532.
Owen, an informer, 314, 318, 349, 491.
Calthorpe, Sir Christopher, elected Knight for Norfolk, 56.
Calverly, Sir Henry, 340.
Cambie, Soll. 451.
Cambridge :
University of, 293.
King's College, Fellow of, 514.
Cameron's Party [i.e. Cameronians], 368.
Campbell :
Captain, duel of, 138, 139.
Henry, Bishop of London, 55, 58, 262, 287, 307, 454, 459.
——, orders signed by, 278.
Mr. Hugh, 125, 126, 206.
Campsfield, 619.
Candish. See Cavendish.
Candlemas, 532.
Canterbury, Archbishop of. See Sancroft.
——, ex-officio Privy Councillor, 55, 58.
——, attends Privy Council, 307.
——, the late [Sheldon], 316.
Cape Clear, 309, 336.
Capel :
Sir Henry, Privy Councillor, Chief Commissioner of the Admiralty 31, 238, 239, 270, 271, 302, 312, 450, 561, 562.
——, appointed to Privy Council, 55, 56, 58.
——, withdrawal from Privy Council, 270, 271.
——, letter from mentioned, 321, 328.
Captoeres, General, 325.
Carew, Sir Thomas, 371.
Carlingford, 155, 259.
Nicholas Taafe, 2nd Earl of, 549.
Carlisle, Charles Howard, 3rd Earl of, 353, 470, 529.
Carolus, Jac., letters from, 245.
Carpenter, Edward, 158.
Carr, Sir Robert, 563.
Carrick, 482, 545.
letters dated from, 178, 181, 182, 398.
letters dated from, mentioned, 400, 405.
Carrickfergus, 264.
Governor of, 285, 295.
See Longford.
Edward Chichester, Viscount, 285.
Arthur Chichester, Viscount, afterwards 1st Earl of Donegall, q.v.
Carrick in Ross (Carrickmacross), letters dated from, 257.
Carrick-on-Suir, 242, 245.
Carrigaholte, letters dated from, 556.
Cartwright, Tho., 451.
Cary, Sir Nicholas, 561.
Cashel :
letters dated from, 117, 334.
Archbishop of. See Price, Thomas,
Chancellor of. See Sall.
Bishop of, Roman Catholic. See Brenan.
Cassiobury, 185, 437.
Castle, an Irish witness, 570.
Castledawson, letters dated from, 264.
Castlehaven :
James Touchet, Earl of, 145, 146, 445, 611. memoirs of, 445, 581, 586, 599, 602, 608. See also under Anglesey.
Castlelyons, 598, 600.
letters dated from, 432.
Castlemaine, Roger, Lord, secretary of. See Ledcot.
Castlemartyr, letters dated from, 51, 61, 77, 138, 143, 145, 149, 171, 172, 206, 595, 600.
Castleton, John, Dublin merchant, 28.
Casualties. See under Rents.
Catherine, Lady, 612.
Queen of Charles II. See under England.

Cattle :
Bills concerning Irish, 9, 30, 77, 116, 487.
Bills concerning Scotch, 497.
Catline, Sir Neville, elected Knight for Norfolk, 56.
Cavan, county of, 233, 241.
Cavendish :
Elizabeth (Betty), daughter of Wm. Lord Cavendish, 331, 338, 538.
Henry (Harry), son of Lord Wm. Cavendish 2nd Duke of Newcastle, Duke of Bedford, 338, 475.
James, son of Wm. Lord Cavendish, 338.
Mary, Lady wife of Wm. Lord Cavendish q.v., daughter of James Butler, 1st Duke of Ormond, 200, 338, 466, 470, 554.
——, letters from, 367.
William, Lord afterwards 1st Duke of Devonshire, 5, 38, 98, 133, 137, 238, 239, 281, 291, 292, 443, 503, 554, 561.
——, letter from, 366.
——, appointed to Privy Council, 56, 58.
——, withdrawal from, 270, 271, 274, 291.
——, indictment of Duke of York, by, 340.
——, proposed as Lord Chamberlain, 55, 58.
William (Will), son of Wm. Lord Cavendish, 338.
Cecil, Col., 332.
Cellier, Mrs., or Syliard, the informer, 237, 261, 461, 467, 490, 501, 502.
Chamber, The, messengers of, 299.
Chamberlain :
Lord. See under Arlington, Earl of.
——, chamber of, 90.
——, Privy Councillor, 55, 58.
Champante, Sir John, 201, 202, 205, 369, 429.
Chancellor :
Lord, of England. See Finch.
——, of Ireland. See Boyle.
——, a Privy Councillor, 55, 58.
——, conveys King's approval of Speaker, 459, 460, 619.
——, his staff, 512.
Chancery : 58.
Court of, 332, 335. appeal to the King in, 45.
Clerk's office in, 594.
Masters in, 8, 9.
See also under Ireland.
Chandos of Sudeley, James, 8th Lord, Ambassador to Turkey, 310, 311.
Channel :
The (English), 309.
chops of, 336.
Chappell Izard. See Chapelizod.
Chapelizod, 292, 479.
Chappel, 179.
Charlemont, 128.
letters dated from, 138.
Charles, The, a galley, letters dated on board, 326.
Charles Fort, Tangier, 329, 334.
Charles :
I., King of England, 261, 262.
II., 10 et passim.
II., accusations against, 297.
——, addresses to, 487. See also under Parliament, House of Commons, House of Lords.
——, assassination of, alleged attempts and plots for, 158, 159, 220, 224, 237, 461, 486, 488, 512, 513, 516.
——, buck hunting, 424.
——, at Burford, 618.
——, chaplains, of, 288.
——, at Cornbury, 615, 618.
——, dines with Duchess of Portsmouth, 75.
——, divorce of, proposed, 488, 490, 499, 500, 501, 502, 505.
——, entertained by Lord Mayor of London, 288.
——, favours calling of Parliament in Ireland, 436.
——, hawking by, 618.
——, Household of, 243.
——, ——, Bedchamber, 123, 427, 467, 573.
——, ——, Bedchamber, Gentlemen of the, 122, 123, 521, 566, See also Bath, Earl of ——, ——, Chamberlain, Lord, 55, 58. See also Arlington.
——, ——, Comptrollers, classes of, 262.
——, ——, expenses of, 147.
——, ——, Groom of the Stool of Stole, Privy Councillor, 55, 58.
——, ——, Horse, Master of, 55, 58, 247.
——, ——, house and stables, 239.
——, ——, Privy Chamber, Gentlemen Ushers, 310. See Duppa.
——, ——, Privy Seal, Lord, 55, 58, See also Anglesey.
——, ——, Porter, Serjeant, in, 598, 610.
See Brett.
——, ——, Steward, Lord High, allowances and salary of, 98, 261, 262.
——, ——, Steward, Lord High, 38, 55, 58, 94, 99, 291, 511, 610, See also under Ormond, Duke of ; Winchester, Marquis of ; Finch, Heneage :
——, ——, commission of, 512.
——, ——, office sold by, 79.
——, ——, commissions to 98, 99.
——, ——, Privy Councillor, 55, 58.
——, ——, Speaker of House of Lords, 38.
——, ——, White Staff, 49, 253.
——, houses of, Roman Catholics excluded from. Vide Roman Catholics.
——, illness and recovery of, 191, 193, 194, 196, 197, 199, 202, 316, 317, 318, 319, 321, 322, 324.

Charles II.—contd.
——, Irish Revenue, Bills for, Report to, 416.
——, at Newmarket, 219, 273, 286, 287, 288, 290, 291, 292, 303, 312, 400, 409, 420, 436.
——, New Year's gifts given and received by, 541.
——, at Oxford, 616, 618, 619.
——, Parliament, dissolved by, 152.
——, Parliament prorogued by, 116.
——, Parliament necessary to, 96, 171, 553.
——, Parliament, relations with, 194, 604.
——, person and life to be defended, 94, 189, 475, 491.
——, petitions to, 460, 563, 565, 569, 577.
——, Privy Council dissolved by, 55, 58, 74.
——, refuses to have Whitehall searched, 111.
——, remands five Lords, 116.
——, resents aspersions on Queen, 140.
——, reputed marriage, 311, 314, 315, 321, 329, 332, 335, 336, 561.
——, Scotch Lords' petition, 133.
——, Sheriff's names pricked by, 476.
——, speech at opening of Parliament, 437, 459, 619.
——, sports attended by, 75.
——, visits Marquess of Winchester 75.
——, at Whitehall, 223.
——, at Windsor. See under Windsor.
——, letters from, 340, 341, 537.
——, letters to, 507, 558, 564.
——, ——, mentioned, 379, 614.
Charleton, Mr. (Charlton), 466, 591, 593.
Charlotte, Lady. See Butler.
Charras, Mons., 318.
Chase, The. See Enfield Chase.
Chatham, 134.
Chatsworth, letter dated from, 338.
Cheekes, Tom, 1st Deputy and then Lieutenant of the Tower, 37, 112, 515. loss on a greyhound match, 75.
Chelsey (Chelsea), 279.
letters dated from, 331.
Chelsey House, 280, 289.
Chepstow, Deputy Governor of, 10. See Spaulding.
Cheque, Clerk of, 278.
Cheshire, 177.
Chester, 178, 298, 309, 331, 384, 405, 422, 462, 508, 558, 584.
letter dated from mentioned, 611.
Chief Justice of. See Jefferyes. prisoners sent to, 533, 537, 538, 540, 548.
Recorder of. See Williams.
Chesterfield, Philip Dormer Stanhope, 2nd Earl of, Justice in Eyre, Privy Councillor, 247, 248, 566, 603.
appointment to Privy Council, 566.
letters from, 419.
Chetwynd, 4, 9.
Chicheley :
Sir Thomas, Master of the Ordnance, 4, 55, 96, 177.
——, refuses proposed colleagues, 122.
Sir John, 177.
Chichester, Capt. John, letter to, 264.
Sir Arthur, Baron of Belfast, 285.
Chief Justices of England, Privy Councillors, 55, 58.
Chief Justice of Ireland. See under Ireland.
Chief Place, Court of—Court of Common Pleas. See under Ireland.
Chiffinch :
Will, beagles of, 618.
Mr., 37, 68, 145.
Chirurgeones, Company of, Warden of, 306.
Chislington, letter dated from, 449.
Cholmondley or Cholmeley, Sir Hugh, 84, 86.
Christ Church (Dublin), 543.
Christchurch, Oxford, Canon of, 155.
Christ Church College, Oxford. See Oxford Colleges.
Christian, [Edward], 275, 340.
Christmas Day, 606.
Churchill :
Captain, 551.
Col., 343.
John, [afterwards] 1st Duke of Marlborough, 329.
Jasper, 265, 297, 314, 521.
Chute [Challoner], 506.
Cinque Ports, 48.
Civil List. See Ireland.
Claims, Commissioners of. See Ireland, Commissioners of Claims in.
Clancarty : 40.
Donogh McCarthy, 4th Earl of, 419, 471.
Ellen, Countess of, sister of James Butler, 1st Duke of Ormond, 172, 379, 543.
——, letter from, 400.
Clancy-Whitehead Papers, 6.
Clancy, 550.
Clanrickardes—Clanricarde :
William Burke, 7th Earl of, 278, 340.
——, grandson of, 277, 278.
——, privileges conferred on, 341.
——, letters to, 341.
Richard, 8th Earl of. See under Dunkellin.
Clare :
assizes, 593, 596.
——, Judges of, 607, 608, 609, 612, 613.
County of, 78, 578.
Deputy Governor of. See Stamer.
Governor of, 230, 231. See also Thomond. jury, common, of, 606.
jury, grand, 606.
——, Foreman, see Gore.
——, jurymen, 594.

Clare—contd.
——, petition from, 593, 596, 600, 606, 609, 611, 613.
Justices of Peace for, 593, 600, 612.
troops for, 455.
Castle, letter dated from, 455.
Clare, Countess of, wife of Daniel O'Brien, 3rd Viscount, 577, 611.
Daniel O'Brien, 3rd Viscount Clare, 67, 463, 578, 586, 588, 595, 607, 608, 609, 614.
——, dismissal of, 616, 617.
——, insincerity of, 577, 611.
——, petition from, 593, 594, 600, 606, 607, 612, 613.
——, steward of. See Jevers.
——, letters from, 556, 578, 599.
——, ——, mentioned, 558, 564, 565, 577, 587, 602, 612.
——, letters to, 558.
Clarendon :
Edward Hyde, 1st Earl of, 3, 8.
Henry Hyde, 2nd Earl of, 110, 144, 158, 388, 459, 486. (See also Cornbury.)
——, estate of, 618.
——, informers' disclosures to, 461, 462.
Clarges, Sir Thomas, 31, 89, 561.
Clark, Mr., 331, 372.
Clarke, James, 356.
letter to, 345.
Clavers, Laird. See Graham.
Clayton, Sir Robert, Lord Mayor of London, 288, 546, 609.
Clerkenwell, new prison at, 91.
Cleveland, Barbara Villiers, Duchess of, 151, 241.
Clifford, Sir Thomas, 1st Lord Clifford of Chudleigh, 37.
Clogher :
Bishop of. See Synge.
Titular Bishop of. See Tyrrell.
Clonmel :
29, 200, 204, 242, 541.
Braye's Buildings in, 203.
improvements in, 203.
Kilsheelan Gate in, 203, 204.
Kilsheelan Street in, 204.
Lough Street, 204.
Manor Courts at, 204.
Mayor of, 203.
North Gate, 204.
Regality Courts in, 203.
Vicar of. See Ladyman.
letters dated from, 199, 200, 203, 295, 597.
Clough, letter dated from, 536.
Cockpit, The, 2, 245, 324.
Cloyne, Bishopric of, 446.
Clynton, Robert, 315.
Cobbum (Cockburn), 125.
Coffee-houses (as Clubs), 165, 177, 210, 226, 281, 297, 353, 431, 486, 532.
Coghill, John, D.D., letters to, 124, 126.
Cole :
Sir John, 200, 220.
——, State letters and memo signed by, 53, 186, 189.
Mr., 10.
Cole—contd.
Robert, 594, 597.
Colear, Sir Alexander, 198, 271.
Coleman [Edward], secretary to Duke of York, 511, 516. letters of, reported to House of Commons, 94.
Colepeper (Culpeper), Thomas, 2nd Baron Colepeper of Thoresway, 31.
Colinge, Richard, letters from, 354.
Colleges, appointments in forbidden to Papists, 10.
Colpoys, John, 594, 597.
Colt :
[John Dutton], M.P., 467, 547.
Cornet, 545, 547, 551, 557.
Colvill, Sir Robert, 126, 129.
Combe, Mathew, letters to, 264.
Common Pleas, Court of, 524. See also under Ireland.
Chief Justice of, 58, 562.
See also Davys, Sir Wm.
Court of, Judges of, 524.
See also Atkins, Sir Robert ; Levinge, Sir Creswell.
Common Prayer, Book of, 132.
Commons, i.e., M.P.'s, 276.
Commons, House of. See under Parliament.
Commonwealth : discussed by Privy Council, 136.
form of Government refused by House of Commons, 95.
Comyn, Eustace, 537, 538, 540, 542, 571.
——, letters from, 541.
Conclave (Church of Rome), mentioned, 2.
Concordatum Money, 394, 510.
Confirmation of Estates, Bill of. See under Estates.
Connaught, 113, 327, 440, 491, 532.
rents payable from, 510. See also under Ireland Rents.
troops in, 517.
Connor, Diocese of. See Down and Connor.
Constantinople, English Ambassador at, 311.
Conventiclers, 89, 125.
Convocation. See England, Church of.
Conway :
and Kilulta, Edward Conway, Viscount, created Earl of, 186, 405, 424, 537, 540, 551, 568, 574, 577, 588, 598, 605, 608, 616, 618.
——, appointment as Secretary of State, 563, 565, 566, 568, 569, 571, 579.
——, letters from, 485, 553, 588, 602.
——, ——, mentioned, 588.
——, letters to, 471, 576, 587, 609, 611.
Cooke :
Mr., 241, 569, 603, 615.
Col. Edward, letters from, 2, 6, 30, 36, 48, 55, 66, 74, 85, 88, 97, 100, 106, 109, 115, 239, 242, 244, 247, 371, 424, 449, 459, 466, 475, 479, 494, 501, 505, 511, 521, 618.
——, letters to, 11, 405, 483.

Cooper, Sir William, 351.
Coote :
Capt. Richard, 451, 554, 604, 605.
——, State letters and memos signed by, 162, 241, 250.
Mr., 554.
——, letters from mentioned, 551.
Cope, Widow, 440.
Coppinger, Robert, 269, 287, 290, 318, 329, 332, 335, 454.
Squire, 448.
Cork, 29, 63, 71, 78, 139, 171, 173, 201, 211, 303, 356, 357, 534, 601.
letters dated from, 124, 187, 218, 597, 601.
arms at, 586, 590.
Assizes at, 596, 600.
Bishop of. See Synge and Wetenhall.
——, Titular. See Creagh. cathedral of, 201.
garrison, 17.
gaol, 173.
harbour, 51, 139.
liberties of, 597.
Mayor and Sheriffs of, 124.
mutiny in, 146.
Militia in, 597, 598, 600, 601.
Recorder of. See Worth, William.
Lord Dumbarton's Regiment in, 124.
weekly market in, 17, 27.
Cork, County of, Commission of Peace in, 207, 445.
——, gentry of, 432.
——, governor of, 230, 518. See under Burlington, Shannon.
——, Lord Lieutenancy of, 236.
——, Sheriff of, 518.
See Supple.
Cork, Richard Boyle, 2nd Earl of. See Burlington.
Cork and Ross, united Diocese of, 446.
Cornbury, 158, 615, 616, 618.
Henry Hyde, Viscount, afterwards 2nd Earl of Clarendon, q.v.
Cornish, Mr., Sheriff of London, 339, 349, 350, 356.
Corporations :
Act for Purging and Regulating, 284, 343.
See also under Ireland.
Cosin, John, D.D., Bishop of Durham, 311, 320, 321, 354, 539.
Costagan or Costigan, Derby or Darby, an informer, 212, 226, 249, 250.
Council : Privy. See England. Also Ireland.
——, Table. See Ireland.
——, of War. See Ireland.
Courcy, Almericus, Lord, afterwards Baron of Kingsale. See Kingsale.
Courteney, Sir William, 555.
Courts, Manor. See Clonmel.
Courts Martial. See under Ireland, army in.
Court Party. See under England.
Covenant, The. See Scotland, the Covenant in.
Coventry, 443.
Henry, principal Secretary of State (till 1680), 3, 4, 5, 14, 22, 24, 25, 26, 27, 33, 34, 37, 45, 49, 73, 80, 83, 84, 87, 94, 100, 106, 113, 133, 134, 149, 153, 157, 159, 163, 168, 169, 170, 172, 176, 180, 181, 183, 185, 191, 197, 214, 218, 220, 222, 224, 226, 227, 228, 235, 236, 252, 253, 254, 260, 263, 267, 269, 271, 276, 280, 285, 286, 289, 291, 292, 293, 296, 301, 302, 305, 310, 312, 321, 322, 331, 385, 389, 390, 396, 410, 424, 443, 481, 482.
——, Orders-in-Council to, 112, 128,
——, orders signed by, 278.
——, resignation of, 271, 273, 275, 276, 294, 300, 311, 415.
——, State letters to, 188, 249.
——, State letters to mentioned, 112, 315.
—, letters from, 35, 39, 57, 65, 82, 105, 114, 117, 118, 123, 127, 131, 137, 142, 145, 146, 150, 163, 166, 177, 185, 196, 202, 208, 210, 212, 213, 215, 219, 231, 233, 241, 244, 248, 249, 258, 260, 264, 266, 270, 272, 274, 278, 284, 287, 288, 291, 295, 298, 327, 365, 393, 528.
——, letters from mentioned, 223, 226, 229, 281, 290, 432.
——, letters to, 23, 72, 73, 114, 118, 128, 129, 190, 231, 249, 269, 285, 299, 304, 366, 404.
——, letters to mentioned, 120, 183, 268, 306, 315, 336, 340, 386, 474, 500.
Sir John, 281, 285.
Sir William, 95, 97.
Cox :
Thomas, letter signed, 492.
See Plunkett, Oliver.
Cramer, Tobias, Commissioner of Array, Kerry, 320.
Cranborne, Frances Bennet, Lady, afterwards Countess of Salisbury, 315.
Craven, William, 1st Earl of, Regiment of, 329.
Crawley, T., 451.
Creagh, Dr., Roman Catholic Bishop of Cork, 300.
Creation Money. See Ireland.
Crewe, Nathaniel, Bishop of Durham, 235, 354.
Crispine, Mr., 177.
Crockford, Edward, wool licencee, 162.
Croker, John, Esq., 463.
Cromwell :
Oliver, 30, 255, 562, 575.
——, offices of, 575, 576.
Vere, 528.
Crooke :
Sir Richard, Recorder of Oxford, 618.
Upton, 618.
Mrs., 385.
Crosse, Sylvester, Esq., 251.
Crown lands, 430.
Cuffe, Sir J., 176,
Culpeper, Lord. See Colepepper.

Cumber, Conventiclers in, 125.
Curtis, Mr., 340.
Custom House, Clerk of, 161.
Customs, 111, 240, 431. See also Ireland.
Customs, Commissioners of, 431.
——, Farm of, 431.
Cypher, employed in correspondence, 454, 469, 478, 479, 486, 493, 494, 498, 549, 553.

D

D——, Mr., trial of, 122.
Dainton, Dr., 456.
Dacre, Elizabeth, widow of 14th Lord Dacre, daughter of Paul, Lord Baynham, 506.
Dalrymple, Sir James. See Stair.
Dalton alias Geoghegan, q.v.
Danby :
Bridget, Countess of, Lady Bridget Bertie, daughter of Earl of Lindsay, 324.
Thomas Osborne, 1st Earl of, Lord Treasurer of England, 41, 46, 100, 230, 243, 297, 324, 458, 459, 482, 563.
——, Bill of Attainder against, 10, 11, 22, 30, 31, 32, 38, 39, 48, 49, 51.
——, Bill for banishment of, 2, 3, 9, 10, 48.
——, Bill of impeachment of, 9.
——, Bill for punishment of, 2, 5, 32, 39.
——, bribery of witnesses by, 68.
——, defence and plea offered by, 68, 71, 76, 77, 84, 86, 88.
——, narrative and reasons for precedence of trial of, 119.
——, pardon of, 32, 71, 76, 84, 86, 88, 103, 107, 115, 116.
——, petitions of, 56, 89, 90.
——, punishment demanded by Commons, 2, 3, 9, 85.
——, share of secret service money, 91.
——, treasurership, 111.
——, Treasurer, mentioned as, 5, 30, 33, 34, 36, 140.
——, trial of, 57, 86, 93, 103, 108, 111, 115, 116.
——, letters to, mentioned, 340, 386, 474.
Dangerfield [Thomas], alias Willoughby, an informer, 233, 236, 237, 459, 461, 462, 466, 490, 497, 501.
Daniel, valet de chambre to Ossory, 138.
Danter :
John, wool licencee, 162.
Richard, wool licencee, 162.
Dapool, 462.
D'Arlincourt. See Drelincourt.
Dashwood, Mr., 179.
Davis, Rev., 201.
Davys, Lady, 509, 590.
Davis or Davys :
Sir John, Commissioner of Revenue, Ireland, Secretary of State in Dublin, 179, 199, 202, 454, 463, 467, 484, 489, 507, 516, 520, 521, 523, 524, 525, 530, 532, 533, 537, 538, 540, 541, 545, 548, 552, 557, 568, 580, 590, 592, 608, 610, 616, ——, accusations and petitions against, 478, 481, 488, 507, 537, 542, 543, 544, 546, 547, 553, 580, 584, 590.
——, Bill for high treason against, 580, 581, 587, 588.
——, recommended to King by Ormond, 507.
——, trial of, 589, 590, 591, 602.
——, State letters and memos signed by, 23, 24, 29, 53, 186, 189.
——, letters from, 508, 526, 542, 546.
——, letters from mentioned, 553.
——, letters to, 463, 553.
Sir Wm., son-in-law of Primate Boyle, q.v., Prime Serjeant, Lord Chief Justice of Common Pleas, Ireland, 181, 481, 488.
——, appointment as Chief Justice of Common Pleas, Ireland, 581, 587, 588, 589, 593, 595.
——, promotion of, 35, 39, 589.
——, letter from, 597.
——, letter from mentioned, 593.
Davy, Sir William, 23.
Dawson :
Squire, daughter of, 295.
Thomas, letter from, 264.
Deane :
Sir Anthony, 96, 108, 111, 119, 122.
Sir Arthur—Sir Anthony, q.v.
Deering, or Dering, Sir Edward, 268, 419.
Delamere, George Booth, 1st Baron, 112.
Delvin, Mary Butler, wife of Christopher Nugent, Lord Delvin, niece of Ormond, 361, 379.
Dempsey, Col., 477, 480.
Denehey, Mr., 86.
Denison, Richard, letter to, 541.
Denmark, King of, 54.
Dennis :
Bernard, priest and Franciscan friar, witness at Stafford's trial, 512, 516, 547, 580, 581.
Major, of Wexford, 575, 576.
Denny, Captain Edward, 320.
Deptford, 281.
Derby :
Countess of, 568.
Elizabeth Butler, Countess of, daughter of Thomas, Earl of Ossory, 33, 80, 235.
William George Richard, 9th Earl of, 80, 120, 234, 235.
——, letters from, 343, 567.
——, letter to, 611.
Derry :
Bishop of. See Mossom.
Bishopric of, 262.
County, 368, Tories of, 440.

Desborough, Captain, 206.
Devereux, Nicholas, 594, 597.
Devonshire, 497, 555.
William Cavendish, 1st Duke of. See Cavendish.
——, servant of, 372.
Dewey, Mr., J.P., 293.
Diamond. Star of the Garter, 387.
Dickinson, Dr., 354.
Digby :
Simon, Bishop of Limerick, 200, 203.
——, letters to, 199, 200.
——, letter from mentioned, 323.
Dillon :
Colonel Cary, 88, 180, 183, 351, 352, 517, 604.
——, affidavit signed by, 492, 493.
——, State letter and memos signed by, 23, 24, 29, 186, 189, 250.
Dingle :
Corporation of, 184.
troops at, 184, 185.
letter dated from, 536.
Disney, William, 315.
Dissenters :
See under England, Protestant Dissenters in ; Nonconformists ; Scotland.
Dockets, Clerk of. See Buck, Ellis.
Dolben, John, Bishop of Rochester, 34, 289, 293, 457, 462, 477, 508, 521.
Domville, Sir William, Attorney General of Ireland, 35, 57, 177, 295, 374.
Don[ation], act of, 80.
Donaghadee, 126.
collector of Revenue at, 125.
conventiclers at, 125.
Presbyterian Minister of, 125.
Doncaster, 234.
Donegal, county of, 234.
Donegall, Jane Itchingham, Countess of, widow of 2nd Earl of, 480.
Arthur, 1st Earl of, Governor of Carrickfergus, 285.
Donoghoe, Teige, 455.
Dorset :
Frances, Countess of, daughter of Lionel Cranfield, 1st Earl of Middlesex, m. Henry Powle, afterwards Master of the Rolls, 177.
——, Housekeeper at Somerset House, 40.
Charles Sackville,6th Earl of,488, 598.
Doughty, Mr., 346.
Douglas :
Capt. A., letter from, 616.
Captain William, 139.
——, duel of, 138, 145.
——, letter from, 295.
Dover, 218.
Dowlen, James, wool licencee, 162.
Dowling, Murtagh, see Downey.
Down : and Conor, Bishop of, [Thos. Hasktet], 448, 603.
——, letters from mentioned, 446, 448, 460.
and Connor and Dromore, united Dioceses of, 446, 447.
County, 254, 368.
Downey or Dowling, 533, 558, 559, 569.
Downing :
Sir George, 49, 396, 408.
Murty, informer, 544, 548, 549.
Downpatrick : or Old Head, 251.
conventiclers in, 125.
Downs, The, 128, 166.
Downy—Downey, q.v.
Doyly, Sir John, 495.
Dragoons, King's, 122, 123, 124.
Drake, 591, 608, 616.
Sir Francis, debts of, 90.
Drapers, Woollen, Chief Master of, 245.
Drelincourt :
Rev. Peter, 12, 13, 39, 46, 184, 289, 335, 375, 419.
——, letters from, 46, 129, 141, 156, 194, 216, 277, 347, 417.
Drogheda, 29.
Drogheda, Alicia Countess of, widow of Henry Moore, 1st Earl of, 154.
Henry, 3rd Earl of, made Privy Councillor, Ireland, 424.
Archbishop's visitation at, 170, 185, 186.
garrison in, 17.
weekly market, 17, 27.
Dromcarrin, 455.
Dromore, Bishop of [Essex Digby], 471.
Drury, John, 286.
Drysdale, John, 125.
Dublin, 16, 18, 25, 28, 29, 34, 42, 62, 82, 113, 114, 128, 178, 182, 188, 193, 199, 206, 210, 211, 212, 213, 215, 233, 234, 257, 264, 273, 285, 302, 331, 370, 413, 420, 425, 447, 497, 508, 576, 606.
——, letters dated from, 11, 13, 23, 30, 33, 34, 40, 42, 52, 59, 60, 64, 66, 71, 72, 73, 78, 79, 80, 83, 86, 88, 92, 104, 106, 108, 109, 113, 114, 118, 120, 124, 134, 142, 147, 148, 155, 160, 178, 185, 195, 202, 205, 207, 214, 216, 219, 221, 223, 229, 231, 243, 246, 252, 253, 259, 268, 269, 276, 293, 298, 299, 302, 303, 304, 309, 310, 312, 316, 319, 320, 326, 327, 333, 336, 345, 353, 356, 365, 366, 369, 373, 387, 413, 414, 425, 432, 455, 460, 470, 471, 473, 478, 482, 483, 486, 489, 493, 500, 504, 507, 509, 517, 521, 523, 533, 538, 540, 543, 544, 545, 548, 551, 553, 557, 558, 559, 564, 567, 571, 573, 576, 579, 581, 583, 585, 586, 587, 592, 599, 608, 609, 611.
Castle, 15, 17, 24, 25, 26, 93, 168, 299, 498.
——, documents and letters dated from, 242, 249, 250, 268, 285, 314, 481, 617.
——, Council Chamber in, 24, 53, 249, 517.
Aldermen of, 205.
Archbishop of, 615. See also Parker, John.
Archbishop, Roman Catholic, of. See Talbot, Peter.

Dublin—contd.
Archbishopric of, Diocese of, See of, 45, 567, 615.
——, Seals of, 615.
Corporations of, 387.
Exchange, 551.
Franchises of, perambulation of, 387.
guards in, 192.
King's Bench, Court of, in, 352.
Lord Mayor of, 29, 41, 387.
Sheriffs of, 29.
petition from, 422.
Phœnix Park. See under Phœnix.
Protestants in, 168.
Recorder of, 314. See Reeves.
Roman Catholics in, 168.
troops for duty in, 517.
Bay of, 128, 129.
County of, Array, Commissioners of, for, 53.
Sheriff of, 53.
Trinity College. See Trinity College. and Glendelogh (Glendalough), united Diocese of, 446.
Duffy [Hugh], an informer, 590.
Dugdale:
Stephen, an informer, 4, 9, 27, 32, 512, 516, 519.
——, evidence at Stafford's trial, 513, 514.
Dukes, represented on Privy Council, 55.
Dumbarton, Lord George Douglas, Earl of, regiment of, 1, 13, 61, 88, 104, 124, 140, 184, 342, 393.
Dun, (a horse), 177.
Dundalk, 155, 257, 259, 352.
Dundonald, Sir William Cochrane, 1st Earl of, 126.
Dungan, Colonel, Lt. Governor of Tangier, 273.
Dungannon, Marcus Trevor, 1st Viscount, or Lewis Trevor, 2nd Viscount, 246.
Dunkellin:
Richard, Lord, afterwards 8th Earl of Clanricarde, 277, 340. privileges conferred on, by King, 341.
letter to, 340.
Dunkirk, 343, 353.
Dunleary, 460.
Duppa, Mr., Gentleman Usher of the Privy Chamber, 310.
Durel, John, Dean of Windsor, 591.
Durham, 235, 595.
Bishop of, See Cosin: Crewe, Nathaniel.
Bishopric of, 234, 235.
Dutch, The, 238, 242, 423.
Dutton, 564, 565.
Sir Ralph, greyhound match of, 74, 75, 239, 240.
——, Horse of, 618.
Sir Richard, Governor of Barbadoes, 330.

E

Earls, represented on Privy Council, 55.
East India:
ships from, 133, 351.
Committee, 165, 193.
Company, 51, 422.
Eastland, Capt., 526.
Eaton, Lieutenant Colonel, daughter of, 206.
Edinburgh: 89. prisoners brought to, 146.
rebels at, 126, 129, 132, 135.
royal troops at, 132, 147.
Edlington, letter dated from, 368.
Edmund, 532.
Edrington — Hetherington, q.v.
Edward:
III., Statutes of, 580.
——, Act of Association of, 502.
VI., statutes of, 457, 462.
Edwards, Sir James, Lord Mayor of London, 213, 227.
Egan, 477.
Elections:
Committee of. See House of Commons.
Parliamentary General, 157, 166, 202, 579, 584, 611.
——, Leicestershire, 49.
——, Norfolk, 56.
——, Surrey, 50.
——, London, 219.
——, Portsmouth, 591.
Elizabeth:
Queen, 238, 475.
——, Act of Association of, 488, 502, 506, 619.
Elliott, Tom, 435.
Ellis:
——, [John], 200, 289, 304, 324, 351, 352, 375, 391, 397, 415, 416, 439, 457, 461, 462, 465.
——, appointment as Bailiff of Westminster, 508, 528.
——, Clerk of the Dockets, appointment as, 552.
——, letter from, 289.
——, letters to mentioned, 368.
Sir William, Justice of Common Pleas, 84, 273, 493, 580.
——, death of, 524.
William, letters to, 613.
Ely:
Peter Gunning, Bishop of, 33.
Robert, Bill for high treason against, 580.
Emerson, Mr., 346.
Enfield Chase (the Chase), 177, 331, 393.
letters dated from, 327, 365.
England, 8, 28, 52, 64, 65, 72, 87, 95, 96, 108, 118, 131, 134, 143, 161, 169, 174, 391.
alliances with. See under France, Holland, Spain.
Archbishops of, 45.
Attorney General. See Jones, Levinge, Sawyer.
Cabinet Council, 39.
——, abolished by King, 55.

England—contd.
Chamberlain, Lord. See Arlington.
Chancellor, Lord, 55, 58. See also Finch.
Church of, 8, 17, 55, 132, 187, 341, 344, 449, 529.
——, Bishops of, 187.
——, ——, right to vote at State trials, 86, 88, 98, 99, 101, 102, 103, 104, 106, 107, 108, 110, 111, 116.
——, ——, beg leave to withdraw from State trials, 103.
——, ——, referred to as Lords Spiritual, 99, 103, 115.
——, Convocation of, 32.
——, ——, oaths for members of, 56.
——, represented on Privy Council, 55.
Church and State, 313, 460.
Counties of, Lords Lieutenants of, 48, 58, 530, 570.
——, Lords Lieutenants, Deputy, 48, 530, 570.
Justices of the Peace in. See under Peace.
Court of, 89, 136, 137, 173, 197, 204, 331, 338, 354, 386, 402, 414, 419, 437, 445, 479, 537, 547, 551, 554, 556, 557, 558, 561, 562, 563, 569, 584, 586, 602, 609, 614, 616.
Court party, 48, 87, 106, 547.
Crown of, 251, 259, 297, 304, 326, 337, 341, 374, 377, 392, 398, 409, 423, 439, 458, 530, 561, 579.
Government in, 65.
Imperial Crown of, 38, 374.
King of. See Charles, II.
——, addresses to from House of Commons. See House of Commons.
——, addresses to from House of Lords, q.v.
——, Household, officers of, 55.
King in Council, 24, 43, 44, 49, 100, 112, 123, 127, 128, 136, 152, 157, 164, 185, 215, 241, 271, 282, 302, 305, 307, 312, 398, 417, 541, 580, 592, 602, 609.
——, appeals to, 127.
Lord Justices of, 44.
Militia in. See under Militia.
Ministers of State (collectively), 92, 587.
Parliament in. See under Parliament.
Plots in, general, 516.
Political relations with France, 239, 242.
Political relations with Holland, 239, 242.
Privy Council, q.v.
Protestants in, 7, 40, 403.
Protestant Council in, 43.
Protestant Dissenters in, 8, 67, 123, 342, 497, 529, 619.
Queen Catherine, 40, 55, 70, 158, 167, 184, 213, 223, 288, 308, 332, 354, 375, 379, 501, 591.

England—contd.
——, accusations against, 95, 136, 580, 581, 582, 589, 590, 592, 602.
——, chamberlain of, 283.
——, at Euston, 220.
——, suggested divorce of. See under Charles II.
——, King concerned regarding charges against, 140, 144, 145, 158.
——, referred to in the House of Commons, 89.
——, Roman Catholic servants of, 283.
——, letter to mentioned, 479.
Rebellion, the, in, 93.
Roman Catholics in. See under Roman Catholics.
Solicitor General for, 285, 467. See also under Finch, Heneage, Jr.
trade of, 417.
Treasurer, Lord, of. See under Danby; Essex.
undertakers, 210.
Eniskeen [Inniskeen], co. Monaghan, 492.
Ennis, 613.
letter dated from, 599.
assizes at, 612.
Grand Jury of, 606.
troops for, 455.
Episcopacy, repudiated by Conventiclers, 132.
Ernly, Sir John, Chancellor of the Exchequer (England), 33, 55, 307.
Erwin, Sir Garnet, 437.
Essex:
Arthur Capel, Earl of, Commissioner of the Treasury, Privy Councillor, 14, 31, 35, 40, 42, 45, 65, 100, 103, 127, 132, 137, 142, 143, 144, 152, 166, 172, 176, 185, 187, 198, 209, 210, 220, 221, 225, 229, 236, 238, 239 262, 263, 266, 269, 270, 289, 301, 302, 303, 307, 308, 311, 312, 315, 316, 318, 319, 321, 324, 362, 388, 390, 395, 403, 409, 411, 420, 421, 429, 448, 454, 459, 474, 486, 488, 500, 506, 520, 524, 553, 562, 563, 565, 566, 581.
——, Lord Lieutenant of Hertfordshire, 566.
——, appointment as Lord Lieut. of Ireland, discussions regarding, 96, 160.
——, Cabinet Council, member of, 39, 55.
——, dismissal of, 563.
——, Commissioner of the Treasury, 14, 30, 39, 55.
——, Chief Governor or Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, 152, 289, 477, 480.
——, hostility to Ormond, 65, 66, 132, 142, 264, 274, 300, 549.
——, instability of, 253.
——, retirement from Privy Council, 270, 274.
——, retirement from Treasury, 214, 238.

Essex—contd.
——, self-denying ordinance of, 36, 37.
——, sincerity doubted, 1, 54.
——, supports Shaen's proposals, 390, 395, 403, 411, 428.
——, letters from, 140, 213.
——, ——, mentioned, 222.
——, letters to, 33, 148.
——, ——, mentioned, 222, 225, 340, 386, 474.
Estates, Bill of Confirmation of. See under Ireland.
Eton College, Fellows of, 571.
Provost of. See Alestree.
Eustace, Sir Maurice. State letter signed by, 186.
Capt. Richard, letter from, 605.
Euston, 79, 158, 167, 175, 219, 405, 409.
Queen dines at, 220.
Evangelists, Holy, 311.
Evans, Captain, a Jesuit, 307.
Evelyn :
John, 279.
——, letter from, 279.
Everard [Edmond], 595, 603.
Evers, Father [Francis], 9.
Every, John. See footnote page 11.
Exchange, the, 118, 394.
(Dublin), 551.
Exchequer, 179, 237, 266, 285.
Chancellor of. See Ernly, 307. collection of Revenue for, 441, 442.
Barons of, 487, 501.
Chief Baron. See Turner.
Court of, 487, 577.
letters dated from, 123, 155, 193, 194.
Chancellor of, ex officio Privy Councillor, 55, 58. See also under Ireland.
Excise, 112.
Additional duties on, 248.
Exclusion, Bill of. See under York, Duke of.
Exeter, Thomas Lamplugh, Bishop of, 116.
John Cecil, 15th Earl of, 618.
Eyre, Justice in, 247, 248.
Deputy Justice in, 245.
John, of Eyrecourt, 326, 327.
Eyrecourt, Co. Galway, 327.

F

Fairborne (Farebone), Sir Palmes, Lt. Governor of Tangier, 273, 347, 499, 503, 508.
——, letters from mentioned, 329, 344.
Fairfax :
Tom, 178, 199.
Thomas, letters from, 330, 551.
Falconberg—Falconbridge.
Falconbridge — Falconberg, Thos. Belasyse, 2nd Viscount, afterwards Earl, Deputy Justice in Eyre, 245, 307, 470, 474.
Falconbridge—contd.
——, representative Viscount on Privy Council, 56, 58.
Falmouth, George Fitzroy, Viscount Falmouth and Earl of Northumberland, 159.
Fathom Castle, 255.
Fanshaw, Mr., 146.
Farley, Lieutenant, 205.
Fast and Humiliation, Days of, 61, 83, 502, 505, 506, 516, 606, 615.
Faubert, Mons., Academy of, 165, 301, 317, 345, 375, 385.
Fauconberg — Falconbrige, q.v.
Fell, Rev. John, D.D., Bishop of Oxford, Dean of Christchurch, 142, 156, 160, 195, 215, 216, 217, 348, 360, 375, 418, 470, 495, 548.
——, letters from, 39, 117, 151, 173, 182, 217, 337, 338, 347, 357, 358, 379, 399, 419, 471, 522, 554.
——, letters to, 320, 413, 585.
Felton, Lady Elizabeth, daughter of the Earl of Suffolk, wife of Sir Thomas Felton, Bart., 265, 297, 314, 319, 326.
Fenwicke, John, a plotter, 121.
Ferguson, schoolmaster at Cumber, 125.
one, at Killyleagh, 125.
Fernely, Mrs., 206.
Ferrers :
Mrs., 159, 178, 331.
Robert Shirley, Baron Ferrers of Chartley, afterwards 1st Earl, 247.
Feversham :
Louis de Duras, Earl of, 35, 425, 513.
——, pension of, 425.
——, letter from, 376.
Fez, K. of, 378.
fflower. See Flower,
Ffolliott, John, letters from, 218, 601.
Fiants, 439.
Fielding, Sir Charles, 372, 604.
——, letters from mentioned, 372.
Fife, rising in, 137.
Finch .
Daniel, Privy Councillor, 56, 58, 270, 475,
——, sworn as P. C., 272.
Heneage, 1st Earl of Nottingham, Lord Chancellor of England, 68, 77, 94, 97, 108, 109, 116, 149, 249, 256, 258, 268, 270, 276, 283, 307, 317, 388, 390, 420, 428, 430, 436, 459, 470, 508, 511, 521, 524, 559, 563, 580, 582.
——, appointed Lord High Steward for Stafford's trial, 516.
——, order signed by, 278.
——, petition against Duke of York, presented by, 460.
——, precedence of, 512.
——, Stafford's trial, presided over by, 512, 514, 515, 516, 519, 524.
——, Jr., Solicitor-General for England, 301, 386, 392, 468, 602.
Sir John, English Ambassador to Turkey, 311.
William, Bill for high treason against, 580.

Fingall :
Margaret, Countess of, daughter of Donough, Earl of Clancarty and his wife Ellen, sister of Ormond, 400, 479, 494.
——, her daughter Betty, 400.
Luke Plunkett, 3rd Earl of, 479.
FitzGerald :
Informer, Franciscan friar, 299, 303, 308, 312, 315, 317, 324, 332, 336.
a priest, 100.
Mr., 326, 470.
Augustin, 594, 597. or fitzgerald, David, alias Mr. Meleady, an informer, 199, 200, 206, 212, 220, 224, 229, 233, 244, 317, 330, 340, 444, 445, 461, 462, 463, 465, 480, 489, 533, 538, 544, 546, 549, 553, 566, 571, 579, 581.
——, Bill for misdemeanour against, 580.
——, examination of, 200, 224, 318, 477, 487, 547.
Dudley, 600.
Edward. See under Villiers.
Gerald, High Sheriff of co. Limerick, 432.
——, letter to, 444.
——, Knight of Glin, 433, 444, 454, 463.
James, 594, 597.
Sir John, 463, 476, 478, 533, 544.
——, Grand Jury's Bill against, 580.
Maurice, 533, 544, 548, 558, 559, 569.
Robert, Captain and later Colonel, Privy Councillor, Ireland, 25, 35, 82, 438, 445, 470, 517, 604.
——, State letters and memos signed by, 23, 24, 29, 162, 186, 189.
Captain Thomas, warrant issued to, 236.
FitzHarding, Maurice Berkeley, 3rd Viscount FitzHardinge of Berehaven, attendance at Committee for Irish affairs, 423.
Fitz Harris [Edward], 595, 598, 599, 602, 603, 608.
——, committed to Tower, 609.
——, examination of, 603, 609.
Sir Edward, 595, 602.
Ned, 523.
Fitzpatrick, page to Ormond, 508.
Ensign, 473, 534, 540, 543.
Colonel John, 21, 22, 34, 43, 45, 53, 60, 212, 215, 226, 229, 250, 260, 384, 437, 439, 477, 480, 493.
——, conversion of, 439, 448.
——, prosecution of, 51, 54, 79, 202, 210, 212, 249.
——, letters to, 482, 585.
Mr., page to Earl of Oxford, 199.
Five Lords, 3, 10 11, 32, 36, 37, 51, 68, 69, 76, 106, 122, 207, 237, 514, 519.
trial of, 38, 57, 67, 71, 84, 86, 91, 93, 97, 98, 100, 101, 103, 105, 106, 107, 108, 110, 111, 116, 119, 458, 459, 466.
petitions of, 89.
remanded by King, 116.
Flanders, 188, 211, 213, 219, 263, 291, 325, 378.
Fleet, the, 8, 85, 86, 101.
Lord Admiral of, 55. represented on Privy Council, 55.
Fleetwood, Gustavus, 476, 483, 506.
Miles, 504, 506.
Fleming :
Margery, 251.
Patrick, a Tory, 491, 492, 498.
——, papers found on, 312, 491, 492, 493, 500.
Thomas, mariner, 444.
Wm., 451.
Flower, Col. Sir Wm., Col. of the Guards, 454, 517, 604.
——, letters and memo signed by, 24, 29.
Foley, Paul, M.P., 97.
Foord, Mr., 528.
Forbes :
Ensign, 551.
Mr., son of Lord Granard, 508.
Forests, Deputy Justice of. See Butler, Sir James.
Forester, Mr., 340.
Forrest, 167.
Forths, The, 410, 430.
Fox :
Sir Stephen, Clerk of the Green Cloth, Commissioner of the Treasury, Paymaster of the Forces, 79, 104, 111, 158, 214, 239, 279, 280, 319, 326, 387, 418, 465.
——, letters from, 41, 238.
——, letters to, 104, 243, 345.
France :
mentioned, 2, 4, 104, 130, 143, 152, 164, 184, 188, 190, 209, 210, 261, 265, 297, 343, 350, 377, 378, 443, 471, 472, 481, 513, 563, 576, 577, 584, 587, 592, 598, 606. alliance with Holland, 239, 263.
ambassador from, 119, 490, 603.
English Roman Catholics in, 576.
King of, 23, 242, 265, 325, 328, 343, 350, 471, 557.
——, page of, 577, 611.
Frazer :
Capt., 169.
Mrs., 325.
Frechevile, also Fretwell, John, Lord, 56, 228.
French :
The, 7, 8, 56, 119, 238, 242, 437, 592.
commodities destroyed, 67, 69.
commodities forbidden, 195.
invasion, 62, 69, 272, 278.
army, 143, 375.
King. See under France. language, 47.
plays, 273.
Frowd, Mr., 589.

G

Gadbury, Mr., an informer, 263.
Galway, 28, 29, 226.
letters dated from, 425, 600.
charter of, 451.
Common Council of, 451.
Corporation of, 451.
garrison in, 17, 223.
Governor of, 186.
inhabitants of:
——, Irish of, 169.
——, ——, order concerning, 186, 190.
——, petition of, 163.
Mayor of, 186, 451. See Russell, Colonel.
Mayor and Corporation of, Report to Ormond, 451.
Tholsell of, 451.
Warden of, 451. See also Vaughan.
weekly market in, 17, 27.
County, 526, 553.
Gandy, Mr., 157, 217.
Garcia, Daniel of, ship, 536.
Gardner, Henry, innkeeper at Newry, letters to, 531, 533.
Garrett. See Gerard, Lord.
Garrisons, in England, 8.
Garrisons. See Cork, Drogheda, Galway, Limerick, Waterford, Wexford, Youghal.
Garway or Garaway, William, M.P., 475, 561.
Garter, Badge and Order of the, 424.
Garven, John, a plotter, 121.
Gascoigne:
Henry, secretary to Ormond, 21, 123, 241, 274, 401, 494. 537, 552, 564.
——, letters from, 365.
——, ——, mentioned, 519, 537.
——, letters to, 22, 323, 361, 564.
Sir Thomas, 221, 275.
Gazette, The, 271, 275.
Geoghegan, alias Dalton, an informer, 504, 534, 537, 538, 539, 545, 549, 550, 555, 557, 567.
George and Garter, 387.
Gerard or Gerrard:
Charles, 1st Baron Gerard of Brandon, 32; created Earl of Macclesfield, q.v.
Sir Gilbert, 310, 311, 497, 579.
Mr., 320, 321.
Gerry, John, 451.
Gethings, Henry, burgess of Barnstaple, a pilot, 158, 159.
Gilford, Roman Catholic priest, 69.
Glamorgan:
County of, 307.
Edward, Earl of, 2nd Marquis of Worcester, 611.
Glanneragh, meeting at, 445.
Glasgow, 149.
abandoned by King's troops, 127.
Archbishop of, 126.
rebels at, 124, 182.
royal troops retire to, 122.
Glendalough, Diocese of. See Dublin and Glendalough.
Glin, Knight of. See FitzGerald, Gerald.
Gloucester, 7.
Bishop of (John Pritchard), 33.
County of, 469.
Henry, Duke of, 3rd son of Charles I., 400.
Godderd's Drops, 356.
Godfrey:
Sir Edmond Berry or Sir Edmondbury, Sir Edward, murder of, 9, 82, 95.
Sir Edward. See Sir Edmond.
Captain, 244.
Godolphin:
Sidney, Privy Councillor, 153, 270, 272. 281, 307, 386, 454, 496, 561, 563.
——, orders signed by, 278.
Goodericke, Sir Henry, 499.
Gordon:
Alexander, 125.
James, a preacher, 125.
James (at Cumber), 125.
Gore:
John, foreman Grand Jury, Clare, 594, 597, 606, 607.
Hugh, D.D., Bishop of Waterford, 295, 296, 357.
Gorges:
Robert, letters from, 441.
Coll., 332.
Gormly, an informer, 590.
Goring, Harry, 475.
Gossene [or Gazeene, John], committed to prison, 2.
Gourney, J., farmer of Revenue, Ireland, 163.
Grady, priest of Tullagh, 606.
Grafton:
Isabella Beaumont, Duchess of, 236.
Henry Fitzroy, 1st Duke of, 236.
Graham: of Clavers, [Claverhouse] John, afterwards Viscount Dundee, 126.
Sir Richard. See Grimes.
Grana, Marquis de, 465.
Granard:
Arthur Forbes, Viscount, afterwards 1st Earl of, Field Marshall, Lord Justice of Ireland, Privy Councillor (Ireland), Lieut.-Genl. of army in Ireland, 35, 206, 209, 230, 368, 380, 382, 383, 384, 388, 389, 390, 396, 398, 406, 413, 417, 422, 424, 426, 430, 431, 435, 437, 449, 469, 508, 517, 537, 540, 552, 588, 602, 614.
——, allowances to, 209. 431.
——, attendance at Committee for Irish Affairs, 422, 423, 427.
——, commands troops, 128, 138.
——, company of, 323.
——, made Lieut.-General, 424.
——, President of Court Martial, 604.
——, proposed as Deputy Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, 74.
——, servant of, 292.
——, son of, 508.
——, troopers of, 440.
——, State letters and memos signed by, 23, 24, 29, 162, 186, 189, 250.

Granard—contd.
——, letters from, 357, 386.
——, letters to, 138, 391, 600.
Grand Juries, 342, 499, 515, 518, 581, 599. See also under London, Westminster, Clare; Middlesex.
Grangebeg, 421, 460.
Grantham, 234.
Gray, Lord. See Grey.
Great Seal, 45.
Great Turk or Mogul, 471.
Green Cloth, 239.
Clerk of, 239.
classes of, 262.
officers of, 143, 255, 282.
——, Commission for Oaths of, 255.
Green(e), John, 492.
Green, [Robert], 9.
Greenings, Mr., Chief Master of Woollen Drapers, 245.
Greenwich, King at, 176.
Grey of Werke, Forde, 3rd Baron, afterwards Earl of Tankerville, 133, 137, 340, 514.
——, regiment of, 133.
Grimes, Sir Richard (or Graham), 86, 475.
Gristin, Mr., Horse of, 618.
Groninx, a Dutchman, 482.
Grove [John], 516.
Guards:
Regiment of, 174, 222, 296, 329, 574, 575, 579, 591.
——, voted illegal, 22.
Col. of. See Flower, Sir Wm.
Guernsey, Island of, garrison for, 85.
Guinea, Coast of, 423.
Gwin. See Gwyn.
Gwyn:
Eleanor, 155, 193, 194, 237, 246, 259.
Francis, M.P., Clerk of Privy Council in England, Commissioner of Revenue, Ireland, 248, 249, 276, 383, 396, 399, 486, 493, 526, 559, 569.
——, letters from, 249, 252, 255, 267, 269, 270, 271, 273, 275, 281, 284, 286, 287, 290, 291, 292, 296, 301, 306, 310, 314, 318, 322, 328, 335, 339, 342, 346, 349, 352, 374, 379, 393, 459, 460, 476, 488, 507, 516, 518, 524, 541, 555, 566, 568, 570, 579, 590, 603.
——, letter to, 259.
——, orders-in-Council signed by, 307.

H

Habeas Corpus, Act of (or Bill), 39, 74, 89, 90, 110, 112, 115, 116, 119, 122, 324, 346, 551.
Hackett:
James, alias Hara, 357.
Major, 139.
Hagan, a tory, 535.
Hagan, Torlagh P., 232.
Hague, The, 92, 246, 286.
letters dated from, 245, 273, 330.
Hale, Chief Justice, 96.
Hales:
Sir Edward (of Kent), 56, 58.
Mr. (son of the above), Privy Councillor, 56, 58.
Halifax:
George Savile, Viscount, 5, 97, 100, 108, 144, 152, 159, 240, 454, 459, 488, 490, 496, 562, 563, 564.
——, representative Viscount on Privy Council, 56, 58.
——, appointment to Irish Government, discussed, 96, 152, 160.
——, Bill against Roman Catholics introduced by, 456.
——, created earl, 157.
——, dismissal from Privy Council, 497, 499, 503, 506, 508.
Halkett (Hallkett), Major, 543.
——, letters to, 246, 247.
Halton:
Rev. Timothy, D.D., Provost Queen's College, Oxford, Vice-Chancellor of University of Oxford, 117, 152, 337.
——, letters from, 174, 347.
Ham, 384.
Hamden or Hambden [Richard], M.P., 97, 506, 516, 561, 562.
Hamett, Muly, 378.
Hamilton:
Captain, Company of, 323.
Anthony, son of Sir Geo. Hamilton of Donalong, 599, 613.
Archibald, Conventicler, 125.
Sir George, Lord Lanesborough, 552.
Sir Hans, 312, 315, 318, 440, 500, 534, 535.
——, letters from, 232, 233, 368, 530.
——, letters to, 231.
John, 125.
Lady Mary, wife of Sir George Hamilton, Bart., sister of James Butler, 1st Duke of Ormond, death of, 398, 400.
Col. Richard, 609.
Robert, 125.
Sir Robert, Secretary to Commissioners of Accounts in Ireland, 381, 472, 473, 475, 479, 484, 489, 493.
——, attendance at Committee for Irish Affairs, 422, 423, 428.
William Douglas, 2nd Duke of, 227.
Thomas, letters from, 326.
Hamper Office, 177.
Hampshire, 591.
Hampton Court: dog match at, 102.
Olympic, 75.
Privy Council meetings at, 122, 147, 152, 163, 295.
Hanlon, a Tory, 223, 257, 473, 474, 534
Hanmer, Sir John, 493.
Hara. See Hackett, James.

Harbord :
Mr., 467.
Sir Charles, 116.
Harcourt, William, a plotter, 121.
Hardwicke, 247.
Harris' News Book, 587.
Harrison, Mr., of Lisburn, 441.
Harry, butler to Lord Arran, 196.
Hartop, Sir Joseph, 49.
Harvey :
Mr., 158.
——, greyhound, match of, 75.
Hatfield (House), 234.
Havers, Mr., 450.
Havre de Grace, 366.
Hawell, Mr. [possibly Stawell], 561.
Hawkins, a farmer, 469.
Hawksworth, James, 320.
Hayden, 32.
Hayes :
Sir James, 205.
Robert, 38.
Mr., 167.
Mr., Controller of Revenue, Ireland, 185, 381, 534.
Capt., 528.
Hayles, George, wool licencee, 162.
Hayter [Thomas], Clerk of the Acts of the Navy Office, 122.
Hedge Lane, 247.
Henaghan, Tory and informer, 82, 187, 188, 560.
Henan, an informer, 314, 318, 491.
Hene or Henn :
Henry, Chief Baron of Exchequer, Ireland, 275, 286, 500, 607, 612, 613.
letters to, 599. 612.
Henrietta Fort, Tangier, 329, 334.
Henry VIII., Statute of, 589.
Henton. See Hinton.
Heralds, Papists forbidden to be, 10.
Herbert :
Sir George, 503.
Mr. William, 306, 541, 561, 589, 593.
Herring, Oliver, letters to, 254.
Hertfordshire, Lord Lieutenant of. See Essex, Bridgwater.
Hetherington or Hethringham, also Edrington, an informer, 308, 312, 315, 316, 317, 322, 352, 461, 486, 487, 491, 538, 545, 553, 556, 565, 571, 579, 580, 581, 582, 590.
Hewit, Sir George, 281.
Heydon, Sir John, Governor of Bermuda, 590.
Hickman :
Henry, 594, 597.
Sir William, 122.
Thomas, 594, 597, 607.
W., petition signed by, 594.
Hicks :
Hall, 342.
Robert, farmer and gamekeeper, 36.
Hickey, D., 500.
Hide — Hyde, q.v.
Higgin, Paul, priest and Vicar General of Killala, 491.
Higgins, Robert, 286.
Highnam, letters dated from, 371, 424.
High Steward. See Charles II., Household.
High Treason :
Grand Jury's Bills for, 580. trials for, King's option in, 589.
Hill, 241.
Hillier, Captain, 52.
Hinde, Rev. Thomas, Dean of Limerick, 320, 338, 347, 471.
Hinton [St. George], estate, etc. of, 372.
Hitchcocke, John, wool licencee, 162.
Hobson's Choice, 196.
Hocher, Imperial High Chancellor, 325.
Hodder, Captain, 139.
Hodson, Mr., Collector of Revenue, 125.
Hog, greyhound owned by Sir Ralph Dutton, 75.
Holland, 263, 265, 271, 272, 276, 289, 326, 443, 539, 570, 576.
alliance with England, 334.
alliance with France, 238, 239, 263.
Ambassador to. See Temple, Sir Wm.
arms exported from, 117, 443.
army of, 176, 184, 220.
English regiments in, 128.
States General of, 143, 164, 188, 223, 263, 330, 332.
Holles or Hollis, Denzil, 2nd Lord, 108.
——, representative Baron on Privy Council, 56, 58.
Holmes, Sir Richard, 96.
Holmes (? Holmes, Sir Robert), 562.
Holt, Sir Robert, 497.
Holyhead, 216, 298, 300, 374, 467, 489.
Holyrood House, 227.
Holywood, conventiclers in, 125.
Horse, Commissary General of, 35.
Horden, John, master of ship Unicorn, examination of, 158, 159.
Hore :
Major, 598.
Sir Scroop, 340.
Horse Guards, 329.
Hoskins, Will, 451.
Hospital. See under Ireland, army in.
Hotham, Sir John, 2nd Baronet, M.P. for Beverley, 111, 496, 561.
Hounsden. See Hunsdon.
Hovedon, 448.
Howard :
of Escrick, Lord, 506.
Edward (Ned), the poet, greyhound match of, 75.
Henry, 264.
Sir Philip, 534.
(of Norfolk), Cardinal [Philip], 33, 36.
Sir Robert, 246, 259.
——, letters to, 113.
——, letters from, 104, 123, 155, 193, 237.
——, mentioned, 193.
Thomas, 264.
Lady or Mrs., 274.
Hoyle, steward to Earl of Longford, 51.
Hubbard, Sir John, 56.
Hublan, Mr., Spanish merchant, 394.
Hublethorne, Mrs., pension of, 473.
Hughes, a Jesuit, 25.

Hull, Governor of. See Monmouth; Mulgrave.
Hull, government of, 247.
Humphrys, Humphrey, Dean, afterwards bishop, of Bangor, 359.
Hungerford:
Col., 573.
Sir Edward, 340.
Hunsdon, Robert Carey, 2nd Lord, 276. 551.
Hunt, Mr., counsel for Stafford, 518.
Hunting Tower, Lord, 86.
Huntingdon, 234.
Huntington, Theophilus Hastings, 7th Earl of, 88.
——, indictment of Duke of York by, 340.
Hutchinson, Mr., preacher, 605.
Hutcheson:
Alexander, 125.
John, 125.
Hyde:
Laurence, afterwards created Viscount [Hyde of] Kenilworth, and Earl of Rochester, Privy Councillor, 1st Commissioner of the Treasury, 239, 241, 276, 281, 295, 305, 307, 326, 332, 354, 382, 386, 389, 390, 391, 395, 396, 409, 410, 418, 429, 430, 438, 459, 470, 472, 475, 541, 561, 563, 589.
——, orders signed by, 278.
——, pension of, 120, 121.
——, supports Shaen's proposals, 395, 396, 418, 428.
——, letters from, mentioned, 393.
Mrs., 346.
Park, 247.

I

Impeachment, Articles of, 524.
Inchiquin: Dermod, 5th Baron, 43 note.
William, 2nd Earl of, Governor of Tangier, 273, 326, 329, 346, 534.
Margaret, wife of the above, dau. of Roger Boyle, 1st Earl of Orrery, letter from, 273.
See also O'Brien.
Indemnity, Act of, 599.
Independent, 575.
India, 51.
Indies, The, 502.
Ingoldsby:
George, 168.
Sir George, 144.
Sir Henry, 168, 223, 226, 229, 253, 468, 475, 476, 486, 495, 506, 507, 566, 588(?).
——, charges against Ormond, 168, 178, 192, 483, 484.
——, dismissed from Privy Council, 218, 219, 223, 226, 327, 332.
——, letters and memo signed by, 23, 24, 29.
Innish, co. Clare, 593. See also Ennis.
Intelligence, Committee of. See Privy Council.
Ireland, 1, 7, 13, 15, 16, 20, 21, 23, 30, 34, 39, 40, 49, 50, 51, 54, 62, 71, 87, 88, 91, 94, 95, 105, 106, 118, 123, 127, 128, 140, 143, 160, 163, 176, et passim.
Accounts, Commissioners of, 180, 356, 362, 391.
——, secretary of. See Hamilton, Sir Robert.
accounts relating to, 104.
Appeals, Commissioners of. See Revenue, Commissioners of. arms in, 27, 28, 63, 71, 81, 83, 113, 117, 139, 151, 443, 535. arms and ammunition, license to buy and sell, 16, 18, 20, 28, 53, 63, 81, 84, 88, 168, 596.
army in, 17, 19, 20, 28, 53, 71, 128, 129, 134, 140, 144, 196, 209, 340, 380, 381, 394, 548, 572, 597, 617.
——, condition of, 15, 63, 64, 78, 380, 435, 582.
——, courts martial, 173, 182, 604.
——, disbanding of, 610.
——, disposition of, 517.
——, drafts for Tangier. See under Tangier.
——, payment of, 121, 132, 141, 284.
——, Guards, 192.
——, Hospital, See Royal Hospital.
——, insubordination in, 146, 173.
——, Irish officers in, 104.
——, Lord Ranelagh's transactions with, 118, 119.
——, Commissaries of the Muster, 572, 617.
——, mustered, 16, 24.
——, Muster Master of, 17, 53, 605, 617. See also Yarner, Abraham.
——, ——, order to, 617.
——, northern expedition of, 42, 129, 209.
——, officers of, 1, 16, 27, 28, 62, 254, 528, 540, 560, 573, 583, 594.
——, officers of, duelling among, 139.
——, ——, M.P.'s, 540.
——, ——, memo concerning, 575.
——, ——, payment of, 104.
——, ——, queries concerning, 61.
——, ——, sale of commissions by, 552, 614.
——, ——, Scotch, 104.
——, paymaster of, 104.
——, payment of, 34, 52, 75, 121, 132, 137, 141, 146, 148, 205, 209, 609.
——, proclamations concerning, 17, 24, 27.
——, quarters for, 51, 52, 59, 61, 138.
——, Roman Catholics in, 509, 570, 571, 573, 583, 584, 587.
——, wives of soldiers, 592, 613.

Ireland—contd.
——, recruiting for, 144, 381, 559, 574, 583, 596, 614,
——, dismissal of soldiers of, 613.
——, Scotch Regiment or troops of,
66, 145, 148, 172, 173, 176, 182, 190, 191, 222, 275, 328, 336, 356, 484, 509, 520, 559, 565, 567, 573, 574, 577, 588, 598, 614.
——, ——, pay of, 145, 148.
——, tests imposed on soldiers of Army and Militia, 1, 11, 509, 572, 573, 584, 605, 617.
Array, Commissioners of, 19, 26, 27, 28, 52, 53, 78, 139, 320, 584, 596, 601, 605.
See also Blenerhassett: Brewster: Cramer. assizes in, 27, 544.
——, judge of, 186, 188, 455, 544.
Attorney-General. See Domville.
Auditor's office, 179.
coinage in, 206.
bishoprics in, union of, 446, 460.
Lord Chancellor of, appeals to, 45.
——, salary of, 381.
——, seal of office, 389, 404.
See also Boyle, Michael.
Chancellorship of, 45, 272, 280.
Chancellor of the Exchequer in, 118; and see under Meredith, Sir Charles.
Chancery, Court of, 269.
——, payments for, 510.
Chief Governor of. See Lord Lieutenant.
Chief Justices of, 45, 73, 74, 412.
Lord Chief Justice of, 14, 22, 35, 179, 199, 215, 226, 328, 412. See also Davys, Povey, Reynell.
Church of England in, 278, 242, 342, 392, 397, 447, 584, 593, 606, 617.
Church in, Bishops of, leases by, Bill for, 391, 392, 397.
——, bishops of, plurality by, 446.
——, fines for non-attendance, 562.
Civil List in, 120, 121, 381, 384, 510, 609.
Commissioners of Claims in, 81.
Common Pleas, Chief Justice of. See Booth; Keating. concordatums, paid, 394, 510.
conquest of, mentioned, 59, 64.
constables in, 236.
conventicles in, 125, 584.
coroners' inquests, 139.
corporations used to denote towns, 19, 22, 27, 29, 52, 60, 79, 163.
Council in. See Ireland, Privy C.
Council Table, 43. counties of, governors in, 64.
——, lord lieutenants of, 575.
Courts of Justice in, Judges of, 81.
——, officers of, 81.
——, Common Pleas, Chief Justice of, 35, 65. (See also Keating.)
Ireland—contd.
——, ——, Puisne Judge of, 35. (See also Reynell.)
——, King's Bench, 250. 352.
——, Judges of, 439.
——, King's Bench, Chief Justice of, 35, 249, 250, 439.
——, Presidency, 560.
Creation Money in, 381, 510.
Customs in, 384, 428.
——, collectors of, 240, 284, 286.
——, farmers of, 240.
——, ——, letter to, 240.
dangerous condition of, 1.
dean of, a. See Ardfert.
Deputy Vice-Treasurer of, 148.
Duties, Bill for Additional. See Revenue, Bills of Additional..
English in, 19, 196.
——, army of, 83, 84.
——, plantations of, in, 61
——, tenants on estates, 46.
English interests in, 44.
Establishment of 120.
Establishment, charges on, 121, 140, 381, 388, 393, 394, 422, 566, 615.
Estates, Bill of Confirmation and Settlement of, 149, 221, 222, 249, 253, 259, 260, 268, 270, 284, 287, 383, 386, 396, 416, 427, 430.
Exchequer, Chancellor of. See Meredith.
Exchequer in, Chief Baron of, 266, 269, 274, 275, 286. See also Bysse, Hene.
——, Court of, in, 266, 269, 270, 577.
——, payments for, 510.
Excise and Custom duties in, 384, 392.
fanatic preachers in, 112, 113.
fast days proclaimed in, 125.
flax and hemp, planting of, 421.
French invasion of, feared, 272, 278, 433, 437, 535, 562, 601.
French Protestants in, 21, 22.
Government in or of, 5, 6, 17, 23, 65, 196, 356, 413, 414, 458, 467, 470, 508, 511, 521, 539, 541, 542, 545, 584, 593, 600, 613. See also under Establishment.
——, by commission, 4, 30.
——, cost of, 20, 50, 121. See also under Establishment.
——, Lord Lieutenancy, 356, 368.
Great seal of, 340, 374, 404, 593, 615. incidents, payment for, 510.
Inspection, Commissioners of. See Revenue.
Irish, See Roman Catholics.
Jesuits in, 25, 207, 584.
——, proscribed and banished, 10, 24, 81.
——, superior of, 25.
King's Bench. See Ireland, Courts in.
Land Tax in, 393, 395, 403.
letters from, 15.
Letters Patent in, 425, 439, 446, 510.

Ireland—contd.
Lords Justices of, 72, 73, 74, 412, 489, 610.
See also Borlace ; Granard ; Parsons.
Chief Governor or Lord Lieutenant of, 241, 299, 377, 378, 446, 452, 453, 473, 592. See also Berkeley, Essex, Ormond, ——, deputy for, 489.
——, member of English Privy Council, 55.
——, Orders-in-Council sent from and to. See Ormond.
——, petitions to, 161, 593, 596, 597, 600, 607.
——, proclamations of. See under Lord Lieutenant and Council.
Lord Lieutenancy of, 58.
Deputy Lord Lieutenancy of, 72, 73.
Lords Lieutenants, Bill to prevent sale of offices by, 37.
——, plot against referred to, 18, 27.
Lord Lieutenant, seal of, 404.
Lord Lieutenant and Council, mentioned, 5, 15, 17, 18, 19, 20, 28, 29, 52, 60, 179, 180, 185, 287, 288, 292, 313, 340, 352, 364, 369, 377, 382, 386, 390. 395, 397, 398, 399, 404, 408, 409, 423, 433, 436, 541, 596.
——, examination before, 452, 463, 464, 465, 555.
——, letters, orders-in-Council, proclamations, etc., 15, 16, 17, 18, 23, 24–29, 186, 188, 249, 432, 437, 480, 486, 510, 517, 522, 526, 530, 531, 583, 593, 617.
——, ——, mentioned, 35, 63, 81, 137, 161, 166, 170, 202, 210, 212, 215, 272, 284, 292, 374, 438, 455, 487, 500, 578.
——, ——, printing of, 197.
——, letters to, 393.
——, memo. regarding steps taken by after discovery of Popish Plot, 24–29.
——, orders regarding wool licences mentioned, 161.
——, report of Revenue Farmers to, 162, 163.
Lord Lieutenant and Government. See Lord Lieutenant and Council.
Lord Treasurer, 23, 140.
magistrates in, 81.
mails to stopped, 295, 296, 298, 300, 308.
Master of the Rolls, 45.
Militia in, 19, 20, 26, 28, 52, 53, 64, 71, 78, 83, 135, 144, 151, 168, 582, 584, 586, 596, 597, 600, 601, 607, 616.
Military List, 120, 121, 381, 384, 510.
——, pensions of, 510.
——, training of, 144.
Non-conformists in, 189, 209.
north of, despatch of troops to, 128, 129, 209.
——, population of, 576.
——, Scotch in, 112, 196.
——, Scotch rebels in, 145.
Orders from, 15.
Ordnance, office of, officers of, 20, 28, 53, 510.
Orders to Lord Lieutenant, 15.
Ossory's memo. on state of, 15 et seq.
Papists in. See Roman Catholics in.
Parliament in, 20, 43, 49, 50, 109, 184, 185, 186, 199, 249, 287, 290, 297, 300, 301, 326, 333, 350, 351, 357, 383, 385, 386, 395, 398, 401, 409, 410, 421, 434, 437, 460.
——, Bills for, 229, 258, 294, 303, 308, 319, 321, 324, 325, 350, 351, 384, 408, 411, 414, 417, 420, 435.
——, Bills for sent to England and considered by Privy Council, 231, 336, 339, 340, 343, 348, 353, 374, 377, 380, 382, 385, 386, 389, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 402, 404, 405, 407. 411, 413, 430, 436.
——. Bills in, 65.
——, calling or meeting of, 92, 109, 148, 149, 150, 160, 209, 222, 229, 257, 286, 287, 294, 303, 313, 341, 350, 377, 380, 382, 384, 386, 388, 390. 391, 392, 396, 403, 404, 406, 407, 408, 413, 417, 420, 424, 430, 433, 435, 436, 472, 474, 550, 553, 559.
——, demands on from King, 437.
——, election of members for, 391, 392.
——, Houses of, 437.
——, members of, Catholic, 610.
——, ——, Protestant, 610.
——, House of Commons, 326, 350.
——, House of Lords, Order of, 535.
——, House of Peers, 341.
——, reasons for, 421.
——, (Strafford's), composition of 610.
——, Votes on supply. See under Revenue.
Peace, Commission of. See under Peace, Justices of.
Peace, Justices of the, in, 17. 25, 27, 28, 81, 139, 236, 341, 441, 444, 452, 471, 504, 533, 578, 583, 612.
——, wives of, 613.
pensions in, 381.
perpetuities, payment of, 510.
plots in, 244, 290, 298, 302, 315, 317, 431, 433, 439, 444, 452, 453, 461, 462, 464, 468, 470, 471, 474, 475, 476, 477, 479, 480, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 507, 517, 531, 532, 544, 547, 557, 558, 559, 562, 571, 577, 593, 604.
——, Presbyterian Scottish, in, 356, 461.
Post Office in, 324, 585, 589.
Presbyterians in, 125, 126, 207, 368, 576.
Presbyterian ministers in, 206, 368.
Primate of. See Boyle, Michael.
Primate of, titular. See Plunket, Oliver.

Ireland—contd.
Prime Serjeant, 35. See also Davys, Sir William.
Privy Council in, 4, 16, 18, 26, 34, 35, 43, 44, 81, 118, 157, 161, 162, 181, 182, 183, 188, 190, 192, 196, 216, 272, 308, 313, 342, 357, 373, 377, 399, 402, 421, 478, 482, 490, 493, 523, 534, 545, 555.
——, Board of, 17, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 52, 163, 186, 250, 527, 534, 549.
——, ——, chamber, 24, 249, 517.
——, ——, Committee of, 250.
——, ——, clerk of, 41.
——, ——, letters, orders and proclamations of. See Ireland, Lord Lieutenant of. Also Ormond.
——, Committee of, 43, 65, 109, 478, 517.
——, members present, 517.
——, ——, minute of, 517.
——, letters from. See Lord Lieutenant and Council.
——, Lords of, 278, 422, 436, 438.
——, Lords of Committee of, 370.
——, Lords of in London, 422.
——, meetings of, 369, 517.
——, members attending examination of informers, 452, 455.
——, memo regarding steps taken after discovery of Popish Plot, 24-29.
——, reductions of, 65, 71, 91, 92.
——, reform of, 169.
——, Secretary of, 161.
——, Table, 369.
Privy Councillors in, 65, 326.
——, number of, 65.
——, individuals mentioned as, 200, 424.
Protestants in, 2, 3, 16, 19, 155, 168, 177, 188, 189, 190, 421, 539, 567, 593.
——, arming and disarming of, 81, 83, 88, 100, 105, 114, 192, 516, 586, 608.
Protestant Council in, 43.
Protestant interest in, 14, 43, 44, 579, 599, 600.
Protestant religion in, 189, 210, 244, 278, 421, 430, 437, 558, 578, 584, 597, 611.
Protestant tenants. See Ireland, English in. rebellion in, 44, 525, 526.
rebellion in, proclamation of, 455.
rents, Crown, 428, 510.
——, custod, 510.
——, on decrees, 510.
——, new patent, 510.
——, payable to Treasury, 510.
——, quit, 51, 280, 401, 427, 428, 510.
Revenue in, 120, 148, 162, 183, 193' 197, 222, 313, 382, 392, 401, 410, 422, 451, 615.
——, accounts for, 179.
——, allocation of, for defences, 380, 394.
Ireland—contd.
——, Bills for, 339, 374, 384, 386, 389, 390, 391, 393, 394, 395, 396, 402, 414, 415, 416, 420, 425, 430.
——, Bills for Additional, or Bills for Additional duties, 396, 406, 409, 410, 415, 421, 426, 427, 433, 436, 438.
——, Board of, 240.
——, collection of, methods of, 441, 442.
——, ——, Acts concerning, 442.
——, collectors of, 59. 125, 441, 442.
——, commission appointing farmers of, 33.
——, Commissioners of, 33, 118, 167, 174, 179, 180, 183, 202, 205, 207, 227, 260, 363, 370, 388, 395, 396, 486, 493, 520, 566. See Davis, Sir John, Gwynn.
——, Commissioners of, salaries of, 381, 384, 484.
——, ——, farmers' accounts, 356, 362, 363, 369, 390.
——, Commissions of Inspection of. See under Revenue Commissioners of.
——, Controller of. See Hayes.
——, farm of, 339, 382, 389, 393, 396, 410, 413, 427, 428, 429, 430, 438.
——, Farmers of, 28, 33, 42, 59, 118, 121, 132, 140, 142, 162, 176, 178, 205, 214, 243, 245, 269, 295, 336, 339, 350, 352, 356, 362, 365, 369, 373, 383, 386, 389, 390, 393, 398, 399, 401, 406, 416, 414, 419, 423, 427, 429, 430, 433, 436, 438, 443, 482, 591, 609.
——, See under Gourney, Mill, Ranelagh, Ryder, Shaen, Stepney: also under Customs.
——, ——, letters to Sir James Shaen from, 436, 438.
——, Farmers' payments to Treasury 510.
——, Farmer of. Reports to Lord Lieutenant and Council, 162.
——, Inspection, Commissioners of, 388, 396, 493.
——, overplus of, 42.
——, state of, 23, 33, 41, 393, 427, 430.
——, supply by Parliament, 388, 401, 410, 414, 418, 430, 473, 554, 596, 601.
——, undertakers of, 19, 20, 183, 210 410.
Roman Catholics in, mentioned, 5, 7, 8, 14, 19 et passim.
——, acts and rules regarding, 100.
——, archbishops, bishops and clergy proscribed and banished, 16, 17, 24, 26, 27, 28, 50, 299, 562.
——, disabilities of, 16, 17, 21, 24, 25, 26, 27, 81, 248, 374, 486, 493.
——, exclusion of, from cities and towns, 99, 163, 210, 213. 216.
——, exclusion from Parliament and offices, 248.

Ireland—contd.
——, letters, orders and proclamations regarding arms possessed by Roman Catholics, 16, 25, 27, 517, 522.
——, banishment of dignitaries and clergy, 16, 24, 29.
——, ——, mentioned, 35.
——, letters and orders, etc., meetings and services forbidden, 29.
——, ——, rewards for discovery of perverts, 17.
——, ——, search for, ordered, 17, 18, 27.
——, ——, schools dissolved, 16, 24.
——, ——, towns admittance to, 60.
——, ——, towns, exclusion from specified, 17, 26, 27, 29, 46, 79.
——, ——, transport of, ordered, 16, 24.
suggested, 614
Roman Catholic interest in, 44.
Royal Hospital, Kilmainham, 42, 381.
Settlement, Act of. See under Settlement.
Sessions in, 17.
Sessions, Quarter, 27, 29.
Sheriffs, 27, 28, 442.
ships for defence of, 394, 395, 439.
Solicitor-General for. See Temple, Sir John.
State offices, payment for, 510.
Subsidy Bill, 395.
Supply, Bills of. See Revenue, Bills for.
Treasury in, 333.
undertakers in. See under Revenue.
Union of bishoprics or diocese in, 446, 447.
Vice-Treasurer, 45.
Vice-Treasurer, Deputy, 148.
War, Articles of, 173.
——, Council of, in, 521.
Irish (Roman Catholics), 168, 169, 170, 439, 445, 525, 609.
Irish Cattle Bill. See Cattle.
Irish language, 329, 334, 335, 491.
Isabella, Princess, daughter of James, Duke of York, 355, 599.
Italians, 325.
Italy, 130, 291, 532.
Ivers, Henry, petition signed by, 594.
Mr., steward to Lord Clare, daughter of, 612.
Ivy [Edward], 580.

J

Jack-an-apes Lane, 307.
Jackson, Mr., 372.
Jamaica, 353.
sale of, 38.
James I., King of England, 261, 262.
Jefferyes, Sir George, Chief Justice of Chester, Recorder of London 485, 488, 497, 498, 514.
Jeffrys, Colonel, 138.
Jenkins:
Sir Leoline (or Lionel, also Lyollin), Chief Secretary of State (succeeded Coventry, 1680), Privy Councillor, 301, 302, 307, 311, 315, 318, 333, 382, 388, 389, 390, 394, 396, 405, 418, 419, 423, 426, 438, 459, 488, 514, 519, 522, 524, 525, 555, 561, 564, 565, 566, 568, 569, 574, 577, 578, 581, 588, 608.
——, appointment of, 271, 272, 273, 276, 301.
——, office of, 566, 569.
——, orders signed by, 278.
——, receives seals of office, 311.
——, sworn as Privy Councillor, 275.
——, ——, secretary, 311.
——, letters from, 316, 317, 322, 334, 340, 348, 357, 359, 386, 415, 420, 422, 433, 436, 530, 569, 574, 579, 582, 584, 589, 591, 594, 599, 614.
——, letters from mentioned, 401, 425, 452, 449, 576, 592.
——, letters to, 316, 507.
——, mentioned, 327, 581, 592, 602.
Jennison [Thomas], an informer, 193, 512, 516.
Jephson, 18.
Jersey, Island of, garrisons for, 85.
——, Governor of, 57, 329. See also Littleton: Saunders.
Jervis, Alderman, of Dublin, 205.
Jesuits, 2.
College of, 25.
expulsion of, from Ireland. See Ireland, Jesuits in.
Johnston, Nathaniel, 357, 374, 392.
Jones:
Henry, Bishop of Meath, Privy Councillor, 178, 318, 431, 438, 467, 536, 542, 602.
——, State letters and memos signed by, 23, 24, 29, 53, 160, 186, 189, 250.
——, affidavit signed by, 492, 493.
——, letter from, 473.
——, ——, mentioned, 105, 537.
John, wool licencee, 162.
Sir Theophilus, 35, 146, 517.
——, State letters and memos signed by, 186, 189.
Sir Tho., 515.
Sir William, Attorney General for England, 57, 84, 121, 149, 155, 177, 225, 228, 454, 518, 561, 562, 563.
——, manager of Stafford's trial, 518, 519.
Justice, 511.
Coffee House, of Mr., 532.
Juan de Austria, Don, 150, 175.
Judicature, Supreme Court of, 101. See also under House of Lords.

K

Kane, Ed., 532.
Kearney, William, 444.
Keating:
John, Lord Chief Justice of Common Pleas (Ireland), Privy Councillor, 35, 36, 65, 83, 114, 182, 193, 200, 331, 478, 481, 494, 531, 581.
——, State letters and memos signed by, 162.
——, letters from, 187, 401, 425, 595, 614.
Keeling, Sir John, junior, K.C., 275.
——, senior, Lord Chief Justice of King's Bench, 275.
Keightly, Mr., letters from mentioned, 456.
Kelly, Terence, 533.
Kennah, 324.
Kennedy:
Lt. Col., 508, 521, 537(?).
Sir Richard, 286.
Thomas, 125.
——, Mr., 540, 543.
Kerry:
William Fitzmaurice, 20th Lord of, 320.
Commissioners of Array for, 320.
county, 78, 185, 188.
Kirkdonald, conventiclers in, 125.
Kilbrew, letter dated from, 441.
Kildare, county, Commission of Peace in, 445.
——, See of, See Sall.
Kilfenny, co. Limerick, letter dated from, 320.
Kilkenny, 15, 29, 109, 134, 170, 172, 178, 182, 199, 201, 205, 207, 214, 219, 242, 345, 352, 353, 356, 357, 360, 365, 373, 378, 398, 400, 401, 445, 447, 453, 455, 458, 463, 464, 568.
or Kilkenny Castle, letters dated from, 128, 129, 182, 188, 190, 208, 210, 212, 214, 215, 292, 391, 392, 404, 405, 407, 413, 415, 416, 421, 433, 434, 438, 443, 454, 460.
——, State letters and orders dated from, 186, 188, 189.
letters dated from, mentioned, 202, 212, 425, 470.
Alderman of, 491.
Diocese of, 219.
Mayor and Corporation of, 491.
letter to Mayor and citizens, 314.
Privy Council at, 181, 186, 188, 190.
Recorder of. See Reeves, Richard; Turner, Arthur.
Castle, Court of, 292.
and Ossory, united diocese of, 446.
Killala:
Diocese of, 491.
Bishop of, 262, 263.
Killaloe, Bishop of. See Roan.
——, Roman Catholic. See Molony.
Killinchy, Conventiclers in, 125.
Killingworth — Kenilworth, created 1st Viscount, 239. See under Hyde.
Kilmainham, Dublin, 241.
Killmeaginie, Conventiclers at, 125.
Killyleagh, Conventiclers in, 125.
Kilrush, battle of, alluded to, 611.
Kilsheelan Gate. See Clonmel.
—— Street. See Clonmel.
Kilulta, 605.
Kilworge, letter dated from, 81.
King:
Jack, 601.
Martin, 451.
Sir William, Governor of Limerick, 144, 230.
——, letters from, 323, 613.
King and Council. See England.
Kingdom, Mr., Paymaster of the Army, 76.
King's Bench, Court of, 324, 339, 439, 566, 579, 589, 590.
—— Council—Privy Council, q.v.
—— Counsel, 22, 319, 342, 374, 408, 580, 587, 589, 592.
—— Declarations, 66, 67.
—— County, 575.
—— Evil, 371.
—— Hospital or Bluecoat School, Dublin, 395.
Kingston, Robert King, 2nd Baron, 223. brother of. See King, Jack.
Kingsale or Kinsale:
Almericus Courcy, 23rd Baron of, 47, 142, 471, 522, 554.
——, guardianship of, 250, 251, 585.
——, letter from, 548.
Mary, Baroness of, wife of Patrick Courcy, 19th Baron of, daughter of John Fitz Gerald of Dromore, 250, 251.
Patrick Courcy, 22nd Baron of, 251, 337.
King's Head Inn, 564.
Kingsweston, letter dated from, 548.
Kinsale, Barons of. See Kingsale.
Kinsale, 15, 29, 51, 52, 128, 137, 139, 153, 173, 272, 285, 295, 298, 303, 309, 339, 345, 356.
collector of, 61. See also Upton.
fort of, 214, 261, 380.
Governor of, See Armorer, Sir Nicholas, sovereign of, 51, 52, 444.
surprise of, 118, 120.
Kirke:
Col. Peircy, 150, 342, 499.
Knights Marshals, 256.
Knock, Conventiclers in, 125, 126.
Knockbridge, 255.
Knowsley, 120, 319, 357, 466, 528, 557.
letters dated from, 343, 367, 567.
Knox, John, Master of Guild of Merchants (Dublin), letter from, 387.
Kyately [? Keightly], Lady Francis, 388.
Kyrle, Sir Richard, 82.

L

Lacy, Col. Pierce, 318, 476, 478, 533, 544.
Lady Day, 275.
Ladyman, Rev. Samuel, vicar of Clonmel, 295.
——, letter to Ormond on improvements in Clonmel, 203.
Lamar, Philip, an informer, 297, 324, 340.
Lamleigh or Lamplew, Dr., J.P. for Oxford, 514, 519.
Lancashire, 502.
——, Clerk of the Peace of, 283.
Land's End, 336.
Lane, Mr., 68, 161, 173, 174.
Lane, Sir George, 516, 523, 534, 539.
Lanesborough, George Lane, 1st viscount, 132, 163, 351, 352, 365.
——, state documents signed by, 23, 24, 29, 53, 162, 186, 189, 250.
——, state letter to, 53.
——, letters from, 267, 460, 552.
——, letters to, 441, 456.
Langford, Mrs., 274.
Langhorne, Richard, senior, a plotter, 121, 132, 516.
Laniere, Sir John, 329.
La Terre, Mons., dealer in arms, 114.
Lauder, Sir John. See Saunders.
Lauderdale, John Maitland, Duke of, 105, 114, 119, 133, 134, 136, 137, 152, 209, 211, 290, 307, 374, 378.
——, Lord Commissioner in Scotland. Address from House of Commons concerning, 90.
——, Address from Scotch Lords concerning, 133, 135, 165.
——, disgrace of, 84, 86, 97.
——, correspondence with Ormond, 209.
——, despatches sent to, 357.
Laugh, Lady Anna, probably Ranelagh, q.v.
Laughlin, Red., 532.
Lauze, Mr., Gentleman of the Horse, to Ossory, 367, 375.
Lavallin ; also Levallin ; also Lavallyan, Captain Patrick, 201, 208, 224, 349, 523, 527, 539.
——, warrant for arrest, 236.
Lawndy, Edward, wool licencee, 162.
Lawrence, Thomas, wool licencee, 162.
League, offensive and defensive, 239.
Ledcot, secretary to Lord Castlemaine, 514.
Lee, Henry, petition signed by, 594.
Lee or Lea, Sir Thomas, Commissioner of the Admiralty, Privy Councillor, 98.
——, appointment to Privy Council, 56, 58.
——, resignation of, 275.
Leeward Islands, 336.
Legge, Captain, troop of, 228.
Legge, Col. George, afterwards Baron Dartmouth, Governor of Portsmouth, Lieutenant of the Ordnance, 9, 57, 66, 96, 99, 296, 335, 481, 582, 591.
Leicestershire, elections for, 49.
——, knights of 49, 50.
Leighton, Sir Ellis, 414.
Leinster, 532.
——, ports of, 284, 286.
——, rents payable from, 510. See also under Ireland.
——, troops in, 517.
Leith, 272, 275.
Lenthall, William, Speaker of Long Parliament, 618.
Lessae, Mons., 265.
Leslie, Sir James, 616.
Letter from Person of Honour, 611.
Letter to a Person of Honour, 329.
Letters Patent. See Ireland.
Levallin. See Lavallin.
Leveson-Gower (Luson Gore), Mr., 89.
Levett, William, D.D. head or principal of Magdalen Hall, Oxford, 337.
Levinz, Sir Cresswell (Levinge), Attorney-General (1679-1681) serjeant-at-law, 284, 288, 295, 297, 342, 346, 353, 386, 395, 476, 501, 502, 505, 524, 575.
——, appointment as Judge in Common Pleas, 575, 579.
——, writ as serjeant, 580.
Lewis, an informer, 488, 501.
Lewis, Mr., dealer in arms, 83.
Leyne, Donough. See Lyne.
Lieutenants. See England, counties of.
Limerick, 29, 61, 187, 206, 212, 220, 278, 443, 444, 445, 464, 480.
——, letters dated from, 323, 606, 612, 613.
——, arms landed in, 443.
——, assizes, 340.
——, bishop of. See Digby, Simon.
——, bishop of, Roman Catholic, 323, 349.
——, Castle, 207.
——, circuit, judges on, 224.
——, dean of. See Hinde, Thomas.
——, fairs, 17, 27.
——, garrison in, 17, 323.
——, Governor of. See Blessington. See also King, Orrery.
——, Governor of, 61, 230.
——, letters to, 443.
——, Castle of, 230, 443.
——, garrison of, list of soldiers with Roman Catholic wives, 613.
——, Mayor of, 61, 342.
——, plot in, 206, 207.
——, river of, 443, 578.
——, Roman Catholics in, 61.
——, troops in, 144, 168, 323.
——, weekly market in, 143.
County of, 78, 533, 553, 613.
——, Commission of Peace in, 207.
——, gentry of, 432.

Limerick—contd.
——, governor of, 230.
——, sheriff of, 452, 453, 455, 463. See Fitz Gerald, Gerald.
Lincoln College, Oxford. See Oxford Colleges.
Lincoln's Inn, letter dated from, 468.
Lincolnshire, 234.
——, Lord Lieutenant of, 234.
Lindsey, Robert Bertie, 2nd earl of, Lord Lieutenant of Lincolnshire, 221, 234.
Lindsay House, 240.
Linlithgow, George Livingstone, 3rd earl of, 132.
Lisburn, 441.
——, letter dated from, 605.
Lismore, 353.
——, letter dated from, 381.
Littleton :
Sir Charles, Governor of Jersey, 329.
Sir Thomas, M.P., Commissioner of the Admiralty, 98, 122, 270, 275, 559.
Liverpool, 309, 325.
——, ferry, 462.
Lixnaw, letters dated from, 320.
Lizard the, 309.
Lloyd, Sir Philip, 193, 567.
——, letters from, 129, 402.
Dr., Rector of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, Bishop of St. Asaph, 343, 355, 360, 387, 388.
Lockhart, Captain Julius, servant of, 173.
——, letters from, 240.
Lodge, the, 331.
Loftus, Mr., 205.
Loling, 535.
London :
mentioned, 7, 41, 63, 69, 70 and passim.
letters dated from, 1, 2, 3, 6, 22, 29, 34, 36, 39, 40, 45, 48, 50, 55, 66, 70, 71, 74, 83, 85, 88, 91, 93, 97, 99, 109, 115, 117, 119, 132, 134, 137, 140, 152, 159, 163, 165, 167, 176, 187, 192, 196, 213, 221, 224, 225, 226, 228, 229, 230, 232, 236, 237, 238, 242, 244, 246, 247, 249, 252, 253, 255, 260, 262, 263, 265, 267, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 275, 276, 281, 284, 286, 287, 289, 290, 291, 292, 296, 301, 306, 310, 314, 318, 322, 328, 330, 335, 339, 342, 345, 346, 349, 352, 357, 374, 379, 381, 386, 388, 393, 394, 399, 403, 409, 418, 422, 423, 426, 427, 438, 439, 443, 445, 454, 456, 457, 459, 460, 461, 467, 469, 472, 474, 475, 476, 477, 479, 483, 485, 487, 488, 489, 490, 494, 497, 500, 501, 507, 508, 511, 516, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 524, 525, 526, 528, 531, 533, 537, 541, 544, 547, 549, 550, 551, 553, 554, 555, 559, 563, 565, 566, 568, 569, 570, 572, 573, 580, 581, 586, 588, 590, 595, 598, 602, 609.
Alderman of, 252, 349, 469.
——, court of, 349.
London—contd.
Apprentice boys of, 293, 295, 296.
Bishop of. See Campbell, Henry.
——, Ex-officio Privy Councillor, 55, 58.
City of, 67, 227, 228, 238, 293, 339, 343.
Common Council of City of, 263, 487.
Common Hall of City of, 339, 349.
Companies, Guilds and Liveries in, 343, 349.
Grand Jury in, 275, 297, 342.
Incendiarism in, 69, 91, 93, 487.
Jury, 592.
Justice of the Peace for, 252.
Lord Mayor of, 213, 227, 228, 241, 252, 263, 288, 293, 306, 307, 349, 487, 547, 580. See also Edwards.
——, orders seizure of Narratives and Reasons, 119.
——, and Council of, Address to King from, 487, 563.
Members of Parliament for, 219.
Old Bayly, Session House, 121, 157, 469.
Privy Council meetings in, 185.
Recorders of. See Jeffreys, Treby.
Roman Catholics excluded from. Vide R.C.'s in England.
Roman Catholics in, 282.
Sheriffs of, 228, 314, 339, 349, 352, 603, 609. See Bethel, Cornish, Raymond.
Tower of, 8, 10, 11, 28, 37, 90, 112, 176, 263, 458.
——, Constable of, 112.
——, Deputy Governor of, 112.
——, Governor of, 112.
——, Lieutenant of, 112. See also Checkes, Robinson.
——, Prisoners in, 346. 532.
——, Everard, 595.
——, Fitz Harris, 609.
——, Peyton, Sir Robert, 263, 566.
——, Powis, Earl of, 236.
——, Roman Catholic, 8.
——, Strafford, Earl of, 324, 529.
——, Warders of, 185.
Londonderry, County of, 368.
Diocese of, 219.
Troops in, 323.
Long, Capt. Oliver, 604, 605.
Long, Mr., 445.
Longford : 160.
letters dated from, 614.
Meeting of Tories at, 440, 441.
Anne, Countess of, daughter of 1st Earl of Donegall, 249, 498, 523.
——, jointure of, 51.
——, Letters from, 373.
Francis Aungier, Earl of, Governor of Carrickfergus, Privy Councillor (Ireland), 34, 45, 83, 92, 94, 120, 193, 196, 202, 210, 212, 241, 249, 257, 285, 291, 295, 365, 366, 374, 378, 383, 386, 393, 397, 403, 404, 405, 406, 422, 439, 469, 483, 489, 501, 508, 521, 523, 524.

Longford, Earl of,—contd.
528, 534, 538, 540, 544, 559, 582, 591, 598, 608, 614, 617.
Attendance at Committee for Irish affairs, 422, 423.
Cypher, use of, by, 454, 553.
Ranelagh's debts to, 441.
Letters from, 3, 50, 132, 159, 165, 167, 192, 196, 225, 226, 228, 373, 381, 388, 394, 403, 409, 418, 422, 423, 427, 438, 439, 443, 454, 456, 461, 467, 474, 479, 485, 487, 490, 497, 498, 520, 525, 528, 613.
Letters from mentioned, 178, 207, 210, 216, 401, 404, 434, 455, 494, 523, 524, 572.
Letters to, 80, 350, 351, 398, 405, 416, 425, 432, 434.
Lorche, Mons. de, General of the Horse to Thomas, Earl of Ossory, 473.
Lord Chamberlain. See England.
Lord Chancellor. See under England; and Ireland.
Confirms election of Speaker of House of Commons, 459.
Lord High Steward. See under Charles II. Household.
Lord Lieutenant. See under Ireland.
Lords, i.e. members of House of, 276.
Lords, Five. See under Five.
——, House of. See under Parliament in England: also Ireland.
——, Spiritual. See England, Church of, Bishops.
Lord Treasurer. See under England. See also Danby.
Loughlin, a Tory, 440.
Lough Street. See Clonmel.
Lovelace, John, 3rd Baron Lovelace, 36, 38, 449, 470, 475, 478, 514.
Lovell, Mr., 126.
Low Countries, 175.
Lowe, Robert, 541.
Lower, Richard, Dr., reports signed by 355, 362.
Lowther, Sir John, 426.
——, tenants of, 422.
Ludlow Court, 511.
Lumley, Richard, 2nd Viscount, afterwards 1st Earl of Scarborough, 235, 331.
Luxemburgh, Mons. de, 265.
Lym, 445.
Lyndon, Capt., Company of, 254.
Lyne, Donnogh, informer, 444, 452, 455, 482, 533.
——, letter from, 463.

M

McBryd, John, 125.
McCarthy, Justin, 3rd son of 1st Earl of Clancarty by his wife Ellen, sister of Ormond, 400.
McDaniell, James, 594.
McDonald, 324.
McDonnell, Thos., 532.
McGennis, 531.
McGinnis, John, 232.
McNamara or Macnamara [John], an informer, 299, 306, 431, 432, 433 477, 478, 481, 485, 488, 537, 546, 580 (?)
Macartney, George, Belfast merchant, 28.
Macarty, 357.
Macarty, Col. Justin, 54.
Regiment of, 104.
Macclesfield, Charles Gerrard, created earl of, 1679, 157, 502.
Dismissal from Bedchamber, 566.
Macrom. See Macroom.
Macroom, troops at, 173, 600.
Mademoiselle. See Orleans, Marie Louise of.
Madison [Christopher], appears before House of Lords, 2.
Madrid, 166, 499.
Magin, Father Ronan, 477, 481.
Magna Charta, 101, 397.
Maisson, 338.
Malaga, 499.
Man, Isle of, 462.
Manchester, Robert Montagu, 3rd Earl of, 48, 488.
dismissal from Bedchamber, 566.
Mandeville, brother of, 552.
Manning, 594.
Manor Courts, 204.
Mansel, informer, employed by Earl of Shaftesbury, 29, 94.
Mansell, Col. Roderick, 311, 354.
Mansfield, John, Esq., 463.
Mar, Philip le or la. See Lamar.
March, Armiger, 251.
Margate, 218.
Marquesses, represented on Privy Council, 55.
Marshall, Rev. Thomas, D.D., rector of Lincoln's College, Oxford, 152.
William, a plotter, 121.
Martial, Epigrammes de, 156.
Mary, Princess Royal of England, wife of William II. of Orange, mother of William III., 400. daughter of Jas., Duke of York, wife of Wm., Prince of Orange, at the Hague, 273, 274.
——, accession of, possible, 496.
Massereene, Sir John Skeffington, 2nd Viscount, Capt. of Lough Neagh Privy Councillor (Ire), 57, 61, 117, 222, 586, 592.
letters from, 50, 99, 570.
——, mentioned, 573, 586.
letters to, 64, 571, 583.
Massie or Massy, John, an informer, 444, 445, 452, 463, 464, 465.
Massy, 292.
Mathew, Captain George, letters to, 30, 50, 225, 361, 387, 599.
Maurice, Prince of Nassau, 263.
Maxwell, David, 131, 206, 208.

Maxwell—contd.
letters from, 124, 126.
——, mentioned, 205.
May Day, 74, 75, 321.
Maynard, William Lord, 225, 230.
Sir John, Serjeant-at-law, opens charge at Stafford's trial, 512, 516, 518, 580.
Mayo, Co., 526.
Mead, Sir John, Attorney in Ireland for Duke of York, 228.
Meara, Dr., 152.
Meath, Bishop of. See Jones, Henry.
County, 163, 498.
——, Revenue from, 441, 442, 443.
William Brabazon, 3rd Earl of, 83, 105, 211, 520.
——, State letters addressed to, 53.
Meckenez — Mequiney, Mulai Ismail, Emperor of Morocco, at, 616.
Meirs, Pat, 451.
Meleady, Mr., 234. See Fitz Gerald, David.
Melhuish, John, wool licencee, 162.
Melish, Mr., 155.
Melvin, Captain, company of, 173.
Mendaz, Ferd. Dr., physician to the Queen, reports signed by, 355, 362.
Merchants, Guild of (Dublin) Master of. See Knox, John.
Meredith, Sir Charles, Chancellor of the Exchequer, Ireland, 118, 123, 127, 176, 180, 181, 183, 186, 191, 205, 453, 486, 493, 571.
State letters and memo. signed by, 23, 24, 29, 53.
Meres, Sir Thomas, Chairman of Com. of Elections, 9.
Privy Councillor, 56, 58, 98.
Merrick, John, wool licencee, 162.
Middlesex, 602.
Grand Jury for, 339, 340, 579.
County of, Justices of Peace for, 255, 282, 307, 568, 590, 591.
Sessions for, 591.
Middleton, Mark, J.P., 232.
Midensis—Meath, Bishop of. See Jones, Henry.
Militia 48, 49, 50, 52, 53, 100, 110. See also Ireland, Mill, Stanhope, Farmer of Revenue, Ireland, 163.
Minors, religious education of, 40, 190.
Mint, the, master of. See Slingsby.
Mitchell, John, steward to Duke of Albemarle, 576.
Modarine's, Duchess of, 488 [possibly Mazarine's].
Modena, Duchess of, 292, 293.
Mogul, Great, 471.
Mohun, Charles, 4th Lord, bill to pay debts of, 56.
Molony, Dr., Roman Catholic Bishop of Killaloe, 323, 606, 611.
Molyneux, Caryll, 3rd Viscount, 549.
Monaghan, Co., 492.
Money bills, 90, 385, 393. See also under House of Commons, Monk, General George, 575, 576.
Monmouth :
County of, Justice of the Peace for, 307. See Arnold.
James, Duke of, Governor of Hull ; Justice in Eyre ; Lord Lieutenant of East Riding of Yorks. ; Lord Lieutenant of Staffordshire : Master of the Horse, 8, 48, 56, 72, 102, 136, 144, 211, 246, 248, 291, 314, 329, 445, 454, 458, 465, 513, 561, 562.
——, adversary of Lauderdale, 136.
——, at Bansted, 102.
——, attainder, bill of, against, 454.
——, banishment of, 218.
——, as Lord Commissioner, 135.
——, compliments at Oxford, 449.
——, departure from England of, 211, 213.
——, dependents of (Monmouthians) 561.
——, deprived of his offices, 247, 248.
——, as General, 1, 127, 143, 149.
——, grant, 88.
——, mother of. See Walter.
——, at Oxford, 449.
——, pension of, 247.
——, as Plenipotentiary, 135.
——, patents granted by, 88.
——, proceeding to Scotland, 133, 135, 137.
——, regiment of, 104.
——, "Protestant Duke James," 245.
——, return to England, 243, 244, 245.
——, in Scotland, return from, 143, 151, 153, 204.
——, in Scotland, successes in, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149.
——, succession to the Crown, of 95.
Monmouth Fort, Tangier, 499.
Monro, Lt.-Col. Alexander, 51, 52, 62, 145, 509, 606.
Montague, Ralph, 457, 541, 561, 562.
Montecuculi, Count, Governor of Raab, 325.
Moor Park, 15.
Moore, Major, 164.
——, Col. Garret, 549.
——, Roger, 174, 180, 202, 205.
——, Stephen, 541.
Moors, The. See under Tangier.
Mordaunt, Charles, 2nd Viscount, afterwards 3rd Earl of Peterborough, 281, 331.
marriage of, 325.
Moreton, Mr., 337.
Morgan, Major Giles, Governor of Jersey, 57.
Morley, 534, 537.
——, Captain, company of, 223.
Morphy—Murphy q.v.
Morton, Sir John, 501.
Morton or Moreton, Rev. William, afterwards successively Bishop of Kildare and Meath, D.D., 156, 182.
Mossom, Robert, D.D., Bishop of Derry 214.

Mostin, Sir Roger, 508.
Mostyn, or Mostin, 520.
letters dated from, 508.
Mountgarret, Edward Butler, 4th Viscount, 15, 25, 26, 163.
eldest son of. See Butler, Richard.
Mountrath, Charles Coote, 2nd Earl, 216.
Moyer, John, a friar, informer, 312, 314, 318, 321, 328, 491, 500, 537, 547, 590.
Mulgrave, John Sheffield, 3rd Lord, Governor of Hull, Governor of Tangier, Lord Lieutenant East Riding, Yorks, 48, 242, 247, 331, 354, 356.
Mullan, 531.
Mulys, Richard, secretary to Thomas, Earl of Ossory, 46, 71, 226, 236, 308, 327, 335, 355, 360, 361, 416, 451, 467, 474, 481, 485, 491, 499, 521, 523, 528, 557, 559.
——, letters from 355, 361, 367, 372, 378, 387.
Muncrieth, Captain, 139.
Munster, Province of, 15, 299, 303, 308, 324, 520, 523, 532, 533, 535, 560, 567, 572, 574, 582, 586, 594, 595, 608, 609.
Governor of. See Orrery.
Government of, 235, 241.
Ports in, 284, 286.
Rents payable from, 510. See also under Ireland, Rents.
, troops in, 517.
Murdock, Ebenezer, wool licencee, 162.
Murphy, Edmond, priest, 542.
Owen, an informer, 295, 302, 314, 318, 321, 328, 352, 461, 477, 478, 480, 481, 487, 530, 531, 534, 535, 537, 540, 545, 549, 559, 573.
Murray, Capt. Charles, 573, 586, 604.
Sir James, 598.
Murrogh, Mr., 598.
Muschamp, Denny, 226, 327, 389, 401, 403, 404.
——, letter from, 353.
——, ——, mentioned, 401, 406.
Ensign, 551.
Musgrave, Sir Christopher, Commissioner of the Ordnance, 122, 335.
Philip, Lord, regiment of, 329.
Muster, Commissioners of. See Ireland, army in.
Master. See army.
Mylius, Mr., 193, 237.

N

N., 178, 193, 295.
Naas, 150.
Nantwich, 462.
Napper, John, letter from, 240.
Nash :
Mr., 396, 422, 425, 432, 434, 444, 533.
——, letters from mentioned, 434, 443.
Nash—contd.
David, an informer, 445, 452, 464, 465, 482, 484.
——, examination of, 452, 453, 455, 463.
John, an informer, 444, 445, 464.
Nassau, Prince Maurice of. See under Maurice.
Naul, 234.
Navy :
The, 530.
Board, 177, 352.
Office, Acts of, 122.
Clerk of. See Hayter.
Treasurer of, 243.
Naylan, fflann, 455.
Neagh, Lough, 100, 227, 255.
Admiral or Admiralty of, 285.
Captain of. See Massereene.
Needham, 2.
Walter, Dr., reports signed by, 355, 362.
Needwood, 503.
Forest, 591.
Nelly, Mrs., See Gwyn, Eleanor.
Nenagh, 599.
Netterville, Mr., 192, 356.
letters from, 350.
letters from mentioned, 351.
Newark, 234.
Newcastle, 320.
Henry Cavendish, 2nd Duke, Lord Lieutenant of Nottinghamshire, representative Duke on Privy Council, 55, 58, 234.
——, daughters of, 554, 555.
——, family of, 475.
——, house of, 234.
Newcomen, Sir Thomas, Privy Councillor, Ireland, 299, 300, 303, 395, 401, 604. letters signed by, 23, 24.
Newdegate, Rawley, 594, 597.
Newgate, London, 237, 306, 532, 539, 545, 603.
Newmarket, 177, 202, 204, 209, 211, 213, 219, 223, 273, 286, 287, 288, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 296, 303, 310, 312, 396, 400, 409, 420, 436, 449, 475, 618.
Mayor of, 291.
letters dated from, 218, 219, 220, 290, 313.
Newport :
Francis, Viscount, afterwards 1st Earl of Bradford, 488.
House, 372.
Newry, 533.
troops at, 232.
Newterfield, a Jesuit, 41.
Newtown, Conventiclers in, 125.
rebels at, 126.
Nicholas, Sir John, 276.
orders signed by, 278.
Nicholls, Captain, J.P., 470, 478, 576(?)
Nicholson, Mr., proposed Sheriff of London, 349, 350, 356.
Nonconformists : or Protestant Dissenters, 56, 342.
oaths to be taken by, 55.

Norfolk, see also Elections, 304.
Norreys, James Bertie, Baron Norreys of Rycote, after 1st Earl of Abingdon, Lord Lieutenant of Oxfordshire, 449, 495, 496, 512, 618.
North :
Sir Francis, Lord Chief Justice of Common Pleas (England), Privy Councillor, afterwards Lord Guilford, 55, 96, 307, 459, 505.
orders signed by, 278.
Northampton, 30, 529.
Northamptonshire, 292.
North Gate. See Clonmel.
Nottingham, Heneage Finch, 1st Earl of (1681), Lord Chancellor of England. See under Finch, Heneage. attends Privy Council, 307.
Nottinghamshire, Lord Lieutenant of. See Newcastle.
Notts, Mr., stationer, 373.
Nugent, 549.

O

O'Brien :
Dermod, 5th Baron Inchiquin, 43.
Mr. Donough, of Dogh, 556, 558.
——, letter from, 612.
O'Brien, Lord, 116.
Mary, married Primate Boyle, 43.
Lady Sophia, daughter of 1st Duke of Leeds, wife of 7th Baron, 116. See also Inchiquin.
O'Bryen :
Donogh, Minister's Proctor, 612.
Donough, 612.
——, Petition signed by, 594, 597.
O'Conlan, Marcus, 584.
O'Hagan :
Cormack, 583.
Neill, 536.
O'Hanlon, Redmond, the Irish Scanderbeg, 254, 440, 531, 535, 536. And see under Hanlon.
——, Mrs. Katherine, letters to, 535, 536.
——, Redmond, mother-in-law of, 531, 535.
O'Kearney, Denis, a plotter, warrant for arrest of, 236.
O'Quin, Mr. Manus, letter addressed to, 492.
O'Sullivan, Captain, 453.
Bere, 544.
——, his eldest son, 535.
More, 535, 544.
Oates :
Titus, 9, 15, 31, 55, 68, 193, 431, 437, 459, 512, 515, 516, 519, 543, 546, 547, 578.
——, depositions and examinations of, 543, 544, 550.
——, evidence at Stafford trial, 513.
——, plots to kill, 461, 462.
Oaths :
sworn on Holy Evangelists, 311.
and Tests, 50, 75, 76.
Oaths—contd.
——, Commissions for administering, 256. of Members of Parliament. See Parliament. of Supremacy and Allegiance, 17, 127, 132, 255, 256, 276, 282, 283, 285, 302.
of Supremacy and Obedience. See also Ireland, Army in, Tests imposed on.
Odell, John, 463, 464, 465, 533.
letters from, 444.
Ogle :
Henry Cavendish, Lord, son of Duke of Newcastle, death of, 473, 475.
Lady, Elizabeth, widow of Lord Ogle, 495, 555.
Oglethorp, Mr., 551.
Olands, the two, 576,
Old Baily or Bayley. See London.
Oran, 346.
Orange, William, Prince of, 95, 164, 176, 191, 209, 249, 264, 271, 294, 577.
——, letter from, 330.
——, letter from mentioned, 268, 385
——, letter to, 266.
Ordnance :
Commissioners of, 176, 335, 583, 615.
Lieutenant of, 66, 335. See also Ley : Walters,
Master or Mastership of, 55, 58, 335. See Chicheley.
Office of, 20, 122.
Orleans, Marie Louise of, married Charles II., King of Spain, 150.
Ormond :
Elizabeth, Duchess of, 129, 130, 141, 202, 217, 235, 275, 328, 344, 345, 350, 360, 366, 369, 371, 373, 376, 400, 424, 462, 509, 565.
——, letters to, 53, 265, 271, 275, 292, 338, 347, 358, 366, 367.
——, ——, mentioned, 585.
Ormond, James Butler, 1st Duke of, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, etc. (Titles, 161), mentioned, 46, 47, 141, 154, 155, 240, 275, 279, 280, 331, 348, 350, 359, 366, 367, 498, 507, 551, 600, 602, 551.
——, in warrants, 236.
mentioned as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, 15, 16, 18, 19, 20, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 55, 61, 64, 113, 124, 126, 160, 169, 188, 205, 206, 219, 220, 225, 236, 241, 242, 257, 266, 275, 290, 299, 312, 345, 351, 357, 380, 422, 441, 444, 446, 447, 452, 453, 454, 471, 474, 481, 498, 535, 600, 605, 608, 612.
accounts of Government expenses, 65.
accusations and charges against, 3, 4, 5, 6, 14, 30, 36, 66, 70, 80, 83, 84, 168, 170, 177, 184, 188, 192, 196, 197, 202, 208, 210, 226, 297, 298, 431, 435, 439, 471, 472, 477, 483, 484, 487, 491, 508, 520, 524, 527, 537, 542, 547, 562, 582, 591, 599, 602.

Ormond—contd.
——, rebutted by, 73, 188, 189, 308, 435, 483, 507, 516, 523, 534, 540, 543, 544, 592, addresses and petitions to, 163, 203, 473, 550, 593, 596. advises Ossory re trip to Spain, 154. allowance paid to, 381.
Bailiff of Westminster, appointment of, by, 457, 508.
Chancellor of Oxford University, 151, 160. choice of Bishops left to, 219.
comments on State affairs in England, 114.
——, on cost of Establishment, 121.
——, on Conventiclers, 135.
——, on Fanatics, 168.
——, on Fanatic Scotch preachers, 112, 114.
——, on Revenue, 41, 120, 148.
Commission for War of, (1646–1648), 611. correspondence with Lauderdale, 209.
cypher used by and to, 365, 454, 469, 478, 494, 498.
defamed by Lady Ranelagh, 96.
debts of, 265, 297, 314, 319, 521, 523.
desires Ossory to remain at Court, 325.
directions for leases of Lord Kingsale's Lands, 251.
duelling, instructions regarding, from, 139.
enemies of, 80, 197, 274, 422, 439, 458, 466, 467, 487, 508, 520.
English residence for, 95, 279, 280, 289, 315, 328, 366, 443. favours calling of Irish Parliament, 92, 109, 222, 294.
godson of, 198.
guardian of Lord Kingsale, 251, 252, 522.
impeachment of, 212, 489, 550.
indictment of, 581, 589, 590.
informers' examination before, 452, 453.
influence and patronage desired, 66, 117, 118, 120, 137, 150, 154, 160, 176, 180, 181, 187, 193, 198, 199, 201, 207, 213, 221, 225, 227, 232, 239, 257, 261, 271, 279, 296, 314, 333, 367, 503, 522. interest in hawks, hounds and horses, 6, 343, 405, 422.
interest in Needwood, 503.
King's appreciation and commendation of, 175, 177, 189.
laws and ordinances for war published by, 617.
letters patent issued by, 425, 439.
list of Irish Privy Councillors furnished by, 65, 108.
lodgings in Windsor Castle, 120. nomination of Vice-Chancellor of Oxford, by, 151. oath regarding Act of Succession, 109.
Oaths, Commission for taking, appointed by, 574.

Ormond—contd.
Orders in Council from, 215, 398.
Orders from, 138.
Orders-in-Council to, 112, 113, 117, 118, 120, 127, 134, 137, 143, 212, 215, 248, 249, 258, 278, 281, 454.
Orrery's pension dispensed by, 235, 236.
enquires as to pay due to officers, 104.
persons recommended by, 284, 285, 286, 314, 320, 326, 327, 457, 548, 581, 588, 589.
persons recommended to, 287, 288, 314, 437, 475, 598.
petitions to. See addresses to.
petitions to, relative to wool licences, 161.
——, referred to farmers of revenue, 162.
proclamations sent to, 252.
proofs of charges against Ranelagh asked from, 119.
queries regarding revenue addressed to, 394, 395.
quit rents of, 401.
relations toward Protestants in Ireland, 168, 210.
——, with Ranelagh, 226.
——, with Roman Catholics, 80, 81, 99, 168, 313, 486.
removal from Irish Government discussed, 4, 30, 96, 114, 175, 223, 266, 374, 404, 412, 422, 439, 486, 520, 562.
report of grant to Lord Mayor of London, 213, 227, 228. report on state of Ireland ordered, 198.
reports to, from Mayor and Corporation of Galway, 451.
Revenue, accounts of, reported to, 179, 180.
Ranelagh's account with, 362.
Revenue, Ranelagh's accounts of, reported to, 205, 207, 221.
——, settled with, 198.
salary, proposed reduction, 381, 405.
sale of post as Steward, 79, 94, 105, 113, 147, 193, 528.
Shaftesbury, Earl of, enmity against, 22, 29, 34, 73, 94.
State letters, memos and orders signed by, 29, 53, 162, 186, 189, 250.
stratagem to discredit, 313.
steps by, for security of Protestants 2, 3, 4. steps to deal with insurrections, 128, 129.
titles of, 161.
troops to be sent to north of Ireland by, 127.
troops to be dispatched to Scotland by, 127, 128, 131, 133, 134, 137, 140, 143, 144.
troops to be despatched to Tangier by, 275.
at Tullogh, 164.

Ormond—contd.
warned to guard north of Ireland, 128, 143.
warned against Ranelagh, 167.
warrants issued by. See Letters, Patent by.
letters from, 11, 13, 30, 33, 34, 40, 59, 60, 64, 66, 71, 72, 73, 78, 79, 80, 83, 86, 88, 92, 94, 104, 106, 108, 109, 113, 114, 118, 120, 128, 129, 134, 142, 147, 148, 154, 155, 160, 173, 178, 181, 182, 190, 199, 200, 208, 210, 212, 214, 215, 219, 221, 223, 229, 231, 242, 243, 246, 252, 253, 259, 276, 285, 289, 293, 294, 298, 299, 302, 303, 304, 308, 309, 310, 312, 314, 316, 319, 320, 325, 326, 327, 328, 332, 333, 336, 338, 345, 351, 353, 356, 366, 391, 392, 398, 404, 405, 407, 408, 413, 415, 416, 421, 425, 432, 433, 434, 438, 443, 454, 460, 470, 471, 478, 481, 482, 483, 489, 493, 500, 504, 507, 509, 517, 521, 523, 533, 534, 538, 540, 543, 544, 545, 548, 553, 557, 558, 559, 564, 567, 571, 573, 576, 579, 581, 583, 585, 586, 587, 592, 599, 608, 609, 611. letter from on behalf of Sir John Davys, 507.
letters to, 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 21, 22, 29, 30, 33, 34, 35, 36, 39, 40, 41, 45, 48, 50, 51, 54, 55, 57, 58, 61, 65, 66, 70, 71, 73, 74, 77, 79, 82, 83, 85, 87, 88, 91, 93, 94, 95, 97, 99, 100, 104, 105, 106, 109, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 120, 123, 124, 127, 129, 131, 132, 137, 138, 140, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 155, 156, 157, 158, 160, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 169, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 181, 183, 184, 185, 187, 191, 192, 193, 196, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 204, 205, 207, 208, 210, 211, 212, 213, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 223, 224, 226, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 252, 253, 255, 257, 258, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 278, 279, 280, 281, 284, 286, 287, 288, 290, 291, 292, 295, 296, 297, 298, 300, 301, 303, 305, 306, 308, 310, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 320, 321, 322, 324, 325, 327, 328, 330, 332, 333, 334, 335, 337, 338, 339, 340, 342, 343, 344, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 352, 353, 357, 359, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 373, 374, 375, 376, 379, 381, 385, 386, 388, 391, 393, 394, 397, 399, 400, 402, 403, 406, 409, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 432, 433, 436, 437, 438, 439, 443, 445, 447, 449, 450, 455, 456, 459, 460, 461, 462, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 471, 472, 474, 475, 476, 477, 479, 483, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 494, 497, 498, 500, 501, 505, 507, 508, 510, 511, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 524, 525, 526, 528, 530, 533, 537, 541, 542, 543, 544, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 553, 554, 555, 556, 559, 560, 563, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 572, 573, 574, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 584, 586, 588, 589, 590, 591, 594, 595, 597, 598, 599, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 609, 613, 614, 616, 618.
letters addressed to, as Lord Lieutenant, mentioned, 386.
letter addressed to Watts sent to, 120.

Orrery :
Margaret, Countess of, 391.
——, letter from mentioned, 391.
Roger Boyle, 1st Earl of. Major-General, 74. 159, 168, 171, 220, 222, 224, 268, 303, 445, 464, 560, 601.
——, death of, 224, 225, 229, 230, 231, 523.
——, Governor of Limerick, 61.
——, President of Munster, 235.
——, illness of, 216, 218, 224.
——, loyalty to Ormond, 62–3, 77-8.
——, pension of, 235, 236, 241, 244.
——, letters from, 18, 51, 77, 138, 143, 145, 149, 171, 172, 174, 206.
——, ——, mentioned, 170, 187, 188, 208, 210, 212.
——, letters to, 59, 71, 81, 92, 147, 182.

Osbaston, 473.

Osborne :
John, Serjeant-at-Law, 295, 492, 493, 500, 595.
——, letters from, 498.
Master Salter, 350.
Mr., 151.
Lady Sophia, married to Baron Inchiquin, q.v. 116.

Ossory :
Bishop of. See Otway.
Diocese of. See Kilkenny and Ossory.
Emilia, de Beverwert, Countess of, wife of Thomas, Earl of, 213, 273, 325, 328, 333, 334, 338, 344, 345, 350, 360, 366, 371, 373, 385, 387, 388, 460, 462, 466, 525, 528, 538, 550, 555.
——, jointure of, 360.
James Butler, Earl of, See under Lord James Butler.
Thomas, Earl of, son of James Butler 1st Duke of Ormond, mentioned, 12, 13, 22, 23, 39, 44, 46, 47, 48, 50, 100, 105, 118, 165, 191, 209, 219, 226, 258, 267, 273, 277, 284, 296, 298, 307, 315, 322, 328, 331, 337, 345, 366, 385, 402, 451, 509.
——, burial of, 360, 361, 367, 385, 400, 493.

Ossory, Earl of—contd.
——, Chamberlain to Queen of England, 283.
——, command in Holland, 265.
——, chaplain of, 219.
——, defence of Ormond's Government, mentioned, 3, 5, 22, 30, 33, 35, 54, 100.
——, Gentleman of the Horse to, 367, 493.
——, Governorship of Tangier, 339, 342, 346.
——, holds himself to join Ormond, 87, 127.
——, illness and death of, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 365, 366, 367, 369, 370, 375, 376, 379, 381, 385, 387, 399, 407, 419.
——, jealousy of, 1, 150.
——, journey to Brussels, 190.
——, journey to Spain, 150, 154, 166, 175, 176, 181, 184, 190, 191, 198, 204, 212, 218, 236.
——, made Privy Councillor (England), 305, 306.
——, General of the Horse to, 473.
——, memo on the state of Ireland, 15, 21.
——, memo presented to House of Lords, 21.
——, Orders, insignia of, 387.
——, proposed as deputy in absence of Lord Lieutenant, 72, 73.
——, reports of physcians attending, 354, 361.
——, secretary of. See Mulys.
——, letters from, 5, 21, 29, 34, 40, 45, 53, 54, 61, 70, 79, 87, 94, 104, 113, 116, 120, 127, 137, 140, 144, 147, 150, 152, 153, 158, 160, 165, 166, 175, 181, 183, 191, 198, 204, 211, 212, 218, 219, 220, 223, 224, 229, 230, 232, 236, 243, 246, 248, 253, 260, 262, 263, 265, 266, 271, 272, 274, 279, 280, 286, 290, 297, 300, 305, 308, 309, 314, 315, 316, 321, 324, 325, 330, 332, 335, 344, 350.
——, ——, mentioned, 293, 344.
——, letters to, 1, 11, 13, 34, 40, 60, 66, 73, 78, 79, 83, 86, 92, 94, 106, 109, 134, 154, 181, 190, 221, 223, 229, 252, 253, 259, 268, 273, 276, 277, 279, 289, 293, 294, 298, 302, 303, 308, 312, 319, 325, 326, 327, 328, 330, 332, 333, 336, 338, 345, 356.
——, ——, mentioned, 197.
Ostend, port of, 423.
Ottrington, Mr., 186.
Otway, Thomas, Bishop of Ossory, letter from, 491.
Our Lady's Foot, print of, 492.
Oxford, 153, 165, 167, 176, 182, 183, 190, 301, 317, 320, 375, 385, 387, 416, 449, 483, 560, 579, 586, 591, 599, 602, 603, 604, 608, 609, 618, 619.
Oxford—contd.
letters dated from, 10, 46, 129, 141, 156, 194, 201, 216, 217, 261, 277, 417, 522, 614, 616, 618.
——, mentioned, 118.
Bishop of. See Fell.
Colleges, Brasenose, Statutes of, 338.
——, Christ Church, 12, 46, 117, 137, 217.
——, ——, Canon of. See Spencer.
——, ——, Dean of, 11.
——, ——, letters dated from, 11, 46.
——, Lincoln, Rector of, 152. See Marshall.
——, Magdalen Hall, 337.
——, ——, Principal of. See Levet Dr.
——, New College, Warden of, 151.
——, Queen's, letters dated from, 174, 347.
——, ——, Provost of, 117, 152.
——, ——, ——, letters from, 174.
Corporation of, 449, 618.
Earl of, Aubrey de Vere, 20th Earl of, Privy Councillor, 199, 343, 353.
——, appointment to Privy Council, 566.
——, porter to, 240.
——, regiment of, 329.
J.P. for, 519.
King at. See Charles II.
Parliament at, 554, 555, 566, 570, 573, 586, 611, 616.
Recorder of. See Crooke.
University of, 160, 263, 320, 416, 449, 548, 585, 618.
——, Acts of, 347.
——, Burgesses of, 154.
——, Commencements, 320.
——, Degrees of, 338.
——, Players at, 320.
——, refuge for Kings, 585.
——, Parliaments at, 585.
——, terms, Michaelmas, 40, 117.
——, Vice-Chancellor of, 40, 117, 151, 173, 320, 337, 338, 347.
——, ——, See Halton.
Oxfordshire, Lord Lieutenant of. See Norreys.
Oyer and Terminer, Commission of, 33, 136, 350, 589.

P

Pacification, Act of, 135, 136.
Palatine, County. See Tipperary.
— Court, 597.
Palatinate, Court of the, 597.
Pall Mall or Pell Mell, 373.
— London, letter dated from, 99.
Palsgrave Head Tavern, 32.
Papists:
See Roman Catholics; also Ireland.
Term applied to members of Church of England, 8.

Parham, Lord Willoughby of, Francis, 42.
Paris, 188, 233, 267, 273, 289.
Parke, Quartermaster Thomas, 492.
Parker, John, State Documents signed by, 24, 29, 53, 162, 186, 189.
Parliament:
the Long, 529, 564, 610.
——, Speaker of. See Lenthall.
in England, mentioned, 2, 3, 6, 10, 11, 14, 21, 22, 23, 39, 46, 56 57, 60, 64, 72, 74, 91, 96, 99, 100, 103, 112, 135, 164, 165, 168, 185, 193, 197, 221, 222, 238, 260, 290, 347, 377, 421, 439, 447, 450, 474, 479, 561, 572, 579, 587, 593, 603, 608, 610, 613, 614.
——, Acts of, 49, 60, 67, 96, 109, 124, 287. See also Ireland Revenue.
——, calling or meeting of, 122, 131, 134, 136, 145, 153, 172, 175, 176, 212, 215, 224, 238, 239, 242, 248, 252, 257, 259, 263, 266, 270, 271, 273, 303, 311, 324, 335, 337, 339, 342, 378, 386, 390, 391, 396, 404, 413, 420, 432, 446, 448, 454, 456, 459, 472, 474, 485, 487, 489, 554, 555, 559, 560, 563, 564, 567, 579, 587, 592, 599, 608, 619.
——, ——, Bill for frequent, 530.
——, ——, objectors to, 485, 498.
——, ——, petitions for, 273, 498, 593.
——, ——, Proclamation for, 391, 555.
——, changes in constitution regarding, 96.
Clerk of, 469.
dissolution of, 152, 153, 154, 155, 159, 549, 550, 553, 555, 559, 560, 563.
elections to. See Elections.
Irish affairs in, 232.
journals of, 489.
King's Speech opening, 459, 619.
meeting places of. See Oxford, Westminster.
Members of, 445.
——, oaths of, 215, 456, 460, 574.
——, ——, commission for, 215. See also House of Commons.
money voted by, 332.
petition to, against conjunction of Bishoprics, 446, 460.
proceedings in, 87, 459, 460, 476. prorogation of, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 215, 222, 225, 226, 252, 267, 302, 349, 524, 549, 550, 553, 560, 563.
Protestant, 43.
relations between King and, 194.
Session of, 164, 219, 449, 556, 557, 602. voting in, 112.
House of Commons, mentioned, 4, 23, 33, 36, 37, 39, 48, 50, 71, 81, 96, 105, 109, 161, 221, 283, 408, 413, 445, 456, 473, 484, 485, 488, 509, 511, 520, 530, 550, 551, 553, 560, 562, 609, 617.
Parliament, House of Commons—contd.
——, (place), 513.
——, Acts and monuments of, 502.
——, addresses to His Majesty by, 33, 49, 69, 70, 84, 107, 114, 488, 497, 499, 506, 507, 511, 514, 530, 534, 541, 543.
——, bar of, 525.
——, better attendance of members, Bill for, 85.
——, Bills against Popery, 110.
——, Black Rod, 2, 46, 90, 116, 490.
——, Clerk of, 256, 283, 516.
——, Committee of, 9, 37, 48, 56, 90, 91, 96, 97, 487, 497, 511, 541, 542, 543.
——, Committee of Elections, Chairman of. See Treby; Meres.
——, Committee of Examinations, 121, 487, 537.
——, Grand Committee of, 49.
——, Committee of Secrecy, 5, 10, 11, 32, 49, 97, 98, 119.
——, ——, chairman of, see Treby.
——, ——, reports of, 97.
——, Select Committee of, 89.
——, Committee of the Whole House 93, 477, 511, 512.
——, contention with Lords regarding Bishops at State trials, 98, 101, 102, 103, 106, 108, 111, 115.
——, contention with Lords regarding State trials, 90, 97, 98, 102, 111.
——, displeasure of, 468.
——, dissolution of, remonstrance against, 96.
——, Five Lords, charge against, 38.
——, ——, proposals to Lords regarding trial of, 98.
——, impeachment by, 9, 518, 522, 524, 542, 544, 546, 553.
——, mace of, 496, 512.
——, members of, gifts to, 542.
——, ——, oaths of, 225, 456, 459, 619.
——, ——, oaths of, Commission for taking, 230, 231, 567.
——, ——, summoned to House of Lords, 456.
——, messages from King to, 514, 530.
——, Money Bills in, 70, 71, 77, 85, 90. See also Army, disbanding of.
——, narrative and reasons concerning Danby's trial, 119.
——, petitions to, 537, 591.
——, Privy Councillors in, 69.
——, proceedings and votes in, 5, 8, 9 10, 31, 32, 33, 37, 38, 48, 49, 51, 56, 65, 66, 67, 69, 70, 71, 74, 75, 76, 77, 84, 86, 89, 91, 93, 94, 97, 99, 101, 102, 103, 107, 108, 110, 111, 112, 116, 461, 462, 474, 476, 477, 481, 484, 487, 488, 490, 497, 499, 503, 505, 506, 507, 511, 522, 524, 530, 541, 546, 548, 549, 563.

Parliament—House of Commons—contd.
——, represented on Privy Council, 56.
——, Serjeant-at-Arms, 108.
——, Speaker of, 10, 11, 31, 84, 85, 90, 253, 460, 488, 490, 512, 617, 619.
——, ——, committal to Tower proposed, 90.
——, ——, transgresses precedent, 90. See also Seymour; Williams.
——, Speaker's Chair, 90, 97.
——, Speaker's Chamber, 31.
——, Stafford's trial, attended by, 512.
——, ——, members as managers of, 516, 518, 522.
——, ——, records for, furnished by, 513.
——, summoned to House of Lords, 56, 116, 456.
——, summoned by King to attend in House of Lords, 74.
——, vote to proceed to House of Lords, 84, 85.
——, Sunday sitting of, 89, 93, 94.
House of Lords, 5, 6, 15, 18, 21, 22, 23, 30, 34, 35, 36, 46, 64, 71, 81, 88, 98, 105, 114, 163, 170, 309, 469, 475, 480, 487, 499, 506, 511, 529, 577, 587, 592, 611.
——, (place), 514, 519, 529, 549.
——, addresses from, 43, 49, 51, 163, 169, 170, 176, 184, 198, 244, 476, 505.
——, adjournment of, 537.
——, bar of, 56, 68, 74, 76, 84, 85, 90, 116, 495, 507.
——, Commission for Oaths of, 215.
——, ——, Prorogation of Parliament, 226.
——, Commissions to Lord High Steward altered by, 99, 512.
——, Commission of Lord High Steward read in, 138, 512.
——, Committee of, 2, 3, 32, 33, 45, 48, 69, 97, 346, 497.
——, Committee of Examination, 56, 68, 110, 112, 468, 470, 476, 477, 481, 541, 544. 546.
——, Committee of, Grand, 10, 107.
——, Committee of Law, 84.
——, Committee of Privileges, 36, 38, 67, 103, 107, 109, 505.
——, Committee of, Select, 89.
——, Committee of whole House, 108.
——, contention with House of Commons, q.v.
——, informers in, 461.
——, journal of, 29, 48, 226.
——, King attends in State, 56.
——, members of, sworn in, 456.
——, memoranda presented to, 15.
——, mentioned as House of Peers, 50, 88.
——, oaths administered by, 276.
——, order from, 531, 535, 545.
——, proceedings and votes in, 1, 2, 3, 8, 10, 21, 23, 30, 31, 32, 38, 39, 45, 48, 49, 51, 56, 60, 66, 68, 69, 71, 74, 76, 77, 81, 84, 86, 90, 97, 98, 99, 101, 102, 103, 107, 108, 110, 111, 112, 116, 462, 469, 476, 477, 479, 488, 491, 494, 497, 505, 506, 522, 524, 528, 544, 619.
——, procedure at Stafford's trial, 512.
——, House of Commons request prolongation of sitting of, 85, 115.
——, Speaker of pro tem, 38, 512.
——, summoned to assemble in state, 74. 116,
——, Stafford, trial of by, requested by Commons, 488.
——, Sunday sittings of, 91, 93.
——, Supreme Court of Judicature, 90, 97, 101, 102.
Houses of, mentioned, 21, 22, 38, 210, 226, 232, 437, 508, 543.
——, address to King from, 81, 110, 112, 163, 190, 502, 503, 506.
——, Committees of both, 90, 97, 98, 99, 100. 101, 102, 103, 106, 107, 108, 111, 115, 499, 501, 511.
——, Committees of both, conference between, 499, 508.
——, conference between, 32, 38, 39, 49, 67, 77, 89, 90, 91, 97, 98, 101, 107, 110, 115, 477, 480, 484, 485.
——, matters pending between, 113, ——, proceedings in both, 8, 87. 111, 486, 489, 596, 607.
——, Sunday sitting of, 97.
Parma, Prince of, 423.
Parsons:
Sir William, Lord Justice of Ireland, 610.
Lady, wife of Sir Richard Parsons, afterwards Baron Oxmantown and 1st Viscount Rosse, 203.
Patents. See Monmouth.
Patrick, Father, 609, 614.
Peace:
Commission of, 283, 297, 301.
Justices of the, 16, 25, 27, 58, 96, 255, 256, 267, 269, 270, 276, 283, 297, 302, 306, 307, 342, 346, 501, 530, 571, 572, 574. See also under Ireland.
Peacock, Patrick, a conventicler, 125.
Peers:
House of. See House of Lords.
Bill for trial of, 93, 99, 100.
Pells, Clerk of the, 509. See Alexander.
Pemberton, Sir Francis, Justice of King's Bench, 84, 273, 275.
Pembroke, Earl of, sister of. See under Poulett.
Peppard, Colonel John, 25, 26.
Pepys, Samuel, Secretary to the Admiralty, Treasurer of Tangier, 96, 108, 119, 122, 129.
Percival:
Mr., 46, 142.
Sir John, 522.
Sir Philip, interment of, 432.

Perte, Madame de la, 265.
Peterborough, Henry Mordaunt, 2nd Earl of, accusations against, 237, 461, 466, 490, 497.
Petre, William, 4th Lord, 3, 31, 68.
Petty, Sir William, 298, 332, 336.
letters from, 385.
Peyton:
Sir John, 604.
Sir Robert, Bart., M.P. for Middlesex, 111, 237, 238, 461, 566.
——, accusations against, 461, 462, 524.
——, committed to Tower, 263, 566.
——, expulsion from House of Commons, 525.
Piccadilly, letters dated from, 528.
Pichenson, Dr., 194.
Pickering, 514, 515, 516, 519.
Pickering, Roman Catholic priest, 9, 70, 86.
Pierson, Col., regiment of, 575.
Prince Philip of Savoy, 488, 489.
Philpot, Mr., 171, 172.
Phœnix Park, Dublin, 241, 258, 374.
Piggot, Parson, rector of Rochdale, 343.
Pilkinton, 179.
Pillau, Port of, 422.
Player, Sir Thomas, house of, 571.
Plenipotentiary. See Monmouth.
Plot:
Col. Blood's, 81, 244.
Irish. See Ireland, Plots in.
Popish, 2, 3, 5, 9, 11, 15, 20, 21, 23, 25, 30, 31, 33, 38, 48, 49, 85, 94, 95, 98, 110, 112, 120, 121, 157, 168, 178, 188, 192, 206, 221, 223, 233, 272, 295, 349, 437, 459, 470, 482, 510, 512, 513, 518, 521, 529, 602, 610, 613.
——, plotters concerned in, condemnation of, 136.
——, ——, trial of, 121, 131.
——, proceedings of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and Council after discovery of, 24, 29.
Presbyterian or Sham, 356, 458, 461, 462, 467.
The Sham — Presbyterian, qv..
Plots, Popish, 44, 236, 290, 295, 403, 421, 470, 604.
proclamations concerning, 241.
Plummer, Ri., 451.
Plunkett:
Sir Nicholas, 261, 264.
Oliver, Roman Catholic Metropolitan and Primate of Ireland, 231, 254, 258, 299, 318, 319, 321, 454, 456, 460, 461, 468, 476, 477, 480, 481, 492, 500, 532, 534, 540, 541, 573.
——, alias Cox, Thomas, 492, 493.
——, examination of, 477, 586.
——, Bill against ignored by Grand Jury, 580, 586.
——, servant of, 324, 325.
——, trial of, 352, 443, 483, 580.
Sir Walter, 253,261.
Plymouth, 423, 499.
Charles Fitz Charles, 1st Earl of, 129, 281, 331, 342, 500, 503.
——, death of, 508.
Poictiers, 25.
Pomfret, 234.
Pope:
The, mentioned, 2, 16, 24, 238, 296, 513, 539.
——, supposed relations with Duke of York, 95, 98, 102.
——, Bulls of, 580.
Roger, 102.
Popham, Colonel, daughter of, wife of Lord Poulett, 371, 372.
Popish Bill, 31.
Porce, Capt., 508.
Portaferry, Conventiclers in, 125.
Porter, Mr. Poyntz, of Warwickshire, 469.
Portpatrick, 126.
Portsmouth, 8, 99, 329.
Governor of, 9, 99, 481, 562. See also Legge, Col. George.
King at, 176.
Parliamentary candidates for, 591.
Louise de Kerouaille, Duchess of, 75, 242, 288, 445, 454, 458, 496, 511, 561, 562, 563.
Portugal:
Ambassador of, secretary to, 461, 462.
letter, 305, 312, 500.
Portuguese, 334.
Poulett:
Fra., 371.
Lady Catherine, eldest daughter of John, 3rd Baron, 371, 372, 424. 449.
Wives of 3rd Baron—
1st, Enex, daughter of Col. Popham, 371.
2nd, Susan, daughter of Earl of Pembroke. 371.
John 3rd Lord, 371, 425, 507, 521.
——, estate of, 371.
Poulle, 549, 550.
Povey, Sir John, Lord Chief Justice of Ireland, 22, 35, 199, 215, 226, 439.
Power:
Laurence, 448, 449.
——, letter from, 440.
Robert, R.C. Deacon of Waterford 541.
Ensign, 616.
Powis:
Elizabeth Somerset, Countess, 237, 275. 462.
William Herbert, 1st Earl afterwards Marquis of, 3, 31, 98, 236, 237, 486.
——, trial of, 68.
Powle, or Powell, Rt. Hon. Henry, M.P., for Cirencester, 97, 177, 457.
representative of Commons on Privy Council, 56, 58.
withdrawal of, from Privy Council, 270, 271, 274.
manager at Stafford's trial, 518.
Poynings' Act, 395.

Poyntz:
Lady, 577.
Sir John, 456, 564.
——, death of, 468.
Sir Toby, 254, 532.
Poyntz-Pass, 255.
Præmunire, Statute of, 590.
Prague, 321.
Prance [Miles], an informer, witness at Stafford's trial, 512, 516.
Pratt, Mr., J.P. for co. Meath, 441.
Prechvile, Lord. See Frechevile.
Presbyterians, 296, 353. See also under Ireland.
Preston, Mrs., letters to mentioned, 475.
Price:
Mrs., 138.
Thomas, D.D., Archbishop of Cashel, formerly Bishop of Kildare, Fellow Trinity College, Dublin, 295.
——, letters from, 117, 334.
Privy Council: or Great Council or King's Council, see also England, King in Council, 4, 14, 15, 33, 43, 57, 67, 81, 91, 92, 104, 105, 109, 118, 119, 120, 123, 135, 140, 144, 147, 149, 151, 153, 190, 193, 202, 212, 218, 225, 226, 233, 236, 237, 244, 249, 252, 256, 257, 260, 270, 271, 272, 273, 275, 290, 291, 292, 295, 296, 298, 301, 305, 306, 307, 308, 311, 313, 316, 322, 325, 327, 328, 332, 334, 338, 347, 406, 422, 436, 438, 500, 538, 539, 540, 551, 554, 561, 563, 570, 577, 579, 580, 590, 602, 614, 616.
Board of, 15, 20, 27, 159, 166, 243, 255, 256, 257, 272, 278, 282, 283, 287, 288, 290, 293, 297, 298, 306, 315, 318, 329, 332, 335, 339, 349, 352, 353, 379, 382, 459, 477, 485, 494, 541, 554, 555, 566, 571, 580, 581, 582, 590, 591, 595, 603, 609.
——, letters from, 256, 393.
Books, or Records of, 223, 226, 311, 312, 329, 394, 421, 555.
Chamber, 380, 459, 476.
——, letters dated from, 402.
Clerks of, 260, 296, 315, 329, 415, 459, 476, 477, 482, 543, 567, 594, 603, 604, 608, 609. See also under Gwyn, Mr. Francis; Southwell, Sir Robert; Thynne, Henry.
Committee of, 9, 92, 150, 244, 252, 253, 255, 272, 285, 321, 322, 468, 474.
Committee of Examinations, 318, 476, 480, 485, 501, 555, 556. See also House of Lords.
Committee of Intelligence, 310, 379.
——, report of, 380.
Committee for Irish Affairs, 123, 231, 242, 243, 244, 249, 259, 260, 267, 269, 271, 275, 276, 278, 281, 301, 339, 357, 374, 377, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 388, 389, 393, 395, 399, 400, 402, 403, 406, 409, 413, 417, 420, 423, 425, 434, 436, 474, 481, 581, 582, 583.
Privy Council—contd.
Committee for Irish Affairs or Bills, minutes of, 393, 394, 397.
Committee for Irish affairs (1641), 611.
Commission or Committee for Regulating Justices of the Peace, 267, 269, 270, 276, 306.
Committee for Suppressing Popery, 255, 267, 269, 270, 281, 282, 284, 302, 306.
——, proceedings of, 282.
Committee of Tangier, 284, 285, 346.
Composition of, 55, 58.
dissolution of, 55, 56, 58.
Council books of, 223, 226.
King's declarations regarding, 66, 67.
letters and Orders-in-Council of, 24 104, 106, 112, 113, 117, 118, 121, 122, 127, 128, 131, 132, 134, 137, 143, 152, 164, 197, 248, 249, 258, 281, 284, 297, 303, 307, 317, 480, 504, 566, 571, 572, 584.
Lord President of. See Shaftesbury, also Radnor.
Lords of, 26, 27, 67, 100, 128, 144, 221, 282, 283, 310, 311, 335, 397, 417, 426, 460, 500, 504, 583, 587.
Lords of, chosen by King, 55, 58.
meetings or meeting days of, mentioned, proceedings in, 122, 163, 178, 216, 238, 239, 258, 269, 272, 273, 275, 276, 284, 286, 287, 290, 295, 301, 310, 318, 323, 324, 329, 330, 332, 335, 339, 340, 342, 346, 349, 352, 379, 389, 395, 403, 418, 434, 436, 438, 454, 460, 476, 484, 526, 538, 541, 543, 590. meetings of, extraordinary, 122, 293, 310, 314, 315, 555, 602. members present on specified occasions, 307. minutes of, see under Books or Records of.
number of members, 55, 58, 65.
petition to, 118, 290, 422.
President of, letters to, 432.
Scotch affairs considered by, 123, 136.
secretary of, 327, 477, 603.
visits to prisoners in Tower sanctioned by, 122.
in Ireland, q.v.
Privy Councillors, 55, 58, 109, 185, 271, 351, 562.
Privy Seal, 282.
Lord, see under Anglesey, Earl of.
Proclamations, 5.
——. See also under Parliament,
——, in Ireland, see Ireland.
Progers, Henry, 598.
Protestant Church, 341.
Protestant Duke James, see Monmouth, Duke of.
Protestants:
See under England, Protestants in; Ireland, Protestants in.

Protestants—contd.
Dissenters, Bill of Exemption for, 497.
French, 21.
Religion, 439, 449, 459, 475, 487, 530, 604, 607.
——, establishment and maintenance of, 70, 89, 94, 98, 189, 282, 341, 421, 490.
——, extirpation of, 95.
——, minors to be educated in, 190, 198, 278.
soldiers, 80.
Pudsey, Sir George, 618.
Purcell:
Capt. James, 104.
Toby, 543, 552, 560.
Purdon, Sir Nicholas, chaplain of, 171.
Purging, Act of. See under Corporations.
Pursuivant, a, 312.
Putney, 75.
Putt, Sir Thomas, 371.
Pytt, J., letter from, 320.

Q

Quakers, 67, 75.
Quarter Sessions, 342.
Queen's Arms, Pell Mell, 373.
Queen's College, Oxford. See Oxford Colleges.
Queen's County, 250, 575. assizes for, 250.
sheriff of, 437, 448.
Quin, 500.

R

Raab, in Hungary, Governor of. See Montecuculi, Count; Baden, Prince of.
Radcliffe, Thomas, State letters and memos. signed by, 189.
Radnor, John Roberts, created Earl of Radnor (1679), 4, 51, 100, 107, 108, 157, 239, 454, 563.
mentioned as Lord President of Privy Council, 275.
Appointed Lord President of Privy Council, 231.
——, to Irish Government, 96.
——, Representative Baron, 56, 58.
Orders signed by, 278.
Rainsford, Sir Richard, Chief Justice, 96.
Raman, Mr., Serjeant-at-law, 84.
Ranelagh, Viscountess.
Catherine, widow of Arthur, 2nd Viscount, 80, 96, 202
Elizabeth, Viscountess and afterwards Countess of, wife of Richard, 3rd Viscount and 1st Earl of 234.
——, letters to, 42, 45.
Ranelagh, Richard Jones, 3rd Viscount and later 1st Earl of, Farmer of Irish Revenue, 35, 42, 70, 123, 157, 175, 178, 192, 193, 197, 211, 214, 216, 220, 223, 232, 243, 257, 269, 298, 301, 369, 373, 383, 398, 404, 410, 411, 412, 423, 424, 432, 434, 565, 569, 615.
Accounts of, 20, 34, 104, 106, 118, 119, 123, 127, 133, 140, 151, 153, 159, 164, 165, 167, 174, 183, 185, 197, 198, 205, 221, 227, 260, 298, 324, 353, 356, 370, 390, 403, 441, 615.
——, appeal concerning, 356, 362.
——, enquiry regarding, 207, 356.
attendance at Com. for Irish affairs, 422, 423, 427, 428, 437.
buys post in King's Household, 122.
Lord, Gentleman of the Bed Chamber, 123, 167. illness, 462.
influence of, 270.
journey to Ireland ordered, 104, 106, 113, 127, 131, 198. journey to Ireland to settle accounts, 118, 123, 131, 133, 134, 163, 165, 166, 174, 181, 186, 197.
arrival in Ireland, 199, 201, 202, 205, 207, 221. opposition to Shaen's proposals, 428, 429, 437, 438, 439, 443.
oppressions of, 441, 442, 443.
return to England, of, 373.
letters from mentioned, 163, 208.
Ratcliff, Sir George, 542.
Ratcliffe, Sir Francis, a plotter, 121.
——, Thomas. See Radcliffe.
Raverty, Denis, 532.
Rawdon (Royden), Sir George, 605.
troop of, 537, 540, 553.
letter from, mentioned, 312.
—— to, mentioned, 312.
—— and memos. signed by, 23, 24, 29, 138.
Raymond, Sir Jonathan, Sheriff of London, 314.
Read, Sir John, 610.
Reade, Peter, Ormond's agent, 525.
Reading, Mr., a lawyer, 31, 33, 37, 51.
——, confession and imprisonment of, 37.
——, trial of, 68.
Sir Robert, 167, 424.
Receiver-General, 285.
Record, Court of, 126.
Red, Hugh, 125.
Redmond, a Tory. See O'Hanlon.
Reeves, Richard, Recorder 1st of Kilkenny, 2nd of Dublin, 314.
Regality Courts, Clonmel, 203.
Religion, Bill of, 56.
Remembrancer, Chief, 415.
Rents. See under Ireland.
Request, Court of, 459.
Restoration, The (of Charles II.) 7, 17, 30, 35, 124, 446, 534.
Revenue. See Ireland.
Revenue, Undertakers of, in Ireland, q.v.

Revett, Tho. 451.
Review, Commission of, 346.
Reynell, Sir Richard, Puisne Judge of Common Pleas, afterwards Lord Chief Justice of Ireland, 35.
accusations against, 481, 488.
Reynolds. See Reynell.
Richardson, Capt., 551
——, Edward, J.P., 232.
Richbell, Captain Edward, Farmer of Irish Revenue, 163, 369, 373.
Richmond, Charles Lennox, 1st Duke of, 247.
Rider, 609.
Rigby, Edward, J.P., for Lancashire, Serjeant-at-law, 77, 283.
Rincorran, Fort, 429.
Rincurran, or Rincorran, 52, 173, 268, 309.
Rineroan, 251.
Ringland, near Glasgow, rebels at, 127.
Ringsend (Dublin), 195, 201.
Rivers, Lieutenant, commands at Youghal, 139.
Roan, John, Bishop of Killaloe, letter from, 606.
letters from, mentioned, 611.
Roberts or Robartes, John, 2nd Baron, created Earl of Radnor, q.v.
Roberts, Mr., 534.
Robeson, Mr., Surveyor-General, 600, 601.
Robinson, Mr., 139, 309.
Sir John, Lieutenant of the Tower, of London, 8, 9, 11, 37, 112.
Rochdale, 344.
Rochester, Bishop of. See under Dolben.
Chapter of, 457.
Dean and Chapter of, 457.
Laurence. See Hyde, Laurence, Earl of.
Rock, The, Cashel, 334.
Roe, 182.
Rogerson, John, Dublin merchant, 28.
Rolls, Mastership of, 228.
Rolls, Samuel, 489, 516.
Roman Catholics in England, mentioned, 1, 2, 7, 9, et passim.
Acts against, 497.
banishment of, 89, 107, 112, 252, 593.
disabilities and prosecution of, 10, 252, 255, 256, 258, 282, 306, 342. 456. exclusion from King's Houses, 255, 256, 282.
——, Juries, 318.
——, from London, 67, 70, 75, 76, 115, 252, 255, 256, 306, 459, 531.
——, Parliament, 248, 287, 321.
——, Westminster Hall, 531. religion, minors forbidden to be educated in, 198, 277.
rewards for discovery of, 256, 282, 283.
trial of priests, 110, 283.
in Ireland. See under Ireland.
Rome, 33, 36.
Church of, mentioned, 2, 8, 95, 187, 220, 229, 290, 341.
Rome—contd.
——, Abbots of, 16, 24.
——, Archbishops of, proscribed and banished. See Ireland, Roman Catholics in.
——, Bishops of, banished and proscribed. See Ireland, Roman Catholics in.
See of, 24.
Roos, John, Lord (afterwards Earl and Duke of Rutland), 49, 50.
Rooth, Sir Richard, 356.
——, Company of, 261.
Roscoe (Ruskoe), 412, 468, 525.
Roscommon, Isabella Boynton, Countess of, wife of 4th Earl, 235.
Wentworth Dillon, 4th Earl of, 235.
letters dated from, 401.
Ross, 29.
Diocese of. See Cork and Ross.
Rosse, Lord William, repulses rebels, 124, 132.
Rotterdam, 40, 83.
Rouen (Rooen) 576.
Rowe, Mr., horse of, 618.
Royal Exchange, 532.
Royal Family, marriages with Roman Catholics forbidden, 32.
Royden, Sir George. See Rawdon.
Rumley, William, a plotter, 121.
Rump, The, 293, 296.
Rupert, Prince, 31, 55, 67, 511.
letter from, 333.
attends Privy Council, 307.
godson of, 333.
precedence, of 512.
Ruskoe. See Roscoe.
Russell, lands of, 615.
Russell, Sir Francis, letters to, mentioned, 302. 328.
Russell, Theodore Col., Mayor of Galway, 451, 552.
letters from, 600.
collector of Revenue in Galway, amount due to, 451.
regiment of, 314, 326, 329.
Russell, Lord William, (beheaded 1683,) 36, 84, 137, 238, 413, 467, 490, 496, 561, 562. birth of son of Wriothesley, afterwards 2nd Duke of Bedford, 473, 475.
representative of Commons on Privy Council, 56, 58.
withdrawal from Privy Council, 270, 271, 274.
indictment of Duke of York, 7, 340.
Speaker proposed by, 456, 458, 460.
Rutherfort, 208.
Ryan, William, Superior of Jesuits in Ireland, 25.
Ryder, William, a Farmer of Revenue, Ireland, 33, 73, 87, 105, 373. 412.

S

St. Albans, Charles Beauclerk, 1st Duke of, 324, 563.
King at supper with, 541.
St. Asaph, Bishop of. See Barrow; Lloyd.
St. Andrews, Archbishop of, Primate of Scotland, murder of, 89, 112, 119, 122, 123, 125.
St. Augustine, 33.
St. ffin Barrys, Cork, now St. Fin Bars, 201.
St. George, Sir Oliver, 489, 517, 604.
——, State letters and memos signed by, 23, 24; 29, 162.
Oliver, 451.
St. Helene, Mons., letters from mentioned, 120, 160, 261.
(son of above), 120, 160, 184, 261.
St. James' Palace, 256, 282, 288.
St. James' Square, Earl of Oxford's house in, 240.
letters dated from, 5, 21, 41, 58, 94, 303, 308, 604.
St. John:
Captain, 254, 255.
Madam, 254.
Mr., 314.
St. John's, Cashel, 334.
St. John's, by Cork, 201.
St. Leger:
Capt. John, 34, 46, 94, 565, 577, 588.
——, company of, 146.
——, petition of, 619.
——, letter from, 22
Mr., 5.
St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, church of, minister of, see Lloyd, Dr.
St. Patrick, 443.
St. Paul, Mr., 361, 375, 378.
St. Thomas Street, Dublin, 202.
St. Vast, Mr., 237.
Sacheverell:
William, M.P., 115, 561.
——, moves commital of Speaker to Tower, 90.
——, opposes votes of thanks to His Majesty, 74.
Sackville, 235.
Col. Edward, 499, 503.
Safety, Committee of, 349.
Salamanca, 578.
Salisbury:
Assizes at, 599.
James Cecil, 3rd Earl of, 506, 555.
——, representative earl on Privy Council, 56, 58.
——, withdrawal from, 555, 563.
——, letters to mentioned, 564.
House, 234.
Sall, Andrew, D.D., Chancellor of Cashel, chaplain to Charles II., 117, 118, 187, 219, 220, 229, 287, 288, 289, 290, 293, 334.
Salters Company, 350.
Sampson [Thomas], 468, 470, 474, 477, 478, 479, 481, 485, 488, 537, 538, 541, 546, 580.
Samson and Delilah, 89.
Sancroft, William, Archbishop of Canterbury, 287, 307, 448.
letters to, 446, 460.
Sanders, Robert, master of ship Virgin, examination of, 158, 159.
Santry, Richard Barry, 2nd Baron, State letters to, 53.
Sarsfield:
Mr., widow of, 146.
——, his son, a minor, 147.
Capt., 104.
Saunders, Sir John, Governor of Jersey, 57.
Savage, T., extract from letter of, 536.
Savignon, 158, 229.
Saville, Mr., 343.
Savoy:
Duke of, 346.
Prince Phillip of, 488, 489.
Sawyer, Sir Robert, Attorney General (England), 1681, mentioned, 582, 587, 589, 590, 592, 602, 603, 604.
appointment of, 575, 579, 580.
Saxony, Elector of, death of, 424.
Scarborough, Sir Charles, M.D., 355.
Scarvagh, 255.
Scot, Sir Edward. See Scott.
Scotch:
Academics, 210.
Lords, 133, 135, 165.
troops. See under Ireland, Army in.
Scotland, 54, 128, 134, 135, 140, 143, 144, 218, 219, 223, 235. affairs of, Privy Council consider, 123, 132, 133, 136, 143, 147, 149, 340.
Church of, 126.
condition of, 1, 123, 135.
Conventicles in, 153.
Council of. See Privy Council of.
The Covenant in, 146.
——, declarations regarding, 122, 123, 148.
——, objuration of, 122.
——, proclaimed by rebels, 127.
Dissenters in, 123.
hill meetings in, 368.
fanatics in, 122.
fanatic preachers from, 112.
Government in, 65, 368.
insurrection in. See Rebellion in.
Militia in, 124.
Nonconformists in, 208, 209.
Parliament of, 135, 136.
plots in, general, 516.
possible secession from Union, 496.
Presbyterians in, 615.
President of, 126.
Primate of, 125.
Privy Council of, 129, 133, 135, 143, 248.
——, Lords of, 132.
——, letter from mentioned, 508.
rebellion in, 87, 122, 123, 126, 127, 128, 129, 131, 132, 134, 135, 136, 137, 143, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 151, 164, 168, 177, 188, 189, 190, 208.
rebels in, 124, 145, 149, 155, 192.

Scotland—contd.
——, conditions of membership with, 132.
recruiting in, 209, 509, 520.
Secretary of State for, Privy Councillor, 55, 58.
Scott [Thomas, the regicide], 576.
Col., son of above, 576.
Sir Edward, 251, 477, 480.
Scroggs, Sir William, Lord Chief Justice of King's Bench, England, 119, 193, 378, 503, 542, 546.
impeachment of, 546.
Seal, The, 593.
Seale, Mr., informer, 501, 502.
Sealy, Mr., 597.
Secret Service Money, 91.
Secretary of State, Chief, 272. See also under Coventry, Henry; Jenkins, Sir Leoline.
office of, 298, 305, 312.
Sedway or Sydwey, 33.
Serjeant-at-Arms, 37.
Sergeant, Mr., a priest, 15.
Serini, Count, 325.
Sessions. See Ireland.
Settlement, Act of, 44, 231, 253, 260, 268, 270, 284.
Severn Fishery, Bills concerning, 511.
Seymour:
Edward, Privy Councillor, late Speaker of House of Commons, 56, 58, 248, 253, 272, 285, 307, 459, 475, 485, 506, 559, 562, 563, 568, 569, 579, 580, 588.
——, charges against and impeachment of, 497, 504, 505, 508, 524.
Captain, 259.
Shaen (or Shane):
Sir James, Farmer of Irish Revenue, 178, 205, 268, 269, 353, 365, 390, 395, 398, 404, 409, 410, 412, 418, 421, 428, 429, 432, 434, 436, 438, 472, 534, 609.
——, favours meeting of Irish Parliament, 424.
——, objections to Bills of, and proposals for, Revenue, 382, 383, 384, 386, 389, 394, 396, 399, 402, 403, 405, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 414, 415, 417, 420, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 436, 437, 439.
——, overtures to Ormond, 411, 422.
——, relations with Ranelagh, 439, 443.
——, letters to mentioned, 436, 438.
Shaftesbury, Anthony Cooper, 1st Earl of, Lord President of Privy Council, England, mentioned, 2, 5, 13, 22, 29, 33, 34, 36, 38, 40, 45, 54, 55, 58, 67, 73, 83, 87, 88, 97, 99, 100, 101, 103, 108, 110, 111, 115, 119, 136, 152, 169, 190, 192, 198, 218, 237, 240, 260, 291, 295, 302, 305, 307, 309, 315, 319, 339, 351, 379, 383, 388, 389, 390, 403, 411, 420, 421, 430, 431, 433, 437, 438, 458, 472, 474, 477, 484, 490, 499, Shaftesbury—contd.
500, 505, 506, 514, 520, 523, 529, 534, 553, 560, 561, 562.
Bill to abolish Lord Treasurer, 37. employs emissaries and informers, 29, 94, 184, 312, 520, 521.
house of, 432, 541.
indictment of Duke of York by, 339, 340.
moves for commission to govern Ireland, 4.
objections to Sir John Robinson's actions, 8. opposes increase of army, 136.
plots against, 461, 462.
speech on condition of Scotland and Ireland, 1, 3, 29, 30, 33, 54.
removal from Privy Council, 225, 226.
revelation of plot in Ireland by, 295, 296.
Stafford's trial attended by, 514.
letters to, mentioned, 564, 577.
Shane's Castle, 264.
Shannon:
Francis, Viscount, Governor of Cork, 303, 324, 415, 600, 601.
——, letter from mentioned, 525.
Park, 207.
Shatall, John, Bill for High Treason against, 580.
Shaw:
Captain, 264.
Rev. Robert, clerk, 451.
Sheen, letters dated from, 164, 376, 450
Sheerness, 329.
Sheldon, Mr., 265.
Sher., Mr., letter from mentioned, 391.
Sherard, Bennet, Baron, 49, 50.
Sheridan, Thomas, 522, 525.
letter to, 408.
Sheriffs, pricked by King, 476.
Sheriff's Book, 591.
Shires, Knights of, 256, 257, 283.
Shirley, Capt., 580.
Shrewsbury, Maria, Countess of, 69.
Signet Office, 555, 559.
Silvester, 570.
Silvius, Sir Gabriel, 246, 271.
Simcocks, Thomas, 451.
Sissack, Mons., 488, 489.
Skinner, a soldier, 138.
Slattery, Roger, 455.
Sligo, County, 516.
Slingsby, Mr., Master of the Mint, 335.
Smith or Smyth, 477.
convert priest of Durham, 595.
witness at Stafford's trial, 512, 516, 595.
Sir James, Alderman of London, 469.
Smoker, greyhound owned by Duke of Albemarle, 75.
Societies, appointments in, forbidden to Papists, 10.
Soissons:
Count, 188.
Comtesse de, 265.
Solomon, 89, 94.
Somers, Will, 365.

Somerset House, 55, 256, 282.
housekeeper at, 40.
porter of, 40.
Somersetshire, 497.
Southampton, Mary Wood, Duchess of, wife of Charles Fitzroy, Duke of Southampton, afterwards Duke of Cleveland, death of, 489.
Southwark, 477.
army quarters refused by, 136.
Southwell, Sir Robert, Clerk of Privy Council in England (to 1679), 3, 4, 5, 9, 10, 21, 54, 55, 73, 87, 94, 106, 116, 118, 210, 214, 220, 224, 225, 236, 241, 248, 249, 251, 252, 260, 268, 280, 286, 337, 399, 476, 478, 486, 548. sent on mission to the Elector of Brandenburgh, 277, 281.
at Berlin, 451.
Order of Privy Council signed by, 113.
resignation of, 248, 249, 259.
sale of office by, 258.
letters to, 11, 46, 141, 268, 522.
Sir Thomas, 220.
Spain, 166, 175, 346, 423, 499, 577, 611, 614.
alliance with England, 334, 335, 423.
—— Holland, 334.
Ambassador to. See Temple, Sir Wm.
Ambassador to England, 423.
coast of, 345.
embassage extraordinary to, 378.
horses of, 150, 154, 167, 342.
King of, 150, 334.
Queen of, 229.
Spalato, Archbishop of, 187.
Spaulding, Captain, Deputy Governor of Chepstow, 10.
Speaker of the House of Commons, see Parliament.
Spencer, 495.
Mathew, wool licencee, 162.
R., D.D., Canon of Christchurch, Oxford, 155.
——, letter from, 154.
Spot, Captain, 295.
Squiffland, 274.
Stacallan, co. Meath, 498.
Stafford, 458.
William Howard, Viscount, accusations against, 486, 488.
——, appeal of, 529.
——, execution of, 524, 531.
——, 31, 32.
——, moves for writ of Habeas Corpus, 324.
——, trial of, 68, 488, 505, 506, 508, 511, 512, 515, 518, 519, 522, 524, 550, 565.
——, ——, address to, 512.
——, complaint by, 512.
——, trial of counsel for defence at, 518.
——, ——, evidence and procedure at, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 518, 520.
Stafford, Viscount—contd.
——, ——, Judges at, 515, 519.
——, ——, points of law raised by, 515, 518, 519, 522.
——, ——, verdict and sentence, 521, 522, 524, 528.
Staffordshire, 50.
Lord Lieutenancy of, 247.
Stair, Sir James Dalrymple, 1st Viscount, 126.
Stamer, George, letter from, 455.
Deputy Governor of Clare, 455.
Stamford, 234.
Stanhope:
Lady Elizabeth, 538.
House, 373.
Stapley, Mr., J.P. for Berkshire, 497.
State, Ministers of, 92, 587. See also England.
States General. See Holland.
State, Secretary of. See under Coventry, Sunderland, Jenkins:
Privy Councillor, 55, 58.
for Scotland, q.v.
Statutes, Book of, 395.
Statute of honours, 67.
Stawell, Mr., 171.
Mr. Jonas, 171.
Stephens:
Mr., 160.
Sir Richard, 169, 190, 192, 198, 287, 317, 402, 465, 484, 595.
——, purchase of post by, 228.
Sir Robert, 591.
Stepney, John, Farmer of Revenue, Ireland, 179, 180, 181, 207, 364.
Stewart, Sir Wm., 517.
Stirling, Royal troops at, 132.
Stokes, William, an informer, 445, 452, 464, 465, 484.
Stone, Captain, 178, 179, 207, 406, 425.
letters from mentioned, 401, 404, 406.
Stony Stratford, 525, 529.
Stourton, William, 12th Lord, 276.
Strafford:
Anne, Countess of, 235.
William Wentworth, 2nd Earl of, 66, 67, 234, 235.
——, letter from, 6.
Thomas Wentworth, 1st Earl, mentioned, 351 542.
——, trial of, 98.
——, army raised by, 610.
Strange, Paul, Bill for High Treason against, 580.
Streton, preacher, 605.
Strode, Mr., 371.
Stroud, Mr., Bailiff of Westminster (—1680), 346, 371, 457, 476, 484, 486, 494, 508, 528.
Stuarts, The, 576.
Stubbs, butler to Countess of Shrewsbury, 69.
Succession, The, 94, 95, 100, 109, 437, 456, 461, 462, 475, 476, 488, 497, 502, 530.

Suffolk, James Howard, 3rd Earl of, 264, 265, 314, 488, 521, 534, 618.
——, dismissal from the Bedchamber, 566.
Sheriff of, 96.
Street, 378.
Sullivan (Sulyvane), Laurence, 511.
Bill for High Treason against, 580.
See O'Sullivan.
Sunderland, Robert Spencer, 2nd Earl of, Privy Councillor, Secretary of State, 34, 144, 226, 258, 272, 276, 280, 281, 286, 290, 292, 297, 303, 307, 308, 316, 324, 339, 378, 380, 382, 388, 389, 415, 420, 454, 459, 469, 482, 486, 488, 494, 496, 524, 533, 537, 539, 541, 544, 545, 549, 551, 553, 555, 558, 561, 562, 567, 574. influence and patronage, 424.
pension of, 425, 439.
receives Col. Fitzpatrick, 439. resignation or dismissal of, 559, 563, 565, 566, 568.
sale of office by, 122, 123, 568.
warrants signed by, 236.
letters from, 198, 317, 321, 328, 375, 425, 487, 504, 510.
——, ——, mentioned, 293, 394.
letters to, 120, 215, 293, 326, 415, 454, 481, 500, 504.
letters to mentioned, 327, 336, 344, 483, 526.
Supple:
William, 207.
Lieutenant, Sheriff of co. Cork, 518.
——, wife of, 596.
Supremacy, Oath of. See under Oath.
Supreme Court of Judicature. See Parliament, House of Lords.
Surrey, 50.
Commission of Oyer and Terminer in, 589.
Sussex, 360.
——, Earl of, 569.
Sweden, King of, 57.
Suspensions, Report of, 394.
Swinfen, Mr., M.P., 97.
Sword, The — The Crown, 258.
Sydenham, Sir John, 371.
Dr. Thomas, 355.
Sydway or Sedway, an informer, 33, 36.
Syliard (Cellier), Mrs. See under Cellier.
Symons, Mr., M.P., 97.
Synge:
Edward, (Bishop of Cork d. 1678), 446.
George, D.D., Bishop of Clogher, 43, 474.
Margaret, married Primate Boyle, 43.
Mr., 201.

T

Tadcaster, 235.
Talbot, Capt. Gilbert, 528, 537.
Peter, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, 11, 15, 24, 25, 26, 43, 83, 93, 185, 272, 287, 460, 477, 480, 520.
——, death of, 500.
Colonel Richard, 14, 15, 25, 26, 233, 272, 477, 480.
——, release of, 152, 197.
Tanderagee, letters dated from, 254, 440.
troops at, 232, 255.
Tangier, 273, 274, 331, 335, 336, 338, 342, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 353, 354, 361, 378, 394, 437, 473, 497, 499, 502, 503, 506, 508, 534, 540, 543.
letters dated from, 616.
Alcayde of, 334, 347, 394, 403.
annexation of, 38.
Commissioners for, 284.
Committee of. See under Privy Council.
Condition of, 326, 403, 524.
Forts. See under Charles, Henrietta, Monmouth.
King's message, re, 497, 511, 530.
Lieutenant-Governor of, 273, 331.
See Dungan, Fairbone, Inchiquin, Mulgrave, Ossory.
Moors, The, at, 273, 329, 334, 346, 393, 394, 499, 503, 508, 616.
Road, 326.
Sale of, 38, 119.
Spanish Horse at, 499, 503.
Treasuryship of, 122.
Troops, at or for, 122, 272, 278, 284, 285, 309, 328, 329, 330, 332, 333, 334, 339, 340, 342, 345, 350, 356, 384, 393, 415, 484, 499, 567, 574, 598.
Tarbert, letters dated from, 578.
Tasburgh, John, pass to go to, and remain in, Ireland. 113,
Taunaghneeve, Conventiclers in, 125.
Taylor, 241.
Teddington, 75.
Temple, The, 469.
(London), records burnt in, 101.
Temple, Sir John, Solicitor-General for Ireland, 185, 225, 249, 285, 301, 370, 374, 402, 425.
letters from, 414, 439.
letter to, 407.
——, Sir William, 185, 228, 388, 390, 420, 430, 559, 561.
Ambassador to Holland (1674), 450.
——, Spain, 450.
attends Committee for Irish affairs, 422, 430.
dismissal from Privy Council, 563, 566.
loyalty to Ormond, 92, 396,
representative of Commons on Privy Council, 56, 58.
opposes Shaen's proposals, 430.
letters from, 91, 164, 376, 450.
letters to, 108, 407, 434, 438.

Tench, Capt., 576.
Tennant, a licensed coiner, 206.
Terrill or Tyrrel, Roman Catholic Bishop, 573.
Thanet, John, 4th Earl of, 314.
Thomond, Henry O'Brien, 7th Earl of, Governor of Clare, 230, 231, 233, 241, 445.
Thomastown, 199.
Thornbury (Glos.) Lord Stafford's estate, at, 31.
Thornhill, Captain, 396.
——, an informer employed by Earl of Shaftesbury, 94, 586.
Thorsby, Mr., 173.
Thyn, Mr., 340.
Thynne, Mr. Henry, Clerk of the Privy Council, 13, 165, 177, 241, 258, 270, 271, 272, 297, 298, 309, 315, 316, 387, 388, 389, 399, 415, 433, 476.
letters from, 153, 157, 191, 235, 252, 263, 305.
letters to, 310.
Sir Henry Frederick, 310.
(Thinne) Mr. Thomas, 310, 475, 495.
Tichborne, Sir Henry, 610.
——, Sir William, 493, 498.
examination of, 492.
troops of, 491, 498.
Tipperary, County Palatine, 540, 552, 589, 593, 613.
Sheriff of, 200.
Tirenuhillie, 464.
Titus, Colonel, 467, 561, 562.
opposes vote of thanks to His Majesty, 74.
Tiverton, Devonshire, Corporation of, 346.
Topham, Sir John, 493, 605.
Dr. Jo., 176, 180, 183, 185, 201, 210.
——, letters from, 202, 205.
——, ——, mentioned, 211, 212.
Tories, mentioned, 18, 20, 28, 35, 232, 254, 255, 257, 264, 265, 440, 441, 449, 473, 474, 481, 531, 534, 543, 560, 613.
Tower, The. See London.
Townsend, Col., 601.
Mrs., letter from mentioned, 601.
Treasurer, Lord, 5, 10, 30, 33, 34, 36, 55, 58, 73, 80, 209, 264, 272.
Privy Councillor, 55, 58.
Sale of office by, Bill regarding, 36.
——, Lord. See also under Danby, Earl of; Essex, Earl of.
—— Vice, 510, 615.
Treasury, The, 5, 23, 33, 213, 214, 222, 241, 243, 298, 476.
——, Chamber of, 239, 243, 420, 422, 423, 426, 428, 438, 443.
——, Commissioners or Lords of, 5, 14, 23, 30, 33, 36, 37, 41, 57, 66, 114, 143, 148, 149, 159, 166, 177, 238, 239, 269, 280, 284, 303, 306, 309, 339, 350, 373, 374, 398, Treasury—contd.
410, 411, 420, 421, 434, 582, 609, 615, 616. See Danby; Sussex; Fox; Hyde.
Represented on Privy Council, 55.
Sale of offices by, 36.
First Commissioners of. See under Essex, Earl of; Hyde.
The, payments by, 510.
Receipts and Payments, Certificate of, 509, 510.
Office, 32, 34.
Treby, George, M.P., Chairman of Committees of Election and of Secrecy, Recorder of London (1680—) 9, 32, 514.
at Stafford's trial, 512, 516.
Trelawny, Col. Charles, 342.
Trenchard, Mr., 515.
Trevor, Sir John, 76, 257, 516.
Brings in Bill against Irish cattle, 77.
Triennial Bill, 156.
Trinity College, Dublin, exemption of, 395.
lodgings in, 288.
Provost of, 207, 210. See also Ward.
Senior Fellow, 117.
Trustees, College and Hospital, 85.
Tuam, letters dated from, 526.
Archbishop of, 41, 171. See also Vesey, John.
Tufton, Captain Richard, 314.
Tullagh, Priest of, 606.
Tullogh, 164,
Tullow, Viscount, son of Richard, Earl of Arran, 551.
Turberville, Dr., 336, 485, 488, 519, 550.
evidence at Stafford's trial, 513, 514.
Turkey Company, 310.
Sultan of, 471.
Turks, 184.
ships taken from, 272.
Turner, 593.
Mr., 460.
Anthony, a plotter, 121.
——, denies knowledge of Popish Plot, 2.
Sir Edward, Chief Baron of the Exchequer, 501.
Arthur, King's Counsel, 314.
Turenne, M. de, saying of, 433.
Tusker, 255.
Tutthill, Christopher, wool licencee, 162.
Twicnane — Twickenham, 315.
Twysden, Chief Justice, 96.
Tyburn, 350.
Tydberrye, 525.
Tyrone, County, Tories of, 440.
Richard Power, 1st Earl of, 21, 34, 57, 260, 276, 278, 298, 299, 301, 374, 468, 471, 479, 481, 510, 520, 521.
——, Grand Jury's Bill against, 581.
——, Examination of, 511.
——, Impeachment of, 551.

Tyrone contd.
——, Plot of, 546.
——, Trial of, 281, 290, 291, 292, 305, 443, 483.
——, letters to mentioned, 481, 485,
Tyrrell, R.C. Bishop of Clogher, 231, 233, 549.

U

Ulster, Army in, 150.
Rents payable from, 510. See also under Ireland rents.
Scots in, 143.
Troops in, 517.
Umbra (ombre), 167.
Undertakers. See under England and Ireland.
Unicorn (Ship), 159.
Upper House. See House of Lords.
Upton, Mr., Collector of Kinsale, 52, 61.
Usurper, The. See Cromwell, Oliver.

V

Vandyke, 94.
Van Hill, Mr., 94.
Vaughan, Ja., Warden of Galway, 451.
Sir John, Lord Chief Justice, 58.
Mr., Commissioner of the Admiralty, Privy Councillor, 56, 58, 270.
John, wool licencee, 162.
Ventry, 188.
Vernon, George, of Derbyshire, 504, 506, 561.
Col. Edward, 3, 217, 412, 457, 461, 467, 479, 523, 525, 591.
Vesey, John, Archbishop of Tuam, 606, 607.
Letters from, 526.
Villiers, Edward, alias Fitz Gerald, 159,
Mr., 182.
Ned, 176,
Viner, Mr., King's Equerry, 618.
Virgin (Ship), 158.
Viscounts:
Represented on Privy Council, 56.
Votes in House of Commons, included in Proceedings in House of Commons, q.v.
Votes in House of Lords, included in Proceedings in House of Lords, q.v.
Vowell, Rev. Christopher, letter on state of Ireland, 81, 82.
Vyne, la, 54.
Vyner, Sir Robert, 319, 346.

W

Wakefield, George, a messenger 317, 330, 454.
Wakeman, Sir George, a plotter, 32, 121, 136, 140, 164.
trial of, 157, 158, 174, 458.
Walden, Sir Lionel, house of, 234.
Wales, 96.
Walker:
Davy. See Walters.
George, letters to, 264.
Waller:
Mr. Edmund, 571.
Sir William, J.P., 100, 296, 297, 301, 581, 582, 595, 608.
——, servant of, 299.
Wallop, [Richard], counsel to Stafford, 518, 519.
Walsh:
an incendiary, 112, 113, 114.
Peter, 81, 206, 539.
Sir Robert, 11, 564.
——, letters from, 564.
——, ——, mentioned, 577, 587.
Walter or Walters, Lucy, mother of Duke of Monmouth, 311, 314, 315, 321, 326, 336, 561.
Walters, Davy, lieutenant of the Ordinance, 57, 66.
Wandsworth, letters dated from, 95.
Wanman, Captain, 82.
War, laws and ordinances for, 617.
Warcup or Warcop, Mr. Justice, 468, 566, 568, 571, 573, 580, 581, 586, 594.
Ward: of Birmingham, William Ward, 2nd Baron of, 112, 587.
——, petition from, 597.
Mr., son of the above, 112.
Michael, D.D., Bishop of Derry, (1679), Bishop of Ossory, (1678), Provost of Trinity College, Dublin (1678), 219.
Wardour, Lord Arundel of. See Arundel.
Warner:
Edward, Dr., report signed by, 362.
Roo., 451.
Warrants, to Capt. Thos. Fitzgerald, 236.
Warren, Mr., 486.
Washington, Mr., dealer in arms, 83.
Waterford, 29, 182, 203, 208, 242, 575.
letters dated from, 240.
Aldermen of, 252.
Bishop of. See Gore.
chief magistrate of, 242.
disorders in, 240, 242, 246, 248, 252.
Deacon of, Roman Catholic. See Power, Robert.
garrison of, 17, 247.
High Constable of, 240, 242, 246. See also Browne.
Mayor of, 246, 252, 504.
——, letters to, 242, 243.
Sheriffs of, 246, 247.
surprise of, 120,
weekly market in, 17, 27
County, 576.
——, Commission of Peace in, 207.
Diocese of, 295.

Watts, letters to, 119, 134.
——, mentioned, 120, 137, 142.
Waugh, 125.
Weesly, Regt. of, 330.
Welbeck, 234.
Duke of Newcastle's house at, 234.
Weld, George, 566, 569, 571, 574, 594.
Wells, 371.
Bishop of. See under Bath and Wells.
Welsh, rebel general, 126.
Wentworth, Lady Margaret, 234.
West Indies, ships from, 173.
Westminster, 80, 90.
army quarters refused by, 136.
Bailiff of, 193, 346, 349, 443, 457, 476, 484, 508, 521, 528.
——, See Ellis, Stroud.
Chamber of, 346.
Grand Jury of, 580, 581, 586.
Justices of Peace for, 255, 282, 307, 346.
Parliament at, 563, 570.
Steward of, 521.
——, Deputy of, 468. See also Wythers.
Stewardship of, 193.
Westminster Abbey, 360, 361, 367, 385.
——, Dean and Chapter of, 476.
Hall, 69, 86, 116, 330, 342, 512, 515, 530, 580.
——, Five Lords in, 116.
——, Judges of, 490, 530.
——, Stafford's trial in, 512.
Weston, Richard, Sergeant-at-Law, 275, 503.
Westroppe, Mountifort, 594, 597.
Wetenhall, Edward, D.D., Bishop of Cork, 201.
Wetherley, Dr., 191.
Wexford, 29, 575.
garrison in, 17.
weekly market in, 17, 27.
County, 576.
Wharton:
(Thomas), eldest son of Philip 4th Lord, horse of, 618.
——, indictment of Duke of York by, 340.
Henry, 3rd son of Lord W., 281.
Philip, 4th Lord, 88, 281, 340, 506.
Sir Thomas, 102, 545.
——, grandson of, 369.
——, letters from, 234, 368.
Wheeler, Captain, 240.
Whigs, 135, 136.
White, 504.
priest, 606.
Eustace, 464.
Lieutenant, 138.
Whitebread, Thomas, a plotter, 121.
White Friars, 564, 565.
Whitehall, 37, 55, 80, 111, 189, 203, 220, 226, 239, 281, 301, 345, 469, 471.
banqueting house, 107, 511.
gallery at, 227.
King and Court at, 223, 307.
Whitehall—contd.
letters dated from, 22, 35, 39, 41, 57, 65, 82 114, 118, 123, 127, 131, 137, 142, 145, 146, 150, 153, 158, 163, 166, 175, 177, 191, 196, 202, 208, 210, 211, 212, 213, 215, 219, 222, 231, 233, 235, 238, 241, 243, 244, 248, 249, 257, 258, 260, 261, 263, 264, 266, 270, 272, 274, 278, 284, 287, 288, 291, 295, 298, 301, 305, 308, 316, 317, 322, 324, 334, 340, 344, 348, 357, 359, 375, 386, 387, 415, 420, 422, 425, 433, 436, 465, 487, 510, 530, 569, 574, 579, 582, 584, 588, 589, 590, 591, 594, 599, 603.
Members of Parliament take oaths at, 460.
Orders of Privy Council dated from, 112, 128, 278, 307.
painted chamber in, 506.
Roman Catholics excluded from. See Roman Catholics in England.
warrants dated from, 236.
White Staves. See Household, His Majesty's.
Whitehaven Coals, petition concerning, mentioned, 422.
Whitfield, Mr., 456.
Wicherley, Mr., 203.
Wickham, Tobias, Archbishop of York, 235.
Wild:
Mr., Commissioner for Inspection of Revenue, Ireland, 493.
George, Chief Justice, 96, 484.
Wilks, a messenger, 559.
William III., mentioned, 35 note.
Williams, William, Speaker of the House of Commons, Recorder of Chester, 524, 566, 567. election of, 456, 458, 459, 460.
re-election of, 619.
Williamson, Sir Joseph, 548, 552, 555.
letter from mentioned, 559.
Willoughby, alias Dangerfield, q.v.
Wills, Captain, 82.
Wilson, 206.
Hugh, Clerk of Court of Record, 125, 126.
Mr., 525.
Wiltshire, 599.
Wimbledon, 2.
Winch, Sir Humphrey, Privy Councillor, 56, 58.
Winchelsea, Heneage Finch, 2nd Earl of, 601.
Winchester:
George Morley, Bishop of, 187.
College, Warden of, 151, 173.
Isabel, Marchioness of, daughter of Earl of Stafford, wife of John, 5th Marquis of, 235, 518.
Charles Paulet, 6th Marquis of, afterwards 1st Duke of Bolton, Lord High Steward, 1, 70, 75, 109, 116.
——, affairs of, 94, 104.

Winchester—contd.
——, Privy Council, representative Marquis on, 55, 58.
——, ——, withdrawal from, 270.
——, sale of post as steward to, 79, 105, 145, 152.
Windsor, 74, 75, 153, 165, 169, 175, 185, 191, 193, 194, 196, 197, 199, 202, 263, 294, 301, 305, 308, 318, 319, 322, 324, 327, 335, 336, 344, 346, 354, 356, 373, 374, 375, 378, 381, 384, 387, 388, 389, 402, 409, 412, 418, 602, 604.
burgess-ship at, 33.
Castle, 120.
——, letters dated from, 354.
Dean of. See Durel.
King and Court at, 122, 147, 151, 157, 165, 169, 177, 193, 194, 196, 275, 310, 314, 315, 329, 335, 342, 348, 409, 418, 591, 609.
Privy Council meetings at, 151, 185.
letters dated from, 181, 183, 191, 198, 317, 321, 328, 332, 350, 354, 359, 376.
——, mentioned, 190, 317, 354.
money, 484.
Winnington, 512.
Sir Francis, M.P., 56, 67, 112, 467, 512, 515, 516, 561, 562.
——, manager at Stafford's trial, 516, 518.
Winwood, Mr., 33.
Witherley, Thomas, Dr., reports signed by, 355, 362.
Witney, Townes End., 618.
Wolseley, Sir Charles.
Cornet, brother of above, 198.
Woodstock, 36.
Wool licenses, 161.
Worcester:
letters dated from, 302.
Henry Somerset, 3rd Marquis of, Privy Councillor, 193, 307, 459, 530.
——, representative Marquis on Privy Council, 55, 58.
——, letters from mentioned, 328.
——, Ludlow Court belonging to, 511.
Worden, Colonel, 449.
Sir Jo., letters from mentioned, 449.
Worssop or Worship, Sir Thomas, 53.
Worth:
Dr. Edward, 251.
Mr. William, Recorder of Cork, 124, 173, 178, 201, 208, 593.
——, letter from, 124, 597.
——, ——, mentioned, 201.
Wotton, Charles Henry Kirkhouse, Baron Wotton, created E. of Bellamont in Ireland, 1680, 580.
Wray (Wrey), Captain Drury, 168, 463.
Wyche, Sir Cyril, 3, 34, 142, 243, 297, 573.
attendance at Committee for Irish Affairs, 428.
letters from, 5, 21, 41, 58, 94, 303, 308, 426, 604.
letters from mentioned, 528.
Wyche—contd.
letters to, 214, 303, 433.
——, mentioned, 602.
Wyndham, Hugh, Baron of the Court of Exchequer, 96.
Wythens, Sir Francis, Deputy Steward of Westminster, 468, 498.

Y

Yarner:
Abraham, Muster-Master-General for Ireland, 617.
Mr., Commissioner of Revenue, Ireland, 179.
Yeats, Richard, wool licencee, 162.
York:
City of, 228, 288.
Aldermen of, 235.
Deputy Recorder of, 235.
Lord Mayor of, 235.
Sheriffs of, 235.
letters dated from, 234.
Archbishop of. See Wickham.
Dean of, 235.
Prebends of, 235.
Duchess of, Anna Hyde, 400.
Duchess of (Mary of Modena), 218, 220, 223, 227, 228, 234, 235, 271, 278, 280, 288, 561.
James, Duke of, afterwards James II., 1, 14, 22, 49, 86, 99, 105, 114, 211, 220, 230, 237, 238, 281, 285, 288, 291, 293, 305, 310, 315, 321, 324, 326, 329, 338, 339, 343, 344, 350, 375, 378, 379, 389, 420, 424, 437, 449, 454, 457, 465, 479, 494, 508, 529, 562, 606, 614.
——, accusations and agitations against, 449, 458, 461, 466, 467, 468, 470, 478, 481, 513, 579, 581, 582, 589, 590, 591, 592, 602.
——, at Newmarket, 287, 292.
——, attorney of, 228.
——, banishment of, proposed, 488, 490.
——, Bill of Disabilities, 502.
——, Bill of Indictment against, 339, 340, 342, 499, 501.
——, Bill to make landing in United Kingdom treason, 95.
——, Bill and votes to prevent succession of, 94, 98, 102, 104, 110, 475, 476, 477, 481, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 496, 497, 506, 530, 541, 549, 560, 561, 562.
——, Bill of exclusion from succession, Lords opposing, 488, 489, 490, 500, 562.
——, departure from England of, 211, 213, 227, 228, 229, 231, 234, 459.
——, dines with Artillery Company, 227, 228, 424.
——, impeachment of, 456.
——, recall of, 245, 269.

York, Duke of—contd.
——, oaths and tests for, 502.
——, petitions against, 460.
——, regiment of, 329.
——, religion of, 449, 562.
——, return of, 122, 197, 199, 202, 218, 223, 268, 269, 271, 272, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281.
——, in Scotland, 218, 219, 223, 245, 248, 468, 474, 485.
——, journey to Scotland, 234, 235, 459.
——, supposed relations with Pope, 95, 98, 102.
——, troop of Horse Guards of, 329, 330.
——, letters to mentioned, 456.
York, Duke of—contd.
——, letters from, 359.
Yorkshire, 221, 234, 310, 331, 599.
East Riding of, Lord Lieutenancy of, 247. See Mulgrave, Monmouth.
High Sheriff of, 234.
Youghal, 29, 62, 240, 303.
Custom House at, officers of, 598.
garrison in, 17, 138, 139, 565, 577.
inhabitants' petition, 161, 162.
market, 17, 27.
port of, 161, 162.
Young, 125.
D.D., chaplain to Earl of Ossory, recommended to Ormond, 219, 263.
Lady Anne, of Brussels, 190.

HISTORICAL MANUSCRIPTS COMMISSION.

REPORT ON

MANUSCRIPTS

IN VARIOUS COLLECTIONS

VOL. VI.

THE MANUSCRIPTS

OF

MISS M. EYRE MATCHAM;

CAPTAIN H. V. KNOX·

CORNWALLIS WYKEHAM-MARTIN, ESQ.;

&c.

Presented to both Houses of Parliament by Command of His Majesty.

DUBLIN:

PRINTED FOR HIS MAJESTY'S STATIONERY OFFICE BY JOHN FALCONER, 53 UPPER SACKVILLE STREET.

And to be purchased, either directly or through any Bookseller, from WYMAN & SONS, Ltd., Fetter Lane, E.C.; and 32 Abingdon Street, Westminster, S.W.; or OLIVER and BOYD, Edinburgh; or
E. PONSONBY, 116 Grafton Street, Dublin

1909.

[Cd. 4382.] Price 2*s.* 3*d.*

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	PAGE
Introduction	v
The Manuscripts of Miss M. Eyre Matcham. By Mrs. S. C. Lomas	1
The Manuscripts of Captain Howard Vicente Knox. By Mrs. S. C. Lomas	81
The Manuscripts of Cornwallis Wykeham-Martin, Esquire. By Walter Fitzpatrick . . .	297
The Manuscripts belonging to K. B. Tighe, Esquire. By Arthur Maxwell-Lyte, B.A.	435
The Manuscripts of Lord Oranmore and Brown. By Arthur Maxwell-Lyte, B.A.	438
Additional Manuscripts of Captain H. V. Knox. By Mrs. S. C. Lomas	440
Index. By Miss Winifred Lomas	451

INTRODUCTION.

I.—THE MSS. OF MISS M. EYRE-MATCHAM.

The collection in the possession of Miss Eyre-Matcham consists of a part of the correspondence and other papers of George Bubb Dodington, and includes interesting letters from Henry Fox, Lord Bute, Horace Mann, Lord Talbot, the Irish Chief Baron Wainwright and Lord Chancellor Bowes, James Thomson, the poet, and others. On the whole, the letters present Dodington in a more pleasing aspect than that in which he is generally viewed. He probably sums up pretty correctly the opinion of his contemporaries when he says: "It has always been my lot to be represented as an arrogant, self-sufficient, empty coxcomb, and in the same quarter of an hour . . . a deep, designing, dangerous spirit." Posterity has endorsed the former rather than the latter view. But that he could be a warm and steadfast friend is shown by his defence of Byng (in a speech called by Horace Walpole, who did not love Dodington, "humane, pathetic and bold") and of Lord George Sackville after Minden. And many of the letters in this collection prove the real affection felt for him by men such as Lord Halifax, and his kindness of heart and willingness to help others (see letters from the Duke of Argyll, John Scrope and the Earl of Strafford, pp. 4–7). He was a kind patron to James Thomson, the poet, who thanks him for advice and encouragement, as well as for many other obligations, in a letter written just before his journey to Italy with Lord Talbot's son, in 1730. Thomson was then ardently looking forward to "seeing the fields where Virgil gathered his immortal honey" and to gaining inspiration from treading the gound where "men had thought and acted so greatly." His next letter, written a year later, is in strange contrast to the earlier one. He had been through most parts of France and Italy, and had found his enthusiasm for travelling go off very fast. As to fine statues and pictures, "how little of these suffices; they are highly ornamental in life, if one can have them at home and (prudent addition!) without paying an extravagant price," but to run abroad to stare at them is mere folly. All that is needful is to send men of genius to study the fine arts and import them into England, where, "though we cannot reach the gracefully superfluous," he hoped we might never lose "the substantial, necessary and vital arts of life, such as depend on liberty, labour and all-commanding trade." After this beginning we are not surprised to hear that the poet's muse did not cross the channel with him, and was perhaps still lingering in the Dorset woods. And, truly, no doubt she was. Nothing could more plainly show than does this letter where Thomson's source of inspiration lay.

The first letter in the collection was written by Lord Stanhope before George Bubb had taken the name of Dodington, and while he was minister at Madrid. This is followed by two from Admiral Byng to George Dodington the elder on the question of Gibraltar, the difficulties of his own task, and his desire to return home and see quiet days. Letters from (Russell) Lord Orford, the Duke of Argyll, John Scrope of the Treasury, the Earl of Strafford and the Earl of Tankerville bring us to Thomson's letters, already mentioned, and to one from Leonard Welsted, written from the Tower (where he had a clerkship in the Ordnance Office), defending himself from the imputation of having ridiculed his patron, and broadly hinting that although Dodington might think his poetry inferior to that of Thomson, other men did not.

In 1732 and 1733 there are several letters to and from Frederick, Prince of Wales, in the first of which Dodington begins by posing as a candid friend who scorns to flatter, and ends with as fulsome a piece of flattery as one can well imagine.

The Prince's earlier letters are short, friendly notes; but in the autumn of 1733 he wrote a long letter on the subject of divers stories then current to Dodington's detriment, in which, although he takes his friend's part, there are signs of a rift in the lute. Dodington, then on the eve of going over to Ireland, defended himself at great length, but the rupture with the Prince followed not long afterwards.

On p. 16 is a supposed petition, dated in February, 1739–40, from a Miss Hamilton to George Denoyer, the popular dancing master, praying him to procure her a post as rocker in the Prince of Wales' nursery, on the ground that, as she heard, no person was admitted into that part of Norfolk House who was not a Hamilton—an evident skit upon the number of Hamiltons whom Lady Archibald, the Prince's mistress, had placed about his court.

In this same year, 1740, Dodington again joined the Prince of Wales' party.

Three letters from Thomas Prowse, M.P. for Somersetshire and a member of the secret committee for investigating the charges of bribery and corruption against Walpole in 1742, illustrate the strong animus of the majority of those composing it—an animus so bitter that some of his more moderate antagonists ceased to attend the meetings. When their report was presented on June 30, the charges were so insignificant as almost in themselves to form a defence of the fallen minister (see Mahon's History, iii, 121, 123); but this was not the view taken by Dodington and his party. They were eager to take further steps, "for the world having seen such a scene of iniquity incontestably proved, and the author of it still unpunished," together with the many other strange events of the last session, "are at a loss to guess on what ground they stand, and are doubtful (perhaps with reason) whether they have been gainers by the change hitherto effected."

Letters written in the autumn of 1744 show the deep depression of the party to which Dodington at this time belonged. "If we can do nothing," he wrote in a letter to Sir Watkyn Williams Wynn, "let us at least agree in that nothing, and show that it proceeds not from meanness, but from a noble despair." And again to Hillsborough: "If I foresaw any moral possibility of repelling the broad ruin that now stares us in the face, I should call upon your Lordship." But almost immediately afterwards Granville's ministry fell, and in the "broad bottom" administration which followed, Dodington was made Treasurer of the Navy.

At this point there is a hiatus of some years in the collection, and the next papers relate to Dodington's return to the Prince of Wales in the spring of 1748–9. At this time also Dodington's Diary (printed in 1784) begins, and helps to elucidate the letters. At the beginning of March the Earl of Middlesex was sent by the Prince to Dodington to offer him "the full return of his favour." His answer, accepting the Prince's offer, was given on March 11, and on the same day he resigned his office of Treasurer of the Navy. His professed reasons, as given to Luke Gardiner, were—the hopeless state of the country and his own powerlessness to remedy the evils he foresaw, so that he thought it better to retire than to "stand loaded with emoluments, without the power of doing any real service" either to his country or his friends (p. 20). His statement to Mr. Pelham, as related in the Diary, is almost identical with this. He agreed, however, to act until the appointment of a successor, and did not actually quit office until the 3rd of May. After this he was made much of at Leicester House; invited to sup or to dine, and appointed Treasurer of the Chamber, with a salary of 1,200*l.* a year, though it would appear from a passage in the Diary that this was made up to 2,000*l.* by the Prince, privately. This for the present. In the future, when the Prince should come to the Crown, he was to have a peerage, the management of the House of Lords and the Seals for the Southern Province, and was allowed to kiss hands, by way of acceptance, upon the spot (see Diary, p. 4).

A short note from the Prince of Wales (written in Dec., 1750) brings this chapter of Dodington's history to a close, so far as these papers are concerned. Frederick died in the following March, and the next document calendared is the "memorial of several noblemen and gentlemen" concerning the education of the new Prince of Wales (p. 22). The matters of which the memorial treated are mentioned on pp. 122, 123 of the Diary, and the paper itself is alluded to on p. 132.

On p. 20 is a curious letter from a Miss Fanny Bowyer to the Prince. This is perhaps the lady whom Horace Walpole mentions in 1766, when he says that Madame de Corstin is very like "old Miss Bowyer" (Letters, ed. Toynbee, vi, 412). Following this is the memorial concerning the Prince of Wales, mentioned above, and a paper on the state of affairs at Court in 1753.

In 1754 Horace Mann gives an amusing account of Elizabeth Pitt's* conversion (or re-conversion, as he considered it) to the Roman Church. The lady's object seemed to be to attract as much notice as possible, and she even went so far as to demand the Emperor's protection, on the plea that the English nation would be so displeased with her as to become her enemy. Mann hastened to assure the Imperial ambassador that he was very sure "her nation would be as indifferent about the religion she professed—as she was herself."

* Sister of William Pitt. See H. Walpole's Letters, iii, 206, 260; iv, 30.

A series of letters to a young friend named East and his mother show Dodington as a kind, but by no means always a judicious, mentor of youth. In one of the letters he incidentally mentions that he has not played at cards for ten hours in ten years.

Writing to Lord Halifax in August, 1755, Dodington mentions Lord Holderness's mission to Wolfenbüttel to endeavour to arrange a double marriage for the Prince of Wales and the Princess Augusta. "For the contingent that we are to furnish," he says, "I have known them ever since they were born, and better goods for domestic as well as public happiness never were put out of hand."

On September 2, and again on September 3 of this year Pitt visited Dodington, as we learn from the Diary, and on the 6th Dodington exactly echoes his sentiments as regards the foreign subsidies, in writing to Halifax (p. 30); yet when Fox, proving more pliant than his rival, was about to be made Secretary of State, Dodington, who ever loved the rising sun, and who also had certainly a warm attachment to Fox, wrote to congratulate him :—

"That of all those who are in the King's service or likely to be so, you are one whom I most cordially wish to see in the first rank, is a truth that I hoped to convince you of by contributing both to the placing and supporting you in it, and not by words. . . . I always wished you should be an actor—a principal actor—but where honour and reputation, as well as power, and profit distinguish the part you appear in; for, dear Mr. Fox, believe an old man that loves and esteems you, there is nothing else worthy of an honest, noble, well-regulated ambition."

Both Newcastle and Fox were anxious to engage Dodington, but doubted whether he would accept the "subsidiary treaties." They therefore wrote to Halifax (who was known to have great influence with him) praying for his assistance, stating that the King had "given his word that he will no longer put his negative on Mr. Dodington," and mentioning in confidence that permission had been given to offer him the comptroller's staff. On Oct. 10, Newcastle and Dodington had a long conference, but separated without coming to terms. On the 19th, however, they "settled preliminaries," and on the 22nd Dodington kissed hands as Treasurer of the Navy.

In the autumn of 1756, the burning question was the establishment of the Prince of Wales. The King wished to get him away from his mother's control; the Prince did not wish to leave her. Newcastle dared not meet Parliament until he had come to terms with Leicester House, and at length persuaded the King to allow the young Prince to remain with his mother, and to consent to their wish that Lord Bute should be Groom of the Stole.

On October 17, as Horace Walpole states, Fox had begged leave to resign, being discontented that all the power was "engrossed by the old monopolist." At this juncture, on October 19, he wrote to Dodington that he had had a good deal of serious talk with the King the day before, that the Duke of Newcastle "did not know his own mind till then if he does now"; that the King keeps his temper, but that what will be the issue of it all he cannot tell; it is in other hands, and he is not sorry for it. In November, Newcastle and Fox resigned, and Dodington lost his place as Treasurer of the Navy.

In Fox's next letter, written on March 12, 1757, he sketched a ministry which he believed would be acceptable to the country, but declared that if the King kept Pitt and Temple two months longer he should look upon them as complete conquerors and "Leicester House the Court." He wished Dodington to approach Halifax on his behalf, but the latter declared that as Mr. Fox had no positive proposition to make, he could have no positive answer to return. On March 15, Fox informed Dodington that Tempie had had "an unkindly audience," but he believed they did not mean to resign on it :—

"So," he continued, "now things tend to delay again; and you and I think alike of the consequence of that. . . . Pitt, &c., have by their faults and want of judgment, put themselves into our power; it is now our turn, by the same means to make them again masters."

Dodington seems to have suggested that Halifax would prefer to be Secretary of State. To this Fox replied :—

"Capacity is so little necessary for most employments that you seem to forget that there is one where it is absolutely so—viz., the Admiralty. It is there we want Lord Halifax's active ability. . . . Now, when the King with difficulty can be brought to open his closet door to Lord Halifax as head of the Admiralty, do you believe his declining that office will leave a possibility of his being Secretary of State?"

The great object was to extricate the King and country from their difficulties, and this could only be done by placing men "not where they chose, but where they may best answer the great purpose they are called upon for." A few days later he mentions his intention of calling upon Ministers "for a contradiction of the prevailing lie . . . of an intended message for English troops to be sent to Westphalia. They say Pitt would not carry such message, and is therefore to be turned out." On April 2nd the downfall of the ministry was known to be imminent, and Fox was busy arranging the administration which he believed it would fall to his lot to form. He offered Dodington (through Hillsborough) the Treasurership of the Navy, and had already got Winchilsea's promise to go to the Admiralty. Matters were not, however, so easily settled, and at the beginning of June Dodington wrote :—

"I hear you are come to town, but not much more informed of the settlement of the administration than the King himself. How long is this gentleman to trifle with his sovereign and benefactor and to keep our destiny in suspense; you of too much consequence, I of too little, to be trusted with or admitted to the honour of supporting him?"

To this Fox the next day replied that it was impossible to recollect half the absurdities he had that day heard.

"The Duke of Newcastle went to the King not to accept, but to desire till Tuesday to determine. . . . If he accepts, it is against the advice of all his friends; yet he will accept, and let those friends make his situation ten times worse than it would be if they did not meddle. But he is to act against their advice, and yet they are to advise him. I, in the meantime, will not be of the system (as you will persist to call what those do who never had a system). I will take what I take from the King. He is certainly engaged in honour to you as well as to me. . . . I am sick of what passes, and will neither see him or them more till I kiss his hand, and that I ever shall kiss it is doubtful."

Fox's last letter to Dodington at this crisis was written on June 6, when Newcastle had been to the King to know what terms he might offer Mr. Pitt :—

"The King gave the Duke little encouragement to think he would condescend to such terms as they would accept, and the Duke gave the King as little to imagine that he would come in without them. His grace is to be at Court to-morrow, when, according to present appearances, they will part for good and all. . . . But the very reverse of this conjecture may prove to be the event. Incertus non perturbatus. I'll go to dinner. Adieu."

This is the last letter from Fox in the collection.

Following the Fox letters are several from Lord Talbot and Horace Mann. Talbot praises Lord Bute, discusses the war, and complains of the treatment of the militia. In 1760 he writes warmly of the young King, and congratulates Dodington on being raised to the peerage.

Horace Mann, writing from Florence in March, 1758, evidently replies to a letter from Dodington describing the "union of counsels" in the ministry and the popularity of the King of Prussia. Not long after this Horace Walpole wrote to Mann :—"Our unanimity is prodigious. You would as soon hear 'No' from an old maid as from the House of Commons." Another letter from Mann about this time tells of his efforts to bring about a reconciliation between the dowager Lady Orford and her husband, Mr. Shirley, and a third discusses the probable consequences of the death of the King of Spain and the English success at Guadaloupe (pp. 42, 43).

On George III.'s accession to the throne, Dodington lost no time in applying to Bute for some mark of favour from the young King and the Princess, who had ever been his most gracious mistress. He exerted himself to please Bute by getting "as many members" as he possibly could (and his parliamentary patronage was very large), and by sending him verses of a flattering nature.

"Quoth Newcastle to Pitt, 'tis in vain to dispute:
If we'd quarrel in private, we must make room for Bute.
Quoth Pitt to his Grace, to bring that about,
I fear, my dear Lord, you or I must turn out.
Not at all, quoth the Duke, I meant no such thing,
To make room for us all, we must turn out the King.
If that's all your scheme, quoth the Earl, by my troth,
I shall stick to my master, and turn ye out both."

There are many letters from Bute to Dodington and Dodington to Bute in the collection. In June, 1761, the Earl appears to have saved Dodington, or rather Lord Melcombe, as he had now become, from a dangerous accident, apparently when riding. Some months later (Feb., 1762), defending himself from a hint of Lord Melcombe's that he had broken his promise by not preferring a friend of the latter, at a time when it "rained bishoprics, deaneries and canonries," he says :—

"I own, and that without blushing, I have been unfortunate in the means I have for years taken of cementing friendships and procuring attachments; others, with much less trouble, perhaps without my honesty, succeed better; . . . but I repine not . . . and shall go on, though single and alone, to serve my King and country in the best manner my poor talents will allow me, happy, too happy, when the heavy burden that I bear shall be removed and placed on other shoulders."

In the following April he complained of not being well, and began to think that a little more of what he had gone through would prepare him for a longer journey than he wished to take. A few days later Melcombe wrote an indignant tirade against the treatment of Bute by the people, and especially by Pitt's party, who were attacking him publicly "in all conversations, and now in writing, personally, in the strongest and most audacious manner." He ended by lamenting the decline, not of Bute's kindness but of his confidence towards himself, and assuring him of his unswerving attachment.

The answer to this letter is not amongst the papers, but there are two short notes from Bute, written in the summer of the same year, in a very affectionate strain, and urgently desiring to see his "noble friend" to talk over with him important business and interesting news.

In October, 1761, two short notes from Young, the poet, offer emendations to Dodington's metrical Epistle to the Earl of Bute (p. 50). It has sometimes been stated that this was merely his Epistle to Walpole (the parody on which is noticed on p. 5 of this collection) altered to suit the circumstances; but this is an error, as they are entirely different.

The second section consists of letters on Irish affairs (1725–1762). The earlier letters are chiefly from Lord Chancellor West, Baron Wainwright, W. Cary and Dr. Hart, Bishop of Killmore. They tell of the amusing plan of the Irish House of Commons in 1725, who, in order to make an estimate of what the revenue might produce in two years, "thought it necessary to take a medium" of what it had hitherto produced, and gravely did so by taking one year, and that the highest ever known; of the friction between Lords and Commons on the question of the "communication of bills" in 1733–4; of the difficulty in carrying a bill for the relief of the creditors of Burton's Bank, "the struggles to defeat and the arts to embarras it" being, as Wainwright said, incredible; of the plot to oust Wainwright from the Exchequer by "kicking him upstairs"; of the great run on the banks in 1744; of the mischief brewing by the papists, and of the solemn vote of thanks given to a valiant cornet "for his great zeal and intrepidity in rummaging the monasteries, friaries and seminaries of Galway," and carrying off their papers (pp. 55–61).

In 1735, John Bowes, the Irish Solicitor-General, appealed to Dodington for help against a bill in the English Parliament which he feared would tend to promote the growth of popery; and also repeated a speech made against him by "that eternal snarl Swift." Alluding to Dodington's place as Clerk of the Pells, and speaking of the good nature of his countrymen, Swift had said:—

> "One Carey, last session, introduced a gentleman from England, dressed him in a suit of Irish manufacture, which cost thirty shillings, and then showed him for a patriot, upon which the good people of Ireland gave him seven hundred pounds per annum."

Sir Arthur Acheson thought that too much had been made of a small matter. Luke Gardiner had been "talking like a great patriot," and said no gentleman of the country should be forgiven that wore anything but the manufactures of it. The Dean retorted that Gardiner had got into employments worth two thousand pounds, while he possibly might lay out ten in a suit of clothes, and then made the speech about Dodington, but only in the "way of rattling the Dean has always indulged himself in," and which, it is to be feared, "he will never be broke of."

There was a good deal of opposition to the vote for Dodington's salary, and Wainwright advised him—if this sort of thing went on, and he was supposed to owe an obligation to every man who did not vote against him; if he must "work for them in Parliament and treat them in Piccadilly"—to arrange for some equivalent, give up the 500*l.* a year, and "deprive them of the topic." In the end, however, the matter was settled in his favour, and the vote was passed without a division and with only a few words of objection which never "rose to the shadow of a debate."

In 1736, Wainwright reported that affairs went on very quietly from respect to the Duke (of Dorset), though he did not believe this would last:—

> "When we are at peace, and marching on cheerfully and quietly, a mine is sprung, and the engineer protests he had no thoughts of disturbing the General or the army, but there were two or three fellows that he had a mind to toss into the air, or to beat their brains out. . . . An Englishman turning Irish is like a dog running wild and herding with wolves; he has his own domestic tricks to add to their savage dispositions."

A letter from Dr. Lewis Bruce gives an account of the discussion in the House of Lords in February, 1756, in relation to the creeds of the church; and one from Bowes (now Lord Chancellor) describes the tumult in Dublin in December, 1759, on the alarm of an intended union with Britain, when the mob broke every door in the Parliament House, and, surrounding the coach in which the Chief Justice and the Chancellor were sitting, insisted on the latter being sworn that he was against the Union. To this letter Dodington replied very gravely. However diverting the sight might be "of a Chief Justice swearing a Chancellor in the hands of an enraged multitude" it was a thing which he saw with great concern, and the more so because he did not see a remedy. His love of Ireland, he continued, made it very distressing to him to see "a Protestant multitude attack a Protestant government, in a country where all together do not make a sixth of the whole," and though all is said to be quiet again, "methinks we are dancing upon a mine that may spring at once, in the very moment that we imagine we are most entertained and entertaining." He congratulates his friends, however, upon their escape, and also sincerely rejoices at their safety from foes without, "for had not Hawke been more and Conflans less than a man, Ireland must have been as much lost as Minorca." The allusion is, of course, to the sea fight of Quiberon Bay.

There are other interesting letters from Chancellor Bowes, in more than one of which he refers to Lord George Sackville's court martial. "The military trial of one not under that command" is, he says, new to him, and he is wishful to see on what reasons the Attorney and Solicitor-General founded their opinions; it seems strange to him "that the judges saw no ground to doubt of the legality of the jurisdiction of a court martial in the case," and he believes it may be a precedent which may have very ill consequences (p. 74). Several other letters from the Chancellor follow, discussing the political situation in 1760 and 1761, and especially the question of sending bills (particularly money bills) over to the English Parliament. The latest Irish letters in the collection tell of the arrival and favourable reception of the Earl of Halifax in 1761, and the last of all is from Halifax himself. After a toilsome six months, he was preparing to leave Ireland, where, "what with claret and with business," he declared, he was almost dead, although he had been "as sober and busy a lieutenant as any of his late predecessors."

In the text of the Dodington and Knox Reports, proper names are given as spelt by the writers.

S. C. Lomas.

II.—THE MSS. OF CAPTAIN HOWARD VICENTE KNOX.

The manuscripts which form the subject of the following report consist for the most part of the official papers and correspondence of William Knox, best known as Under Secretary for the Colonial Department from 1770 until 1782, when the office was abolished. Knox was born in Ireland, in 1732, and in a memorandum preserved amongst the papers he gives the following account of his ancestry *:—

"My grandfather was of the same family with John Knox, the Scotch reformer, but I know not how nearly related. He married the daughter of Porter, laird of Barnwell, and passed into Ireland as a settler, and took up lands in the lower part of the County Antrim in the latter end of James' or beginning of Charles I.'s reign. He accepted the commission of cornet in a troop raised for the King and commanded by Captain Hamilton, and appears to have been a royalist from principle, for when that troop was taken prisoner in Carrickfergus Castle by Oliver Cromwell, he, with the other officers, refused to be incorporated in Cromwell's guard, with the same rank as they held in their troop. Their lands were accordingly confiscated, but, in hopes that things would come round, they sat themselves down upon portions of their former property, under the new proprietors. At the Restoration they were disappointed, as all Cromwell's grants were confirmed, and no compensation made them. My grandfather had no resource but in the change of his principles from a Royalist to an anti-Stuart, and he brought up his sons in the strongest principles of Whiggism. He lived to see James II. of that race detested, a fugitive in Ireland, and had the satisfaction of numbering his two eldest sons amongst the defenders of Derry and [blank].

"My father was the youngest of his children, and was then too young to carry arms. When the war was over, he was thought to have a turn for the church, and he was sent to Glasgow to be brought up a Presbyterian teacher. The detection of an amour with a bedmaker, it is said, was the cause of his quitting that University, and with it all thoughts of the pastoral cloake, and pursuing the study of physick at Edinburgh, where he received his diploma about the time Bishop Burnett was scheming a union between the churches, he was chosen by the University to convey up to London their demands on the part of Scotland; which introduced him to Bishop Burnett and Archbishop Tillotson. He found the former very ready to admit the claims of the Scotch Church, but the other not so willing to make concessions on the part of the Church of England. The difficulties that opposed themselves to an accommodation he perceived arose more from the claims of the clergy than the difference in their persuasions. Great numbers must necessarily be deprived of their benefices, and neither would give way to the other; nor had the patrons of the Comprension (sic) scheme interest enough with the Administration to obtain pensions for those who should resign.

"My father returned to Ireland, and began to practice physick in Dublin, but finding a city life disagree with his constitution he removed into the country. He married shortly after the youngest daughter, Nicola, of John King, Esq., of Gola, in the county Fermanagh, and fixed at Clonish [Clones], in the county Monaghan, where I was born in the year 1732, the youngest of all his children."

The papers in this collection contain nothing which throws light on William Knox's early life, but he must, as a young man, have shown considerable capacity and intelligence, for, when only four and twenty years of age, he was appointed Provost Marshal of Georgia by Lord Halifax, going out with the new Governor, Henry Ellis, in December, 1756. Knox's narrative of his journey to and proceedings in Georgia will be found on p. 245. Many of the names are indicated only by initials, but these are easily identified by the registers of the proceedings of the Council, the official entries showing that Knox's account of what happened is extremely accurate. At Charlestown, in South Carolina, Knox for the first time met William Henry Lyttelton (then Governor there), afterwards one of his most intimate friends. At first there was a good deal of friction between Ellis and Knox, but gradually the Governor appears to have found out the value of his subordinate, and they became firm friends, as is shown by the many letters from Ellis in the present volume.

* This Memorandum is not calendared in the Report, as it seemed to find its more fitting place in the Introduction. It is written in a copy-book, uniform with that which contains the "Political Anecdotes." It was partly printed i "Notes and Queries," 8th series, Vol. xii.

In 1760, Knox made up his mind to return to England. Neither the climate nor the country of Georgia was agreeable to him, and he complained that the whole burden of affairs lay on his shoulders. His residence in the colony had not, however, been without satisfactory results, as he had set up a plantation there, with every prospect of a good return (p. 82).

Not many weeks later his plans received a sudden check upon the receipt of news of the death of his brother and father. As the desire of ministering to an aged parent had been his strongest reason for wishing to return, he determined to postpone his intended voyage, if he could acquire something better than his present office. His salary and fees together at this time only amounted to 150*l.* per annum, on which he was expected to keep up his position as a member of Council in a land where every necessary of life cost nearly twice what it did at home.

Governor Ellis was, just at this time, going to England, and offered to propose Knox as his lieutenant during his absence, but Knox declined this, partly indeed from the difficulty of carrying on the government without support, but partly also from lack of means. He would have liked the post of English agent with the Indians, urging his knowledge of the people in general and of the Indians in particular, and especially emphasising the need of kindness in the treatment of the latter; it "being ridiculous in the highest degree to think of gaining an influence among a people who are as free as the wild beasts and as jealous of their liberty, by assuming a superiority over them." The expected vacancy, however, did not occur.

In February, 1762, the legislature of Georgia appointed him their agent in England, and he received the King's permission to return. He farmed out his office of Provost Marshal, let his plantation and negroes, and before the end of April was in England (pp. 85, 86).

At the end of the year 1762, when the preliminaries of the Peace of Paris were under discussion, Knox was brought to the notice of Lord Shelburne, as able to give him valuable information and assistance in regard to the provinces of Florida and Louisiana, the acquisition of which was treated by the Opposition as a matter of no importance.

Lord Shelburne, soon after, gave him a commission to execute in Paris of "a pretty hazardous nature," it being in fact to procure, out of the French King's bureaux, maps and plans of the French islands and fortifications in the West Indies; but, on reaching Paris, Knox found that, some short while before, a draft had been purloined for the Duke of Cumberland, in consequence of which the Government had taken precautions, and there was no longer a chance of anything being obtained.

Shortly before going to France, Knox was introduced to Charles Townshend, "and became very intimate with him." While in Paris he sent a long letter to Townshend giving his impressions of the country and the people, and ending with a description of his most Christian Majesty, attended by a procession of all his ministers and great officers of State, setting out to shoot partridges (p. 88).

The English statesman whom Knox most heartily admired, and with whose views he was in fullest sympathy, was George Grenville. His connexion with Grenville had already begun when he returned from France, and from that time he never thought of leaving him "either in or out of office." In November, 1764, he sent Grenville a paper—probably that called "Hints relative to our Commerce" (p. 286)—some of the materials for which had been collected during his visit to France, desiring Grenville, if he found anything "worth adopting," to make it his own with confidence, as it was meant only for his use.

Two intimate conversations at Wotton are recorded on pp. 250, 252. Knox's friends, Lyttelton and Ellis, shared his admiration for Grenville, and were greatly pleased by the intimacy. Lyttelton, in 1767, congratulated him on having paid a visit > "to a man who will know how to do justice to your talents, and who is himself such a fund of useful knowledge that everybody who frequents him must improve from his conversation, especially when matters of government are in question."

In June, 1768, Grenville sent Knox a long letter, chiefly on the subject of preventing the American Colonies from manufacturing their own raw materials, a possibility which filled the minds of English statesmen and English merchants with dismay. Grenville believed that to stop all manufacture was an impossibility, and that "the attempting to do it by force, notwithstanding what Lord Chatham declared in the House of Commons, of 'filling their towns with troops and their ports with ships of war,'* would be most violent and unjust," but urged that every encouragement should be given them to produce and export raw materials. His letter ends by a strong protest against giving up Great Britain's right of taxation, and, as the inevitable consequence, her right of sovereignty, "which is inseparable from it, in all ages and in all countries" (p. 96).

This was followed by another letter on the same subject. Knox was in favour of the plan proposed by Franklin, that the taxes should be, as it were, compounded for; that each colony should furnish a certain quota, and that all taxes should cease to be imposed, except in case of refusal by any colony to provide its contingent.

> "To such a surrender," Grenville wrote, "I can never be a party, as I think it the highest species of treason against the constitution and sovereign authority

* In his letter of Aug. 15 (printed in Knox's Extra Official State Papers) Grenville alludes to this at more length, saying that he would never give up the right of taxation, but could not "go as far as Lord Chatham did, by his solemn declaration in full Parliament in his speech for repealing the Stamp Act, that 'if the Americans should manufacture a lock of wool or a horse-shoe, he would fill their ports with ships and their towns with troops.'" of this kingdom to deprive it of one-fourth of its subjects ; but tho' I cannot adopt nor approve of such a plan, yet I can submit to it, . . . and so far I am from thinking, if I had the power, that I have a right to carry matters to extremity, as you tell me it is supposed I would . . . that if I were to see the King, the Parliament and the people ready to run into extremes on that side, I would employ all the means in my power to prevent it" (p. 7).

Many other letters follow upon this subject and others allied to it. At this time Knox was diligently writing on political matters. On Sept. 11 Grenville congratulated him on having almost got through the tedious business of correcting for the Press, and hoped soon to have the pleasure of seeing his "performance upon the State of the Nation" complete. A month later he assures Knox that he has read the papers sent him with the greatest pleasure.

"They are written with so much temper and force, with so much knowledge and precision, that I am persuaded they will do you great honour, if ever you shall think fit to avow yourself as the author of them.* The general principles laid down in them correspond so much with my declared opinions, and are so favourable to the public measures I have pursued, that to express any approbation of them to you, who are so perfectly acquainted with both, must be unnecessary. I will therefore only return you my sincere thanks, both as a public man and as a mere individual, for having put them in so clear and advantageous a light."

After criticizing certain points, Grenville concludes: "I rejoice to hear that a work of this national importance . . . is likely to be as universally circulated as it deserves" (pp. 101, 2). While Grenville thus showered generous praise upon Knox, the latter showed that he still looked up to his leader for advice and counsel, and Grenville's next letter is a careful reply to questions which Knox had propounded to him (p. 103).

In 1765 Knox married Letitia, daughter of James Ford, Esq., of Dublin, and in either 1766 or 1767 a son was born, to whom Lyttelton stood godfather. This child died in infancy, but in 1768 a little daughter arrived, whose "spiritual direction" was undertaken by Lord Clare ; and in 1769 Lyttelton's hope of having another godson to replace the one he had lost was fulfilled.

During the summer of 1770 Knox was appointed joint Under Secretary with John Pownall for the colonies, and served successively under Hillsborough, Dartmouth and Lord G. Germain until the suppression of the department in 1782. Germain and Knox appear to have worked very harmoniously together. Lord George's letters are business-like, but always courteous, and he evidently appreciated his subordinate's superior knowledge and experience in relation to America. Sometimes he made alterations in Knox's drafts (see pp. 126, 135, 149) ; occasionally he demurred, but did not alter, as in a letter written in September, 1777.

"I like the letter to Sir G. Carleton very well in general. I had rather not have said that the information which Haldimand was to receive could not fail of being of the greatest use in the conduct of his administration. As I do not believe a word of that sentence, you must absolve me from the crime of signing what I do not think true" (p. 138).

This, however, was only a question of opinion. If the "useful information" was to come from Carleton, Germain would naturally protest against the compliment, as (in spite of his assurances to the contrary) he disliked Carleton extremely. In matters of policy or the conduct of the war it is not to be supposed that Knox's voice would have great weight. In fact, Lord George would appear to have been only too ready (with the King's support) to undertake the control of military operations. It may be, however, that he was not personally so responsible as is sometimes supposed. On p. 132 is a letter from him to Carleton, evidently in reply to a protest from that commander against the powers exercised by the Secretary in regard to military affairs. Business of such importance, he assured Sir Guy, received the fullest consideration from his Majesty's principal servants, and was then submitted to the King, who, after mature deliberation, gave such orders as he thought proper. The execution only of these orders belonged to the secretary's department, and for the manner, but not for the matter of the despatches must he be held responsible. In some cases Germain went even further, for in July, 1778, after he had received his instructions for a letter to the Commissioners in America, and had had the draft drawn up and revised it, he desired that Lord North, some other ministers, "and in short the whole cabinet, if possible," should see the despatch before he signed it.

* This treatise, published anonymously, was very generally supposed to be the work of Grenville himself.

Knox was by no means so opposed to concessions to the colonies as was his chief, although he was quite as strongly convinced that England's sovereignty over them must be maintained at all costs. It has been seen that he advocated the abandonment of all taxation, supporting the idea of some voluntary proposal as an equivalent; nay, he went further, and thought that "there were many unjust as well as unpolitic restraints upon the colonies which ought to be taken off."*

Not only Grenville and Germain, but North and Thurlow, valued Knox's opinion and sought his help. In August, 1778, Lord North desired to consult him in relation to compensation for the American loyalists.

"Nobody," he wrote, "knows better than you do what difficulties are in the way, or is better able to point out the proper methods of surmounting them" (p. 146); and again, as to the position of General Clinton, "I mention this to you for your consideration, for perhaps you may agree with me that care should be taken, &c." (ibid.).

Germain states also that North "had a kindness" for Knox, and used to talk confidentially with him, a view which is certainly borne out by the account of the interview of which Lord George was speaking (p. 274).

Knox's acquaintance with Thurlow began when General Burgoyne called for an enquiry into the cause of his miscarriage at Saratoga. Thurlow, then Attorney-General, came to Knox for information as to "the motives, measures and failure of the expedition," and the Under Secretary at once put into his hands a precis which he had drawn up (according to his annual custom) of the letters of that year. Thurlow examined it and exclaimed:—

"'Why, this is the very thing I wanted, and you have done it already; pray, do the ministers know of this?' 'Yes, Sir, they have all had copies of it.' 'Then,

* His sympathy with Ireland, as regards the irritating restraints imposed upon her trade, helped to widen his view, and he hoped to be able to comprehend his own country in any indulgences given to America (p. 258). See also his pamphlet, published in 1765, The Claim of the Colonies Examined.

by God, they have never read it, for there is not one of them knows a tittle of the matter'" (p. 270).

From that time Thurlow was always very civil to Knox, who regularly visited him at his levées after he became Chancellor, and in time was admitted to a closer intercourse, an account of which will be found on p. 298.

In the spring of 1782 the suppression of the American department deprived Knox of his office, while the "fatal revolt of New York and Georgia" had left him without income from his American property. After the recovery of Georgia, he had indeed re-established his plantations there, and towards the end of 1783 his private fortune had so far recovered itself that he was able to buy an estate in Wales, and to ask the King for the baronetcy which his circumstances had not allowed him to demand in compensation for the loss of his office in 1782 (p. 193). He states elsewhere * that he had a definite promise of this baronetcy from the King, but the promise was never fulfilled. Moreover, when the time came for settling the compensation to be given to the American loyalists, Knox found to his dismay that his name was "placed in the class of neutrals, or such as had rendered no service to the King during the war," and this although the State of Georgia had passed an act for the sole purpose of confiscating his property, on the ground "that he had always shown himself inimical to the liberties of America, and was then, as Under Secretary of State, counselling and advising the King of Great Britain in his arbitrary and tyrannical designs." A full statement of his grievances will be found in his "Case" and memorial to the King on pp. 196, 197. His own belief was that by his efforts to preserve English trade and navigation from being sacrificed to America, he had "excited the enmity of Mr. Pitt and of the omniscient Mr. Rose."†

For the rest, he entirely disclaimed any hostility to ministers, and enumerated the many occasions on which he had given help to Government. Yet the only attention he had received was the offer of a knighthood, when he "came up with the address from Pembrokeshire." This was in 1786, when he was appointed High Sheriff for the county (p. 195). The offer of knighthood was not likely to be very gratifying to a man who believed himself entitled to a baronetcy.

This neglect made Knox very bitter against the Government in general and Pitt in particular; and on May 25, 1788, he wrote to Lord Walsingham announcing his adherence to "a middle party (i.e., Lord Rawdon's) that has sprung up from the inattention and partiality of Mr. Pitt in disposing of offices":—

"Look then into the offices and say how they are filled? is the common exclamation of the gentlemen I allude to. Behold two Secretaries of State [Sydney and Carmarthen] who cannot write a sentence of English, Commissioners of the Treasury who do not understand arithmetic, and Commissioners of the Admiralty who do not know larboard from starboard. . . . His two substitutes for Secretaries of State, Lord Hawkesbury and Mr. Dundas, are certainly able, but they are both much disliked, and one of them at least suspected of want of sincerity. . . . Perhaps it was wise in so young a man to decline the assistance of the

* In a letter in the possession of Capt. Knox, but mislaid, and therefore not calendared.

† See letter to Eden, dated 19th December, 1785; British Museum, Add. MS., 24, 428 f. 280.

follow in 1768–70, and then either the correspondence flagged or the letters have not been preserved. A short note in 1777, when Lyttelton had become Lord Westcote, urges Knox to come down and taste the lampreys and venison of Hagley; then silence again until 1782, when he expresses his satisfaction that the power was in Shelburne's hands (rather than in those of any other opponent of Lord North), as he had always had a very high opinion of his talents, although widely differing from him in political sentiments.

The letters during the next twenty years are few and far between, although always affectionate and intimate in tone; but there are two written within a very short time of each other, in April, 1803. In the earlier of these he says:—"I am in mourning for my very old cousin, Lady Chatham, who survived all her brothers many years. It is no personal loss to me, for she lived at so great a distance from me that I have had no society with her for a long time past." Lady Chatham lived, during the last years of her life, at Burton Pynsent in Somersetshire, the estate which had been bequeathed to her husband by a devoted admirer. The letter written a week or two later than the above ends with a frankly personal outlook upon public affairs, so naïve as to be amusing. "Upon the whole, I will only say 'give peace in the remaining part of my time, O Lord,' for had the war with its income tax continued my affairs would have been much deranged" (p. 217).

In 1805 he mentions that his much lamented friend Champion had left him his library as a legacy. This was Anthony Champion, an old schoolfellow of Lyttelton's, who edited his poems.

His last letter is dated Jan. 4, 1807:—

> "I will not omit to tell you, my very worthy old friend, that I am this day completely eighty-two years old, and shall give and partake of a cheerful dinner with some of my neighbours. What a pleasure would it be if I could add you to their number! Yet I will not propose a journey to you in the winter; I believe I shall outlive it and shall be happy in your company if you will favour me with a visit in any one of the next summer months."

The old man's belief was well-founded, for he lived until the autumn of 1808; but there are no more letters from him in the collection, and so the curtain rings down upon a friendship which had lasted for fifty years.

Next in order amongst Knox's correspondents is Henry Ellis, ex-Governor of Georgia,* under whom Knox had worked when Provost Marshal of that province. After leaving America, Ellis led a wandering life, apparently in search of health, and, from the summer of 1774, seems to have spent most of his time at Spa. His letters give the gossip of that fashionable watering-place, intermixed with comments and reflections upon public affairs. He was a bitter opponent of the Americans, and found it impossible to conceive that they could hold their own against England. "The ignorance of people upon the continent," who thought such a thing possible, struck him as amazing (p. 112). As time went on, however, his optimism forsook him, and he became "very miserable" in regard to the political outlook (p. 143). He spent the winter of 1778–9 at Marseilles "very agreeably, particularly as none of my own country-folks were there, who are the most restless and discontented people upon earth." A general order had excluded all British subjects from the ports of France, but Ellis obtained an exception from King Louis in his favour, and associated freely with the French, who treated him with "uncommon attention." In 1780 the King of Sweden was at Spa, and Ellis, whom he distinguished by his notice, pronounced him "one of the most amiable and captivating princes" he had ever seen. Gustavus III. praised the King of England as "a most worthy and well informed prince," and begged the Governor, on his return to England, to assure his Majesty that he should never forget the good he had done him. Ellis could not tell what this good was, but said it seemed to have made a great impression on the King of Sweden's mind.

* Best known by his "Voyage to Hudson's Bay," written after his return from the expedition in search of the North West passage in 1746. He was made a Fellow of the Royal Society in 1749.

In the winter of 1780–81 Ellis was again in the south of France, where he found the people so "warmly attached to their prince and to the honour of their country" that faction dared not show its head a moment. Although the effects of the war were pretty severely felt, there was no appearance of discontent, and hardly any murmuring. So little did he suspect the storm that was soon to burst over the land. Some suspicion had, however, as he said, crept in, in relation to Neckar's publication of the state of the Finances (which at first had produced a most favourable sensation), and an officer declared to him that there were above 160 millions of debt concealed from the public (p. 176). A few weeks later he mentions Neckar's fall.

Ellis, like Knox, suffered severely from the loss of his American possessions, and the close of his life was clouded by financial anxieties in consequence of the threatened failure of the bank into which he had put much of his capital. In August, 1805, there was a violent earthquake at Naples, where he then was, and he had a fall, followed by a paralytic attack. From this he partially recovered, but the improvement was only transitory, and he died on Jan. 28, 1806 (pp. 223, 224).

Intimately associated with Governor Ellis was George Cressener, who sent Knox letters of news concerning foreign affairs. He was a shrewder observer than Ellis, and from the first was doubtful as to the issue of the quarrel with America, emphasising especially the smallness of the English force there and the need "to ensure success by numbers." But he was just as bitterly hostile to the insurgents, and spoke of the Bostonians as men in a high fever, whom bleeding only could bring to their senses (p. 117). In this same letter he gives an anecdote showing the violent temper of the Prince Royal of Prussia, who in the following year became King Frederick William II. "Judge," he concludes, "what a king he will make, with such a fiery disposition." In his next letter he alludes to the effect which Montcalm's letters must have produced, writing with evidently no doubts as to their authenticity. In the spring of 1777, Cressener lost his wife, and appears to have left Bonn (whence all his letters are dated) and gone to join Ellis at Spa (pp. 129, 135). Although he does not seem to have kept up his correspondence with Knox, his friend's optimistic despatches always had a hearty welcome from him, giving him, as Ellis said, new life when he was in a desponding condition.

Amongst Knox's other correspondents may be mentioned Lord Clare, with whom he was evidently on very intimate terms, and who was godfather to his eldest daughter; his fellow Under Secretary, John Pownall, from whom there are many letters in the collection; Lord Hillsborough; Sir Grey Cooper, who quotes Shakespeare and Swift in one of his letters, and in another says that he is so anxious about public affairs that he still "ingeminates the sigh of Falkland;" and Lord Rawdon, from whom there are two long letters on the position taken up by himself and his friends in 1789. In one of these he gives Knox the excellent advice already alluded to, against too bitter an attack upon his adversaries (pp. 203, 205).

The second section of the papers in this collection contains letters and documents relating to Ireland, the earliest letter writers being Sir Lucius O'Brien and Sir John Blacquiere, who in 1776–1778 discussed matters of trade, especially in relation to exports and imports and the fishery (pp. 231–233, 236).

In 1778 are many letters from Sir Richard Heron on the same subjects. He also alludes to the attempts made at this time to relieve the Roman Catholics of Ireland from their disabilities. The most violent opposition was expected "against repealing the gavelling clause, which the Roman Catholics abhor, and their opposers—even moderate men—consider as the palladium of Ireland." Dean Tucker, of Gloucester, wrote, somewhat later, that as regards the repeal of the persecuting laws, he had one short remark to make: "that when the Papists are reforming the very worst and most mischievous parts of their religion by their open disavowal of persecution, some of us, who call ourselves Protestant, adopt those very principles which they are casting off."

Other correspondents in Ireland are Edmund Pery, General Cunningham (on the Mutiny Bill), William Eden, the Marquis of Buckingham (acknowledging a letter from Knox containing praise of his "ever dear and honoured father," George Grenville), and Archdeacon Hastings in relation to the publication of Knox's "Extra Official State Papers."

The last document relating to Ireland is a paper by Knox on the question of Emancipation, in which, referring to the doctrine of the Real Presence, he observes:—"The only difference is that the Catholics believe more than the Church of England. The latter inculcates the belief of a spiritual eating the flesh of Christ, the Catholics believe that they eat it carnally, but the Protestant dissenter denies both, and is therefore further removed from the Church of England than is the Catholic."

Following the Irish papers are Reminiscences, Political Anecdotes, &c. Knox's proceedings in Georgia and his conversations with George Grenville have already been mentioned. These are followed by the circumstances of Lord Hillsborough's resignation in 1772, Anecdotes at Spa, and a memorandum on the proceedings attending Lord G. Germain's appointment as Secretary of State for the Colonies. A difficulty had hitherto been made in considering the American Secretary as a Secretary of State at all. Lord Hillsborough " was only held to be first Lord of Trade with Seals and Cabinet." Lord Dartmouth's commission was the same, and Lord Weymouth had refused the department on that very account. Lord George being a commoner,

" it became necessary to make some alteration in his commission, for the former commission made it a new office and consequently excluded him from the House of Commons. A commission in the terms of those of the other Secretaries obviated this difficulty, for there were precedents of three persons being at the same time Secretaries of State."

But opposition was expected, especially from Lord Weymouth. "The King, by one of those minute strokes for which he is so eminent, removed all difficulty." When Council met, and the Lord President moved that Lord Weymouth might be sworn, the King replied: " There are two Secretaries of State to be sworn; let them both be sworn together "; which was done accordingly. Lord Weymouth perfectly understood the King, and accepted the situation (p. 256).

Next follow papers in relation to America; a sketch of the King's speech to his Cabinet on June 21, 1779—when " he sat down at the head of his library table, and desired for the first time since he became King all the ministers to sit down " (p. 260)—and a note on the proposed changes in July, 1779.

A quarto copy-book contains a number of personal sketches, entitled " Curious Political Anecdotes." The first gives an account of an audience of Lord Rockingham, as narrated by the King to Lord G. Germain. In the course of it, Rockingham alluded to the fact that he always received his rents :—

" As I found," said the King, " I was in to be treated with a long harangue, I thought this was a good opportunity to make him shorten it by diverting him from his subject, and asked him how he managed so well. This made him talk a little about his own affairs, and took him out of his speech; and when he came to resume it again, he could not take it up in form, but huddled the substance together."

Lord Rockingham urged the importance of liberty to export woollen cloth from Ireland :—

" But," said the King, " I could not help observing how people are affected by their particular interest, for I was talking of what Lord Rockingham proposed to Lord Hertford, and he said the exportation of woollens would do nothing for Ireland: advantages in the linen were the things wanting " (p. 266).

Sir William Howe, Lord Hillsborough, William Eden, Wedderburn, Thomas Hussey are in turn the subjects of sketches; followed by one on Lord Thurlow, part of which, in relation to Knox, has already been quoted. A curious little anecdote is told of Thurlow in relation to the proposal to apprehend Handcock, Adams and other American leaders. The two under secretaries were in the outer room awaiting the end of a sitting of the Cabinet when Thurlow, then Attorney-General, came out :—

" ' Well,' cried Pownall, ' is it done ? ' ' No,' answered Thurlow, ' nothing is done. Don't you see,' added he, ' that they want to throw the whole responsibility of the business upon the Solicitor-General and me, and who would be such damned fools as to risk themselves for such——fellows as these. Now if it was George Grenville, who was so damned obstinate that he would go to hell with you before he would desert you, there would be some sense in it.' He walked off, and the project was dropped."

An account of a Cabinet meeting on " the Dutch business " in 1780 states that Lord North and the President (Bathurst)

" fell asleep as soon as the business was opened; Lord Hillsborough nodded and dropt his hat; Lord Sandwich was overcome at first, but rubbed his eyes and seemed attentive; Lord Amherst kept awake but said nothing. Lord Stormont, the reader of these important papers, the Chancellor and Lord George Germain only gave them consideration, but when the others awoke, they approved of what was proposed."

There is a long account of the circumstances which preceded Lord G. Germain's removal in 1782. On Jan. 18 Germain had a final meeting with Lord North on the subject of America:—

"The conference lasted an hour, and the report Lord George made to me [Knox] of it was to this effect. Lord North said it was impossible to continue the war; that America was lost, and it was vain to think of recovering it. Lord George offered to treat upon the uti possidetis, but that, Lord North said, they would not accept; nothing but independence would do, and that, Lord George said, would never be given by him, and therefore, if such was his purpose, he must look out for another Secretary of State. . . . In the conversation, Lord North said there was no objection to Lord George's person, but to his declared principle of never consenting to independence, which made the difficulty; 'and yet,' says he, 'your being out of the way won't mend matters, for the King is of the same opinion.' Some days later the King told Germain that Lord North had spoken of the necessity for his going out, because of his avowed principle of treating with America upon any footing but preservation of sovereignty. 'If you mean by his going out,' said the King, 'to relinquish that principle, you must make other removes.' 'No,' replies Lord North, 'for no one else has declared that principle.' 'Yes,' says the King, 'you must go further; you must remove ME'" (pp. 275, 276).

After a paper on Lord Thurlow, giving the story of "the Regency business" in the Chancellor's own words, there follows a sketch of Charles Townshend. Knox accompanied him home after the debate in the Lords on the Cyder Bill (in 1763), against which forty Lords voted, and which he thought a death blow to Lord Bute's administration; and as Lady Dalkeith (his wife) and Knox sat at supper, which he never eat, he walked about the room, entertaining them with his observations upon what had passed that day, in his eccentric manner:—

"'The Burial is gone by, Knox (says he); Lord Pomfret and Lord Denbigh, the two black staves men. Whose funeral is that? Lord Bute's. Then comes Lord Hillsborough, tolling the big bell—bum, bum!' These three were the only lords that had declared themselves attached to Lord Bute in the debate, and their manner of speaking, which he took off, made the allusion highly ridiculous. 'Do you know (says he again) the meaning of the other speeches you heard?' The Duke of Newcastle said, 'My Lord Bute, you thought it was an easy thing to govern this country through the King's favour. Now I can tell you that, altho' I had as full possession of the late King as you have of the present, I found it necessary to take the great connexions of the country with me, which you are endeavouring to break and oppose; but take my word for it, you will find your seat at the Treasury an uneasy one if you don't change your plan, of which what passes here this night is only a specimen.' Then Lord Mansfield. 'My Lord Bute, you gave me reason to think I should be of your cabinet, but you have neglected me. . . . I will now show you that I can punish you if I choose to do it, but as I don't mean to break with you, but only to teach you to behave better for the future, I will bring you off now.'"

Townshend's manner of reading a book, Knox says, was curious:—

"He turned over the leaves at the beginning extremely quick, first glancing at the middle of each page. 'That's all preface,' says he. He then ran over the facts with more attention, and when he had gone through them, turned over the remainder of the leaves as he had done the beginning, saying, 'that's all conclusion, I can do that myself,' and he received oral communications in the same manner, always confining the narrator to the fact."

The sketch closes with an entertaining account of the advice given by Townshend to Yorke, when the latter was offered the choice of being Attorney-General or Master of the Rolls in 1764. Before deciding he came to consult Townshend.

"That is (said Townshend to Knox) he wishes much to take one of them, and to throw the blame of his quitting the Opposition upon me. We are very good friends, but I'll be cursed if he makes me his stalking horse to get into office. So go into the next room when he comes, and stay till he is gone, and then I'll tell you what has passed.' When he called me in, he began with laughing most heartily. 'My poor friend (says he) came to me under great embarrassment for my advice, and I think I have sent him away ten times more embarrassed than he came.' "

And, truly, so he did, for Townshend put before him the pros and cons for each of the offices in so bewildering a manner, that Yorke waited and hesitated until he (for the time being) lost both.

The subject of the last sketch is Lord Lansdowne.* Knox's intercourse with him in 1763 has already been mentioned. After that, they met but little until his Lordship (then Earl of Shelburne) brought the seals of the Southern and American Departments to Whitehall in 1782, when he held out hopes of continuance in office, or at any rate of ample compensation, to the Under Secretary, who had then been in harness for nearly twelve years. Knox was not greatly inclined to work under him, and this feeling was shared by others, "Pollock's terror and Sir Stanier Porten's exclamation of 'God be thanked I am not to be under you again' making him feel happy to be at liberty to withdraw."

"Sir Richard Sutton had long ago told me that of all ministers, Lord Lansdowne was the most difficult to please. He was never satisfied with what anyone did, or even with what he did himself, but altered and changed without end. As an instance, he mentioned his having prepared a draft of a despatch for Tuesday's mail. His Lordship directed him to alter and write it over again for his signing in the evening." More alterations and fresh transcripts followed, and "before the letter was sent off, it had been nine times transcribed, and the Friday night's mails detained for it till two in the morning" (p. 283).

Knox's own experience soon proved to him that it was not without reason those who had served with Shelburne in office "abhorred him as a principal." He attended day after day without being able to obtain instructions, and was finally sent for between ten and eleven o'clock on a Sunday night, when he positively refused to go. The Earl made Knox inform him of the reason and purpose of every order and movement during the progress of the late war with America, but was so ill-informed of its geography that Knox had "to lead him through the map and describe the country" as he went along.

Some miscellaneous papers, chiefly in relation to American affairs, are followed by letters and other documents on the subject of presents to the North American Indians, a business in which Knox was actively concerned. The value of those sent out in the years 1775–1779 amounted to about 87,500*l.*, and in 1781 the demands made by the officers charged with their distribution fell little short of 55,000*l.*, without reckoning charges of freight or delivery (pp. 293, 294).

On this head, there is an interesting letter amongst the Stopford Sackville papers (8to ed. vol. ii, p. 252) written by Lieut.-Col. Benj. Thompson in January, 1782, declaring that unless the expenses of the department could be reduced, he should certainly vote for its abolition, for the expenditure of late had been enormous, and the advantages derived from the Indians "perfectly trifling."

An incident showing the temptations to which an official was * Always spelt "Lansdown" by Knox.

exposed in the management of such matters occurred in 1782, when a merchant to whom Knox had applied refused to do anything because Knox rejected his proposal of laying an extra profit of 6,000*l.* upon the goods, and dividing it between themselves. This, as Knox said, showed the danger of employing traders to do business for government, as their own interest "suppresses all feelings for the public service."

On p. 294 will be found a list of things, useful and decorative, which were chosen for the Indians round Niagara.

After the text of the present volume was completed, Captain Knox found and sent up a packet of letters from Dr. Philip Skelton, which it was thought a pity to exclude. They, therefore, form a short supplementary report at the end of the volume. Dr. Skelton, whose name is said to be even yet remembered in Donegal for his goodness and charity,* was a learned divine, who wrote much, and delighted in buying books. But his life was devoted to the service of his poor parishioners, and twice, in time of famine, he sold his library in order to feed his people. In 1770 he published his collected works by subscription, designing the profits to be given to the Foundling and Magdalen Hospitals. He had not, he said, helped to fill either of these institutions, but those who had done so refused to support them (p. 442).

His letters are written in a tone of deep despondency in regard to England and England's future, but are full of loving kindness to his friends and desire to help his fellow-men. He eagerly accepted and carefully distributed contributions sent to him for his poor weavers; but in spite of his goodness to them, his Ulster parish gradually became a hotbed of discontent, and in 1780 the old man withdrew to Dublin, where he died in 1787.

The editor is indebted to Capt. Howard Vicente Knox (great-great grandson of William Knox, and the present owner of the MSS.) for the information that after Knox's death they went to Lady Dillon (Letitia Knox), his daughter, who arranged and docketed the letters. All endorsements, not in Knox's own handwriting, are hers. From her the collection passed to Miss Carew-Smyth, Knox's grand-daughter, who passed them on, in or about 1889, to Capt. H. V. Knox and his wife. A few of the letters calendared in this report are printed, partially, in Knox's "Extra Official State Papers," but have been included in this volume, in order not to break the continuity of the correspondence, and the rather, as Knox's book has long been out of print.

In a small packet with the letters is a silver tinselled, jewelled leek, and a note by Lady Dillon, saying "This was given to my dear Father by the Prince of Wales on St. David's Day [1810], who took it out of his hat, asking my father to give him his in exchange, saying they would exchange again next year on St. David's Day, but, alas, my dear Father had passed away before that date."

At the British Museum (Add. MSS. 34413; 21703; 18902) there are letters from Knox to William Eden, General Haldimand and George Chalmers. A list of his writings is annexed to his life in the Dictionary of National Biography.

S. C. Lomas.

* See his Life in the Dictionary of National Biography.

III.—MSS. OF CORNWALLIS WYKEHAM-MARTIN, Esq.

This selection of letters addressed to Admiral the Honourable Sir William Cornwallis, G.C.B., although without claim to any very high importance in a historical sense, possesses interest of various kinds naturally arising out of the Admiral's own position and achievements. He belonged by birth to two famous English families which reached a very high point of renown and prosperity during his own lifetime. His long and distinguished services embraced the most glorious period in the naval annals of Great Britain. And while the earlier letters present a most pleasing picture of English family life, of union firmly knit by pure affection, governed by high principle, and directed to worthy aims, many of those of a later date are the unstudied effusions of great seamen, whose deeds lend undying lustre to our national records.

Sir William Cornwallis, born on February 20, 1744, was the fourth son and youngest child of the fifth Viscount and first Earl Cornwallis, by a marriage with the eldest daughter of Viscount Townshend, a leading statesman in the reign of George I. He appears to have entered the navy at the age of eleven. When the correspondence opens in April, 1761, we find him sharing as a Lieutenant of the Thunderer under Captain Proby the glory of a successful action with a Spanish frigate near Cadiz. There are only a few letters to him from his father, all written in the course of that year. They are affectionate and full of good counsel, urging him particularly to cultivate the esteem and friendship of his superior officers as the surest means of professional advancement, and pointing to the example of his eldest brother, Lord Brome, who, at the age of twenty-three, already commanded a regiment in Germany with great reputation. A letter from Brome himself, overflowing with fraternal regard and with grief for the recent death of their brother Harry in Germany, belongs to the same period. The Earl died in 1762, leaving his two younger sons, James and William, still minors, and but slenderly provided for, under the guardianship of their mother. James, who had gone to Merton College, Oxford, soon won a fellowship, and entering the Church under the favouring auspices of his uncle, Frederic Cornwallis, Archbishop of Canterbury, obtained rapid preferment. Having thus happily got her elder charge "off her hands," all Lady Cornwallis's cares and aspirations centred in William, her favourite child. All her efforts and resources were employed in pushing him forward in the navy. Having obtained for him from Lord Halifax, now at the head of the Admiralty, the command of a schooner in which he sailed for the West Indies, she set her heart on having him promoted to the rank of post-captain before the close of the Seven Years' war.

The Whig party, to which the Cornwallis and Townshend family belonged, had been ejected from office. Party spirit ran high, and promotion depended on political patronage. It was only by bringing social influence and personal charm to bear on reluctant Ministers that the Dowager Countess could hope to accomplish her aim. And the exulting sense of desert with which, intent on compelling her son's approval, she unfolds to him the skilful manœuvres by which, with the help not only of confederates of her own sex, but of Admirals Burnaby, Keppel, and Rodney, she obtained promises of the coveted rank from Lord Halifax and his successor Lord Egmont, is delightful. Meantime the schooner Swift, which William commanded, was cast on a desert island. By the strenuous exertions of captain and crew the vessel was saved, and made its way in much hardship and peril to Jamaica. Cornwallis at least must have found ample compensation for his misfortune in the generous solicitude which it evoked. His eldest brother, who seems always to have made his interests an object of particular concern, and his unmarried sister Mary eagerly contended for the privilege of making good his losses. But his mother jealously asserted a superior claim. "I told them," she wrote, "I was able to assist you with whatever you wanted, and I would give up that pleasure to nobody." It appears, however, from a letter written to him by Admiral Keppel, that her efforts to have him posted were frustrated by some blunder or change of purpose on the part of Admiral Burnaby, who commanded in the West Indies; and her mortification on this account was not lessened by a display of professional sensitiveness which must have appeared to her ungracious, if not ungrateful. William seems to have thought that her eagerness for his promotion outran discretion, and to have asked her to abstain from any further application to the Admiralty on his behalf. Thenceforward she schooled herself to a severe control of indiscreet feeling. "All her happiness," she told him with touching submission, "consisted in obeying his wishes." In 1765 the Whigs, returning to office for a brief period under Lord Rockingham, conferred on him the rank so much coveted for him by all his family.

Some of the early letters of the Dowager Countess give current news of social or political events. Notwithstanding her staunch loyalty she seems to have sympathised with Wilkes in his struggle with the Crown. In a letter written in 1763 during the political crisis provoked by George Grenville's arrogant lectures to George III., we have a striking picture of the Great Commoner passing in his "gouty chair" through the crowded park from Buckingham House, after a prolonged interview with the King, during which the Prime Minister, calling to administer his daily admonition, found the Royal closet closed against him. In the interval of peace between the Seven Years' war and the war of American Independence the correspondence is broken by long and frequent blanks. Captain Cornwallis seems to have been for the greater part of this time absent from England on foreign service. During the year 1770, his sister Mary, who had married Mr. Whitbread, sent him news of the day, and contributed to his comfort at sea by liberal supplies of porter from her husband's brewery. The evidence afforded by her letters of a most amiable and generous nature leaves a feeling of regret for her premature, death. In 1771 Captain Blankett, having "come to peep in London," sent Cornwallis a report of what he heard of the particular fortunes of their naval friends, and saw of the general society of the capital. Their friend Stott had taken possession of Falkland Island, and returned safe to Plymouth." Mr. Banks "was going on another expedition to the South Sea, taking Cook as one of his captains." "Cotton still continues idle in regard to our service, and is entered into that of a wife (though he denies it), which probably may be attended with as many storms, hurricanes, and tempests as any frigate in the West Indies." His picture of the general aspect of social life in London at this time is not edifying. "Extravagance," he wrote, "luxury, and gaming are the fashionable vices of the town, and it will astonish you on your return to see the vast improvements of the age. The Lotorie, Macaroni, White's, Almac's, &c., are in the most flourishing state, and cards in all companies are the only things worth living for. A man of taste must play all the morning, or at least four or five games before dinner, which is shortened to give time for the exquisite pleasures of Quinze and Vingt-Un. In fact, idleness and debauchery are so far taken possession of all ranks in society that opposition to the King's measures is a piece of barbarity inconsistent with the manners of the present age. All wit is at Court, all knowledge at the gaming table."

During the war with the American States and their European allies, Captain Cornwallis was constantly on active service, every year adding to his reputation as a brave and skilful officer. In November, 1777, when in command of the Isis frigate on the American station under Lord Howe, he took a prominent part in the attack on Fort Island. In reference to this action his eldest brother, then at Philadelphia, wrote to their mother—"I have the satisfaction of assuring you that William has gained the greatest credit in the face of the whole army and fleet. Lord Howe extols him to the skies." His ship being much damaged, Captain Cornwallis returned in her to England early in 1778. In September of that year we have two short but remarkable letters written to him by his sister-in-law, Jemima Lady Cornwallis. They paint in the gloomiest colours the state of parties in England; an administration, obstinate and incapable, rushing blindly on national disaster; an opposition, in which the spirit of faction has killed every patriotic feeling, rejoicing in public reverses which must soon overwhelm all in common ruin. This picture in some measure reflected the morbid melancholy to which the writer had fallen a victim. She was dying of a broken heart. In 1776 George III. had appointed Lord Cornwallis to a prominent post in the army assembled under Sir William Howe to repress the American revolt. Lady Cornwallis, unable to endure the prospect of separation for an indefinite time from a husband to whom she was tenderly attached, privately contrived, through the influence of their uncle, the Archbishop of Canterbury, with the King, to have the appointment cancelled. But Cornwallis, though devoted to his wife and strongly opposed to the colonial policy of the Government, insisted on joining Howe. He considered military service in time of war as a call of duty which he could not evade without dishonour. At the end of the campaign of 1777 he came home for a few months, returning to New York in April, 1778. His wife, with their children, accompanied him to Portsmouth, where he embarked, and sorrow for this second parting brought on her an illness which proved fatal. When her husband heard of her danger, he threw up his command and hurried back, only to see her die. By her express request no stone was inscribed to her memory, but a thorn was planted on her grave, as nearly as possible over her heart. The bereaved husband in a letter dated May 5, 1779, announced to William, now commanding the Lion man-of-war on the West Indies, that he returned to America not with views of ambition, but because England had become insupportable to him. All the joy had gone out of his life.

In the disorderly battle off Grenada, in July, 1779, between the English and French fleets, commanded by Admirals Byron and D'Estaing, the Lion, being exposed without support to the whole fire of the enemy, was shattered and dismasted. Escaping capture by good fortune, the disabled ship drifted on the current to Jamaica. However inglorious for the British arms, this fight reflected lustre on Captain Cornwallis. Admiral Barrington, second in command to Byron, on returning to England in very bad humour with the general conduct and condition of the fleet, spread his praises everywhere. His brother James, already Dean of Canterbury, his uncle the Archbishop, and Captain Leveson Gower wrote to assure him that his valour and seamanship were the theme of every tongue. Lord Cornwallis, still plunged in grief for his irreparable loss, sent him cordial congratulations from New York. "God bless you" the letter ends, "May success, honour and riches attend you. Mind I put honour first, which you will approve of." Later in the same year Lord Cornwallis wrote to his mother: "For myself I have in this world neither hopes nor fears. I will endeavour to do my duty to my country and be honest; and then, with perfect resignation to His will, I will put my trust in God's mercy."

Early in 1780, Captain Cornwallis, being in command of a small squadron in the West Indies, encountered a stronger French force under Admiral La Mothe Piquet, and bore off the honour of the day. At a time when the public mind in England was depressed by repeated defeat, and hostile fleets rode triumphant in the Channel, this partial success, to which the official report of Admiral Sir Peter Parker did full justice, seems to have caused a considerable sensation. Sir George Rodney, much dissatisfied with the conduct of some of his own captains, wrote to Captain Cornwallis from Sandwich in July: "To have you with me will make me very happy, as I should then be certain of being well supported. . . . Once more I can only say, to have you with me will be the greatest favour the Admiralty can show me." At the end of the year Admiral Parker despatched Cornwallis to England in charge of a large convoy.

During these events in the West Indies the mind of the old Dowager Countess, as exhibited in her letters, was a constant tumult of excitement. Her joy and pride in the rising fame of her favourite son, and the compliments showered on him from all quarters, which she fondly treasured up in her diary, were mingled with anxiety for his safety, and a passionate longing to see him again. When his approaching return was announced her impatience knew no bounds. "The wind is consulted every hour of the day," she wrote on November 11, "and my good or ill-humour depends entirely on the going of the smoke." She reproached him with concealing from her exploits which she had learned from friendly congratulations, or found published in the gazette. "Why did you not mention this event in your letter to me," she wrote on one occasion; "I believe you feared I should grow too vain." Discovering that he had been allowed only three ships-of-war to escort two hundred homeward bound merchantmen, she was oppressed with dread that the enemy would intercept and overpower him, and began filling another letter with bitter reproaches against the Admiralty. While thus engaged Archbishop Cornwallis, calling to see her, combated her fears, and told her how Lord Sandwich, when speaking of this convoy at dinner in the presence of Lord North, declared that Captain Cornwallis was the most promising young man in the service. "Upon hearing this," she wrote, on returning to the interrupted scroll, "I have scratched out all my uncharitableness. I am quite reconciled to him. He has chosen you for this material convoy for the good opinion he has of you." An erasure in the body of the letter bears witness to her repentance.

In 1781, after resting a short time in England, Captain Cornwallis applied to the Admiralty for active employment. A vacancy having just occurred in the command of the Canada, Lord Sandwich wrote:—"As I understand that she is the best ship in the navy, of her rate, I cannot do my duty better than by offering her to one of the most distinguished officers in the King's service." Sailing again to the West Indies, Cornwallis won additional renown early in 1782 by a gallant attempt to save St. Kitts from the more powerful French armament of Count D'Estaing. A little later he took a leading part in Rodney's brilliant victory over Count de Grasse, the closing, and for England the most glorious, event of the war. It would appear, however, from some very indifferent verses he thought worth preserving, that he shared the opinion held by many of Rodney's officers, that more energy in improving the victory might have made it much more decisive. His fame was now high, and firmly established. Letters from his mother and brothers in England, informing him of a change of Ministry and other matters of public or personal interest, contained many particulars flattering to himself. James Cornwallis, now bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, wrote in reference to the naval action at St. Kitts, "the King spoke very handsomely of you the other day to Tommy Townshend, the present Secretary of War." And again, after news had arrived of Rodney's victory, he wrote, "the King made your praise the subject of his conversation at the levée. Lord Rockingham was as strong in his commendation of you to me." Lord Rodney, too, lauded him to the skies. Lord Cornwallis, now back in England as a prisoner of war on parole, sent equally favourable reports. "Lord Keppel (the new First Lord of the Admiralty) speaks of you," he wrote, "in the handsomest manner. Jervis spoke of you in the highest terms to Lord Shelburne, and said it would be a disgrace to the Administration if you did not receive some distinguished mark of honour." The Dowager Countess, grown feeble, and satisfied with the renown William had acquired, now sighed for peace, and lived only in the hope of having him with her again. Hearing that Rodney had offered him De Grasse's captured flagship, the Ville de Paris, to take to England, she wrote on May 27 :—" Why did you not accept the Admiral's offer ? By all the accounts, you had a very considerable share in the taking her. The coming home in her would have been an éclat, and what is material, I should have the comfort of seeing you soon. Perhaps that would have been an objection to you. If so I withdraw my wishes, for they are always governed by what you like. Myself is always out of the question where you are concerned, and I should be more happy with your being in the West Indies than nearer to me did I know that it was your choice." This is her last letter. It gives the finishing touch to a beautiful picture of maternal devotion.

Captain Cornwallis having returned to England with a convoy, and the war being now virtually over, his brothers were anxious to obtain for him a staff appointment in recognition of his services. In order to promote his interests the Earl brought him into Parliament as one of the members for the family borough of Eye, leaving him full liberty to choose his own political line. Shortly afterwards Lord Cornwallis, being offered the appointment of Governor-General of India, tried to obtain the command of the naval squadron in the Indian seas for William. But Lord Keppel, now at the head of the Admiralty, thought Admiral Parker had superior claims. And in fact, notwithstanding the old relations of the Cornwallis family with the Whig party, and particularly with Charles Fox, and ties of friendship with Lords Shelburne and Keppel, it was only after some delay and angry complaints of being overlooked from William, that Keppel gave him command of the Foudroyant. After the fall of the Coalition Ministry Lord Howe, on becoming First Lord of the Admiralty under Pitt, seems to have conferred on Captain Cornwallis the post of Colonel of marines ; and in 1788 Lord Chatham, Howe's successor, made him naval Commander-in-Chief in the East Indies, with the rank of Commodore. During the war of American Independence Cornwallis had formed intimate friendships not only with Lord Howe and the Hoods, under whom he served, but also with Captains Jervis, Nelson, Collingwood, and other famous seamen of his own rank, whose letters diversify and sometimes enliven the correspondence. With Nelson his relations were particularly affectionate, and continued so to the end. Writing to him in October, 1784, from Antigna, Nelson, then commanding the Boreas, expresses with amusing candour his aversion or contempt for the station, the admiral, the captains associated with him in the absence of Collingwood ; in fact for everybody and everything except the officers of his own ship, and "his only female friend in these islands," Mrs. Moutray.

In October, 1788, hearing in his retirement at Burnham of Corn wallis's approaching departure for India, Nelson wrote again expressing an ardent desire, "though happily married," to "step forth" for service under his friend. After his arrival in India two objects, suggested by the Governor-General's advice or example, appear to have specially occupied the Commodore's attention. One was to create a convenient and secure station for the British fleet, adequate facilities for which seemed to be afforded by the Andaman islands. The second was a reform of naval administration, the whole public service of the East India Company being at this time gangrened by fraud and peculation. Lord Howe, whom he appears to have consulted in regard to both objects, while highly commending his motives, gave him but cold encouragement; inclining to the opinion that naval stations were worse than useless unless guarded by a large military force, and deprecating the destruction of a bad system until proper instruments were available for the introduction of a better. The Governor-General also, to whom the dishonesty of subordinate Indian officials was only too familiar, had convinced himself that the miserable pay which the Company then doled out to its servants lay at the root of prevalent abuses. Attempts at reform, he thought, must prove ineffectual unless accompanied by a higher scale of remuneration. Lord Hood, however, now first sea-lord of the Admiralty, wrote to assure the Commodore of the full approbation and support of the Board. And letters from Lord Chatham expressed in very flattering terms the confidence of Government in his advice, and its appreciation of his exertions. Schemes of improvement were interrupted in 1790 by the breaking out of war between the East India Company and the Sultan of Mysore. During this conflict the Commodore co-operated with his brother by keeping vigilant guard over the ports through which the enemy might obtain foreign supplies. Several letters from the Governor-General, and from the Rev. Christopher Wells, give interesting accounts of the difficulties the former had to overcome in the tedious campaigns of 1791 and 1792. On February 10, 1792, Lord Cornwallis announced to his brother the storming of Tippoo's camp near Seringapatam. A fortnight later he sent him a copy of articles of peace just signed, "which I flatter myself," he wrote, "you will think advantageous for us." The success had been so decisive that the conditions of the treaty, though sufficiently onerous for the vanquished, bore testimony to the moderation of the victor. Hardly had the new territorial arrangements arising out of this conflict been settled when news reached the Governor-General, now Marquis Cornwallis, of the renewal of war between France and England. With the help of his brother, now Rear-Admiral, he took possession of the French settlements of Pondicherry and Chandernagore. Having thus restored internal tranquillity in India, and provided against external attack, he returned home towards the end of 1793, and was followed by the admiral a few months later.

The Dowager Countess being dead, the Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry had taken charge of the affairs of his brothers during their absence on foreign service, and kept them informed of current events in England. He appears to have been an indefatigable man of business. In addition to the cares of a large diocese, of the Deanery of Durham, and of his own personal and domestic interests, he acted as guardian for the Marquis's children, invested large savings of the Governor-General in advantageous purchases of land in Suffolk, rebuilt the family seat at Culford, watched over the borough of Eye, selected the members, and was a regular attendant at Court and in the House of Lords. His letters depict for us a life of many interests and constant work.

When Admiral Cornwallis arrived in England in 1794, the war of the first coalition against the French Revolution was in full operation. And already it afforded an example of the striking contrast between the extreme caution of British generals and the heroic audacity of British admirals which marked it throughout. A letter, dated May 23, from Nelson, then serving under Lord Hood in the Mediterranean, alludes with veiled sarcasm to General Dundas, commanding five British regiments in Corsica, who pronounced the seige of Bastia utterly impracticable, and held his force aloof, while Hood and Nelson, at the head of 1,000 men from the fleet, carried the town by storm with little loss. Cornwallis, now promoted to be Vice-Admiral, seems to have obtained immediate employment; and hoisting his flag on board the Royal Sovereign of 100 guns, soon raised his professional reputation to a very high point. When cruising off Brest in June, 1795, with a squadron of five men-of-war and two frigates, he fell in with a French fleet of twelve men-of-war and twelve frigates, under Admiral Villaret-Joyeuse. The English squadron, being over-matched in sailing power as well as in force, was in imminent danger of being taken or destroyed, when Cornwallis by a bold and skilful manœuvre which completely deceived his antagonist, checked the enemy's onset, and secured for the English vessels an unmolested retreat to Plymouth. It would appear from a letter of congratulation from Lord Howe, dated June 30, that Admiral Cornwallis, with the modest reticence habitual to him when his own credit was concerned, did less than justice in his official report to his personal share in this action. But when the full particulars became known, public approval of his conduct was loud and universal. Congratulations poured in on him from all quarters. Lord Cornwallis wrote from Warley camp that his conduct in this rencontre would do him more honour "than ten ordinary victories with equal or superior force." The Bishop of Lichfield informed him that, "at the birth-day the Queen enquired much after you, and was very civil about you." Sir Charles Middleton wrote that the Admiralty proposed to "bind up his journal separate, to be kept as a model of professional conduct." Wesley Pole, second of the five distinguished sons of the first Earl of Mornington, and who as a naval officer held fame so cheap as to quit Cornwallis's ship in 1780, at the very crisis of the war with France, on succeeding to an Irish estate, not only wrote a most affectionate letter full of gratitude for past kindness, but wept for joy when hearing and repeating everywhere the praises of his old commander. And when Parliament met in November, the speaker, Mr. Addington, conveyed to him "the high and unanimous sense entertained by the House of Commons" of his "judicious and gallant conduct."

Admiral Cornwallis had now proved his capacity for high command. The greatest employments, the most splendid achievements, seemed to be fairly within his grasp. But during the five years that elapsed between the beginning of 1796 and the beginning of 1801, a most eventful period of that war, and, as regards British exploits, one of the most brilliant in naval annals, he disappears altogether from the scene. Nor does this collection of letters give us the slightest hint as to the cause of his professional eclipse. On turning, however, to James's "Naval History," we learn that Admiral Cornwallis was appointed Commander-in-Chief in the West Indies in February, 1796. Going out in charge of a convoy, his flag-ship, the Royal Sovereign, suffered damage by colliding with another vessel; and he returned to England in her for repairs, leaving the convoy to pursue its course. The Admiralty sent him orders to embark at once in the Astræa frigate, and rejoin the convoy; but he excused himself from obeying by pleading that the state of his health could not endure the discomfort of a frigate. He was thereupon tried by court martial for disobedience of orders, and, although acquitted on this charge, was censured by the Court for leaving his convoy. Under a sense of harsh treatment by the Admiralty he tendered his resignation, which was immediately accepted; and during the remaining years of Mr. Pitt's first administration he obtained no further employment. This authentic account of an unfortunate conflict with authority leaves much room for conjecture. It was only natural that Admiral Cornwallis should dislike being despatched for the third or fourth time to the West Indies, particularly as service on that station no longer afforded much prospect of additional laurels to compensate for an unhealthy climate and other depressing conditions. There are indications in letters addressed to him of his being of a gouty habit, of somewhat irritable temper, with a disposition to feel aggrieved by even legitimate control which crossed his own plans. And the British navy at that time contained so many famous captains, eagerly competing for employment, that the Admiralty could afford to shelve a contumacious officer, however distinguished, as a lesson of discipline to others. These various circumstances might be suggested in explanation of an offence which was visited by such severe punishment. On the other hand, we find Lord Cornwallis deploring to Colonel Ross, in a letter dated March 18, 1796,* the conduct on this occasion of his brother William, who showed himself so wrong-headed, so warped by absurd suspicions of the Admiralty, as to have become incapable of listening to rational argument. It appears also from another letter written four days later that the Marquis, although a most important member of the Cabinet as the highest authority among the British generals of the time on military operations, had interposed in vain with his colleague Lord Spencer to prevent a court martial, from which he feared the worst consequences for his brother. We learn from the same source that the real cause of Admiral Cornwallis's refusal to sail in the Astræa frigate was a disinclination to be separated from Captain Whitby, his flag-Captain, whom he afterwards made his heir.

Of this long period of forced inaction the collection tells us little.

* Cornwallis Correspondence.

There are a few letters from the Bishop's daughter, Elizabeth Cornwallis, to her uncle, generally bright and cheerful, though clouded by a serious disappointment of her own. A gloomy letter from Lord Nelson at Palermo, dated January 31, 1799, reveals a mind sunk in deep despondency. Fame, rank, and wealth have failed to bring him happiness. A letter of Lord Cornwallis written from Dublin in June, 1800, expressing sanguine hopes as to the effect of the Act of Union between Great Britain and Ireland, affords another illustration of the vanity of human wishes. When the Addington administration was formed in February, 1801, Lord St. Vincent became First Lord of the Admiralty, and recalled William Cornwallis, now full admiral, to active service as Commander-in-Chief of the Channel fleet. The First Consul's project of an invasion of England, and his efforts to infuse spirit into French admirals, now demoralised by constant defeat, seemed likely to afford Cornwallis an opportunity of winning a great battle. Lord St. Vincent wrote to him at the end of March, 1801 :—"On combining the intelligence from every quarter, I do in my conscience believe you will have the honour and happiness of finishing the war by a glorious achievement." This expectation was not fulfilled.

The service of the Channel fleet during the spring and summer of 1801 was confined to the hard and tedious task of blockading the combined naval squadrons of France and Spain in Brest harbour. Lord Hood, now enjoying well-earned repose as Governor of Greenwich Hospital, wrote towards the end of August severely criticising Lord Nelson's abortive attack on the Boulogne flotilla, and urging Cornwallis to draw off from the French coast in order to lure the enemy out, and thus gain for himself the opportunity of winning a decisive battle. This was the stratagem afterwards practised by Nelson in the neighbourhood of Cadiz, and which resulted in the victory of Trafalgar.

But the French fleet at Brest was neither in a condition nor in a disposition to fight. It lay in inglorious security within the defences of the port until preliminaries of peace, signed in London on October 1, put an end to hostilities with France, Spain and Holland. Lord Cornwallis, having been appointed to represent England in the final negotiations at Amiens, wrote to the admiral from Paris on November 10 that, being convinced of the necessity of making peace, "he did not feel himself at liberty to refuse the mission when it was pressed upon him, although nothing could be more disagreeable to him."

During his short term of service in 1801 Admiral Cornwallis's relations with the Admiralty had been of the most cordial character. Lord St. Vincent's letters to him evince unbounded confidence ; and when the peace of Amiens came to an end in 1803, he was called on to resume his command, now become the most important, perhaps, under the British Crown. For no sooner had Mr. Addington's administration rejected Bonaparte's proposal to refer the ultimatum presented by Lord Whitworth at Paris to the arbitration of the Emperor of Russia, than the First Consul set to work with all the powers of his mind and all the resources at his command to bring his conflict with England to a decisive issue by transporting 150,000

French troops across the British channel to the coast of Kent. The astonishing energy he threw into this project, the magnitude of his preparations, the various experiments by which they were tested, the minute care bestowed on every essential detail, appear to have been little known to English ministers of that time. They have indeed only come to light by the publication of his confidential notes to the French Minister of Marine.* A vast flotilla of gun-boats, gun-brigs, and sloops were built, armed, and equipped under his supervision at convenient points along the whole coastline from the mouth of the Loire to that of the Scheldt. Favoured by night, by fogs, by stormy weather, and low tides, detachment after detachment of these vessels crept along the shore, and rounded headlands until, in spite of the efforts of British cruisers, more than 2,000 of them, carrying upwards of 3,000 pieces of artillery, were assembled in four ports—at Ambleteuse, Vimereux, Boulogne, and Etaples, scooped out with immense labour to receive them, and defended by forts and powerful batteries of cannon. At the same time, in order to reduce the risks of the passage to the lowest possible point, he planned various combin tions which, by surprise and a superiority of force, might give a French fleet command of the Channel for thirty-six hours. These plans were deferred or modified repeatedly in the course of the years 1803 and 1804, in consequence of a deficiency in the means of equipping, and more particularly of manning, naval squadrons blockaded in the French ports; and of the prudence or timidity of French admirals, in nearly all of whom long ill-success or inexperience had quenched every spark of enterprise.

During this time Admiral Cornwallis, in command of an inferior force, kept watch over the principal naval division of the enemy at Brest with an unwearied vigilance which seems to have raised him high in public favour. His brother the Marquis wrote on January 9, 1804: "You are the most popular man in England. It is no very unpleasing sensation for a man to know that his conduct is universally approved and admired." Other letters from Nelson and Collingwood testify warmly to the good will and generosity which marked Cornwallis's relations with those famous seamen.

When Mr. Pitt returned to office in 1804, Lord Melville succeeded Lord St. Vincent as First Lord of the Admiralty. This change did not affect Cornwallis's position, or his cordial and confidential relations with his official chief. But no exciting incident occurred during all that year to relieve the monotony of his harrassing employment. On January 3, 1805, his eldest brother wrote that, yielding to appeals from the Ministry and the Court of Directors, and to a desire to benefit his family, he had consented to return to India as Governor-General and Commander-in-Chief. In the same year came the crisis of the maritime war. Bonaparte, now Emperor of the French, saw another European coalition against France looming on the political horizon, and determined to finish his conflict with England before this new war-cloud had time to gather and burst. In 1804 Spain had joined France, and placed the wrecks of her navy at his disposal. In the principal ports, French and Spanish,

* "Consulate and Empire," by M. Thiers.

from Toulon to Brest, more than sixty ships of the line and a large number of frigates lay inactive in various stages of equipment. Of these armaments the most numerous and efficient were assembled at Brest and Toulon. All were closely beleaguered by the English; but in spring equinoctial gales frequently dispersed blockading fleets, and dense fogs sometimes baffled the closest scrutiny. It was in accordance with these various circumstances that Napoleon shaped his final plan for capturing the Channel. Early in the year secret orders were sent from Paris to the naval commanders at the various French and Spanish ports to leave them as opportunity offered, and sail for Martinique in the West Indies, as a common rendezvous. It was expected that these expeditions would not only train and season the raw French and Spanish crews, but draw English fleets away from Europe, for the defence of trade and territories scattered over the world, and left almost without protection. When those various naval detachments, united at Martinique under one command, had cruised for forty days in American waters in order to effect these purposes, then by Napoleon's orders they were to return with all speed to sweep the English channel clear for the passage of the "army of England" encamped on the heights of Boulogne. It was the same army that a little later made Bonaparte master of continental Europe, at Austerlitz, Jena, and Friedland. Early in March Admiral Missiessy led the way from Rochefort with a few ships of war, made prizes of British merchantmen, and partly conquered Dominica. At the end of the same month, the mistral having blown Nelson from Toulon, Admiral Villeneuve escaped from that port, formed a junction with a Spanish fleet commanded by Admiral Gravina at Cadiz, and, capturing a British convoy on his way, reached Martinique with twenty ships of the line and seven frigates. But neither Ganteaume commanding at Brest nor the Admiral in charge at Ferrol found an opportunity during the spring of evading the observation of his English opponent. Early in May Napoleon sent fresh orders to Villeneuve to return with all the force he could muster, liberate, at all costs, the fleets shut up in Ferrol and Brest, and having overwhelmed Cornwallis, take possession of the Channel. In the meantime Nelson had pursued the Toulon squadron with only nine ships of the line. When Villeneuve heard of the arrival at Barbadoes of the great antagonist, of whom he lived in perpetual terror, he set sail for Europe with a precipitation which flung away every advantage moral or material his fleet had gained by its voyage. Arriving before Ferrol on July 22, he encountered the blockading squadron of Sir Robert Calder, much inferior to his own in strength, and after a confused battle in a fog, he succeeded in entering the port with a loss of two Spanish vessels, which Calder carried off in his retreat. He found at Ferrol a reinforcement of eleven French and Spanish ships of the line, well manned and equipped. But the late action so discouraged him that many days passed before he plucked up resolution to proceed further, under the spur of vigorous remonstrances from Count Lauriston, an Imperial aide-de-camp. On the sea all his misgivings returned; and being overcome by an apprehension that Nelson, as well as Calder, might have joined Cornwallis, he turned his back to the foe and steered south for Cadiz. As a matter of fact, Nelson, worn out by fatigue, had returned to England for a short rest. Cornwallis, after waiting some time for the approach of his enemy, had sent back Calder, with half the ships at his disposal, to resume the blockade of Ferrol. And if Villeneuve had carried out Napoleon's orders he might, according to French official reports, have brought thirty-five ships of the line to encounter eighteen retained by Cornwallis, and been joined by twenty-one other ships of the line, which Admiral Ganteaume, forewarned from Paris, ranged for battle in Brest roads. On the other hand, it appears from a letter dated August 8, from Lord Barham, now at the head of the Admiralty, that the British government had become fully aware of Napoleon's design, and made every effort to increase its naval force in the Channel. From which it may be inferred that however much Cornwallis might have been out-numbered in a first attack before Brest, he had powerful reserves to fall back upon. Had the French navy still possessed an Admiral of the type of Duquesne or Tourville, which seemed to have perished with the old monarchy, the Channel, in August, 1805, would probably have been the scene of a conflict in comparison with which the great fight against the Spanish Armada, was mere child's play. When Napoleon at Boulogne became assured towards the end of August of Villeneuve's retreat, he moved off his army to the Rhine with a secrecy and celerity which took the coalition completely by surprise, and gave him a decisive advantage at the very opening of the Continental campaign. But with the march of the "army of England" to Ulm and Austerlitz, the danger of a French invasion of England passed away.

According to all antecedent probability, and so far as the intentions of both belligerents could determine events, the glorious task of bringing the maritime war to an end should have fallen to Admiral Cornwallis. Circumstances, in great measure fortuitous, transferred it to Lord Nelson. Napoleon, in his first bursts of anger at the failure of a project so long announced and so ardently pursued, called Villeneuve coward and traitor. Before departing for Germany in September, he gave orders for superseding the ill-fated Admiral in the command of the Mediterranean fleet. In September Lord Nelson returned to the Straits with the most formidable armament he ever commanded. But Villeneuve, stung to desperation by his impending disgrace, now sought a battle in vindication of his personal courage, as eagerly as he had avoided one when the possibility of a great national enterprise depended on his obeying explicit and repeated orders. He went forth in search of his dreaded enemy, to find his worst presentiments of defeat amply verified at Trafalgar. Of this great victory, of Nelson's death, and of the storm that scattered the victorious fleet, Admiral Collingwood sent an account to Cornwallis, dated October 26. The naval war on any large scale was now over. Napoleon had already ordered his Brest fleet to be broken up into small sections, and used in separate expeditions for the destruction of English trade.

Early in the year 1806 particulars of the last illness and death of his brother, the Governor-General of India, were communicated to Admiral Cornwallis by Captain John Gore, writing from the Medusa at sea, on January 23. "Great Britain," the letter concludes, "will long mourn the loss of her most brilliant ornament, and the world at large one of its best men." This sentence probably embodies the national sentiment of the time. The news of Lord Cornwallis's sudden death carried with it throughout England a sense of public calamity. In a later letter of condolence, dated February 10, Lord Hood calls him "the greatest statesman and the greatest general any country could ever boast." Here we have the exaggeration of personal regard. Lord Cornwallis possessed, in rare combination, qualities and talents which generally command success both in government and in war. When we consider the length, variety, and uniform merit of his services, in positions, civil and military, of the highest responsibility, we must regard him as one of the most distinguished figures of what is, perhaps, the most eventful period of English history. No one, however, would now call him the first, or even second, of English generals, still less of English statesmen. Political measures for which he was more or less responsible, and which in his own day were held to be clear titles to enduring fame, such as the land settlement of Bengal, have since been condemned as enormous blunders. But even the few letters of his which have been preserved in this collection suffice to show that, in addition to mental powers of a high order, he possessed moral attributes, a noble, humane, and generous spirit, unselfish devotion to duty, modesty and fortitude in good and evil fortune, which more than mere intellectual superiority make a man great, an honour to his country and an ornament of its public life. In his virtues and in the range of his abilities he bore no small resemblance to his more famous antagonist, George Washington.

Two very interesting letters from Charlotte Nugent, wife of Admiral Nugent, dated respectively January 23 and May 4, 1806, give details of the last illness and death of Mr. Pitt and of Lord Melville's trial before the House of Lords.

The accession to office of the Coalition Ministry of Fox and Grenville had a decidedly adverse influence on Admiral Cornwallis's fortunes. The first intimation of his supersession in the command of the Channel fleet came to him from his successor, Lord St. Vincent. On February 8, the Earl wrote that, under a sense of ill usage from Mr. Pitt, he had spurned an offer of this command from the late Ministry; but that he felt it an imperious duty to obey a similar call now made on him, "with only one repugnance, which arises out of the high respect I have for you . . . for no one regards you more sincerely than I." In a second letter, dated February 10, St. Vincent assured his friend that "a most favourable and honourable statement of your meritorious service will be made to his Majesty." This statement, if made, proved to be only a barren compliment. No mark of royal favour appears to have graced the Admiral's enforced and final retirement from active service. Charles Grey, now First Lord of the Admiralty, informed him in civil terms of Lord St. Vincent's appointment, and afterwards made a few naval promotions on his recommendation. This was all; and surely but shabby treatment at the close of a long and distinguished career. Ten years later, on the conclusion of a general peace, Lord Liverpool's ministry, as we learn, did something to repair the neglect of the Whigs by obtaining for Cornwallis the decoration of G.C.B. On the last years of the admiral's life this collection of letters throws little light. There is a complete blank from February, 1807, to June, 1811. Nearly all subsequent letters are from the Bishop of Lichfield. They give us interesting sketches and reminiscences of well-known persons and places, but tell us nothing of the admiral himself, not even of his death in 1819.

The Bishop survived till 1824, having succeeded his nephew as fourth Earl Cornwallis in the preceding year.

As may have been gathered from foregoing remarks, readers expecting to find in this collection of letters anything even approaching to a biographical sketch of Admiral Cornwallis will be disappointed. It does not contain a line written by himself. He is indeed little more than a shadow for us. That he was a man whose qualities won for him the love of kinsfolk and friends, the admiration and respect of many of the ablest naval commanders and most heroic spirits of the age, the confidence of successive naval ministers, is abundantly evident. But we miss altogether the revelations of mind and character, of motives which shape conduct, of personal habits, opinions, and pursuits; we miss the vivid descriptions and frank judgments of contemporary persons and events only to be found in a man's familiar letters, and which make him live for us again in his proper atmosphere and surroundings. Nearly all his life, apart from periods passed on active service, is left in complete obscurity. The professional record itself is broken by long, sometimes perplexing, gaps; and it leaves on the mind of the reader a sense of incompleteness, and even of failure, inasmuch as it necessarily omits those crowning achievements and honours of which early exploits and rapid advancement gave promise, and which fell to competitors more fortunate, but not of higher desert.

Admiral Cornwallis appears to have been a favourite with British sailors. We are told that they called him among themselves "Blue Billy" and "Billy-go-Tight." Naval biographers ascribe those soubriquets to the false suggestions of a jovial presence, a complexion inclining to purple. They insist on the Admiral's exemplary sobriety. We find Lord Howe, also, in a letter dated November 17, 1785, complimenting him on being "a pattern of self-denial." But sobriety and self-denial are terms which vary in signification as manners change. That was a time when many worthy people who would regard the name of drunkard as opprobious seem to have thought intoxication a social duty on festive occasions. It is said to be on record that Pitt and Dundas, halting for dinner at an inn on their way to Walmer, consumed five bottles of port at the sitting. A drinking bout of this kind, however much it might discredit a prime minister of our own time, cast no slur then, violated no social canon. And there is a passage in the Cornwallis Correspondence which leads one to suspect that the playful satire of the sea-dogs may not have been altogether unwarranted. It occurs in a letter from Lord Cornwallis to Colonel Ross, dated July 12, 1802, on the subject of a contest for the borough of Eye, and runs as follows:—

"The Admiral got very drunk at the election, and the next day insisted on my steward taking £500 towards defraying the election. Without having given a vote in the House of Commons for many years past, and, perhaps, never intending to give one again, no youth of one and twenty was ever more pleased at coming into Parliament. What unaccountable creatures we are."

This anecdote, somehow, does not diminish one's regret that this collection contains no letter written by "Blue Billy" himself.

WALTER FITZPATRICK.

THE MANUSCRIPTS

OF

MISS M. EYRE MATCHAM,

OF

NEWHOUSE, SALISBURY.

I.—GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

LORD STANHOPE to GEORGE BUBB, at Madrid.

[1717 ?], July 25. London.—"We have both had the luck we could have wish'd for, I have had the happyness to receive your letters, and find by them that you have escap'd the trouble of mine. Your last gave me some hopes of seeing you here this winter, but I am since inform'd that I must be some time longer without that satisfaction. How far your publick spirit may prevail I can't tell, and make you prefer your country's service to any other consideration, but setting that motive aside, I believe you would not be unwilling to see London again, nor like it the worse for coming from Madrid; the gravity and reservedness of the one may be very good preparatives towards tasting the other.

"If you have a great turn to politicks, you would find here ample matter for the exercise of that talent. Never were more speculations, and to less purpose than now, for the mistery of State is become like that of godlyness, ineffable and incomprehensible, and has likewise the same good luck of being thought the finer for not being understood.

"As for the gay part of the town, you would find it much more flourishing than you left it. Balls, assemblys, and masquerades have taken place of dull formall visiting days, and the women are become much more the agreeable trifles they were design'd.

"I can't ommitt telling you that punns are extreamly in vogue, and the licence very great. The variation of three or four letters in a word of six breaks no squares, insomuch that an indifferent punster may make a very good figure in the best companys.

"I know I should not have ended this letter without making you some speeches, but Mr. Methuen has promis'd to do that for me, and I willingly accepted of his offer. 'Tis always a difficult task, but to me it would be perticularly so, to express with how much respect and sincerity, I am, dear Sir, your most obedient humble servant, Stanhope." Holograph.

Endorsed :—"Lord Stanhope to Mr. Bubb, [rec.] the 21st n.s. August, 1716"; but in 1716 Stanhope was not a peer, and had left London on July 9 for Hanover.

ADMIRAL SIR GEORGE BYNG to GEORGE DODINGTON [senior.]

1720, March 12. N.S. Naples.—"The packets from London of the first of February brought me three sheats more of your kind remembrance of me. I am much obliged by your great goodness and frindship for me, which now I may hope soon in person to acknowledg, for I think wee now seem to be allmost at the end of the war, this way at least.

"The very bad weather wee have at present keeps me from getting off from this place, but the very first slatch carries me over to Sicily, where on my arivall wee shall, I think, come to a cesation of armes. All that relates to Italie and Mediteranean I think is left to me to settle with the powers concern'd this way, and if I have the good chance to do what shall be thought reasonable and right, I shall think myself happielie got out of an affair that has given me some care. To this day I am so fortunate to have his Majesty's aprovall of all I have don, and hope I shall not fall under sensure, even of my enimies. But let that be as it will, I can at present aquaint you with nothing new from this place; you will know sooner then I what is transacted at Pariss, &c. I wish you gentlemen of the House of Commons had come to some resolution what shoud have been don with Gibraltar before the Quadruple Alliance was signed. I fear that place will beget uneassieness and cost more then it is worth. I mean in another way, too, by bringing us under difficulties that may embroyl —, for my own part am resolved (as it is not mentioned in the Quadruple Alliance) not to entangle myself with it in any way, more then what relates to a forbareance from hostillities, untill I shall have his Majesty's express command. But I wont trouble you with more on that subject at this time, beeing wholie intent on what I have allredie in command. Preserve me, my dear Mr. Doddington, in your esteem as a man that has all the value and respect for you that a gratefull heart can pay for the thousand frindships bestow'd."

Postscript.—"It rejoyces my heart to hear my good Lord Orford is like to do well againe, and that I may hope to pay my dutty and service to him still." Holograph.

The SAME to the SAME.

1720, April 12. N.S. Barfleur, at Traponia.—"I have but just time to tell you that I have received your letter of the latter end of Feabruary, and I belive every packet you have sent to me, which will make a book that I shall leave my son, wherin he will see the greatest marks of frindship and affection that can be found in a man, but hardly to be creditted of the vile age wee live in. I must own though your letters ever give me great pleasure, yet thay bring pain to me too, when you tell me of the attacks made by Nature on my worthie Lord Orford and yourself, and when you wrote the last storie of our old frind Cornwall, and the malancholly seane between my Lord Orford and you on that occation, it even meted (sic) me into womanish tears, but on recovering myself unto man againe I reflet on the Bedfords motto,* and must prepair to submit, and tho of all things your letters are pleasing to me on every other subject, yet woud not purchace that happyness at the expence of giveing you disorder, which I fear so much writeing occations, therfore let me conjure you not to hazzard the least uneassieness through your goodness to me, and yet I woud gladly hear from you too, therfore order Corbet to come to you now and then and make him write what you intend to favour me with. I think him very honest, and very secret and true, though after a storie you told me by your letter I received this day of our aquaintance of Sumerse House one dos not know who to repose trust in.

* "Che sara, sara."

"I am wonderfully obliged for your advice about the affair of the hospital, which Corbet gave me notice off, and I did resolve, as I do still, not to take any notice of it untill I come home, and then shall not give myself trouble about it more then to let some men know what may be reasonable on that occation, and if I shall think it proper even the King himself what was promiss'd me in his name, and though I dont speak anything but English, yet shall find a way to do that plainly if I am obliged to it. God send me well through the difficult task I have at present on my hands (hetherto all I have transacted has met with his Majesty's approbation), and as I have only his service at heart at present so wont dout of his goodness in accepting my endeavours. If I end well what I have in charge, which I think must soon be, I shall have hope to have leave to go home, where I will be made eassie one way or other, and let the more able persons serve their prince or contrie better and more faithfully then I have don, and with lesser self-interest if thay please.

"I find the little fateage and sleep I meet with wares me apace. If I am to see any quiet days thay must be soon; this maner of liveing cannot hold much longer with the man that vows he has all the gratefull sence (that he is capable of beeing master of) of the many affectionate frindships and goodness you have ever had for me, which revets me eternaly to you, and I hope will keep to the last houer of my life."

Postscript.—"Pray make my service acceptable to Mr. Doddington the younger." Holograph.

[Edward Russell] Lord Orford to George [Bubb] Dodington.

1721, June 27. Hill.—"Itt is with the utmost truble, deare Mr. Dodington, that I am forced to send you word, the goute has attacked me in the other foot allsow; on one I can hardly put on a cut shoe, the other I am forced to putt on a great shoe, soe that I am unable to obaye your commands in going to the Prince; very possible I shoud not had an answer to my mind, but it woud a giving me the pleasure of leting you see how reddy I am and allwes will bee to obeye your commands."

Postscript.—"I returne you abundance of thanks for the favor of your leter last night." *Holograph.

* In the above four letters the original spelling is retained.

ROBERT WALPOLE to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1723, October 10. Whitehall.—"You do me but justice in beleiving I did not want to be reminded of my engagements to you, for altho' the new vacancy that has happened may contribute to make us easy with regard to other people, what concerns you was before as much determined as 'tis in my power to determine it, and I question not but upon the King's return you will immediately find the good effects of it.

"I suppose Paul [Methuen ?] is with you, and as he is stout, I beg he will be merciful, and whatever havock he makes with the game abroad, I hope he will not be unconscionable in his recreations within doors." Signed.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL AND GREENWICH to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1726, July 27. Inverary.—"I have received the favour of your letter, and am most thankful for the friendly part you have been pleased to take in what so nearly concerns me, and shall ever acknowledge the obligation as an honest man ought to do.

"I find by a letter an express brought me from Will Stuart, that Sir Robert has assisted me with great honour upon this occasion, and that the Duke of Newcastle and Lord Townsend have sincerely contributed their share of interest to support me. If all this should fail I am a little unfortunate, but the pleasure I enjoy in the friendship of those I esteem, with the consciousness of having deserved success, will more than balance the disappointment." Signed.

JOHN SCROPE [SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY] to GEORGE DODINGTON.

[1726, September 15 ? *].—"No business hath been done at the Treasury since you was there till yesterday, when most of the papers you had signed were dispatched, with these I have the honour to transmit to you.

"The governor [Walpole] is extremely pleased with his success at New Park. The King dined Monday at the little house at Richmond, ten persons were at the table—viz., the Lords Hartford, Walgrave, Duke of Newcastle, Sir R. Walpole, Colonel Negus, Deimar, and some other foreigners, and another English lord who's names I have forgot. His Majesty was in very good humour, and drank the healths of the company in a large glass of his landlord's ale.

"William Steuart expects to succeed the Duke of Portland, tho he says the office is not honestly worth above 12,000*l.* per annum. Spotswood pretends the government hath been offered to him, but he chooses rather to return to Virginia.

"Your servant Fane is under some perplexity, the governant having put him out of conceit with matrimony, and Mr. Pitt having varied his first proposal very much. This makes him desire to get out of the scrape as soon as he can with honour.

"Sir Ch. Turner is in good health, full of projects, in which he

* Date of receipt.

meets with some rubs, which is all the contention we are at present apprehensive of . . . ."

Postscript.—"By what I now hear, I guess Mr. Stuart will be disappointed of his government."

JOHN SCROPE to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1726, September 20.—" . . . Both Mr. Fane and I are extremely obliged to you for the regard you have for him, and for the trouble you have given yourself in enquiring about Mr. Pitt. What you have heard of Sam. Pitt is certainly true; Fane was concerned in the Court of Chancery in the dispute about old Pitt, where Sam. Pitt owned that he had forty thousand pounds stock of his uncle's in his name; but the father of the young lady is William Pitt, the son of a brother that was older then Sam. Pitt's father, and who might probably get the custody of his uncle if he desired it.

"I believe I mistoke in the account I gave you of the government of Jamaica; Steuart told me it was but 12,000*l.* per annum, not 1,200*l.* How it is to be disposed of I dont know.

"Poyntz hath carried the speaker in the Assembly to the great satisfaction of his masters. I wish we dont, like Waller, spend more money to get one borough thann would buy half a score.

"Though I have dined at Chelsea, and been there several times, I have not had the governor alone since you went hence. I am to be with him to-morrow, when I will try what he will do about the Irish affair."

The SAME to the SAME.

1726, October 4.—" . . . You will find by the prints that the King was yesterday at New Park; he afterwards dined at the Governor's at Richmond without invitation, and was in very good humour.

"I hear Lord Chesterfield is brought into good humour, and if your learned friend the serjeant continues in the temper I left him last week, our Master and he will soon meet. I am extremely sorry to find by the letter which I had the honour to receive from you by Richards that you are so much tired and ill.

"A county election is a frightful thing. The Chancellor [of Exchequer, i.e., Walpole] seemed to be pleased at your having declared, but he was in so much haste that he said nothing more of your letter."

SIR ROBERT WALPOLE.

[1726].—"An epistle to Sir Robert W——le, on behalf of the author of a preceeding one."

Begins :—

"Rare gifted W——le, didst thou condescend
To read th' Epistle of thy scribling friend."

Ends :—

"But since no art can make a counter pass,
Or add the weight of gold to mimick brass.
Let him no more debase a name like thine

Nor stamp thy image on his worthless coin.
Just praise to thee if e'er the Muses give,
If e'er in equal verse thy actions live,
Pope must improve or Addison revive."

Endorsed :—"To Sir Robert Walpole, ridiculing Mr. Dodington's epistle to him." 80 lines. A parody on the Original.

The Earl of Strafford to George Dodington.

[1728–9, February 20]. Thursday.—"I did myself the honour to wait on you yesterday, but was not so happy to find you at home, therefore take the liberty to trouble you with this to beg the favour of you to call upon the proper officers of the Treasury to lay before you the warrants of about a thousand pounds due to me for surplusage, having received little or nothing of my post-fines for these two years last past, but what I received last year (after a long solicitation) out of the Treasury, though there are two Acts of Parliament in my favour directing prompt payment. I have spoke to Sir Robert Walpole, who has promised me twice that as my pretensions is a matter of right, as soon as the warrants are laid before him he will be sure to dispatch them, but the difficulty is, it seems, to get those warrants lain before you, and unless (as I am informed) some of you lords will call for those warrants they will be delayed, though my deputy is every day soliciting at the Treasury to get them done. . . . It is a great imposition on me, and contrary to the express words of my grant from King William, that I am obliged to come to the Treasury for my money, which should be paid me by the sheriffs, and the Treasury ought to have a call on me for 2,270*l.*, the reserved rent of the crown; but they over-rule my legal right in the Exchequer by that tyrant custom, which has only proceeded from the negligence of my deputy whilst I was abroad, and the troubles I have met with since at home. Few in England have a better right to their estates then I have to this, most having come from grants from the crown one time or other.

"I have not that acquaintance with Sir Robert Walpole as I have with you, to explain the difficulties I lie under, for what by double and extravagant fees this grant, which was meant, and was at first a benefit to me, now brings me in but very little, and may be a prejudice instead of an advantage to my family, being, whether I receive anything or no, I am obliged to pay the reserved rent to the crown of 2,270*l.* a year during the continuation of my lease, which is for about thirty years to come.

"You encouraged me last year to give you this trouble annually whilst you are in the Treasury, which must plead my excuse for so long a scrawl." Holograph.

Endorsed with date.

The Earl of Tankerville to George Dodington.

1729[-30], January 1. Up Park.—Requesting his interest on behalf of one Mr. Williams, who desires a place in the Customs. Signed.

The Earl of Strafford to George Dodington.

1729[–30], January 24.—To save you the trouble of a soliciting visit, give me leave to desire by this the favour of you to call for the warrants for the surplusage of my post-fines, which will be ready to be laid before you Tuesday, which I think is the day of your meeting. You are sensible, sir, that the matter is to travel down to the Exchequer, and to take a great and expensive round before it comes back for your ordering the money.

"After I had got the Attorney-General's opinion, and that of several other counsel, that the disbursements of the sheriffs ought not to be thrown on the post-fines, as they are, and had been with Mr. Fortescue to represent that to Sir Robert Walpole, I was in hopes I should have received the money myself from the sheriffs, as I have right to do, both by my patent and several Acts of Parliament subsequent to my grant, but I find I am still obliged to continue a solicitor to get my own legal money back again, and to beg I may not be delayed and injured in my property, for now there is 908*l.* odd money due to me for almost all the product of the post-fines for last year, after my rent deducted to the crown, so that at present I am, by reason of fees, &c., a good deal of money out of pocket, and must be much more before I get my own, for if I had received it as I have right to do from the sheriffs, all the fees and expenses of the Treasury had been saved, besides the vexation of being obliged to be so often troublesome to you, which you have hitherto received in so obliging a manner, as has made it much easier to me." Holograph.

The Same to the Same.

1729[–30], February 20.—"Having done what I desired of you, you might naturally think you were free from further trouble, but you must bear this one more, which is the sincere acknowledgment of my obligation to you, for though it is a matter of right which cant be denied me, yet till this year that I wholly left it to you, I met with so many delays and puts off that it made it disagreeable to me; but your handsome way of doing it, with such dispatch, doubles the obligation. I really, for your sake, wish you may never have occasion for my service, but if ever you have, pray be assured, as I shall never forget the obligation so you shall always find me ready and pleased to serve and show you," &c. Holograph. Seal of arms in Garter.

James Thomson to George Dodington.

1730, October 24. Saturday.—"I ought, ere now, to have acknowledged the honour of yours, but must own myself at a loss how to make a suitable return to the fine spirit and humanity of such an agreeable letter. The kind advice and encouragement it gives me, together with the many frank and unsolicited obligations I lie under to your goodness, have made an impression on my heart which I shall always feel with a particular delight, in whatever part of the world and circumstance of life I am.

"What you observe concerning the pursuit of poetry, when one is so far engaged in it as I am, is certainly just. Besides, let him quit it who can, et erit mihi—I cannot say magnus Apollo, but something as great. A true genius, like light, must be beaming forth, and a false one is an incurable disease. One would not, however, climb Parnassus, any more than your mortal hills, to fix for ever on the barren top. No, it is some little, dear retirement in the plain below that gives the right relish to the prospect, which, without that, is nothing but enchantment, and, though pleasing for some time, yet, at last, leaves us in a desert. The great fat doctor at Bath told me that poets should be kept poor, the more to actuate their genius. This is like the cruel custom of putting a bird's eyes out that it may sing the sweeter; but surely they sing sweetest amidst the luxuriant woods while the full spring blows around them.

"Travelling has been long my fondest wish, for the very purpose you recommend—the storing one's imagination with ideas of all-beautiful, all-great, and all-perfect Nature. These are the true materia poetica, the light and colours with which Fancy kindles up her whole creation, paints a sentiment, and even embodies an abstracted thought. I long to see the fields whence Virgil gathered his immortal honey, and to tread the same ground where men have thought and acted so greatly! If it does not give, it must at least awaken, somewhat of the same spirit But not to travel entirely like a poet, I resolve not to neglect the more prosaic advantages of it; for it is no less my ambition to be capable of serving my country in an active, than in a contemplative, way.

"At my times of leisure abroad I think of attempting another tragedy, and on a story more addressed to common passions than that of Sophonisba. People nowadays must have something like themselves, and a public-spirited monster can never concern them.

"If anything could make me capable of an epic performance it would be your favourable opinion in thinking me so. But, as you justly observe, that must be the work of years, and one in an epic situation to execute it. My heart both trembles with diffidence and burns with ardour at the thought. The story of Timoleon, as to the subject matter of it, is certainly a fine one; but an author (I think) owes the scene of an epic action to his own country; and besides, Timoleon admits of no machinery, except it be that of the heathen gods, which will not do at this time of day. I hope hereafter to have the direction of your taste in these affairs, and in the meantime will endeavour to cultivate those ideas and sentiments, and in some degree to gather that knowledge which are necessary to such an undertaking.

"Should the scenes and climates through which I pass inspire me with any poetry, it will naturally have recourse to you. But to hire a return from Young or Stubbs were a kind of poetical simony, especially when you yourself possess such a large portion of the spirit.

"I shall be very proud of being mentioned by you to any you may think it proper to mention me to at Paris, whither we go first, and in about two weeks hence. Perhaps I may have an opportunity of paying my respects to you at London before then." Holograph.

Leonard Welsted to George Dodington.

1730, November 14. The Tower.—I cannot but be in fear that I do not stand in that degree of favour with you which I had reason to hope I did, and some suspicions have occurred to me on this occasion which give me inexpressible uneasiness, not to say torment.

I must, therefore, beg leave to assure you, sir, conclude what you please from it, to assure you, on my honour as a gentleman, and by everything sacred, that as I have never mentioned you in conversation but with the highest respect and gratitude, so I have never writ anything that had a view to you but was perfectly honourable and well intended. There is a line in a late poem—viz., the One Epistle, which I presume you may have seen, that carries in it a slight raillery upon Dr. Young;* but this was sincerely without my approbation, and I was overborne in it, as a thing of that nature, that could not well give offence to him or any one else; and as for the first Ode of Horace, which I had the honour to address to you, I hope it is not in the heart of man to conceive that I foresaw and wilfully designed the ridicule, which I found, with grief, followed upon it, or that I could be guilty of such low and wretched disingenuity and impertinence. I am indeed utterly incapable of every thing of this sort, and I wish you, sir, nothing worse than that the whole world may always have the same sentiments of esteem towards you that I have, and speak of you at all times as I do, and when they write in your praise, be more happy in the way of doing it than I was.

"It concerns me not at all how much lower I may be in your estimation as a writer than Mr. Thomson, or any other person, further than seriously to reflect if I do not deserve to be so, and if you do not judge truer than other men in that regard; but, whether I may ever be so happy as to receive any mark of your patronage hereafter or not, nothing has, nothing ever will tempt me to treat ill, or lightly, or with any paltry slyness whatever, a gentleman of your character and quality, and that has laid great obligations upon me. . . .

"It would be an uncommon satisfaction to me to know if I were really acquitted in your thoughts, and this, sir, if you will please to exact so severe a thing from me, shall be the last favour I will ever request of you."

Odes to Mr. Dodington.

[1730 ?]—"An imitation of Horace, to Mr. Dodington, in acknowledgment of some favours received (Ad Martium Censorinum, Ode 8, liber IV.)."

Begins:—

> "Whene'er my stars shall prove so kind
> To suit my fortune to my mind,
> By presents which I'll soon bestow
> The world each friend of mine shall know."

---

* One Epistle to Mr. Pope, written by Welsted and Moore-Smithe. The allusion to Young is as follows:—

> ——"that name which through both worlds is gone,
> "Which Dr. Young applauds and Prester John."

Ends :—

" Verses you love, those I can give,
And verses which, perhaps, may live,
T'embalm your name to future times,
At least outlast a tombstone's rhimes.
* * * *
The Pyle where Marbro' lyes inshrined,
By Risbrack wrought, by Kent designed,
But some few ages may survive
To keep his memory alive.
In Addison's immortal lines
The wondrous man for ever shines
There (when the Foe's last doom is passed),
' Calm and serene he drives the blast,
' And pleased th'Almighty's orders to perform,
' Rides in the whirlwind and directs the storm.' "

42 lines. With quotations from Horace's Ode in the margin.

1730.—" The Praises of a country life. An imitation of Horace, to the same (Vilse rusticæ laudes Epod. II.)."

Begins :—

" Happy the man who void of care
(As good old Lords of mannours were)
From all the plagues of money freed,
Which prodigals and misers breed,
Grows fat upon his own estate,
And never dreams of being great."

Ends :—

" When Dodington had thus expressed
How rural calm retreats are blessed,
(That Dodington whose judgement none Disputes, who has not lost his own)
Resolved to lead a country life,
Renounce the Court—and take a wife,
This week six horses whirl him down ;
The next—he hurrys back to town ! "

119 lines, with quotations from Horace in the margin.

James Thomson to George Dodington.

1731, November 28. Rome.—" I will not make any apology for neglecting to do myself the honour of writing to you since we left Paris, when I may rather plead a merit in not troubling you with long scrolls of that travelling stuff of which the world is full even to loathing. We have been over the most part of France and Italy. What is remarkable and curious in that tour, you know much better than I do, though actually here on the field of staring.

" That enthusiasm I had upon me with regard to travelling goes off, I find, very fast. One may imagine fine things in reading of ancient authors, but to travel is to dissipate that vision. A great many beautiful, antique statues, where several of the fair ideas of Greece are fixed for ever in marble, and the paintings of the first masters are indeed most enchanting objects. How little however of these suffices ? How unessential are they to life ? And surely not of that importance as to set the whole world, man, woman, and child a-gadding. I should be sorry to be Goth enough not to think them highly ornamental in life, when one can have them at home without paying for them an extravagant price; but for every one who can support it to make a trade of running abroad only to stare at them, I cannot help thinking something worse than a public folly. Instead of travelling so furiously, it were a wiser and more public-spirited thing, with part of those vast sums of money spent that way, to send people of genius for architecture, painting and sculpture, to study these arts here and to import them into England. Did they but once take root there, how they might flourish, in such a generous and wealthy country! The great architect, painter and statuary, Nature, is the same she ever was, and no doubt as profuse of beauty, proportion, lovely forms and real genius as formerly to the sunny realms of Greece, did we but study the one and exert the other. In England though, if we cannot reach the gracefully superfluous, yet I hope we will never lose the substantial, necessary and vital arts of life, such as depend on liberty, labour and all-commanding trade. For my part I, who have no taste in the least for smelling to an old musty stone, look upon these other curiosities with an eye to poetry, in regard that the sister arts reflect lights and images on one another. Now that I mention poetry, should you enquire after my muse, all that I can answer is that I believe she did not cross the Channel with me. I know not whether your gardener at Eastbury has heard anything of her among the woods there. She has not thought fit to visit me while in this once poetic land, nor do I feel the least presages that she will. But not to lengthen out a letter that has no pretence to entertain you, give me leave only to add that I can never lose the pleasing sense I have of your goodness to me, and it is a hope I must flatter myself with, your continuance of it on my return to England; to England, for whom my veneration and love, I will be vain enough to say, increase every day, even to devotion and fondness. It will not be disagreeable to you to hear that Mr. Baily and his family arrived safely here two [or] three days ago. They go this week for Naples, where I hope that from the pure air there they will reap those advantages for which they have undertaken such a fatiguing journey.

"Lord Binney [? Binning] says that you are building a house in a very fine taste at London. Then I am persuaded we shall see, not an uninhabitable whim of architecture, but a habitable house for the climate of England, where usefulness and convenience support beauty, and beauty dignifies usefulness and convenience. If there is anything in which I can serve you here, or whereever I am, you will do me the greatest pleasure in the world by laying your commands on him who is, &c." Holograph.

My address is Chez Messieurs Rizzi et Joseph Macirone, à Rome.

George Dodington to Frederick, Prince of Wales.

1732, July 2. N. S. Paris.—" . . . I own your Royal Highness's favour is the pride and pleasure of my life, but it is because I did not owe its rise, nor will owe its continuance, to flattery. Nor ought you to think it common to your high rank to find a man who prefers your interest to your pleasure, and dares take part with your glory even against your inclinations, should you ever be so unhappy as to set them at variance. . . . I have set my whole heart upon your happiness, but I place it in your glory, and this last in the welfare of our country. To see that life and gaiety which makes you the delight of all that are near you corrected by a severe probity and rigid honour, makes me every day bless my own good fortune and your partiality to me; but when I consider the happiness of millions one day flowing from you, as the effect of that probity and honour, I am thoroughly charmed with the prospect, and am proud to own that your good opinion does give me a pleasure that the friendship of a private man could not give. . . ." Copy.

SIR THOMAS FRANKLAND to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1732, July 5. London.—"I have received the favour of my dear Mr. Dodington's of the 2nd of July from Paris, and have delivered the enclosed to the Prince. . . . I dont like your joke of my buying a cart, I wish you would think of that sort of vehicle for some other of your friends.

"We begin to have a very thin town, and ever since you went, we sea men* have been the conversation of it; but as our great men believe the Spanish fleet to be before Oran, hope all our sailing is over."

FREDERICK, PRINCE OF WALES, to GEORGE DODINGTON.

[1732, November 16].—"My good Dorrington, this is only for telling you that I and most part of the friends are well; that I had your letter; wish you allways well, and hope to see you soon again. I forgot to tell you that I wont have you conclude that bargain in Ireland; the reason you'll know when you come here. I have found a better thing for 'em. Good bye; you wont be forgot by Frederick P." Holograph. Endorsed with date.

The SAME to the SAME.

[No date].—"My good Dorrington, I plead excuse for not coming at our meeting by Vane's, but a croud of family which expect the King hinders me of it. You know the vieillerie of the Wendsdays comming there, a good courtier must not be out of the way, the more now. I ordered Wrede to look out for you everywhere. I'll tell you the success of . . . to-night if you can, after their supper, come to me at 12. Adieu, mon bon ami."—F. P. Holograph. Seal, a cupid drawing his bow.

The SAME to the SAME.

[1733, September 8]. Saturday, at 7 o'clock.—"My good Dodington, according to my promise I write to you, but 'tis on my sorrow, for I have weighed with myself enough about it. What an ungrateful part am I to play. I wish a man well, I think him an honest man, and I must tell him the stories that publickly are told here of him. Take me right, I mean publickly are whispered about him. You are accused to have told some of the superiors that Merry was the only cause of quarrel, and that he could never be left there if servilitude should be transplanted. I hope you comprehend all this, for I can't make it plainer. This story goes so well about, that several people have acquainted me with it, as well by words of mouth as unsigned letters have been sent me; the belief I give to it you see. Your friends and honest men have advised me to send you word of it, and told me, that if such a thing should get ground, your character would suffer by it, but as one can't in this wicked age be sure of anything, or anybody, I have told [them] I should acquaint you with it, at your return from Ireland, for I should always tell a man what is told to me behind his back; but for sending you word of it now was no need, for I and my friends knew lies enough to laugh and despise them. They report confidently about town that everything is easy since you are gone, and therefore you, as the disturber, are to be out. This is the common talk as I am told; if it will happen I doubt, for it is giving themselves the lie, to my opinion. If you was wicked enough to intend to hurt anybody you are too wise to do it so grossly; therefore, if I do not see it writ by your own hand I'll never believe it. This was an attempt to make me disgrace you, which I take to be my own disgracing, if upon a tittle tattle of some few people a prince will give up a friend, or servant. Any prince may be cheated by people they have a confidence in, and then they are to give them up as a justification and a satisfaction to mankind; but weak is the prince, and can never be well served, if he believes too quick. Thus things stand now; what further will happen time will learn. You must reckon what a combat I have had with myself; at one side I should acquaint a man I live well with of what is told of him. How can a man justify himself if he does not know it? At the other side what a terrible part do I play, I do worse than to cut a man's throat, when I tell him what trials are made to make him pass for the dishonestest man in the world, for tis true you would be that, if you had done it. I have chose to take the first part, for I think always in everything the fairest way is the best. Now I must desire you to answer me instantly by this man, for, except Barnard, who has pitched upon him, no soul knows it, and he thinks it is something relating to Barnard's affairs; then to continue quietly your journey to Ireland, for if you returned upon this, and begun a bluster about it, you would undo the whole machine; therefore, go on to Ireland, end your affairs, and then come quietly after the birthday over again. Your coming to London would do no good, not hinder the noise—rather augment it, and give a handle to your enemies to say the dog came frightened home, for he had else lost that low insignificant creature. If I was like you I would show nothing of this in Ireland, but look as gay as ever, and when you return we'll see if this storm will augment or diminish, and I, as a famous pilot, will bring my carriage and vessel happily in the port. Pray be directed by me in this, for I think few people would have acted as I have done. I hope you can read and comprehend all this stuff, for I am in haste, and have had not a hour to end my epistle. Good bye; pray in your letter return me mine, and think that I must be better than the rest of the prince's pack, to behave so fairly to people."

* Sir Thomas was one of the Lords of the Admiralty at this date.

Endorsed :—"Copy of the Prince's letter, received at Eastbury the 9th of Sept., being Sunday, 1733. Original returned."

GEORGE DODINGTON to the PRINCE OF WALES.

1733, September 9. Sunday. Eastbury.—A long letter defending the writer's conduct, especially in relation to Mr. Merry, against whom he has never, directly or indirectly, said a word, but whom, on the contrary, "when particular facts have been charged against him," he has defended and justified as one whom the Prince loves, and who he himself sincerely esteems, and believes to be an amiable and honourable man. Protests his love and devotion to the Prince, and urges his Highness to be prudent in his conduct, and not to let his passions carry him away, as his enemies will improve every incident that may rise to his disadvantage. The part he has to play is only "duty, respect, affection and gratitude where alone it can be due, and to all the rest of mankind, affability in conversation, but entire reserve as to opinions." Copy. Seven folio pages.

The SAME to the SAME.

1733, September 19. Eastbury.—"This letter will be delivered to your R. Highness by Sir Thos. Frankland, and I presume I shall be in Ireland before you receive it. . . . I have again carefully considered this wise accusation about Merry, and it amounts to no more than laying a very foolish action to my charge, in doing an ill-office to a deserving man, without a possibility of any gain or advantage to myself by it. But you well know that it has always been my lot to be represented as an arrogant, self-sufficient, empty coxcomb, and in the same quarter of an hour, nay in the same breath, a deep, designing, dangerous spirit. . . . If this fiction were true, I should have done a very foolish action, indeed; but how does it relate to you or your service, unless it was done in order to deliver you up implicitly to the Minister? If so, I am indeed infamous to you; but then how do I become a disturber, and how comes that to be the cause, the sole and only cause, of my disgrace? . . . I beg leave to assure your R. Highness that I have much too great an opinion of the goodness of your head and your heart to believe that such stories, or indeed any stories, will make you think ill of a man who has ever loved you, and sacrificed all other prospect of advantage to that of serving you most faithfully without any.

"I must, then, take leave humbly to represent to your R. Highness that the question is not what is to become of me, but how you are to behave, in case I go out as a disturber, or in other words, for the share imputed to me of your late conduct. As to myself, I am a private man whom your R. Highness was pleased to call to your acquaintance. Your partiality for me grew very fast, till at last, without any merit even in my own vain opinion, you were pleased to honour me with so unreserved a confidence that I believe there was nothing that was most near and dear to us that we could not, nay that we did not, communicate to each other. In the beginning of this I found you in no favourable disposition towards the Minister; I used all my endeavours at that time, nay always have endeavoured, more or less, to soften it." By my attachment to you I have drawn on myself the hatred and indignation of those who have the most power to hurt me, and have done this "with my eyes open and from 'an affectionate duty to you, in which I call the great God to witness that my principal view was to cultivate in you those maxims which would make you a great and glorious prince, and by strengthening and establishing on immoveable foundations your happy disposition towards great and virtuous actions and sentiments, to leave in you an inestimable legacy to my country, when I shall be beyond the reach of favour or disgrace. . . . I most humbly entreat your R. Highness that your goodness and partiality for me may, by no means, carry you to do anything in my favour that any way derogates from the grandeur of your illustrious rank, or from (what I think more respectable) the true and innate grandeur of your mind. . . . " Draft. Five folio pages, closely written.

Sir Thomas Frankland to George Dodington.

1733, October 4.—"Our elections in Yorkshire will be the same as last, except Bradshaw in the room of Hotham, but fear it will not be so quiet in other counties, as the barbers and parsons informed me on the roads. I have been at Court, where I met with greater marks of civilities from all the Royal family than I deserve.

"The King of Sardinia has made a treaty, offensive and defensive, with France and Spain. The election of Poland looks like a double return.

"As I am the son of a former post-master, I have desired my friend Mr. Manley to deliver you this."

Earl of Hadinton to George Dodington.

1733, December 1. Tynninghame.—" . . . About a year ago, James Hamilton, uncle to the present Lord Bellhaven, died; he had a small post. Upon his death, I sent a flying packet, with one letter to you, one to my Lord Ilay, and one to Sir Robert Walpole, desiring their favour in getting my second son, John Hamilton, to succeed him. You was so kind not only to answer my letter but to let me know what my Lord Ilay said upon that head. Mr. St. Clair, who my Lord said was to have that post, is now one of our judges; . . . but yesterday I was told that a brother of this Lord Bellhaven's has got his uncle's post. I thought myself bound to acquaint you with this; I am sure I have given very little trouble to any ministry by my demands; what I made were but trifles, and it seems they have thought so; at least that I was of little use, by their not thinking it worth their while to return an answer to any letter I have writ to any of them; though, if I inclined to boast, I could tell that I very early showed my entire attachment to the family now on the throne, when my zeal was not well taken, and I defy the world to accuse me of doing anything since that could be interpreted as if I had in the least altered my principles. . . ."

To George Denoyer, Dancing Master.

[1739–40, February 19].—The humble petition of Itta Hamilton, spinster. "Is a daughter of James Hamilton, who married Laur (?) Erskine, niece to the Earl of Mar, and a descendant of Sir William de Hambledon, so called from the manor of de Hambledon, co. Bucks." Petitioner's father was killed in the rebellion in King George I.'s reign. Hearing that his honour, Lady Archibald [Hamilton] (her cousin), Mr. Lyttleton, Mr. Pitt, Carey the surgeon, Reynolds, Lord Albemarle's footman, influence the Prince of Wales; that his Royal Highness has a great regard for the ancient family of the de Hambledon's; that the petitioner is informed no person can be admitted into that part of Norfolk House called the nursery but what is a de Hambledon; petitioner prays for the place of a rocker, void by the death of Lady Charlotte Edwin's maid. "Her Father's being a Jacobite and in the Rebellion will be no objection to her coming into play, since his Royal Highness has laid aside all those distinctions by employing her uncle Erskine." *

Addressed to George Doddington, Esq., and endorsed with above date.

William Murray to George Dodington.

1740, October 7. London.—"The moment I got loose I went abroad to make a little tour by way of amusement. . . . I wish our M[inisters ?] were as vigilant in some of the places I have seen as they are at home. They are making new voters at Dunquerque without molestation, and there are ten thousand returning officers in Berg and Juliers which we dont trouble our heads about. I had a letter to-night brought me by a private hand which informs me of the astonishing and incredible success your friend the Mareschal has had this campaign. The enemy is seized with a panic, and fly before him. I hope your success is as great, but I fancy you are forced to fight much harder for it."

Thomas Prowse † to George Dodington.

1742, July 26. Berkley.—"I think the measure you have proposed of returning thanks to the members in so public a manner must be attended with the best consequences, as it will be a means of setting matters in a right light to our friends here, who from the present odd jumble of placemen, and the many other strange events of the late session, are at a loss to guess upon what ground they stand, and are doubtful (perhaps with reason too) whether they have been gainers by the change hitherto effected.

"As the country in general is not apprized that the materials which have been laid before the House this session may serve for the foundation of a parliamentary prosecution in the next, the

* A skit. Cf. Letters of Horace Walpole, ed. Toynbee, i., 161.
† M.P. for Somersetshire.

intimation you have given of it in the draft you favoured me with will be exceeding proper, and ought to be followed strictly in that particular by others: for the world having seen such a scene of iniquity incontestably proved, and the author of it [Walpole] still unpunished, may imagine that those places which have been bestowed upon some in the committee* could be given with no other reason or design but to frustrate the effects of this and all future inquiries; and as so many have already deserted us, in whom the people have been long used to place a trust and confidence, it is no wonder if they are a little inclined to distrust those who have given them no reason.

"How we shall be able to put this scheme in execution here I am not at present able to judge, being so lately come into the country, and but just upon the edge of it. . . I own I have great doubts whether Sir William Pynsent's treatment of some of our friends the last assizes, and some little family quarrels amongst our gentlemen in the West, may not be the occasion of a very poor meeting at Bridgwater; but should this be our case, I own I think it pity so proper a measure should be dropped in Dorsetshire, where it is in your power, even though you were single in it, which I daresay will not happen.

"Sir William Carew and Mr. Codrington are expected in the country this week, and as soon as he comes, I will wait upon him, if it be in my power, or at least write to him; but I fear the ill health of poor Sir J. St. Aubyn's family will not permit him to leave London for some time. I have no particular acquaintance in Devonshire, but will try to manage that matter by Mr. Bampfylde."

Thomas Prowse to George Dodington.

1742, August 5. Berkely.—"Some time before I received the honour of your last I had communicated by letter your scheme to Mr. Carew and Mr. Bampfylde, the first of which gentlemen going in person to Exeter will be able to put it in practice there. . . I dont know whether there may be time enough for sending a letter across the Severn to Sir Watkin, but I should think if you were to give him a hint of what you propose, by the post, if it come too late for the assizes, that measure may be put in practice by him at some other opportunity. . . ."

The Same to the Same.

1742, August 30. Axbridge.—"Upon my return to Berkely . . . I received a letter from Mr. Carew telling me that Sir J. Trevylian, Mr. Palmer, and several gentlemen, upon the intimation he had given them, were resolved to attend. Upon this assurance I set out the next day to the assizes, and was surprised to find there none of the gentlemen he had mentioned, but in their stead Mr. P. (sic) Poulett your brother member, Mr. Baker, and some others of that sort, who, with the assistance of two or three of our friends, rose to no greater number than ten, so that if Mr. Carew and I had not served, the judge would have had but little trouble. I own I always suspected this would be our case with such a sheriff, and was told Lord Poulett had the nomination of the grand jury, and that the under sheriff had waited upon him with a list for the purpose.

* The Secret Committee, appointed March, 1742, of which Prowse was a member.

"I cannot conceive how the measure you had so happily begun came not to be followed at Exeter, since there was so great an appearance there, and all friends. I could not learn from Mr. Carew the occasion of it, or whether, indeed, he had even proposed it."

THE EARL OF WILMINGTON to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1742, September 30. St. James' Square.—" . . . The Duke of Argyll has been in town some time, but so low in spirits that it has delayed the match for his daughter. He would take no advice till Dr. Burton came to town, but now, on taking proper remedies, he is so far recovered that I hear the marriage will be on Saturday." [There are three other letters from the Earl, quite unimportant.]

SIR WATKYN WILLIAMS WYNN to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1743, Sept. 25. Wynnstay.—" . . . I trust our friends will not be so captivated with appearances as to 'conster' escape into victory, or consider our profusion abroad in any other light than as it affects this kingdom solely. What is laid out for this sole end, every Englishman will join in; in what relates to foreign concerns I trust we shall be as unanimous. . . . In this remote part of the earth we cannot account for the alliance with Denmark in opposition to Russia and Sweden, seemingly the eve of an additional war."

GEORGE DODINGTON to SIR WATKYN WILLIAMS WYNN.

1744, September 1.—For the Ministry to plume themselves on the late victory and assume the credit of it is almost ridiculous, for it proves the truth of our advice, to push the war by sea, which they rejected. What we have taken, chiefly by privateers and merchantmen, shows what we might have done if they had applied the strength of the government that way.

I pray you to advise with your friends what is to be done, and, if nothing, "let us at least agree in that nothing, and show that it does not proceed from meaness, but from a noble despair, which, by a firm union in improving events, may possibly save or contribute towards saving our country." Copy, endorsed with above date.

GEORGE DODINGTON to VISCOUNT HILLSBOROUGH.

1744, September 29.—"If I foresaw any moral possibility of repelling the broad ruin that now stares us in the face, I should call upon your Lordship with confidence, as an efficient part of our preservation. . . . However, though I see no salvation for the public, yet still I call upon you. Come to your friends, and help to soften the misfortunes you cannot prevent and disdain to contribute to.

. . . Come away then. Whether, like another Amphion, you teach the attracted rocks and forests to build your rising town, or you are separating the two legged from the four legged savages that inhabit them, in order to people it; whether you are instilling the more refined passions into the already civilized part of your infant colony by assuming the gentle lover's form . . . or whether you are reforming their morals in the sterner shape of magistracy, . . . in short, however, this letter finds you employed, whether in laying the foundations of the town or of its inhabitants—doing or deserving justice, committing the crime or the criminal . . . come away, and remember you are the child of this country, though were you to stay much longer I presume you would be the father of that where you now reside. . . . ."

E[DMUND] WALLER to ——.

1744, October 7.—"I still keep the Beaconsfield stage once a week, for which I am but little the better. . . . My eyes are bad, too, from the medicines I use, and I have not writ a line since I wrote to you last.

"You may easily guess that in conversation, the subject of our going as an opposition has been talked of. It has been taken first for granted that in our present situation everybody designed going; but I have taken it for granted too, for that very reason they designed to keep the resolution they left the last session with, that if ever any good effect was or could be expected from that measure, it must arise from the distress of the public affairs, which might create a virtue out of necessity. . . . The last time I heard from Cobham he was clear for not going. . . .

"As to our foreign affairs, you see what they are reduced to; as you have heard much of this treaty of Hanau which our Regents refused, you may be glad to know something more particular about it. As I am informed, by that treaty, upon our paying the sum of 300,000 crowns only, the Emperor was to renounce all claims on the Austrian dominions; that he was to be restored to his dominions, and it was understood, though not specified, that he was to have a couple of secularisations. This treaty, good as it is, was refused by our Regents, who say that the treaty sent over to them was, the Emperor should be put in possession of Flanders till some other dominions were given to the value of 6,000,000 of florins, and if Flanders did not produce that sum England was to make it good. . . ."

LORD HILLSBOROUGH to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1745, July 26. Hillsborough.—"When I returned from introducing Lord Barrington to Mrs. Grouse and her family, who live in the mountains of Morne, I received the favour of your letter, for which, and your goodness to me about the house, I will only beg leave to say, thanks, and in obedience to your orders have done with apologies. . . . One line will convey my mind; I want to eat and sleep in that house, and to have it answer those ends in as cheap a manner as possible. If you will take the trouble of giving the necessary orders, your good nature carries you to do what I am not any way entitled to ask. . . .

"Barrington and I are very sorry for the unhappy situation of our affairs, both at home and abroad. I am ready, and I believe he is, to join my mite to the common stock, and wait only for your summons to do my little endeavours towards making things better. In the meantime, be so kind as to send us a little news; let us know if anything can be expected abroad, and what is likely to become of us at home; whether our friends gain or lose ground, and whether they are more united in court than in opposition."

The Prince of Wales and George Dodington.

1748–9, March 11.—"Copy of Mr. Dodington's answer to the Prince, delivered by Mr. Ralph to the Earl of Middlesex, to be presented to his Royal Highness." Printed in the Appendix to Dodington's Diary, ed. 1784, p. 325.

George Dodington to Mr. Gardiner.

1748[–9], March 15. Pall Mall.—"I was just sitting down to write to you when I received the honour of yours of the 7th inst., to acquaint you that I have resigned into his Majesty's hands my office of Treasurer of the Navy, and am retired from public business. . . .

"I have long thought this country in a most dangerous and irretrievable state of decline. The want of measures to conciliate and ease the people, hard-held and heavily loaded, I flattered myself was occasioned by, and would end with the confusion and pressure of the war. But our beginnings, after the peace, seem to me so inauspicious, my own inabilities, in every sense, so unequal to remedy the misfortunes I foresee, and if I were able, myself so little agreeable to those who have the principal direction, that I thought it became me to retire, and not stand loaded with emoluments without the power of doing any real service, either to my country or my friends."

Frederick, Prince of Wales, to Thomas, Earl of Scarborough, his Treasurer.

1749, September 2. Leicester House.—Warrant to pay George Doddington (whom he has appointed Treasurer of his Chambers) the yearly sum of 1,200*l*. Signed.

F. B[owyer] to the Prince of Wales.

[1750, or earlier], April 12.—"I certainly go out of town next Tuesday, and for the last time I earnestly entreat your Royal Highness to let me know what does occasion so great a change in your behaviour. I think, Sir, you have too much good nature to behave in such a manner to her that you know loved you above all things without some particular reason, and if any impertinent people has tittled-tattled to my disadvantage I beg to know, that I may prove my innocence; if 'tis inconstancy, and that your Royal Highness has any dislike to my person, pray, Sir, own it, for you will not be the first man that has been fickle, nor I the first woman that has been mistaken. I promised in a letter which I sent your Royal Highness about a month ago to trouble you no more, but my uneasiness will get the better of my resolution, and I shall go out of town the most unhappy creature upon earth if I dont know the cause of so extraordinary a change; so I beseech your Royal Highness, if ever you had the smallest regard for me, that you will gratify me this once, and send a letter enclosed for me to Mrs. Wattson, next to the Golden Fan in Mary Bone Street. I ask ten thousand pardons for begging so great a favour, but as I have been honoured before, I hope now I petition for it I shall not be denied; and then, Sir, we will bid adieu for ever."

Endorsed :—"Miss Fanny Bowyer," over "Lady L. Blanckly" erased.

J. Ralph to George Dodington.

1750, August 23. Turnham Green.—Long letter, endorsed :—"Respecting the letter of July 26, 1750, to the Earl of Middlesex, Lord Talbot, Sir F. Dashwood, &c." * States that he has communicated the paper to Mr. Waller, who objects that it seems to be the measure of only part of his Royal Highness's court, in concert with two or three neutrals; that, consequently, the other parts of the court would not be over-forward to embrace it, and that, in this inter-medley, the common enemy would have a tempting opportunity to defame and misrepresent, and to make their court by all manner of means. That if the proposers were defeated, the eclat of what they had done, though it might furnish new matter against the Prince and his family, would scarce excite the attention of the people, so that both men and measure would be lost together. That an union amongst the Prince's friends and servants was the first thing to be established, and "that the principle of union ought to be a sensible opposition, grounded on such facts as might serve to expose the administration to the bottom . . . and that the embarking his Royal Highness in such an opposition is the strongest security for his future conduct." Has also shown the paper to Dashwood, who did not think it particular enough, but does not consider himself qualified to supply what is wanting.

—— to the Right Hon. George Dodington, Pell-Mell.

[1750], August 29. Tuesday.—"I beg you will deliver the enclosed to the Prince as soon as you can; his being ill is the cause of my writing it; 'tis to beg no favour, nor does no harm to anybody, and will give his Highness no trouble but to hear it read, which I beg may be by you; pray dont neglect giving it, for should he die and not have had it—that is if ever I come to know it—my misery will be insupportable. Believe me there is no harm in it, 'tis only to ease the mind of a poor unhappy maid who implores your faithfulness." Unsigned.

* Diary, August 1.—"I sent to Mr. Ralph a scheme of opposition, to be shown to Lords Middlesex and Talbot, &c., &c. (ed. 1784, p. 53).

Frederick, Prince of Wales, to George Dodington.

[1750, December 6].—"I am very much pleas'd with the letter, if you'ld be so good not to expose your own judgement by praising so much a half witty'd, or to say truth, a no witty'd connoisseur. Be so good not to undo Mrs. Dodington by these excesses, or else new Rome will laugh at your old Rome's Restorer. I sha'nt want the Guercino, nor the 13th Statue. I hope to see you to-night after the Play." F. P. Holograph. Endorsed with date.

Memorial concerning the Prince of Wales.

[1752, December].—"A memorial of several noblemen and gentlemen of the first rank and fortune."

The paper begins :—"That the education of a Prince of Wales is an object of the utmost importance to the whole nation ; that it ought always to be intrusted to Noblemen of the most unblemished honour and to Prelates of the most distinguished virtue." That the misfortunes of the nation under Charles I. and his sons were owing to the bad education of those princes, who were early initiated in maxims of arbitrary power ; that for a faction to engross the Prince's education is unwarrantable, dangerous and illegal ; that to place about him men whose principles or belief are doubtful is most mischievous, and for ministers to countenance improper men is a ground for suspecting the worst designs on such ministers' parts. It is notorious that books "inculcating the worst maxims of government and defending the most avowed tyrannies" have been put into the hands of the Prince of Wales, and the men who were honest enough to protest are driven away from court. The security of this Government being built on Whig principles, it cannot but alarm all true Whigs "to see none but the friends and pupils of the late Lord Bolingbroke entrusted with the education of a prince, whose family his lordship endeavoured by his measures to exclude, and by his writings to expel, from the throne of these Kingdoms. One of the precepto rshas been accused by a noble lord of Jacobitism, yet continues in his place of trust ; that the governor and preceptor (a nobleman of unblemished honour and a Prelate of most unbiassed virtue*) have been treated in the grossest terms of abuse by a menial servant of the family, and no satisfaction given ; that a Scotsman of a most disaffected family, and nearly allied to the Pretender's first minister, is consulted in the Prince's education, and trusted with all the most important government secrets ; and lastly, that "the three or four low, dark, suspected persons" are the only men whose station is permanent, while all the great offices and officers are constantly varied and shuffled about; whereby it is feared there is a design to render the Government ridiculous, and facilitate a revolution which is believed to be meditating.

* Lord Harcourt and the Bishop of Norwich. The sub-governor and preceptor, accused of Jacobitism, were Stone and Scott ; the Scotsman, the Earl of Bute.

Numbered "9," and endorsed :—"This remarkable paper was sent by the penny post inclosed in a cover to General Hawley, about the 18th December, 1752, with an intent ('tis supposed) that he should carry it direct to the Duke [of Cumberland]. But he carried it to the Duke of Newcastle, who laid it before the King." [Lord Harcourt resigned on Dec. 5, and the Bishop immediately after. Lord Waldegrave was declared Governor on Dec. 18. See Dodington's Diary, pp. 122, 123 ; also p. 132, for notice of this paper.]

Dr. Sharpe to [George Dodington ?].

1752, July 3.—We left Paris with as little regret as we should any other place, but there is a certain vis-inertiæ in some men, as in all matter, which resists motion, and I was afraid this sluggishness would have kept us at Lyons till we returned to England. Our guardians, it is true, pelted us out of Paris . . . but being cured of our rage for pictures, and living now at a moderate expence, they will hardly think it worth while to write us out of Lyons. We go not further south, not into Italy, it is too hot, nor into Germany, it will be too cold. [The next part of the letter is an answer to the attacks of "a noble Lord" [Bolingbroke] upon the Bible, and a pressing invitation to his correspondent to publish some observations upon Ancient History.]

"I love Dr. Thompson and shall be very glad to see him. . . . I could wish, instead of mingling with Politicians and Poets, he would court the acquaintance of young men of his own profession, and for the good of mankind teach them his art. . . . I think it becomes both him and me rather to mend old books than old governments. Let him take care of the constitutions of his friends, and leave the constitution of the State to those who love Fees and attendance better than himself."

J. Ralph to George Dodington.

1753, February 1. Turnham Green.—"I am far from presuming to think that I am the proper person to sum up the merits of the affair which has been so long in suspense before the two brothers [Mr. Pelham and the Duke of Newcastle], but surely the time is come when somebody ought to do it. . . . It is not their interest to make the experiment if they are not morally certain of its success, and this certainty must arise from their known superiority, or the closet opinion of their superiority (which would operate in the same manner). Now the Court (to take in a larger field than the Cabinet) may be divided, as I humbly conceive, thus. The Princess of Wales, the Lord Chancellor, the Secretary Duke (his colleague need not be named), Mr. Pelham, Lord Anson, and Lord Hartington, on one side; the Duke, the Princess Amelia, the Lord President, the Lord Steward, the groom of the Stole (though abroad), and Mr. Fox (with his great auxiliary, the Duke of Bedford) on the other. The Dukes of Grafton and Dorset I reckon as trimmers that will certainly lean to the strongest; and if Lord Gower is, at present, too much a cypher to be reckoned at all, Lord Winchelsea may, perhaps, in due time be his successor. Thus the two parties, as they stand at court, stand nearly on equal ground, and from that equality the King may probably find himself in a condition to prefer which he pleases, and, consequently, give the law to both; which was nearly the case of King William in the last year of his life. . . . For a King, so circumstanced, need not yield to either side unless they can talk to him in the name of a majority in Parliament, which also, at present, seems to depend more on himself than anybody else, whether it is understood or acknowledged so to be or not.

"Upon the wisdom of the brothers, therefore, in taking their measures to form a majority of their own, and their resolution to push every measure that may help to constitute such a majority, depends their own real significancy, and with it the fate of this measure.

"But resolution does not seem to be the characteristic of their administration. Have they not suffered Lord Harrington, the first resigner, to be disgraced? Have they not suffered Lord Granville, their old driver, to be taken in? Is not that Lord at open variance with the Lord Chancellor? Are not promotions made every day without their advice, if not against it? And dare they assert their own importance by making an example of any one man, how branded soever for his perfidy and ingratitude to them in particular?" End of the letter missing.

EARL OF SHAFTESBURY to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1753, April 13.—Regretting that he cannot give the living of St. Giles to the person recommended (and who on many grounds would have been greatly acceptable to himself), as, when Mr. Dodington's letter came, he had already promised it to a friend of his own.

HORACE MANN [Ambassador to Tuscany] to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1754, March 15. Florence.—"I had the honour to acquaint you, by my last letter, that Colonel Mill was on the point of returning to England, and that I was not quite persuaded that his total disappointment in his India scheme was the motive of these frequent journeys, as he has declared that he will be back again here by the end of next May. I have since discovered that he has obtained a patent from the Emperor to work some mines, both of copper and quicksilver, in this state, that are supposed to be very rich. The conditions of his patent are that he is to begin to work within the space of eighteen months, that for the first five years the whole profit is to be his, after which the Emperor is to have ten per cent. of the net produce. These are very advantageous conditions, as he is not obliged to go on if he should find that they do not answer, nor is he under any forfeiture if he desists ever so soon. He proposes to set out for England in a few days, in order, I suppose, to get associates in this undertaking, who must, I believe, advance the money that will be required. He intends, likewise, to bring out with him two Cornish miners, who, he thinks, will be very useful in directing the work. . . . It is a pity he should not be rich, for nobody can rack his brain more than he does to invent the means to be so. . . .

"Miss [Elizabeth] Pitt, whom we have had here about two months, last Friday made a public abjuration of the Protestant religion, and became a Roman Catholic. Such a conversion would have been more taken notice of at Rome than it has been here."

Horace Mann to George Dodington.

1754, June 7. Florence.—" . . . Lady Rochford is extremely kind; and . . . at the same time that my Lord and she showed me so great an instance of it, by condescending to dwell under my roof, from a peculiar good and obliging disposition of mind expresses herself as if they had received and not conferred the favour. Did but the greatest part of our countrymen in some degree only resemble them, one should have the greatest satisfaction in employing one's whole time, nay, one's fortune, in showing attentions to them; but, alas, how few one meets with like her! . . . One sees by daily experience how useless it is, and that very few remember any civilities after they have passed the first mountain, though the least omission, on the other hand, w uld make so deep an impression as never to be forgiven.

"The fair lady whose name is mentioned in the next paragraph of your letter [Miss Eliz. Pitt] is a strong instance of such a character as I have hinted at, and who, though she came into this country with so many and such disadvantages as would have excluded a person in any country from the least society, was, by the pains I took, better and more generally well received than I could have expected; but I have, unfortunately, lost all the merit of my first two months' attentions by not espousing her extravagancies, a recital of which would tire you, as really her behaviour has been of such a nature as forms the most dangerous character imaginable, and so much the more as she is still handsome, has wit and great art. Nobody could ever guess the motive of her quarrel with Mr. Montgomery, who was not conscious of having offended her, but still offered to make whatever submissions she might dictate for his supposed offence. Instead of accepting of this she, by degrees, worked herself up to such a pitch of extravagance as made all reconciliation impracticable, though even then she never particularised any motive, nor was it till long after his departure that she invented that of his having told her she was handsome. Nobody pretends to guess either at the motive of her second abjuration, for she performed the same in France, and says that they forgot there to relieve her from the original excommunication. We once thought that she had a view of marriage with a young gentleman of this country, who might be her son. His family has been much alarmed, though he has assured them, without reason;—that he knows her character too well by having avoided the danger she would have exposed him to, by fighting on her account. For my part I am inclined to believe that she had no other motive but that of conformity to the religion of the country where she seems determined, and perhaps is obliged to live, thinking to recommend herself by that means; for the day after she had acted that farce she asked an audience of Count Richecourt by a note (though she had never been at his house before) on purpose to acquaint him with it, and to demand the Emperor's protection, telling his minister that she foresaw that it was a step that would be disapproved of by her nation, and that it would become her enemy. I interrupted the Count by saying that I was very sure her nation would be as indifferent about the religion she professed as she was herself. In short, supposing even that this step would have done her any good with the inhabitants, the extravagance of her behaviour has been such that it excludes even with them the opinion that she could have any good motive for taking it. I should not have dwelt so long upon this subject had not you ordered me to acquaint you with some particulars relating to this lady in a full confidence that it will remain entirely with you.

"Sir William Stanhope passed by here last autumn; during his stay here he permitted me to enjoy much of his company, having passed most of his time at my house; he is now at Naples, from whence in the Holy Week he made an excursion to Rome, and instead of going to Venice for the Ascension, as he had promised his nephew, he returned to Naples, where I hear he has taken a house for a year, still detained by the same motive that engaged him to return. He has quite recovered his hearing, and is vastly happy."

George Dodington to Mrs. East.

1754, December 14.—"The government of a gentleman of eighteen, master of a large fortune, is not a province of the most profound tranquillity for a lady." Induced by a long friendship with your families, being the only old man he is acquainted with, I will willingly, if it please you, try to convey the thoughts of a father to him, though I believe my rules and maxims are grown as old and unfashionable as myself.

"I am not alarmed at his love of expense; his allowance from Chancery is too small, and provided it does not arise from the pernicious passion for play, I think his finding 1,000*l*. more or 1,000*l*. less when he comes of age is of very little importance. His love of horsemanship also I am not apprehensive of. That sort he there practices, which is called the 'great Saddle,' will not lead him to a passion for fox-hunting, and the noble ambition of being the most formidable beast in the field, and spending the rest of his time with a set of animals, at home, who are employed and maintained to destroy those that remain without doors.

"I am chiefly afraid of his too hasty desire of going to Paris, where he will see and hear things, at an improper time of life, which he might make a very good use of at a proper one. I should wish, therefore, he should first stay some time in Italy . . . and from Italy return for a year to you (I shall have taken a journey that I hope he will defer many, many happy years), and then pass a winter at Paris. Lord Huntingdon did so." Copy.

GEORGE DODINGTON to MR. EAST.

1755, March 2. Pall Mall.—"You are now, dear Sir, of an age that permits me to tell you that I love you and to offer you my sincere wishes. You are born in a rank that gives the public a claim to you and expectations from you; of a mother who was always reckoned one of the most amiable women of her time. Her tenderness for you I am sure you have felt and I have seen. . . . You cannot receive the same marks of affection from your father, so I say no more of him. . . .

"You are now in a situation of fitting yourself for either or both of these characters [a man devoted to public life, or a private gentleman]. As to the dead languages, they embellish and amuse the mind, and I wish you may think so; but I lay no greater stress upon them to a man of your rank than as they relate to orthography and writing like a gentleman in your own. As to the living ones, permit me to insist that they are full as necessary to, and more the mark of a gentleman than a laced coat or a fine equipage. The same, give me leave to say, of a competent knowledge in the exercises of riding, dancing and fencing, which you are now entering upon; for though I should be sorry to see you at the head of a society of grooms, or a Mr. Fribble at every ball, and much more, a bully in midnight brawls, yet still I could wish, when properly called upon to any of these exercises, you should have it in your power to acquit yourself like a gentleman.

"And give me leave to tell you that, in my sense, the character of an English gentleman is a serious character. It is not a family, an estate, or an employment that gives it; 'tis not the Patent of the King; it is the Patent of the People only that bestows it. A gentleman must love his country, and look a little into its constitution, to know why he loves it; and if called to mount on horseback in defence of it, or his friend or mistress, he must know how to do it, in a manner that may neither disgrace himself or disgust either of them. He must know how to defend himself, and must only not know how to offend. He must wear his sword, like his wit, only pointed against those who, by undeserved provocation, run wilfully upon it. . . .

"Next, let me recommend to you very frequent conversation with women of fashion; I know nothing so proper to polish a firm and noble mind, and that so naturally will add grace to dignity. Let your first applications to intimacy be, if you please, with ladies much older than yourself; there is youth enough on your side. You will find those, believe me, very charitably inclined to put a young traveller in the right road. . . .

"And now, dear Sir, to finish the character of a pedagogue, which I have very impertinently assumed, it may be expected that I should tell you what I wish you should avoid; and these are only two things, gaming and marriage, and I trust you are too fond of your estate and your liberty to engage in either.

"As to gaming, the first propensity [to] it must be curbed, for I do assure you that amongst all the men of distinction that I ever was acquainted with, I never knew but one who had that passion, that ever left it off entirely; and I do also beg leave to assure you that I never knew one whom it did not make uneasy, even in the greatest fortunes. . . . As to marriage, my humble request is only temporary. The day will come (though I shall not live to see it) when I should as much wish to see you enter into that situation as I now do that you would defer it for some years. . . . Believe me, it is the step in life of all others that requires the most engaged and most mature consideration; for as a man that has a fortune to make is never absolutely undone, so a man whose fortune is made is never absolutely uneasy till he is married.

"I hope, dear Sir, you are pleased where you are, and with what you are doing. . . . I am the more partial to this way of education which you have happily entered upon because it was my own. I have lived some years abroad, and part of them in a public character, which led me to contract friendships with people of the first quality in most countries. These friendships I have kept up; and if this plan be at all agreeable to you, I will take care to recommend you, in all the great courts, to people of the highest distinction, who, I am sure, will receive you with as much affection as if you were my own son."

With postscript, dated as above, stating that the letter had been written the previous autumn, but it was thought better not to send it then. Copy.

George Dodington to Mr. East.

1755, May 11. Pall Mall.—Stating that he has forfeited Mrs. East's favour and confidence, he knows not why, and urging Mr. East on no account to enter into any engagement, promise or obligation to be made good when he comes of age, either as to himself or his fortune, by marriage or otherwise. Copy.

The Same to the Same.

1755, July 17. Hammersmith.—Praying him, if the danger of war with France should drive him from Caen, not to be persuaded to join his mother and her friend, seeing that for a lady to travel tête-à-tête with a gentleman she has not the least relation to is not enough authorized by custom to escape either the observation of foreigners or the remarks of their own countrymen; also desiring him to show this letter to nobody.

"I like your aversion to cards. 'Tis natural to be pleased that those we love should like and dislike as we do. I believe I have not played at cards ten hours these ten years, but it must sometimes be submitted to, by way of introduction and for small sums. . . . I think your allowance ought not to be less than 600*l.* per annum, nor can that by any means do if you must have a governor. I am very positive upon that head; I have no notion of your travelling with a governor; 'tis a great expense (not less than 300*l.* per annum in salary, maintenance, &c.) quite thrown away, nay worse, for, as you rightly observe, one is never so well received with one as without one. However, if you are forced to Geneva so much sooner than we wished, you may take yours, who is a very good man, with you thither. They are more used to them there than in greater states; but you must, by all means, take leave of him when you go to Italy, and take only a couple of servants with you—one that is used to be about you, and another that you may get, well recommended to you, that is used to travelling and knows the languages.

"I say I think your allowance should not be less than 600*l.* per annum, without a governor. You do not tell me if you think that is enough. Pray let me hear your thoughts of it, and if you think your guardians have settled it too narrow, say nothing to them, but draw upon me to make it up. Your bills shall be punctually paid, and you may repay me when you are of age or never, just as you please, for of you I accept neither security nor interest. In short, my meaning is this: I should be much happier to produce you to the world, a credit to your country and the pride of your friends, than to find that you, or I, were a thousand pounds richer when you come of age.

"A word about guardians. They are now, or ought to be nothing but names, to carry your intentions into execution. You must know what is proper for you to do much better than anybody; maybe not how to conduct it. Now to facilitate the execution of your plan is all they have to do, or will attempt, with a young man of your capacity, if they are in their senses. . . . I shall assist you in carrying your choice into execution with decency, honour and advantage, by all the means that my experience shall suggest; for in experience only I pretend to be your superior." Copy.

George Dodington to the Earl of Halifax.

1755, August 23. La Trappe.—"The King will be here between the 10th and 15th. Hawke's orders that your Lordship understood to be very indecisive, when we parted, were so, to a ridiculous degree; but have been altered into very decisive ones lately, of which we may expect the effects every hour. In the meantime, they forget to give the same orders to any other Admiral or single commander. Now for the natural consequences of so much wisdom.

"The 16th inst., the Greyhound, one of Smith's squadron in the Downs, takes a French ship of 400 ton, 20 guns, and 60 men, bound, I think, for America; brings her to Smyth, who dismisses her; she continues her voyage, persuaded all is well. . . . Now I am pleasing myself with the thought, when this very ship is taken and made prize by Hawke's people, as in all human probability she must be where she is going, how Capt. Aget will stare, and how much our incomprehensible neighbours (who are full of a peace, at Paris) must honour our superior incomprehensibility. . . .

"I have good reason to believe that Spain has declared to our ministers that she will observe an exact neutrality in this war; let it be carried on how or where it will, which I am very glad of.

"Lord Holderness went to Woolfenbuttle the 9th, and returned the 12th or 13th. My correspondent that went with him thinks it certain that they completed one match at least, most probably two ; says that the transaction itself was carried on with much secrecy, but that the appearances were so strong that all those of the party and of the place whom they conversed with thought alike ; and somebody put it into their heads that it was to be a double match,* and no money on either side. The extraordinary reception was one reason, for he says the servants were treated like gentlemen and Lord Holderness like a prince. I can hardly think that his Lordship would have left the King for three or four days at this critical conjuncture, to go to a fair ! God send it may be happy. For the contingent that we are to furnish, I have known them ever since they were born, and better goods for domestic, as well as public happiness, never were put out of hand. Copy.

MRS. ANNE EAST to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1755, September 5. Paris.—" The obliging letters you write to my son does him great honour, and I am much obliged to you for the kind notice you take of him, and, indeed, the offers you make him of supplying his want of money where the Chancery falls short is such an obligation as is never to be forgot ; but, Sir, I must beg you to consider he is very young, certainly not capable of judging for himself yet ; too much encouraged may perhaps be too presumptious—for what is so much so as ignorance—and he may take liberties from your indulgence that may be improper. . . . He is a very honest, good-hearted boy, but too young of his age, inattentive to business, apt to trifle away his time, knows but little of books. Let me intreat you, when you honour him with your letters, to recommend such books as may inform his mind. You have but to name 'em ; I'll answer for his readiness to observe, for he has set you up as his law-giver, and I believe the world could not persuade him to go contrary to your advice." Prays Dodington not to oppose her son coming to her in Paris for a day or two.

P.S.—" Sir John Bland took his leave of this world by the help of a sword last Wednesday morning."

GEORGE DODINGTON to the EARL OF HALIFAX.

1755, September 6.—" . . . Either this country or the whole system of continent subsidies must be put an end to. I defy the art of man to support the naval war in Europe and the mixed war in America vigorously, as the true interest of Britain requires, with a subsidiary war at the same time, upon the continent, fruitless and increasing. I say I defy the art of man to do these two things for three years together without a general bankruptcy.

" These subsidies will be strongly opposed ; possibly in your House by court lords of the first consideration. . . . I write only to entreat you to take no positive engagements when you come to town, nor to drop any expressions, even to the King, much less to the minister [Newcastle], that may in the least influence you when the time of action comes nearer."

* Prince of Wales to Princess ; Princess Augusta to Hereditary Prince.

George Dodington to Henry Fox.

1755, September 27. Eastbury.—"That of all those who are in the King's service or likely to be so, you are one whom I most cordially wish to see in the first rank, is a truth that I hoped to convince you of by contributing both to the placing and supporting you in it, and not by words, and therefore I have been very sparing of them. . . . My opinions in many things must naturally be known to most of those I converse with, for as it is below the Administration to take notice of them, I have thought it below me to conceal them; but as to the particular manner of acting in pursuit and consequence of those opinions, I have taken no positive engagement, because I have not positively determined it in my own thoughts, nor will I take any till I have the honour of seeing you, since you are pleased to make me some part of your care in so noble and friendly a manner. . . . I never thought you could be a looker on; I never wished it. I always wished you should be an actor—a principal actor, but where honour and reputation, as well as power and profit, distinguish the part you appear in; for, dear Mr. Fox, believe an old man that loves and esteems you, there is nothing else worthy of an honest, noble, well-regulated ambition." Copy.

The Duke of Newcastle to Lord Halifax.

1755, October 4. Claremont.—"I am sorry that your Lordship's absence has deprived me of an opportunity, which I should otherwise have taken, of acquainting you with the rise, progress, and cause of Mr. Fox's promotion, which was not so much as in negotiation till very lately. Everything has been done by my Lord Chancellor and myself, and I cannot too much commend the King's grace and goodness to us, upon this occasion, and at this conjuncture. I can send nō particulars by letter, but when I have the honour of seeing you, which, I hope, will be soon, I shall explain the whole to you.

"As I have had no view since last session of Parliament, but to bring all men of weight and abilities into the King's service, who would support the King's measures, and act in concert with his servants, I have been very desirous that the King should have the assistance of Mr. Dodington; and have not only spoke to the King for that purpose, but have his Majesty's leave to offer him a very considerable employment, which I hope will be entirely to his satisfaction. I found Mr. Fox equally desirous with myself to bring this about; and that Mr. Fox was at this time in great favour with Mr. Dodington. Mr. Fox readily undertook to talk to him, and intended to have gone to Dorsetshire on purpose; but Mr. Dodington coming to Hammersmith, they have since had a meeting, which has ended well, though Mr. Dodington has given no positive answer, or Fox made any particular offer. Mr. Fox found Mr. Dodington had the greatest regard for your lordship and desire to act with you, and is of opinion that you may be of great service to fix this matter to our satisfaction. I know your goodness to me, and your readiness to do anything that may be of real service, and particularly with Mr. Dodington. I therefore would be obliged to you if you would see him as soon as you can, acquaint him with the inclination of us all to have him one of us, and that for that purpose I had his Majesty's leave that Mr. Fox should talk to him, and you will say everything from yourself to induce him to come in. Mr. Fox has not thought proper to name the particular employment to him, and therefore you should not; but to show your lordship that I am in earnest, I have procured the King's leave to offer him the Comptroller's staff, but I beg you would not mention it to him. Your friend Hillsborough will then be pleased with the other staff, as Fox was, to be Secretary of State. I was glad of this opportunity of making our friend Barrington Secretary at War, which pleased the King as well as it did me." Copy, on the same sheet as the following letter.

Henry Fox to Lord Halifax.

1755, October 4. Holland House.—" . . . I am coming into a situation that will, I hope, give me opportunities of cultivating what I have long aspired to, your Lordship's friendship. . . . Mr. Dodington, who has known you longer, honours you above all mankind, and I believe is as much inclined as man can be to make one in a political system with your Lordship, Lord Hillsborough and your humble servant; but how far his opinion will permit him to follow his inclination, I do not know. I think him of great importance, and I believe, to the forming or changing that opinion, your Lordship will go a great way. If your Lordship thinks the measure which will be the question in debate (I mean the defence of Hanover by these two subsidiary treaties) just and necessary, and to be given in to, upon a knowledge that it is to extend no further, and would endeavour to engage Mr. Dodington, your Lordship would do the greatest service to your friends. The King has given his word that he will no longer put his negative on Mr. Dodington. . . .

"I am sensible that I have ventured too far with your Lordship in a first letter, but I hope and believe your Lordship will not only excuse this, but let me go a great deal further in the progress of that friendship which is among the sincerest and most ambitious wishes of, &c." Copy.

The Duke of Newcastle to Lord Halifax.

[1755, October 8]. Wednesday. Claremont.—Appointing a meeting with Mr. Dodington. Copy, on the same sheet.

The Duke of Newcastle and Mr. Dodington.

1755, October 10.—" An account of a conference between the Duke of Newcastle and Mr. Dodington." Printed in the Appendix to Dodington's Diary (ed. 1784, p. 337).

Memorandum by the Earl of Halifax.

1755, December 27. Horton.—On his claims to receive the Garter.

GEORGE DODINGTON to MR. EAST.

1756, January 19.—Urging him to remain in Geneva until the next year and to apply himself to acquiring thoroughly the French and Italian languages, and to the study of history—the history of his own country above all others. He can no doubt obtain Rapin Thoyras' Histoire de l'Angleterre, and there are many select pieces, on interesting periods and by men of great genius, such as are to be found in the works of the Abbés de Vertôt and St. Real in French, Guicciardini and Davila in Italian, and "a more comprehensive work, though not a very good one, but yet necessary to be read, L'Histoire ancienne par Rollin; the little period of his own time, wrote by the Cardinal de Retz, with inimitable beauty," and many others which no doubt Mr. Fraigneau will have the goodness to point out.

In belles lettres there are Boileau's Satires and Epistles, and M. de Voltaire's works, with many lesser compositions of wit and humour, and to these must be added the French critics and their translations of the Greek and Latin authors. Copy.

HENRY FOX to GEORGE DODINGTON.

[1756, April 7].—"His Majesty has consented to our staying till a properer time, so I advise you not to be at his levée to-day. I shall see you at the House." Endorsed with date.

GEORGE DODINGTON to MR. EAST.

1756, June 4. Pall Mall.—Expressing his astonishment that Mr. East has seen nothing remarkable in his mother's behaviour, giving him advice about money matters, and stating that he has left a sealed packet with a friend, Mr. Breton, to be delivered to East in case he (Dodington) dies before they can meet.

"I cannot conclude without declaring myself obliged to you for taking my plain friendly treating you, upon these tender but necessary points, in so kind, so generous a manner. I am charmed with it, as it proves both an excellent head and a good heart. . . . I recommend you, my dear child, most fervently to God's goodness and protection."

HENRY FOX to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1756, June 23. H[olland] House.—" . . . You will observe how like Galissoniere's [the French Admiral's] account was to this of Bing's, mutato nomine. I own I cannot but suppose this, as far as it goes, authentic, and as all the accounts from France agree that the siege of fort St. Phillips is not at all advanced, what if we should at last save it? This is the first time I have indulged myself in such a supposition.

"Bing's despatches, sent from Barcelona cross Spain to the Corunna, are not arrived."

THE SAME to the SAME.

1756, June 23.—"The despatches mentioned in Miller's letter are already come this moment, not all deciphered, but enough so to blast most of the hopes you and I conceived. He [Byng] says he beat the French fleet, or rather that it was a drawn battle. But he says they are too strong for us, that the fort is invested with 17,000 men (in buckram I suppose), so that a letter cannot be conveyed into the place ; and that by the advice of a council of war he is going back to Gibraltar to refit, wait for reinforcements, and return. He hopes to make a more complete victory. Helas ! adieu."

P.S.—Capt. Andrews of the Defiance is killed.

Sir Horace Mann to George Dodington.

1756, July 23. Florence.—" . . . Long before this can reach you the fatal news of the loss of Minorca will be known in England. The stroke is so great, and attended by so many disagreeable circumstances, that the shock, I fear, will not have been diminished by being foreseen ; the consequences, too, must be very great, and not hidden to your penetration. It has already emboldened the perfidious republic of Genoa to avow what they have long been secretly treating about, a convention with the French, by which they yield up all their ports in Corsica, that are immediately to be garrisoned by French troops, in consideration of an annual subsidy of one million two hundred thousand livres. It is said that some steps of the same kind will be taken to exclude our ships from Villa Franca, and that the Duke de Richelieu is to go to Turin for that purpose ; and yet it is necessary that we should have a large fleet in the Mediterranean to retrieve the honour of the nation as well as to protect our trade. What an opportunity has been lost to strike a blow that France would not have recovered in twenty years. . ."

George Dodington to Henry Fox.

1756, August 30. Eastbury.—" I know nothing of public affairs but from the public papers, which represent them in a state of perplexity which I do not see sufficient grounds for ; but if those gentlemen are at all well-informed, and they should, in any the least degree, be in such a state as to make people think that their friends can be of any use to them, you will please to remember that if you send your commands to La Trappe you will find one who is much more ready to do than to say.

" But in truth, the state of my poor dear country is not the cause of my writing, tho' so pathetically set forth by those gentlemen, but their report of your ill-health, which a little alarms me, is the real motive of this letter ; and if you can order Mr. Tucker to send me word that you are well, it will be a more agreeable piece of news to me than all the ministerial intelligence you will ever be able to send me as long as you live."

Postscript.—" My duty to Lady Caroline and any young widow you may find in the neighbourhood." Copy, on the same sheet as the preceding.

George Dodington to Lord Dupplin.

1756, August 30. Eastbury.—Although public affairs afford no very promising prospect, he sees no ground for despair, or even great uneasiness. His own part is easy, as it is both his inclination and duty to serve the public by co-operating with his friends, amongst whom he hopes his lordship may be reckoned. Copy, on the same sheet as the preceding.

R. Glover to George Dodington.

1756, August 30. London.—" . . . The public are sufficiently prepared for some expedient of a militia, probably from the quarter you refer to; from that quarter they expect nothing but a snake in the grass, and will receive it with the indignation it deserves. . . . There are three clouds over our heads, and must burst before the end of two months. The Brest squadron has been stronger than Boscawen for some time. It will not lie always in port. Sir Edward Hawke, all circumstances considered, is inferior to the Toulon squadron, which, we have reason to expect, will soon put to sea. General Winslow marched with nine thousand New England troops from Albany on the 12th of July to attack Crown Point, where the works are vastly enlarged, and defended by at least five thousand men. For my own part, I wait with the utmost uneasiness for these three events, which all promise nothing but new disgrace and calamity."

Sam Masham to George Dodington.

1756, September 5. Oates, near Harlow, Essex.—" Give me leave, dear Sir, to return you a thousand thanks for the best venison I ever tasted. . . . I invited two fat parsons to partake of it. They ate as if it did their hearts good, though it made mine ache. It put me in mind of Joh. Miller (by the by no bad author), who invited a friend (a devilish eater) to dine with him on a shoulder of veal. Good Master Miller, says he, this is something like living, here's cut and come again. Aye, says poor Joh., you may cut but by —— you shall never come again."

George Dodington to Henry Fox.

1756, [September 6]. Eastbury.—" I thank you for your kind letter. Your recovery gives me real joy; take care not to dash it by a relapse, but obey the Countess and I am contented . . .

" You say nothing of Brest. Are you sure that they are not stronger there than Boscawen for periods long enough to come out and attack him?

" I hope the best from the Mediterranean, but am not quite so sure as you seem to be of our superiority there at this hour. Remember how you were misled into a belief that Byng's squadron was too strong for all that they could put out, which it certainly was not; for those who affirmed that to you could have no certainty of his being joined by Edgecumbe—but this is between ourselves.

" I entirely agree there is no great reason to apprehend any active mischief from America this year, but reflect a little, if inaction be not defeat, in an undertaking where, without victory, the expense is ruin . . ." Copy. Dated August 6, but endorsed :—" To Mr. Fox of the 6th of September."

SAM MASHAM to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1756, October 13.—I have been this morning with the Duke of Newcastle. He acknowledged the promise he had made me, and (without making any sort of excuse) told me it was fixed for som body else. This is truth, upon my honour."

THE EARL OF HALIFAX to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1756, October 18. Horton.—I am much obliged to you for the notice you give me of things being in a state of fermentation, and heartily wish it may soon subside. I dare say you think my presence in town necessary, but really, "considering the inferior rank of office I hold, the little right I have to be consulted on such an occasion, and the little weight my opinion, if given, would probably have, I am not aware my journey to town could be of any utility to the King's government or the public service; and as it may be attended with unpleasant circumstances to myself, who am naturally an enemy to quarrel, and dont like being a spectator of distress, I purpose enjoying my retirement here till I see reason to think my presence in town will be of use."

HENRY FOX to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1756, Oct. 19. H[olland] House.—"I had a good deal of serious discourse with his Majesty yesterday. The Chancellor did not come to town till last night. The D[uke] of N[ewcastle] did not know his own mind till then, if he does now. His Majesty kept his temper therefore, and is open to any future behaviour he shall think proper. Pitt came to town this morning. I know nothing more, and therefore had nothing to trouble you with. I believe, without knowledge, reflection will have brought you from what seemed to be your opinion on Saturday, that things will be accommodated. But [what] will be the event I know not, nor am in any degree master of it; it is in other hands, and I am not sorry for it."

GEORGE DODINGTON to the EARL OF HALIFAX.

1756, October 27. La Trappe.—Congratulating him upon his "new station," and calling upon him not only to defend his country, but to assist her in her collective capacity; to "procure her justice from her neighbours, retrieve her honour, recover her possessions, and fix her independency once more among the nations, without which her independency at home will be very precarious." Copy.

THE EARL OF HALIFAX to GEORGE DODINGTON.

[1757, February 26]. Saturday Evening. Bushey Park.—"I take for granted that the House of Commons will unanimously agree to the Bill,* and everything relative to that and the suspension of the execution, I dare say you have taken proper care of. I never saw such times as these, and therefore I hinted to you this morning that nothing was to be trusted to. Though I have not too partial a regard to the body of which I am one, yet my astonishment and indignation were raised as high as one of my phlegm and resignation can be supposed to indulge either, when I received the news you sent me of the Bill being to be opposed in the House of Lords. In matters of death, you will allow that Patience may come as properly from the monument as on any other occasion; and though I pretend not to move hearts of stone, I am resolved to do what I can towards it.

* For absolving the members of the Court Martial on Admiral Byng from their oath of secrecy.

"Do our Bishops, who are so careful of their Sunday, wish that blood, probably innocent, should be spilt on Monday? Will former ministers wish that blood should be spilt on a supposed crime of negligence? Will lords of the law oppose the explanation of a sentence that nobody can understand, and they less than any others? And will common sense and humanity quit the breasts of every other Lord who has not been tied to law or church? Fye, fye! I can't suppose it; but if it be so, as I love you, let me recommend to you never to think of us; we are not fit company for you."

I beg you to tell my servant what has passed in your house, and is likely to pass in ours. I took my children to La Trappe this morning. They had never seen anything so elegant before, and were the better pleased with all they saw, because it belonged to one who has been so good to them, and who they know is so dear to their father.

Henry Fox to George Dodington.

[1757, March 12]. Saturday Morning.—"What can I do? Can I speak to Lord Halifax without such authority as may justify me at all events in what I say to him. I not only authorise but desire you to converse with him on the subject, and if you please, to say that it is by my desire and on this foot:—That I wish the King would dismiss Pitt, Lord Temple, &c.; that I think no one of the late Ministers can now succeed them, but that such a ministry should be formed as the late Ministers may support, and as the people cannot complain of; that the Secretary of State must be in the House of Commons; that if the Duke of Devon will stay there is no place but First Lord of the Admiralty for his lordship, nor anybody that I know of but his lordship who could fill that place; that I should advise you to succeed him, and that Oswald should be Secretary of the Admiralty; that the conciliabulum should consist of the Dukes of Devon and Bedford, the Earl of Halifax, Lord Mansfield, and the two Secretaries. This is my notion, and if everybody will act the part assigned them, I can answer for the success. If because they will not, or for any other reason, his Majesty is forced to keep these gentlemen two months longer, I shall look upon them as complete conquerors, and Leicester House the Court. I shall not go to it, but I shall struggle no longer against it. Adieu, my dear Sir. As soon as I know his Majesty's determination you shall know more, or that there is nothing more to be known."

Endorsed with date.

THE EARL OF HALIFAX to GEORGE DODINGTON.

[1757, March 12.] Saturday night. Bushey Park.—I received yours, enclosing that from Mr. Fox to you, at dinner time. "As Mr. Fox has no positive and precise proposition to make, I can have none such answer to give. You have done your part in laying before me what he desired might be submitted to my consideration, and I will talk with him on the subject whenever he likes I should; by his own account of things I think he is not quite ripe for it yet. I continue with respect to the Admiralty in the same opinion I was last night, . . . and am convinced of the necessity of its being further explained, and the concurrence of all the principal parties being proved, before a man of common sense and prudence would be inclined to pledge himself. You know how delicate I am in engagements of a political sort, because I am desirous of a strict adherence to them." I will come up to-morrow evening if necessary.

Endorsed with date.

HENRY FOX to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1757, March 15.—"I understand Lord T[emple] had an unkindly audience, in which his Majesty did by no means yield; but I understand they do not intend to resign upon it. So now things tend to delay again; and you and I think alike of the consequence of that. I am the less anxious, because, though you may not see Lord H[alifax']s refusal in so strong a light as I do, yet, my dear Sir, if we cannot change his mind, it is much the same thing; and I will not, upon consideration, give myself leave to imagine that what you cannot do with him, the Duke of Bedford can. Pitt, &c., have, by their faults and want of judgment, put themselves into our power; it is now our turn by the same means to make them again masters. It is, however, neither your fault nor that of yours ever."

The SAME to the SAME.

1757, March 16.—"Capacity is so little necessary for most employments that you seem to forget that there is one where it is absolutely so—viz., the Admiralty. It is there we want Lord Halifax' active ability, and if he will not accept it, Lord Winchelsea must be the man. Now, my dear Sir, when the King with difficulty can be brought to open his closet door to Lord Halifax, as head of the Admiralty, do you believe his declining that office will leave a possibility of his being Secretary of State? Neither do I (however I may wish it him for his own sake) think there is any immediate want of him in that office. His objection can't be Lord Anson, for I told him whenever the King and the times were ripe for that, he could not go out of the Admiralty, but to something he would like infinitely better. And if that should happen, he might be courted to take those seals, which nobody can force for him now. The plan I projected was not to please particular people, but to extricate the King and the country from the difficulties, both domestic and foreign, they are involved in. This cannot be done but by finding such men as are least obnoxious and most able; and placing them, not where they may choose, but where they may best answer the great purposes they are called upon for.

"Upon the whole you are troubled with this to desire you to turn your thoughts to this measure, remembering these two things which I lay down as certainties—first, that the First Lord of the Admiralty must be a man of real ability and great application; secondly, that if Lord Halifax refuses it, though the Secretaries should both be taken out of the House of Lords, he will not be one of them, unless great chance, for which in planning you can take no credit, should so order it.

"I shall talk this over with the Duke of Bedford, but if his Grace should have more weight than you with Lord Halifax, I shall be struck with wonder not favourable to his lordship."

George Dodington to Henry Fox.

1757, March 18.—Thinks it absurd to exact a promise "to concur" from a man who never in his life kept one if it interfered with his interest and safety. If that is all the assurance their friend [Halifax] has, believes he himself will not think it worth sixpence. Lord Mansfield is said not to approve as warmly as could be wished.

La Cerda, the Portuguese Minister to France, is in London. "Would catch like a drowning man at the smallest twig that could possibly shoot out into a peace," but wishes his friends to have the making of it. Copy.

Henry Fox to George Dodington.

[1757, March 20.] Sunday night.—"I wish I could agree with you that Lord H[alifax] mentioned the idle promise of another, pro formâ only. But we may probably see, for a positive declaration will be required on the D[uke] of N[ewcastle]'s part; and, perhaps, declined. Lord Mansfield, I am told, approves of no mezzo termino. I believe he approves of nothing that may sooner or later make his patron again a minister. Be at the House to-morrow, and I will inform you, and besides I intend there to call upon the Ministers for a contradiction of the prevailing lie that is industriously spread, of an intended message for English troops to be sent to Westphalia. They say Pitt would not carry such message, and is therefore to be turned out. Adieu. Put the inclosed in your drawer, and 100*l.* in your pocket, which give me to-morrow."

Endorsed with date.

Enclosing:—

> Receipt for 100*l.*, from George Bub Dodington, for which is promised delivery of "a proper security on the Stockbridge turnpike." Signed, Harry Harmood, Treasurer to the Commissioners.

Earl of Hillsborough to George Dodington.

[1757, April 2]. Saturday.—"I have called three times upon dear Mr. Dodington to tell him all I know and to deliver a message to him from Mr. F[ox], who wished me to send him your answer at two o'clock. He begs of you to accept of Treasurer of the Navy without making conditions at present; and commissioned me to repeat to you his assurances of standing by you, totis viribus, if during his Majesty's life any attempt should be made to maltreat you; that he will not stay in a quarter of an hour if such an event was to happen; and if you will be so kind to him as to accept of this for the present, he will be ready to assist in bringing about any practicable exchange that you may wish. I beg leave to add that I hope you will comply with his request, and let me know your resolution as soon as you arrive. He desired me further to ask you whether you would choose it should be done before or after the holidays. [Winchelsea] accepts of the A[dmiralty], so things will be immediately carried into execution; but I believe as yet this is a secret."

Date given in endorsement.

George Dodington to Henry Fox.

1757, June 2. La Trappe. Thursday night.—"I hear you are come to town, but not much more informed of the settlement of the administration than the King himself. How long is this gentleman [Pitt] to trifle with his sovereign and benefactor, and to keep our destiny in suspense; you of too much consequence, I of too little, to be trusted with or admitted to the honour of supporting him? I know nobody that ought to decide for you but the King: I am sure nobody shall decide for me but you." Copy.

Same to the Same.

1757 June 3. La Trappe.—Expressing his conviction that the King stands equally engaged in honour, though not in interest," to both of them for the two Paymasters' offices. If it is necessary for him to be left out, he has nothing to say, except that Mr. Fox must settle about an equivalent for him, as he himself will have nothing to do with them. Copy.

Henry Fox to George Dodington.

[1757, June 3]. Friday night.—"It is impossible to recollect, and you, dear Sir, would be sorry to read, half the absurdities I have heard this day. The Duke of Newcastle went to the King not to accept but to desire till Tuesday to determine, because Lord Hardwicke does not come to town till Monday. If he accepts, it is against the advice of all his friends; yet he will accept, and let those friends make his situation ten times worse than it would be if they did not meddle. But he is to act against their advice, and yet they are to advise him. I, in the meantime, will not be of the system (as you will persist to call what those do who never had a system). I will take what I take from the King. He is certainly engaged in honour to you as well as to me, and therefore that settlement too must be with him. But they cannot settle it with me, nor I with him as yet, for I am sick of what passes, and will neither see him nor them more till I kiss his hand, and that I ever shall kiss it is doubtful."

Endorsed with date of receipt, June 4.

Henry Fox to George Dodington.

1757, June 6.—"The Duke of Newcastle has been with the King to know what terms he may offer Mr. Pitt, whom, together with Lord Hardwyke and Lord Bute, he is to meet to-night. The King gave the Duke little encouragement to think he would condescend to such terms as they would accept, and the Duke gave the King as little to imagine that he would come in without them. His Grace is to be at Court to-morrow, when, according to present appearances, they will part for good and all, for the King complains of himself for having permitted so long delay. But the very reverse of this conjecture may prove to be the event. Incertus, non perturbatus. I'le go to dinner. Adieu! Copy. With note that the original has been sent on to the Earl of Hillsborough.

George Dodington to Henry Fox.

[1757], June 10. La Trappe.—"When we parted, I went to carry Lord Leicester to Ken-wood, who kept us drinking there till nine. Not a word said of what had passed or was passing. I met Rigby yesterday in Hyde Park, who stopped me to tell me that Lord H[oldernes]s had resigned. Am I to wish you joy, and of what? If I am, I do it cordially, and will support you in every honourable thing, usque ad internecionem, in whatever shape you like best, either in or out." Copy.

Richard Cumberland.

1757, August. Eastbury.—Verses in praise of Eastbury and Dodington. After lamenting the "gothic taste," which runs after "wayward fabrics" without "fence from winds or shelter from the sky," or "after > "Some puppet shrine, where antick Folly dwells > Bedawbed with dragons and behung with bells," he continues:—

> "Hither with joy the man of Taste resorts,
> But slowly lags through Eastbury's stately courts:
> Forward to censure, though profoundly blind,
> He spies out faults Palladio would not find;
> Sleeps o'er her splendours with an idiot gaze,
> Nor damns one elegance with awkward praise.
> . . . .
> Yet mourn not Eastbury, thy peculiar fate,
> Thy master's virtues are as much their hate;
> Know, to excell at this degenerate time,
> In him or thee is equally a crime."

The poem ends with a prophecy that a better race and a happier age will > "Respect a genius form'd the State to guide,

> Brand the low arts that tore him from its side;
> Lay bare to shame the faction and their plan
> And pay his memory what they ow'd the man."

The Earl of Halifax to George Dodington.

1757, October 15. Bushey Park.—Has lately been so ill of a fever that it might have prevented his seeing the ruin of his country, which he now imagines he will be a miserable spectator of.

Is alone with his three dear children (who will probably see more misery than he himself will), and prays Dodington to join their family dinner at three o'clock.

Lord Talbot to George Dodington.

[1757, December 17].—" . . . Lord Bute's manner of honouring me with expressions of esteem before you is doubly flattering; he has capacity, discernment, spirit and dignity of mind that might make a person more exempt from vanity than myself highly pleased with the knowledge of such a man's good opinion, and he has such a propriety of manners and such attentive good breeding that he would not have chosen me for a theme of conversation to you unless he had believed the topic acceptable. I am to dine with him to-morrow, but I believe he has nothing of a political nature to communicate to me, for, though I am not without some degree of accidental merit to his connexion, I fancy they do not much care what my sentiments are; but whether I stand well or ill with them, if they will do their duty by the public, they shall have my cordial support." Date given in endorsement.

Sir Horace Mann to George Dodington.

1758, March 18. Florence.—" . . . I am much obliged to you for the instructive sketch which you have given me of our affairs at home. . . . An union of counsels of people of such abilities and experience to concert and determine all political measures, and a vigorous execution of them by others, seems the most expedient for the service of any country. Such a hero as Prussia affords both in civil and military affairs is not often to be met with, and he too has his exceptions. The prospect of success that we may expect from the efforts that will be made so early this year in America affords some satisfaction; any one considerable advantage in those parts would, in all probability, oblige the court of France to listen to equitable terms of accommodation, as there is hardly room to doubt that she is already tired of an ally who has involved that nation in such imbroils, the expence and duration of which could not be foreseen, . . . so that considering it purely in the light that you mention, of a diversion, it seems both a prudent and necessary measure to support the King of Prussia. . . . If each of the Empress's allies should do their utmost, one might tremble for the King of Prussia ; but he alone will have 200,000 men, exclusive of the Hanoverian Army. Great feats may be done with such a force, directed by such a prince. During all these troubles, Italy enjoys a perfect tranquillity, nor, excepting the trifling number of troops that the Queen has had from hence, there is no probability that any of the princes of it will take part in them."

GEORGE DODINGTON to SIR HORACE MANN.

1758, July 11. Hammersmith.—Praying him to try to bring about a reconciliation between Lady Orford and her husband, Mr. Shirley.* Copy.

SIR HORACE MANN to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1758, August 12. Florence.—Giving an account of his interview with Lady Orford, and regretting that he has not been able to bring about a reconciliation.

The SAME to the SAME.

1759, March 30. Florence.—" . . . We are in daily expectation of an event that might naturally disturb the tranquillity of Italy, but we are now told, and the public dispositions seem to confirm it, that the King of Spain's death will not give occasion to any disturbances. It is difficult to see how such contending interests can be adjusted ; certain it is that the ground work of it is, however, to leave the Kingdom of Naples to a second son of the present possessor when he succeeds to the crown of Spain. What equivalent can be found for Don Philip or for those who by the treaty of Aix were to share the States which he now enjoys, is a secret I suppose known to very few ; but the Courts of Vienna and France were too much interested to prevent a storm that must have proved very prejudicial to the system they are at present engaged in, not to make some sacrifice on this occasion.

" We have the pleasure to hear that our own affairs go on very successfully, and have reason to flatter ourselves that we shall be able to baffle the resentment which the French threaten us with this summer. It is certain that they will exert their utmost efforts to recover the reputation of their arms. I will venture to congratulate you, Sir, on our success at Guadaloupe, as it is a severe blow on the enemy, though I fear that such an acquisition will not totally make amends for the disappointment we met with at Martinico. Their trade in these ports to the Levant is entirely put a stop to by the vigilance of our cruisers, though they had found out the means of carrying it on under neutral colours and in the names of neutral subjects. Those of Leghorn were deeply engaged in this deceit, but many have paid dear for it of late. This Government is angry, and cannot brook seeing their own ships brought back as prizes into their own ports, though at the same time they are sensible that the least resentment or impediment would make the matter worse, and that our people would carry them down to Gibraltar.

* There are several letters from Lady Orford to Dodington, and one from him to her, on this subject.

"Marquis Niccolini thinks that he has had a misfortune in his family by loosing his eldest nephew, who was the head of it, and who was on the point of marrying; but he was so unhappy in his understanding, almost an idiot, that everybody else thinks it was lucky. The next brother marries the same young lady who was designed for the other."

George Dodington to Mr. Shirley.

1759, September 15. Eastbury.—"We have not only sacrificed thirty millions of moneys and thirty thousand men to preserve the interests, rights and power of the nation upon the continent of America, but we have added ten supererogatory millions upon this continent to preserve the interest and power of the ministry. We have succeeded fully in both, thank God; let us leave off while we are well, and before we are obliged to sacrifice our works of necessary duty to our acts of supererogation; let us clap up a good English peace while we may, and not be forced to cover our losses in Germany by our gains in America. . . . It is true (and I rejoice, I pride myself in it), that with the help of our money and a very gallant body of our countrymen, [Prince Ferdinand] has beat the French about the field; but let us remember he has not beat them out of the field.

"Poor Lord George! I hear he begins again. Virum volitare per ora. He was burnt this week at Salisbury." Copy.

The Earl of Halifax to George Dodington.

1759, December 10. Downing Street.—"As you gave me hopes I should have the honour and pleasure of your company at Horton this Christmas, I called on you . . . to tell you that our party moves northward on Friday sennight, and that I am far more ready to treat on terms of accommodation (for our journey) than any Plenipos you may have read or heard of lately. . . ."

When there you shall have everything as much to your wish as I and my young ones can make it, "who will sing and prattle to you better than when you saw Horton last."

George Dodington to Lord Chancellor Bowes.

1760, April 8.—A very long letter, giving a clear and unprejudiced summary of Lord George Sackville's conduct at and after the battle of Minden; of his dismissal by the King and demand for a Court Martial. Dodington believes that when Lord Holderness sent the King's permission for a Court Martial, adding that his Lordship would see that there was no specific charge against him, Lord George's wisest plan would have been to go no further, but to let his friends spread about "that he had been injured by private pique, that he had insisted upon a Court Martial to expose his faults to all mankind, and when he had forced them to grant it, they told him that they had nothing to charge him with ; conscious then of his own innocence, he had nothing left but to sit down contented with being made a sacrifice to a German General, whose displeasure he had incurred for not suffering without remonstrance the British army to be squandered and the British troops to be destroyed by undue preferences in the defence of Hanover." All this, though probably not true, might have been of great avail to him by and by, when the people's hot fit was over and a cold one come on. Instead of this his Lordship has held fast to his claim for a Court Martial, though it is difficult to see what he can gain by it. It is a strange transaction, which has put under a military arrest and trial by a Court Martial a member of Parliament who has now nothing on earth to do with the army ; a point which seems to be of the highest importance, " but given up by the Parliament and the people with the utmost indifference." On the day when the King sent the message to the Commons that he had " detained " one of the members, Dodington went to the House, although he was not in the habit of attending it, and had not been there above three times this session. He found all the lawyers there " of all ages and denominations," which made him expect that they meant to give their opinions on the legality of this military detainer, which actually affected the life of a member, but to his astonishment, " the question for the address of thanks [for the King's message] was put and agreed to without one word being said."

Upon this Dodington rose and testified his surprise that in a case so grave, affecting the life of a member and the liberty of them all, the House should " tacitly approve of a doctrine certainly very new, and supported, indeed, upon very great authority, without requiring any one reason in support of that authority " ; that knowing no statute or reasons on which the legality of the military detainer was grounded, he felt it his duty to declare positively that in his opinion it was not law, and that " a point so affecting the very foundation of the constitution was not to be established by implication and arbitrary constructions of ambiguous expressions ; that such an express and dangerous abridgement of liberty must be established by an express law, framed for that sole purpose and intention, and declaring in the preamble the absolute necessity it is built upon." To this the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Treasurer of the Navy said something " pretty slight." Dodington answered them pretty strongly, and there the matter ended without another word.

Lord Talbot to George Dodington.

1760, August 25. Hensol.—" The comparative power of France and England is a melancholy consideration ; but their own writers, who state their revenue nearly as high as it is stated in the paper for which I am indebted to your kind attention, acknowledge that both in the collection and management of their revenue, and in numerous instances of their domestic conduct, they have interior evils that enervate and consume their strength, and it appears to me, had we guarded against the intrigues of France at the commencement of this war, and not absurdly imagined that we could enable the personal abilities of the King of Prussia to be superior to the numerous forces and extensive territorial powers combined against him, and had not we impotently and impolitically attempted to raise him upon the ruins of a house that it has, unhappily, cost this nation so much blood and treasure to establish as a bulwark against that of Burbon, I, with diffidence, say it appears to me that this war would probably have reduced France to a lower ebb than she was reduced to by the Marlborough successes, and notwithstanding the ruin impending over us, it will require a length of time, and a very wise and steady administration of affairs, for France to recover the trade, the marine and recruits of people, of which she has been deprived by the exertion of our maritime force. You will conclude that I am an advocate for the war. I own I think it was unavoidable, not that I am deluded by the splendid events that gratify our vanity in our brilliant beggary, or insensible of the misery and devastation of mankind. The wisdom, the spirit and the integrity of those ministers who advised our piratical denunciation of our resentment for the insolence and injuries received in America never were the theme of my panegyrics, but in public, as in private life, the conduct of other people leave to the ablest of men only the option which part to take between different evils. The annals of our history prove that our wealth, our power, the employment and consequential increase of our numbers of inhabitants have been greatly advanced by our American possessions, and therefore true policy, as well as the protection due in honour and justice to those who are entitled to it by their obedience to our Government, made it impossible longer to endure the both open and insidious attacks of France upon our colonies, for Machiavel's observation is true, that an injury ought not to be connived at when you have power to revenge it. . . .

"I have always considered the Prussian victories in a different light from that with which they have dazzled much stronger and abler eyes, and I do not feel his distress with the aching heart that possibly an Englishman ought to have for the benevolent and pious defender of the German liberties and Protestant religion, and I do not see, provided we were not accessory to it, that the ungrateful Hungarian woman's being possessed of the dominions of the House of Brandenburgh would be finally advantageous to France or injurious to Britain. But I dread the arrival of every post, for though we have reason to have confidence in the valour of our troops, and much praise is bestowed on the capacities of Duke Ferdinand and the hereditary Prince, and the French seem subject to panics, our stake is a deep one, and should it be lost, besides the private friends we shall have cause to lament and the number of gallant countrymen to deplore, I fear there is something in the air of the Cabinet that would not advise such measures as might still enable us to dictate terms of peace, and to secure our future tranquillity and lasting influence."

Lord Talbot to George Dodington.

1760, September 1. Hensol.—"I am much obliged to an inaccurate account for a second favour from my very dear Mr. Dodington. . . . I thank you for your kind desire to hear that I had got well into a post assigned me by your friend Stanley. You judge very justly that it is the only one into which, if I was fairly entered, I might effectually serve my friends and country, but it is now too late in life for me to occupy that post with ability and to discharge the duty of it with readiness and assiduity. . . .

"The Brecknockshire militia have been amused with a march of near two hundred miles. I suppose ours* will be called out before Christmas. I will endeavour to do my duty as well as the lowest private man, and as readily as the first officer honoured with a station to acquire glory; but it is impossible not to feel the insolence with which the militia is treated, or not to be provoked at the violation of the law by which this constitutional force ought to be regulated; or not to be exasperated by being made an expedient army, to facilitate German politics. Where I shall be sent I do not guess, but I shall not compliment power by an offer of my service. I accepted the command because my countrymen desired me, and I thought I could not consistently with my principles of government refuse their request. Till imminent danger of invasion, our continuance unembodied is most agreeable to my sense of the true nature of a British militia; but wherever I go you may be sure there will be found a person most sincerely attached to my dear Mr. Dodington."

George Dodington to the Earl of Bute.

1760, October 27.—Stating that he has just heard of the King's death, and praying his Lordship to obtain for him some mark of the royal favour from the young King and the Princess, who has ever been his most gracious mistress.

The Same to the Same.

1760, Dec. 15.—" . . . I am exerting all my endeavours to get as many members as I possibly can. For God's sake do not suffer all the King's interest to be employed against his power. If it be not thought proper to raise an army, let us at least secure a phalanx to oppose the malice and faction which are everywhere at work. Copy."

The Same to the Same.

1760, December 22. Pall Mall.—In relation to the measures to be taken "to recover monarchy from the inveterate usurpation of oligarchy." Sends some lines, which must not be seen by anybody, unless his lordship has a mind to make the King or the Princess laugh.

Quoth Newcastle to Pitt, 'tis in vain to dispute;
If we'd quarrel in private, we must make room for Bute.
Quoth Pitt to his Grace, to bring that about,
I fear, my dear lord, you or I must turn out.
Not at all, quoth the Duke, I meant no such thing,
To make room for us all, we must turn out the King.
If that's all your scheme, quoth the Earl, by my troth,
I shall stick by my master, and turn ye out Both.

* I.e., the Glamorganshire militia, of which Lord Talbot had been made Colonel.

Lord Talbot to George Dodington.

1760, December 28. Hensol.—"I have this moment received a melancholy, penitential epistle from the gloomy cell of the most mortified anchorite that ever passed his unsocial life without bestowing or receiving pleasure in the ordinary intercourse of the world. . . . You tell me you have heard nothing from me, know nothing about me, and have nothing to say to me. The first position is for your advantage, the second for mine, and the third, provided such a letter as I have this minute received can be said to contain nothing, is the sort of correspondence I would wish from you and any pen, if another can be found equal to yours. . . .

"Dashwood's reception gives me extreme felicity; his head is capable of being turned to everything considerable; his heart is incapable of being perverted from everything good, great and amiable. Lord Bute will find him an original equal to the picture delineated by your masterly pencil and coloured from your Rubens pallet, and he has a firmness in his nature that will make very flippant orators unwilling to take up the gauntlet when he throws it upon the arena. A King that means to found his glory and happiness upon the felicity of his people cannot place such a subject too high in office. Of the names who are to add lumber to the House of Lords, some I much approve; Lord Mansfield (sic) and yours are each a plus that will allow many minuses in our political algebraical calculations of ability.

"I before heard the country dance figure of crossing over and changing hands in the debate in the House of Commons; a little interest and some vanity made mutual absurdities. His Majesty's elegant and lively expression from his heart was known and felt before I left town; it was a sentiment that a Lord Strafford would have felt, and a Lord Bute I hope deserves, but it was such a one as the Lord President [Lord Ashley] thought a youthful extravagance. Indeed the united people do justice to their monarch, and if he is supported by instruments worthy the dignity and spirit of his mind, his annals will shine beyond the most illustrious of the fortunate number added to his name."

Same to the Same.

1761. Lent. Wednesday morning.—"Lent is a season of self-denial and mortification to good Christians; I shall, therefore, deny myself the pleasure I had proposed of dining with my dear Mr. Dodington, and acquaint him that resentment arising from a proud heart and suspicion entertained by too refining a head, have, though supported by as obstinate a temper as ever made man impracticable, been forced to give way to the accumulated acts of friendship and attention shown by your noble friend [Bute] to all the little circle of my most cordial attachments. Dashwood repeated to me what passed yesterday; McKye was also highly satisfied with his reception; in truth, there is a conduct of such dignity, spirit, and generosity, so characteristic of the man, that I think I should as easily determine from what source particular measures flowed, as you would judge a cartoon to have been drawn by Raphael or a beautiful passage in the Iliads to have been wrote by Homer, though you should have found one in a country church, or read the other on a scrap of waste paper. I, therefore, have told Dashwood that I will venture to accept for Mr. Rice, as dispatch is necessary, and it must be seven or eight days at soonest before his answer can return. . . .

"I hope Mr. Rice will be in town before I set out for Wales, or that I shall meet him on the road, for it is necessary that he should know that the offer proceeds spontaneously from Lord Bute, entirely unsolicited by me or unhinted by the Duke of Newcastle, who will be much hurt that a man should be placed in office without his assistance that he has known from an infant, and for whom he has constantly professed the affection of a parent."

The Earl of Bute to Lord Melcombe.*

[1761, June 15]. Monday night.—"Late as it is, I can't go to bed without imparting to you a piece of intelligence that vexes me extremely, while I hate myself for suffering it [to] do so, as I think it highly improbable. It has been asserted to Lord Shelburn that your lordship attempted to supply his vacancy in Wycomb without his knowledge. There is not a man in the kingdom for whom I entertain a warmer friendship, and whose character, spirit, and talents I have a higher opinion of; therefore, you must not be surprised if the least surmise of this nature puts me in a flurry, as it tends to disjoint persons I wish to see cordially united. Be so good, my dear lord, as to let me know what you imagine could have given rise to this report, for if (as I incline to believe) it prove entirely groundless, it will render me extremely happy."

Endorsed (with date of receipt) June 16, 1761.

The Same to the Same.

1761, June 29.—Making inquiries as to his health after an accident and congratulating him on his narrow escape.

Lord Melcombe to the Earl of Bute.

1761, June 29.—Thanking his lordship for his and Lady Bute's kind enquiries, and expressing his conviction that by stopping and laying hold of him, his Lordship had saved his life.

Hans Stanley to Lord Melcombe.

1761, July 12. Paris.—"You can scarce conceive a more fatiguing employment than that which I am engaged in. This consideration, attended with that partial indulgence which your Lordship has always shown me, will, I hope, plead my excuse for not having sooner written to you. . . . My reception here has been very civil and polite; I pass my leisure hours agreeably, but not enough so to forget that my own cottage lies within the reach of a morning

* Dodington was created Baron Melcombe of Melcombe Regis in April, 1761.

from that palace of Eastbury, whose magnificence is a weak recommendation compared to the cheerfulness and sociable friendship of its Lord. Though I am nothing less than a prophet, I shall hope ever to preserve my bed and my candlestick there."

Lord Melcombe to the Earl of Bute.

1761, October 6. La Trappe.—Expressing his joy that his Lordship is delivered from a most impracticable colleague, his Majesty from a most imperious servant, and the country from a most dangerous minister.* Copy.

Dr. E. Young to Lord Melcombe.

1761, October 6.—"Indeed, my good and honoured Lord, I have not been in town since January last. I probably may be mistaken in my fancied amendments,† but in truth I have done my best, for I was pleased and proud of the task. There is much noble and useful sense in it, which will be more applauded than obeyed. I know but little of my Lord Bute, but admire his uncle [the 2nd Duke of Argyll] as much as you. My dear Lord, God preserve you, and prepare us both for the urn you mention. Pollio [Bute] will soon visit us there on an equal foot."

The Same to the Same.

1761, October 17.—"What, my good Lord, if it ran thus:—

—— —— If we can judge aright
From a fair morning, of meredian light.

There is an ease and simplicity in the above alteration (which I think right, especially in an Epistle), and almost the reverse of flattery."

With these two letters is a MS. copy of the Epistle.‡

Lord Melcombe to the Earl of Bute.

1762, February 8.—Reminding him of a previous application, on behalf of a friend of his named Jones, for a prebend or canonry of Windsor, Christ Church, Westminster, Canterbury, &c., which his Lordship encouraged him to believe should be complied with, when Dr. Blair was provided for, who is now satisfied at Westminster.

It has, of late, rained Bishoprics, Deaneries and Canonries, and he has waited, hoping that his poor friend "would have got into the tail of the shower;" but the last of them, Dr. York's canonry of Windsor, being now given to Dr. Hort, he is obliged to trouble his Lordship. Copy.

---

* Pitt resigned on Monday, October 5.

† To Dodington's metrical Epistle to the Earl of Bute; published in 1776 with Dr. Young's emendations as foot-notes.

‡ In this copy the last two lines (which are absent from the printed text) run—

"And thine it is, if we can judge aright
From morning brightness, of meridian light."

THE EARL OF BUTE to LORD MELCOMBE

1762, February 10. Wednesday night.—"Your Lordship's letter, though wrote with your usual politeness, has too much the air of reproach, and conveys too sensibly the idea of a broken promise not to surprise a person of my warm temper, and of my most friendly regard to your Lordship. . . . I will not call to mind any occurrences that passed from the death of the Prince of Wales to that of the late King, for I not only buried them in oblivion myself, but endeavoured to eradicate them elsewhere. Thus much, indeed, I must affirm; all former habitudes were so broken off between your Lordship and me at the demise that you certainly could not call on me for acts of friendship, and yet my conduct ever since has been that of a sincere and steady friend. . . . Your friend, my Lord, was not forgot; Windsor and Westminster were neither of them in my power to procure him; the first vacancy in Worcester or Canterbury I ever intended to be at your Lordship's disposal. . .

"I own, and that without blushing, I have been unfortunate in the means I have for years taken of cementing friendships and procuring attachments; others, with much less trouble, perhaps without my honesty, succeed better . . . but I repine not; conscious of my own feelings, conscious of deserving better treatment, I shall go on, though single and alone, to serve my King and country in the best manner my poor talents will allow me; happy, too happy, when the heavy burden that I bear shall be removed and placed on other shoulders."

THE EARL OF HILLSBOROUGH to LORD MELCOMBE.

1762, February 29 (sic). Dublin.—"When I reflect upon the long and uninterrupted friendship and the sincere and affectionate respect I have entertained towards you, and have upon all occasions, as far as my little sphere of action would permit, endeavoured to evince, and when I recollect that for twenty years of my life, I have been countenanced and protected, and imagined myself beloved by Mr. Dodinton, I cannot but observe with the utmost mortification that my Lord Melcombe seems to have totally forgotten me. I do not complain, my dear lord, that you have not written to me. I could not expect that favour unless I had given you the trouble of a letter, which in truth I should have done with pleasure, if at the same time that I gave you trouble I could have entertained you. What gives me pain is, that knowing I am in this country, in the many letters you have written to our mutual friend you should not once have asked, is Hillsborough alive? What is he doing? How does he bear his annihilation, &c., &c. Indeed, I am heartily mortified by this, I think, undeserved neglect, and if I did not truly respect and love you, I would not let you know it. You write also to the Chancellor, but I am equally forgotten in that correspondence. In the shade of life which the happiest are sometimes in, our spirits feel the unkindness of our friends with quicker sensibility, and as the probability is that I shall always remain in it, perhaps I grow the more liable to see that unkindness in stronger lights than it deserves. The real regard your Lordship retains for Halifax and he for you gives me true pleasure; I should be glad to partake, but I do not envy. Were I of an envious disposition, he daily furnishes food for such an appetite. His conduct in every circumstance since his arrival in his kingdom has not only been unblameable, but as highly commendable and praiseworthy as is possible. The few worthy honour and admire him, the crowd of selfish, corrupt and vicious are ashamed and afraid. Political art and cunning have assailed him by every method that metropolitical priestcraft could suggest in vain. The last great effort was made a day or two ago—a motion in the House of Commons to address for an addition to his salary, so as to make it clear 16,000*l*. They thought him catched. His circumstances, as they argued, embarrassed, this so great offer must enslave him to us; we can ruin his popularity by representing him as sordidly interested; he cannot refuse to augment our salaries in return for our having thus largely increased his; in short, he is ours; he is in our power. Your lordship would have laughed to see the long faces of astonishment and disappointment, when he had given his answer. The Primate [Stone] would not believe it, and every mean-spirited abject soul, not able to comprehend his nobleness of nature, is at this moment turning and twisting and straining his intentions, if possible, to some dirty purpose. I will not tell you his manner of refusal, I should do it injustice; I suppose Lord Bute must have it, and will show you the copy. In general, the dignity and delicacy of sentiment, as well as the elegance and propriety of expression that run through the whole, made me admire it extremely, and I assure you it lost nothing by the just and affecting manner in which he delivered it. I have thus, my dear lord, filled almost three sides of paper about one who flattered himself he had some share in your friendship, and one who deserves to be and is in the entire possession of it. I must, before I have done, add that your friend at St. James' could not possibly be better or more truly represented than he is by your friend at Dublin Castle.

"And now, my dear lord, give me leave to say that the only thing I have regretted since I have been here is the being absent from your late debate in the House of Lords. I have received such accounts of Lord B[ute]'s speech, whom I never, and of yours, whom I have often with infinite pleasure heard that I lament my loss. I should have voted with you, agreeing, nevertheless, in opinion against the German ruinous war; but how any man of common sense could think it right to end it by a Parliamentary vote is beyond my conception. I did intend to have said a word to you about our Septennial Bill, which I hope you will send back, as it is a measure which will effectually place the King's Lieutenant at the head of this government, independent of Primates and other factious leaders; but I have already taken up more of your time than a forgotten friend ought to think himself entitled to; forgotten or not I shall ever wish you all that can increase and continue happiness."

THE EARL OF BUTE to LORD MELCOMBE.

[1762, April 9.] Friday night.—Is by no means well, and begins to think that a little more of what he has gone through will prepare him for a longer journey than he would choose at present to take. Begs Lord Melcombe to come to eat his mutton with him on the morrow.

Received on Easter Eve.

Lord Melcombe to the Earl of Bute.

1762, April 13. Pell Mell.—"I set down the overflowings of a most affectionate and grateful heart, opprest with anxiety too sharp to be supprest. . . . The people are intoxicated with conquest, his partisans take effectual care to combine the idea of Mr. Pitt with it; his party rises; they attack you publicly in all conversations, and now in writing, personally, in the strongest and most audacious manner. Does the body of office assist them in all this? No. Does it lift a finger against them? Yet less. They observe a worse than Spanish neutrality, and though 'tis probable they may at present have no compact with your enemy, yet they will not, most certainly, show you their own family compact among themselves (which I believe will be found more offensive than the Spanish one), as they find they are in no danger of your declaring war. Would they then have Mr. Pitt again? No. But they desire to have that phantom followed enough to intimidate you, if you offer to break through their measures of government or interfere with their disposition of the emoluments of it, by which alone they know they can be defended. But if you were to go too fast in the one, or meddle at all with the other, they would, in my opinion, rather have Mr. Pitt than you, because they would think, in the first place, that he might be a little humbled by adversity, and in the next, that they could better struggle with his popularity, transient and ill-founded, than on your credit with the King, built upon the solid foundation of honour as well as inclination. . . . Other reasons for abetting Pitt's party are that you will be driven either [to] meet this phantom of popularity (which has no body) yourself, with your few firm friends, which experience may make them think you will not venture upon; or else to adopt their system without your own friends (who cannot follow you), and then they will say that you are as deeply dipped as they. Mr. Pitt's party will insult you with following their example, and you must employ the whole weight of your great character, abilities and credit in the closet, to absolve them and justify yourself. . . . Thus fettered, they will not dislike to see you with the Seals, alone and unsupported, while they and their creatures divide all the rest, and are enabled, by wearying, worrying, overbearing, to force the acquiescence of the crown to their system by you, which they could not do by themselves. . . . "This picture would be unwelcome, even from a welcome hand; mine, I am sensible, is become an unwelcome one. Since the middle of the summer I found such an alteration, not in your kindness, my dear Lord, but in your confidence, as would have been very grievous if the consciousness of my pure, unswerving attachment to you had not supported me. . . . I perceive that you impute this vehemence at bottom to a desire and an eager one, to get a place. I do not wonder you should be told this, I do, that you should believe it. . . . My fortune is just sufficient to support the rank that you, my dear Lord, have raised me to, and to leave no stain of injustice upon my memory to make you repent the friendship you honoured me with. Money has no charms for me ; I have neither passions or time to employ it, or anybody to leave it to. What then should make me solicitous about a place ; indeed, why wish it unless your service or credit calls for it. . . . I do assure you, my dear Lord, that I will never take one from any other hand or for any other reason." Copy.

The Earl of Bute to Lord Melcombe.

[1762, June 19.] Saturday.—" A thousand thanks for the heads you sent me ; they are admirably chosen, and will furnish matter for very serious consideration. I have invited the Chancellor to meet me at Kew to-morrow about ten. I hope you will make one, for I wish much to talk over the very important business of Monday. I am ever, with the greatest regard, my dear lord, yours most affectionately."

Endorsed with date.

The Same to the Same.

[1762, July 13.]—" I am extremely concerned to hear you are still so much out of order. . . . If you are too weak to come out, I will endeavour to call on Thursday on my way to Kew. . . . I spoke to the King about Dr. Thompson, and have orders to give him the same salary as the physicians, but to pay it myself, that he may not lose part of it by fees. . . . I long to impart most interesting news received three days ago, in which my noble friend will rejoice with me."

Endorsed with date.

A Character.

" Everybody must remember, in the latter part of the Queen's reign, a certain venerable person of a tall stature, who generally frequented the Court of St. James' Palace, and by the gravity of his deportment, as well as by his habit, was taken for a decayed gentleman of Spain. He was of an olive complexion and long-visaged, his brows black and even, his eyes hollow, yet piercing ; his nose inclined to aquiline, his beard neglected and mixed with grey." His wig was as black and smooth as the plumes of a raven, his cloak so ample as to show nothing beneath it, his sword appearing a yard behind him, and worn so stiffly that it seemed rusted to his thigh. " His whole figure was so utterly unlike anything of this world that it was not natural for any man to ask him a question without blessing himself first. . .

" But under this macerated form was concealed a mind replete with science, burning with a zeal of benefitting his fellow-creatures

. . . mixed with a scorn of doing or suffering anything below the dignity of a philosopher; and accordingly, though he lodged in a small chamber up four pairs of stairs, and had his set days for eating and drinking, yet he was known to refuse several offers of charity from the greatest hands. He was observed never to endeavour to speak to anybody but the Queen or her chief ministers, but in the midst of his application to these distinguished persons . . . he was spirited away from us." If, as I believe, he is still living, I am persuaded I shall some day hear from him.

In Dodington's handwriting.

II.—LETTERS ON IRISH AFFAIRS.

JOHN WEST, Lord Chancellor of Ireland, to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1725, December 2. Dublin.—" Between the term, the Parliament and the Council, I have scarcely had an hour to myself. . . . You write as if you expected news from hence. Believe me, I never think of politics, but when I am obliged to it, and I assure you that excepting the idle dispute about the word wisdom in the House of Lords, nothing has happened worth your reading. I had forgot, indeed, that in the House of Commons, in order to settle the supply, which they here grant from two years to two years, they made an estimate of what the revenue might produce for the next two years. For this purpose they thought it necessary to take a medium of what it had hitherto produced, and this they gravely did from the produce of one single year, that happened to be the highest that ever was known.

The SAME to the SAME.

1726, April 9. Dublin.—Has received a letter from Mr. Love, stating, on the ground of infirmities, that he is willing to resign his post as Mr. Dodington's deputy [in the Pells Office], which will give them the opportunity of putting that office into good order without the necessity of doing anything hard to an officer of forty years' standing.

Strongly recommends one Mr. John Bayly as Mr. Love's successor.

Enclosing :—

Letter from Jos. Love, desiring to resign, and asking that Mr. John Bayly, "bred in the treasury," may be appointed in his place; the said Mr. Bayly having promised to allow him 30l. a year out of his pay, if he gets the space.

The SAME to the SAME.

1726, May 14. Dublin.—Suggesting that he should write to Love, as "something of a kind letter to the old creature, approving his behaviour and giving consent to his resignation, would certainly be very proper," and the poor man is anxious to have it. It will be better to say nothing that might be shown about the town concerning his 30*l.* per annum.

THE DUKE OF DORSET to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1728, August 31.—Offering a small place in the Poultry office to Dodington for a friend, if he cares to take it. The salary is forty or fifty pounds a year, the perquisites considerably more. Holograph.

THOMAS MEDLYCOTT* to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1730, December 27. Dublin.—" . . . I have desired to attend this sessions in England to do my duty in Parliament for his Majesty's service, as I am bound, and, indeed, my own corporation take it ill that I have so long neglected them (having been absent almost three years). Besides, my own private affairs in Monmouthshire require my being there. Forgive me, Sir, therefore, if I humbly beg you to intercede with Sir Robert Walpole to procure me leave. Nobody is more dutifully his servant."

The SAME to the SAME.

1731, December 2. Dublin.—" Some few months ago I took the liberty to acquaint you of the indispensible necessity that was upon me to be in England this winter to settle my (late) brother's affairs. . . . I could not think it became me (a servant of the crown) to be absent from the Irish Parliament on the arrival of a new Lord Lieutenant, so have struggled against all the importunities of my sister and her children, till his Majesty's affairs here were pretty well over. They being now so, I hope you, Sir, will be so good as to interest yourself on my behalf, and please to be my advocate to Sir Robert Walpole for his leave that I may take the first opportunity to come over. I need not tell you, Sir, that I have been near four years without stirring from the Board, and persuade myself that that will be some excuse for an indulgence upon this pressing occasion. . . besides the ambition I have to attend his Majesty's service in your Parliament there."

JOHN WAINWRIGHT, Baron of Exchequer, to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1733[-4], January 2. Dublin.—The storm which is shaking our houses makes us fear that you may have been carried away to the north, but the Surveyor, old " Gresdale, whose nose is a better beacon than the Hill of Howth, assures me you lie safe under Ormshead."

" The illustrious House of Commons came to a resolution in a Committee, by a sonorous majority (which stifled the voice of every lawyer but Bettsworth and Dixon, who were with them), contrary to the Act by which they are privileged for certain days, that their privilege was indefinite. They were something ashamed of this afterwards, and re-committed the matter in the House. It was upon a complaint of Cæsar Cocley [Colclough] that this happened. I fear our Connaught friends are in it, who are apt enough to give judgments, but hate execution. The absurdity is this. We shall fine and commit the sheriff if he does not execute his process; if he does, according to these odd votes and complaints, he will be threatened and put to expense by every incumbranced knight, citizen and burgess, by much the strongest party in this Kingdom.

* A Commissioner for the Revenue in Ireland, and M.P. for Milbourne Port, co. Somerset, in the Parliament of England, and for Newtown Limavady, co. Londonderry, in that of Ireland.

"My Lord Chancellor lays this matter much to heart, et terque quaterque concutiens illustre caput, says it may tend to dissolution.

"The roar that was in the House, and the confidence of strength to carry any question when Sir R. Mead moved to set a day for determining the hopes of the dissenters, made it the most desperate attempt that ever I observed in Parliament. They persevered to the last moment of the time limited, and, if I am rightly informed, were very pert with my Lord Lieutenant; but I have not this from the Castle, but Dr. Coghill, who told me too that the dark gentleman gives out that the Duke pressed him to vote for them, and he absolutely refused, and that this was told to be published. If the prudence of the Prime Serjeant had not stopped it, we should have had such a hurricane of addressing upon this subject as you had about the excise. His Corporation of Drogheda were beginning the dance, but his discretion laid the spirit. Having mentioned the dark gentleman, I must tell you a project he has been upon lately. He has long wanted to get part of our business of the Exchequer into his office in the King's Bench, and now he has got two lives in it, and 500*l.* per annum pension, he is not less desirous of increasing the profit. He was not to appear in this himself, but his cousin Maxwell, who is prothonotary of the Common Pleas, was the visible person, and R. Bettsworth was to move the clause. Those who were to be affected with the loss were David Nixon, the Chief Baron and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It comes to nothing. . . . This, and his artifices and behaviour to obviate the Bill for the relief of Burton's creditors, lest Castle Martin should be in danger, bring his credit and his bows very low. . . .

"The communication of Bills retards their proceedings in Parliament. They have sat in the Lower House all the holidays; the Lords have adjourned only for one week. I believe they are heartily sick of this new method, and ripe for a difference between the houses which will dissolve it, for they dont like the alterations the Lords make, and the freedom they take with their heads of bills, and they have had a doubt whether they would send up a tythe bill or not, and under this difficulty, if they do, the Lords will cut it all to pieces, and it is a favourite, though unjust, point with the Commons; so here is really a convenience to the Government from the communication. The Council will not have the trouble of rejecting or altering heads of an unrighteous bill in favour of the clergy against the instances of the laity. The Lords will do it, and should they go on in the way they are, more instances of this kind might happen; so that it is really worth attention whether an alteration so minute . . . may not be attended with more advantage than hurt to the Government. As to the Parliament, it will certainly create delay and perplexity among them in all but the money bills, and the scheme will soon destroy itself. . . ."

THE DUKE OF DORSET to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1733–4, January 10. Dublin Castle.—On his victory in the Irish House of Commons. [Printed in the Hist. MSS. Report on the Stopford-Sackville Papers (octavo edition), vol. i., p. 149.]

W. CARY to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1733–4, January 10. Dublin Castle.—" I told you in my last of the 3rd instant that the communication which seemed to give so much uneasiness in England, and to be so little understood, would probably be at an end before that letter came to your hands. I have now the satisfaction to let you know that it is entirely broke off, as you will see by the enclosed resolution, which was carried by a majority of 102 against 27. His Grace exerted himself on this occasion, and the carrying this question in so effectual and explicit a manner in that House, where you know their former resolution passed almost nem. con., is looked on here as a coup de maitre. Our three great men procured us one vote—viz., Mr. Philips, which was one less than they got in your affair.

" Though I write in haste, I can't help observing how little anyone here is acquainted with the usage of Parliament or the journals of either House. They have been examined on this occasion, and by them it appears that this method of communication with the Lords was the ancient usage ; it was in practice at the Restoration, and not only continued from that time till the intermission of Parliaments, but has been taken up occasionally, since the Revolution. This, I believe, was not known, even by those who contended for the question when you was here, who, as I am told, had looked back no further than the year 1716. But you who was present at the debate know best what was mentioned in it. . . .

" His Grace gives you by this mail an account of our victory, which is matter of triumph to him as general, with such damned militia, whereas your troops are such that you march into the field always sure of conquest. . . . Lord Middlesex, Lord Rothes, Sir Adolphus [Oughton ?], &c., set sail for England in two or three days ; to them I refer you for Irish news."

The SAME to the SAME.

1733–4, February 4. Dublin Castle.—" . . . We have been very much employed at the Council in settling the bills that are sent by this transmission, none of which were communicated, nor do any remain here without that circumstance, except Burton's bill, and two or three private ones, that took their rise in Council, and are not yet finished. The bill for the relief of the creditors of Burton's bank took up eighteen entire days in the House of Commons, in hearing counsel of the several parties concerned in interest, and the debates of members that were not less so. It meets in Council with the same sort of opposition, which will probably follow it to England, when it goes from hence. This has been one occasion, and not the least, of making our recess something later than it was the last session. The passing this bill is of great importance to the credit and commerce of this kingdom, and the failure and frauds of that bank make almost as much noise here as the South Sea year did in England.

"The two Houses are now adjourned to the last of this month, and if we have a number of bills returned from England by that time, sufficient to employ us, we shall be able to leave this place about the usual time."

Baron Wainwright to George Dodington.

1733[-4], February23 . Dublin.—The struggles to defeat and the arts to embarrass Burton's bill are incredible. . . . I have kept myself from knowing even the merits of the case, lest a natural inclination to oppose Carter should misguide my opinion. The knowledge and indefatiguable skill of Roberts, our Deputy Remembrancer, has at length carried the bill. . . . You may have heard me speak my opinion of this young man. Lord Palmerston has a treasure in him; no Court of Justice ever had a better officer. But besides, I know no one that understands the constitution, the revenue, and the estates of this Kingdom half so well. I have told the Secretary that if he was in the House of Commons he would be the best man an administration could have to furnish materials either to annoy or defend. Him to furnish and state facts, and Caulfeild to speak to them, is what I wish for the public; besides, he knows accounts beyond any man in the House. The Secretary begins to think this way, and I believe the Duke too. . . .

"The place of puisne Baron is worth almost as much as the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, by means of the affidavits I take in Court, &c. Sir John St. Leger enjoyed it twenty years, I about a year and a half. My Lord Chancellor, without the least intimation to me, went to the Duke to have Sir John removed into the King's Bench, upon pretence of easing him, though he knows that the Exchequer has been a sinecure to him ever since I came here. If the Duke had passed his word suddenly, I had been kicked upstairs. The plot to which I was to have been the sacrifice was to defeat Rose, to remove Sir John, and put Bowes into the Exchequer. . . . I had not the least notice till they found it could not be carried by surprise. Then Bowes proposed a division of the profits. I rejected that with scorn. Then that he would be second Baron. My answer was, I would sooner lose my profit than my rank. It ended thus, I had the satisfaction to know that if the Duke could do me no good, he would do me no harm. If my Lord Talbot had been Chancellor of Ireland, I could not have shown him greater respect and deference than I have done this man. . . . He that got into the Chancellorship by the wheel of fortune, and has had it for so many years, should not have stript me of a poor per-quisite, which I have not enjoyed long enough to bear the expences of my settling here. . . .

"One thing I must tell you. We had a complaint against some bailiffs employed by the Sheriff of Mayo for executing our process by breaking open a house violently in the night-time; and in the affidavit of the fact, they swore that the bailiffs justified their proceedings by declaring they came to take and arrest them for high treason against Sir John Bingham."

JOSIAH [HORT], Bishop of Kilmore, to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1733 [–4], March.—Asking for a subscription to a scheme very useful "to the Protestant religion and interest of Ireland. . . . People of the greatest distinction compose the body of this incorporated society, and from their great zeal and assiduity in promoting the laudable design of the charter, one many presage the happy fruits of it in time. . . .

"The Cashel election has been decided in favour of Mr. Pennyfather by a majority of twenty-four in the Committee and of thirteen in the House upon the report. The Committee sat till six in the morning, chiefly in examining witnesses. The speeching was reserved for the day of report. A certain prelate dreaded having his name brought on the tapis, but all the art of man could not stave it off, and he was treated very freely, and indeed too roughly, as all sides allow. I'll give you a fragment of the Master of the Rolls speech—If all these things should be proved, then I shall allow the Archbishop of Cashel to be a man of virtue, probity and honour, which I am far from believing at present.

"The Bishop of Raphoe acquainted the Duke of Dorset in the Great Room this morning that the Popish Bishop having removed a quiet, inoffensive priest, and put a turbulent fellow in his place, Dr. Rogers had issued his warrant for apprehending him. As they were carrying [him] to the county jail, guarded by several protestants, some of them gentlemen, a great body of papists attacked them, wounded several, and rescued the priest. Letters from my own diocese are full of apprehensions that some mischief is brewing, and that the papists have many private cabals. What particular mischief they have in their heads, God knows, but there does not seem to be a crisis in affairs at present for their purpose."

W. CARY to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1734, March 28. Dublin Castle.—" . . . Both Houses will this day address his Majesty, expressing their joy, &c., on account of the wedding [of the Princess Royal], though our Lords here are much displeased that their peers had no rank in that ceremonial. We shall not think of a bill of naturalization, which would be no ill compliment, if it could convey all the rights, perquisites, &c., of an Irishman.

"You may imagine how much I long to see you. We stay for nothing but Burton's Bill, which has now been before the Attorney and Solicitor in England above twenty days. The whole credit of this country depends on the success of that bill, and if it should miscarry, there would be a run on all the banks in this Kingdom, and everything would be in confusion."

P.S.—"I am just come from the House of Commons, where I find everybody greatly alarmed at some private accounts from London, as if the passing of Burton's Bill was doubtful. . . . Pray assist, as far as properly you may, in preventing so fatal a blow to this Kingdom."

JOSIAH, Bishop of Kilmore, to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1734, April 13. Dublin.—Asking him to use his influence to enable Major Philip Dunbar "to turn his half pay into a sum of money," in order to provide for his children. Captain Thomas Weldon, Fort Major of St. Philip's in Minorca, is soliciting to be put on the establishment of half pay in the room of Major Dunbar, and Cornet Stratford Eyre, of Hawley's Dragoons, wishes to succeed Mr. Weldon in his Fort Majorship.

Cornet Eyre has had the thanks of the House of Lords in Ireland "for his great zeal and intrepidity in rummaging the monasteries, friaries and seminaries of Galway, and transmitting to the House those original papers he found there, out of which they formed their report that was published the last session; in doing which he was so exposed that the Lords gave him the protection of a solemn vote."

BARON WAINWRIGHT to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1734, May 10. Dublin.—"Since my Lord Duke left us, we have had a run upon the Banks. The bleeding is at present stopt, and the immediate danger over, but there are symptoms of a consumption. . . . A few years may procure an entire bankruptcy in Ireland of private credit, but the public credit here is a fair field, little of which has been broke up, and the whole is in good heart, for though England can hardly be more rich, Ireland can hardly be more poor. The whole cash of this Kingdom does not exceed 500,000*l.*; at least that sum passes out of the Kingdom annually; as much, probably, repasses, and the circulation is such as to keep up life at least, if not vigour. If we continue under the same administration, the scheme of a fund for public credit should be thought of and well-digested in time; the opposition may not be invincible now. Before these blows, all gentlemen were becoming bankers or involved with them; now they begin to draw out.

"Your services in Burton's Bill, particularly your good offices with my Lord President, overpay all you ask here. . . ."

LORD JUSTICE HENRY BOYLE to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1734, May 21. Dublin.—"Dickson is demolished, and we are all undone, unless timely and effectually relieved. . . . Love has brought over an order from the Lords of the Treasury for his succeeding Maynard, which by this time, to be sure, you have informed yourself of. If it is to be understood that Dickson is to be laid aside to make way for him, where's my credit, where's my influence, or what business have I here, when I can no longer be of use or service to his Majesty's affairs. My own personal interest I shall be able to support in all events ; but you, Sir, very well know the difficulties I laboured under at my first setting out, and the pains I was frequently obliged to be at from four in the afternoon to five or six in the morning to persuade my troops to fight in a cause foreign to their own principles or natural inclinations, and now, just as they are brought into good discipline, I can expect no less than a revolt, if they find their endeavours to support me have proved altogether ineffectual. . . . If the foundation I stand on be sapped, I see no remedy for our not falling a prey into the hands of our enemy, who are vigilant enough for all opportunities to devour us."

Wm. Harrison to George Dodington.

1734, May 22. Custom House, Dublin.—" . . . We are here a little disconcerted at present about the Collection of Cork, and you know, I presume, that the Speaker recommended Mr. Dickson to the Duke of Dorset to succeed Mr. Maynard, the late Collector. His Grace pressed us to appoint Mr. Dickson, notwithstanding that we told him that Sir Robert Walpole had recommended Mr. Love, who was then a collector at Moyallow, but as his Grace undertook to settle that matter with Sir Robert, we submitted and appointed Mr. Dickson ; since which we have received a letter from the Treasury in favour of Mr. Love, which we think is our duty to obey.

" On Monday last, the Lords Justices sent for us (the Commissioners) to the Castle, to know if we would remonstrate against the Treasury order. We told them we did not think it our duty to do it, whereupon Lord Justice Boyle fell into a most violent rage, scarce to be imagined, setting forth the disquiet it would give in the country if Mr. Dickson should be superseded. We lamented our unfortunate situation to be between the two great powers, and hoped that their Lordships would not put so disagreeable a task upon us, to make remonstrance to your lordships, when they themselves might do it, if they thought fit. The Lord Primate and Chancellor would not come into that, so we left Mr. Boyle full of resentment."

Baron Wainwright to George Dodington.

1734, November 23. Dublin.—The trusts of Burton's Bank will, I foresee, " double the business of the year, in a thankless office, which they who gain by it regard only as our duty, and they who lose think our officiousness. In short, to us trustees, as Trotter says, it is all birch and no boys. . . .

" The Grafton being cast away, the new packet boat is called the Windham, and the wags here will have it that the lion at the stern is turned into a man's face, and his mane into a periwig, and that they have put a broad brim hat upon him. I remember to have heard it said that the Indians call a lion the dashcoya, which being interpreted is, the beast with the great periwig. Don't tell this to the serious. The young and merry Lord Middlesex, &c., may hear it."

JOSIAH, Bishop of Kilmore, to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1734[-5], January 10. Dublin.—Recommending to him Lady Doneraile's case, who has an appeal before the House of Lords for alimony. Her husband "being a weak man and a sot, his relatives have him entirely in their keeping in the Isle of Man, where, for 200*l.* a year, he may have his dose of brandy and claret twice a day."

JAMES TYNTE to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1734[-5], March 10.—In favour of Mr. Chaigneau's request, below.

DAVID CHAIGNEAU to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1734[-5], March 12. Dublin.—Is anxious to succeed the late Mr. Deering as Deputy Clerk of the Council, and begs Mr. Dodington's good offices with the Duke of Dorset and Lord George Sackville, the latter of whom "is the Patentee officer, and of consequence, is master to depute whoever he thinks proper."

BISHOP OF KILMORE TO GEORGE DODINGTON.

1734[-5], March 20, Dublin,—Thanking him for his successful efforts on behalf of Lady Doneraile.

JOHN BOWES, Solicitor-General for Ireland, to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1735, April 21. Dublin.—"Your readiness on all occasions to serve this country induces me at this time to ask your patronage against a bill depending in the British House of Commons for securing the titles of protestants, &c., in Ireland. I need not inform you how much the protestant interest here depends upon the acts made the 2nd and 8th of the late Queen, to prevent the growth of Popery, and how jealous we are, both for the safety and property of the Kingdom, that those laws should not be defeated. But if this bill should pass into a law, those acts would be greatly weakened, if not totally repealed." I beg you to peruse a paper sent over to the Duke [of Dorset], and "I would also submit to your consideration whether a British parliament, in point of policy, should trouble themselves to make general laws to affect the property of the subjects of Ireland, in cases where neither the commerce nor interest of England can be in any shape concerned. . . ."

The SAME to the SAME.

1735, September 25. Dublin.—Concerning the annual vote for his payment [as Clerk of the Pells].

"Your name was mentioned upon this subject some time since, at a public city dinner, by that eternal snarl, Swift. Speaking of the good nature of his countrymen, he said, one Carey, last session, introduced a gentleman from England, dressed him in a suit of Irish manufacture, which cost thirty shillings, and then showed him for a patriot, upon which the good people of Ireland gave him seven hundred pounds per annum:—Truth, you know, is only a circumstance in stories, nor could what was spoke in this way admit of a reply."

St. George Caulfeild to George Dodington.

1735, October 11. Dublin.—Concerning Mr. Dodington's affairs. "The town is yet very thin; of those that are here, I think the greater part will be governed by the merits and against any innovation. I find the Speaker [Henry Boyle] of this mind, and believe him to be sincere. My Lord Duncannon and the Master of the Rolls say the same. . . . I have found but two who declare open war, Mr. Morgan and Mr. Malone, and its said Mr. Cowper is another.* If those were all, either in number or kind, it would be but a poor knot, but doubtless there are many who speak fairly who yet cannot be depended upon, so your friends, especially those of consequence and figure, ought to be as active as possible."

Baron Wainwright to George Dodington.

[1735, October].—Discussing who will be for and who against Dodington when the vote for his salary comes on, and advising him—if this sort of thing goes on every session, and he is expected to owe an obligation to every man who does not vote against him, if he must be every man's solicitor, work for him in Parliament and at Court, and treat him in Piccadilly—to "give up the 500*l.* a year and deprive them of the topic," arranging to take some equivalent; especially as some future governor, without the Duke of Dorset's esteem for him, may allege that the matter embarrasses his measures, and give up the cause.

Endorsed as received on Oct. 24, 1735.

Sir Arthur Acheson to George Dodington.

1735, October 23. Dublin.—"We do meet in frequent but idle senate, very little to do, no faction stirring, and our friend Mr. Carey troubled about few things. A great many of our members are not yet come to town. . . .

"I was a little surprised at that part of your letter relating to Dr. Swift. He came to see me soon after I landed, and we had a good deal of discourse of you; he spoke of the acquaintance he formerly had with you, and seemed to wonder that you never sent or took any notice of him when you were here. I told him I had heard you mention the same thing, and that he had never been to wait upon you, which, in my opinion, was wrong in him; upon the whole he said he was sorry the mistake had happened. I have enquired concerning the feast and what mention he made of you there. Doctor Cope, who was present, gave me this account of it:—Luke Gardner was there, talking like a great patriot, and said no gentleman of this country should be forgiven that wore anything but the manufactures of it. The Dean answered him thus:—I am told you have got into employments worth two thousand pounds, and possibly you lay out ten pounds a year for a suit of clothes; for this you would be esteemed a vast friend to the country, though in an affair of any importance you gave it up. I hear that Mr. Dodington, when he was here, bought an Irish stuff suit, and then everybody said, wont you vote for Mr. Dodington, who wears our manufactures; so you made him a present of seven or eight hundred pounds a year for laying out forty or fifty shillings in Irish stuff. This, Dr. Cope assures me, was all that passed, and therefore I apprehend it has been greatly magnified or misrepresented to you, as it is a way of rattling the Dean has always indulged himself in, of and towards all sorts of people, which, though I don't approve I fear he will never be broke of."

* Morgan, Marcus Anthony, M.P. for Athy; Malone, Anthony, co. Westmeath; Cooper, Joshua, co. Sligo.

ROBERT JOCELYN, Attorney-General for Ireland, to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1735, October 27.—"My reason I did not sooner acknowledge the honour of your letter is that I was desirous to feel the pulse of some of our country members. Whether it is controverted elections or want of money, which I am most apprehensive of, I think we could not have reckoned more than seventy at any one sitting. By the inquiries I have been able to make, though I find there will be some Grumbletonians, yet I flatter myself we shall be able to do you and ourselves that justice which we did the last sessions. For my own part, I will most undoubtedly make the motion in the words of our last resolution, and put the good-natured labouring oar on those who, in my opinion, ought always to tug at it. . . . I shall look upon it as the greatest happiness if I can be of any service to you."

THE SAME to the SAME.

1735, November 11.—Stating that the Committee of Ways and Means has sat this day, when he proposed the resolution that "the sum of 6*d*. in the pound, and all other fees which shall or may be payable to the Vice-Treasurer or Vice-Treasurer's paymaster or Receiver-General, out of the aids granted this present session of parliament, be applied towards raising the supply granted to his Majesty." Mr. Malone and Mr. Morgan proposed an amendment, but Malone did not speak in his best manner, and "seemed to express himself with more uneasiness and confusion than usual." Mr. Robert Allen and Mr. Cope supported the original motion, the latter saying that he thought there was a stronger case for the Clerk of the Pells than ever, and that he would not have it imagined that the presence of any person would so influence them that they would recall in his absence what they had given when he was there. Mr.

Coote also opposed the amendment, declaring that it was their interest to oblige those English gentlemen who had it in their power and inclination to serve Ireland.

Mr. Recorder [Stannard] then began to give the state of the National debt; said that he wished they were rich enough to be liberal; but though the Chief Governor had done everything in his power to ease them, and the alterations in the army had for some time lessened their expense, yet, if the peace was concluded, their regiments would be put upon the old foot, and therefore he should be for the question. The Committee then appeared to be impatient for the question, and when it was put, there were not ten persons, in a full Committee, for the amendment. Mr. Cary has been indefatiguable on Dodington's behalf.

Sir Arthur Acheson to George Dodington.

1735, November [11]. Dublin.—Congratulating him upon the happy issue of his affair, which has this day been before the Committee of Supply. Malone and the Recorder were the only two who spoke against it. They did not think fit to divide, which was a pity, as they would not have had twenty with them. The Archbishop and Prime Serjeant were very zealous for Dodington, and so was Harry Bingham. Dated Nov. 10, by mistake.

Marmaduke Coghill to George Dodington.

1735, November 11.—To the same effect as the above, but stating that the writer, "being in the chair, had the satisfaction, upon putting the question for expunging the words proposed by Mr. Malone, not to hear one single affirmative for it, and the resolution stood as at first proposed without Mr. Malone's negative. Several of your friends were ready to speak, but . . . thought it most prudent to let the question be put without further debate. Mr. Stannard said something in answer to what had been urged by those who spoke against the amendment, but concluded in giving his opinion in your favour."

Sir Richard Mead to George Dodington.

1735, November 11. Dublin.—On the same subject. In a very full House, "the only persons who spoke against it were Mr. Stannard and Mr. Malone, who were answered by many gentlemen of our side, and after a very short debate the thing was given up without any division," the objectors seeing so great a majority against them.

Thomas, Lord Wyndham, Lord Chancellor of Ireland, to George Dodington.

1735, November 15. Dublin.—Informing him that his affair has passed the House with only a few words from the objectors, which never "rose to the shadow of a debate," and that the session has proceeded hitherto with great harmony in both Houses.

BARON WAINWRIGHT to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1736, May 14. Dublin.—All things go on quietly, and respect to the Duke has kept them more so than ever I expect to see them again. "All things wear out soon or tarnish in this air and nothing more fast than friendship. When we are at peace and marching on cheerfully and quietly, a mine is sprung, and the engineer protests he had no thoughts of disturbing the General or the army, but there were two or three fellows that he had a mind to toss into the air or beat their brains out. . . . In confidence, I am heartily, confoundedly tired of this Kingdom. There is no comfort in doing all the good or using all the diligence to serve them in a man's power; reputation here is not like what it is in England; when the Duke is absent, it is rather a prejudice than an advantage, and draws invasion rather than protection. Cunning is the noble science upon which the masters that mount the stage depend, and an Englishman turning Irish is like a dog running wild and herding with wolves; he has his own domestic tricks to add to their savage dispositions."

The SAME to the SAME.

1736, October 12. Dublin.—" . . . The situation is odd enough. Munster and Connaught are united, they say, under the Speaker, but over all cups but his, swear they see he does nothing but under the direction and influence of ——, and often complain and are uneasy at it, and in this the other two provinces agree. . . . There are great intimacies between Lord Windham, his Master of the Rolls, and Register; perhaps by some means his presence in England may yield you offers of his influence, if you think that worth while; for from that quarter and the whiskey club came the alarm before last sessions."

JAMES TYNTE to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1736, October 16. Dublin.—Praying him to use his interest with the Duke of Dorset for his [the writer's] good friend and instructor, Dr. Christopher Lloyd, who desires the Treasurership of Christ Church, Dublin. The Doctor "has done more good to the King and Kingdom by the education of many gentlemen in the sound principles of government and religion than half the Bishops, with their occasional prayers and occasional politics," and has been constantly affectionate to the succession and the present government, which is more than can be said for very many other churchmen. If the King will consider that the writer "was the only gentleman from Ireland who did not beg some advantage to themselves from his succession, but engaged himself heartily, sincerely, and to the hazard of no small estate, whose title did not depend on any revolution," it will be very afflicting if, in the present King's reign, he can neither have merit or interest to obtain so small a thing.

SIR ARTHUR ACHESON to GEORGE DODINGTON.

1737, April 2. Market Hill, near Newry.—" . . . I find we are to lose his grace of Dorset, which I am sorry for. I have not the honour of being at all known to the Duke of Devonshire, nor do I know what terms you and he are upon. I could wish to have my name mentioned to him before he comes over, that he might take some more notice of me than he would of a mere stranger; if you and he are well together, I need say no more. I should be glad to know what degree of favour he stands in with His Royal Highness. I believe I did not acquaint you that before I left London I had the honour of an audience there for half an hour, and was very graciously used. Many pertinent questions were asked about this Kingdom, and several people of it, whom I was surprised to hear him name till I afterwards recollected how it must come about. He commanded me to tell a gentleman, he thanked him for being civil to you when you were here, and spoke very kind things of this country. This I have not failed to tell, and who I supposed infused those good thoughts, so you are now esteemed our greatest friend, and indeed our sheet anchor; your health is as generally drank all over this part of the country, as in my house, where it is not one day missed.

"I have been here all the winter, Dublin not being agreeable when it wants a Lord Lieutenant and Parliament. We are in the best improved part of Ireland; not inferior to many parts of England; and the fullest of people, and yet a hundred and thirty years ago there was not one British man in all these northern counties, they being the territory of O'Neal, who was subdued and drove abroad about that time. Never surely was any country so much altered in so short a time. We have now few or none of the old Irish amongst us; we have indeed plenty of everything but money, which is very much wanted. However, we can live comfortably enough if we are satisfied with our obscurity."

Robert Jocelyn, Lord Chancellor of Ireland, to George Dodington.

1739, October 27. Dublin.—Thanking him for his congratulations on his promotion to the Chancellorship, and stating that the Duke of Devonshire having assured them he has nothing new to ask, they expect a very easy session. The Lords adjourn for want of business.

Lord Chief Baron Bowes to George Dodington.

1746, May 29. Dublin.—" . . . It will be now too late to tell you of our gaiety and our sobriety whilst Lord Chesterfield was here, and unnecessary to tell you we are returning to old habits now he is gone. This I must say, his example has convinced that people may be cheerful, though sober.

"Our attention at present is on the Brest fleet. At first we feared for ourselves, but a short reflection satisfied that we were not an object worthy such an armament, and our insignificancy mus continue to be our security. However, I can't at times reflect upon the situation of affairs abroad without terror. I wish it may be in your power to quiet me on this head, which I own alarms me more than the Scotch rebellion."

The Same to the Same.

1747, November 28.—" . . . Lord Hillsborough is, I hope, safe with you in London, and if report be true, I must wish him a safe return hither. The town have settled all preliminaries for his speedy marriage with Lady Margaret FitzGerald, Lord Kildare's sister, with twenty thousand pounds certain, and a mother who may (and probably will), to so deserving a son-in-law, make her a much greater fortune. I thought this intelligence would please you, and was not certain that it would come from himself. My compliments to him, and learn from him how much I value myself on being honoured with your friendship."

The Same to the Same.

1752, May 26. Dublin.—A long letter on Irish affairs, already printed, from an unsigned copy, in the Report on the Stopford-Sackville papers (octavo edition, p. 182), where Archbishop Stone is suggested as the possible writer.

Dr. Lewis Bruce to George Dodington.

1756, February 3. Dublin.—" There was a scheme in the House of Lords of limiting the number of popish priests here by an Act for the register of one to each parish. The heads of a bill were printed; on January the 29th it was thrown out 18 to 16. Then it was the Bishop of Clogher acquainted the House that he thought the protestant dissenters were at least as much entitled to their attention as the papists; that with a view to them he had prepared heads of a bill which he would offer at their next meeting. He did so yesterday, and opened the subject by objecting to some passages in the Act of Uniformity that offended them. He spoke of the multiplicity of creeds, declaring his sentiments freely that the Nicene fathers had asserted what the scriptures do not reveal; that the Athanasian is subject to the same censure, is in great part a forgery, was not received in the church till two hundred years after his death—that he thought it derogated from the honour of the Almighty when any other being was confessed to be consubstantial, co-eternal, or co-equal; that the damnatory clauses were unchristian. He spoke an hour with great calmness and presence of mind and memory. The primate rose, and in the manner of uneasiness, assured the lords his ears had tingled at a proposition so imprudent, so dangerous. His Grace did not enter on the articles of faith; he said he would do every proper thing in his power that could invite the dissenters to the established church, but that matters of this essential, sacred nature should not come before the House without previous consultations and a proper authority from the King. Dr. Smith, Bishop of Down, joined himself to the Primate, and read an extract of the Coronation Oath that his Majesty would preserve the constitution of the Church of Ireland as then established.

" Lord Limerick called on the most reverend Prelate, who expressed such favour for the dissenters, to lay his hand on his heart and say whether the abolition of these two creeds would not invite many of them to the church. He observed that if reformation was to wait for the sanction of crowned heads, Luther and his associates might not have succeeded to this day. He was cordial to the Bishop of Clogher's scheme, but much embarrassed in the substance and method of what he said.

"Doctor Synge, Bishop of Elphin, spoke an hour with temper and weight. Without entering into particulars, he allowed some things required farther reformation, but insisted that they should come recommended to that House, or a convocation from the King, as 'supreme head of the church;' that, supposing, by innovations prematurely agreed to here, all the dissenters were brought into our communion, it ought to be feared that the mother Church of England would treat the Church of Ireland as schismatics.

"Lord Carrick, of most promising genius and manners, was the only temporal peer who spoke against the heads of the bill being read. The Bishop of Clogher divided the House, and went outside of the Bar accompanied by the Lords Limerick, Tullamore, Powerscourt, and Mountgarrett. Thus the heads of the bill were not read.

"This matter will undoubtedly be much spoken of through the christian world, and I am desirous of giving you, Sir, the earliest account of what I heard in the House."

Lord Chancellor Bowes to George Dodington.

[1759, end of December*].—This letter, which I presume will be very long, was occasioned by yours to Mr. Baily desiring an account of what passed here, and will I trust be received as proof of my inclinations to comply with your commands, though, in fact, years and business render me a bad correspondent.

"We had devoted this winter to the pleasures of a court where all parties were united to support Government, which had nothing to ask, and render the session honourable to the Governor, &c., &c.

"Thus we set out till the secretary from your side gave the alarm of a French invasion, and the necessity of being prepared. The speech from the throne stood in the way of asking, and diffidence (which attends provincial government) advanced, scattering every suggestion which suspicion could devise, and talked them over as certain. However, the defenceless state of this Kingdom, the feasibleness of such an attempt, and the known truth that they had wantonly emptied the Treasury the last session, got the better of clamour; they addressed and agreed to a loan for 15,000*l.* at 4*l.* per cent.

"This was honourable. Whether the appropriating that sum (in the act for raising the duties to pay the interest), so as that 42,000*l.* only is left in the power of the Chief Governor, whilst the remainder is to be applied to answer deficiencies of the grants in the former sessions and sums now given to carry on the projects of the last for making rivers navigable, &c. has not lessened the favour, you must judge. But must remark that these projects were considered last session rather as a method to dissipate and disperse the stock in hand at the Treasury rather than matters of real use at this time, but by giving them further aid from Parliament they will be Parliamentary charge, probably for the benefit of the managers only. The loan was opened some weeks since, but is not full.

* Endorsed as received on Jan 5, 1760. The date of the letters is usually about a week earlier than that of their receipt.

"This session has produced a young orator of quicker growth than has been known. He did not speak before he was sworn, but in few minutes after; his patriotic zeal has from the warmth of that House expanded itself since de die in diem. He called for an account of the 42,000*l*. not only before it was raised, but before it could be known what was necessary to be done with it. He (as said) procured the corporation of the City of Cork to resolve that the exporting live cattle from Ireland was prejudicial to the trade, manufactures and interest of Ireland, and in consequence a petition to Parliament, which he promised to introduce, and did with such success, that it was referred to a committee who came to the like resolution, and nem. con. agreed to by the House. Why? Because the question was too popular to admit of opposition, though unsupported with aid save from Cork, or giving time to receive the sense of other parts of the Kingdom, whose lands are only fit to rear cattle, and could rear more than they do, could they sell them when reared. You know what passed in your Parliament on this subject. Success produced a motion from Dil: the next day, for an address to his Grace to lay this resolution before his Majesty, which was rejected with deserved contempt. Not discouraged, he moves for committee to enquire what laws were necessary to secure the liberties of the subject (or of that import); this was disagreed to after debate, though the Chancellor of the Exchequer was with the minority; as also for leave to bring in heads of bill for making Judges to hold during good behaviour, removable only by address of either House of Parliament. Where will these labours end?

"Prior in time, our secretary had leave to bring in heads of a bill to enable the crown in case of invasion to call the Parliament during prorogation. This was opposed, and by art gave rise to fears without doors that the disuse of Parliaments was intended preparatory to an union with Britain, which produced tumults about the House and insults threatened to some of the members, when these impressions were (as supposed) removed by withdrawing of that motion. On the 3rd instant I received when in the Court of Chancery a note from the clerk, then expecting my coming to the House of Lords, to inform [me] of the unusual concourse about both Houses and the danger of coming till they were dispersed. I instantly went to the Castle, which had taken the alarm and sent the Lord Mayor to disperse them. During his absence many of the council were collected and frequent informations of the increase of the riot and the personal insults on the members, on which His Grace ordered a guard to march and receive their directions from the Lord Mayor, who soon after returned to the Castle, complained that soldiers were sent unasked, that their appearance irritated, but on the whole that every thing was in the way to be quiet.

"This was in the dark of the evening. The House of Lords was not adjourned, and on the Mayor's assurance of safety, I agreed to go under his protection, though offered a guard, and took your friend the Chief Justice in my coach. On the way, some called to me not to proceed, others encouraged me, and thus I passed through the greatest mob I ever saw. They suffered me to go up the steps to the Lords, where I found the outer door shut. On being required to open, a man was let out and the door again closed, who, with an oath, told me I should not enter, but advised me to return, as did the Lord Mayor, who then owned he could not protect me. With difficulty we got to the coach, the mob calling out to swear that we were for the country and against the union. They gave a book to the Chief Justice, requiring him to swear, which he took to prevent mischief, and put the book to my face, on which they said that should not do, I must swear, but desisted further insult. I was thus detained half an hour threatening to take the horses from the coach; at last I returned, and on my report some horse were sent by the Duke's order (for the Lord Mayor still refused assistance), and the people after throwing stones fled. After which I went escorted by a squadron of horse and adjourned. They had broke every door belonging to the House besides other indecent indignities within.

"Thus ended this unexampled, unprovoked riot—one only has been secured, but fear they will not be able to convict him.

"I find they are strongly affected on your side, and talk of Government, &c., &c.; but when the people have lost all reverence for Government or laws, and are prepared to believe the most improbable suggestions to the prejudice of those who rule, what can be done? The state may possibly by conviction make martyrs without lessening the evil. God grant it may not end in requiring some strong effort of British authority to establish constitutional Government in Ireland.

"I can't enter into the detail of our great bank and its consequences. The distress is great, and the people dissatisfied; whether any Parliamentary aid will be applied for is uncertain, and without it I can't see how they can sell to raise the debt.

"I wish you may read what I write; bad at best, worse as wrote under pain in the gout."

George Dodington to Lord Chancellor Bowes.

1760, January 19.—"I received the honour of your Lordship's with very sensible pleasure, as a very obliging mark of your goodness and remembrance, but, at the same time, I must own that in every other light it gave me great and real uneasiness. However diverting the sight might be, or be represented, of a Chief Justice swearing a Chancellor in the hands of an enraged multitude, who have no cause of complaint against Government but that they are governed, yet I myself see it with great concern, and the more so, because though I see the tendency but too plain, I do not see the remedy.

"I really do not know what to say to you upon so striking a subject, not from any the least regard to the opinions of any man in this island, but from the love and gratitude I profess to that where you reside, to which I am under very great obligations, and where I have constantly met with much more goodness, friendship and humanity than in this country where I have lived so long without, I hope, any dishonour to it.

"But to see a Protestant multitude attack a Protestant Government, in a country where all together do not make a sixth of the whole, without any imaginable cause of complaint, but because it is Government; detaining and affronting the chief magistrates of all civil policy; seizing and insulting the seats of delegated sovereignty and of legislation, is to me a very striking and a very shocking picture, and though I am told that all is quiet again, I must be better assured than I am of the foundations of that quiet before I can trust to the surface, calm and serene as it may appear. Methinks we are dancing upon a mine that may spring at once, in the very moment that we imagine we are most entertained and entertaining.

"Permit me, before I close this head, to congratulate your Lordship, and my very good and very much-beloved and honoured friend the Lord Chief Justice, upon your fortunate escape from the hands of Anarchy and Indistinction. At the same time, I as seriously and sincerely rejoice at the safety of that country, to which we are both so much obliged, from the most imminent danger of destruction; for had not Hawke been more and Conflans less than a man, Ireland must have been as much lost as Minorca by midsummer. How you came to be in so defenceless a condition I neither understand, nor do I enquire; if I did, I presume I should not be told, and if I was, I suppose I should not have the capacity to comprehend. Wonderfully and fearfully are we made is, for aught I know, as true of the body politic as of the natural. We seem to know as little of the acting powers of the first as we do of the last, and piously at least, if not prudently, trust the operations of the one entirely to the same hand that formed the other."

Lord Chancellor Bowes to George Dodington.

1760, January 21. Henrietta Street.—"You have probably heard that my decree in Mr. Bayly's favour has been reversed by Lord Mansfield, in the absence of Lord Hardwick. I have habituated myself to think the dernier court right in their determinations, without being dissatisfied with myself, where my errors have not proceeded from neglect, though, in the present case, for the sake of this young man's family, I wish his Lordship has concurred in the decree here, the rather as many of the profession, both here and in England, thought it was to be supported." This will probably take away all that was decreed him, but I verily believe that he will be a better officer for being a poorer man, and that "a kind expression from you will compose his mind and enable him to apply his very useful abilities to his own and your service.

"The Parliament here, though not very willingly, yet with a great majority, will give his Grace a vote of credit for what is desired, which, including the former 150,000*l*., will amount to 450,000*l*., with interest at 5 per cent. You are too well acquainted with Ireland not to consider this as bearing some proportion to the millions on your side the water."

Lord Chancellor Bowes to George Dodington.

1760, March 21. Dublin.—"You have treated Mr. Bayly with your usual humanity. . . . Your office will support him with decency, and we all here think you may with safety depend on his punctuality. . . .

"I am much concerned for the Dorset family. The military trial of one not under that command was new to me. They say the Judges have concurred with the King's servants that such trial may be had. The opinions of the Attorney and Solicitor I have seen, but without information, as they have not assigned the reasons on which their opinions were founded. If any have been given by them or the Judges, you may possibly procure them for me. Our accounts of the unhappy man are unfavourable, and yesterday the Primate [Dr. Stone] retired from town, unable to stand the shock expected by the next post. My inclinations are ever in favour of innocence, nor could I account for his pressing on the trial on any principle but that of conscious innocence on his part."

I have purchased Belvidere, the Lodge of the late Master of the Rolls, near this town, and hope the air and the garden will amuse me and fill up the time which the custom of this place devotes to the table and cards.

The Same to the Same.

1760, April 17. Dublin.—"Lord G. [Sackville]'s conduct would be unaccountable did not experience prove that men may deceive themselves in their own affairs, and that those of the greatest abilities are most apt to do so, by trusting more to their own powers than the merits of their particular cases. Be his fate deserved or not, I feel for him and the family, but presume his dismission may be forgot, and he again become considerable in another walk. It also seems strange to me that the judges saw no ground to doubt of the legality of the jurisdiction of a court martial in the case before them. They must allow it was an implied jurisdiction that might be extended beyond the necessity of the service, and exerted at a time when terror (which is the end of punishment) could not have its effect, and seems the rather unnecessary as a soldier cannot discharge himself. . . .

"Dawson's bank has stopped payment, by which 192,000*l.* is shut up till they can call in debts, or raise money by sale of part of their estates to pay their creditors. There is no doubt of the sufficiency of the fund, but in the meantime the creditors are distressed, and the public must suffer, as duties arise from trade, which can't be carried on without paper credit. It has been most injuriously attempted to impute the late failures to the loan voted for the support of the additional regiments on our military establishment.

"The merchants have petitioned Parliament for relief in a way open to objections; but those have been prudently overlooked, and the subject matter will be considered in a committee of the whole House on Monday next. Probably nothing can be done, unless by resolution that the notes of the subsisting banks should be received in payments at the public offices till next session; this may give them credit, and if privilege were suspended as to those who are debtors to the banks, as it has been from the bankers, some debts might be got in towards the discharge of the large demands against the banks who have stopped payment.

"Our Governor has little reason to be pleased with his situation; trifles no way connected with his public character are heightened, and the casualties of the times are placed to his account. They say this is all personal; I rather fear it is the Governor, and will be the same who ever succeeds.

"This Kingdom is an object that requires more attention than it has yet received. Time has almost destroyed the old machine by which this country was governed as a province, and till either that be restored or another framed, like uneasinesses will happen, and if war continues and France carry into execution any attempt to make this country the seat of it, the Lord have mercy upon us."

The Same to the Same.

1760, December 25.—"Your attention to the interests of this country may raise your curiosity to know what is our present situation, especially as you subscribed the letter of the 3rd instant, the event of which may be very serious. Nor am I averse to taking every opportunity of evincing my personal regard to Mr. Dodington.

"The orders to dissolve the late Parliament and to send over bills as usual to certify to his Majesty the considerations for calling a new one, were in consequence of application from the Lords Justices here, that the affair might be speedily over, and that within the year of the present sheriffs. The reasons were just and prudent. Had the difficulties relating to the sending over the bill for a supply (pursuant to precedents) then occurred, it ought to have been disclosed; charity bids us hope it did not; in fact the subject was not mentioned to my knowledge till on the meeting of a Council called, as then informed, to consider what bills should be sent. It was mentioned to me the instant before we took our seats, requesting me to name such as might be proper. My answer was that the notice was short and unexpected, that I presumed we should see what had been done, and follow precedents. On my memory, I thought a money bill was always one.

"The Primate, who spoke to me, and the Attorney-General, who was present, seemed to acquiesce. On mentioning of it to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he objected against sending a bill for a supply, as there would be time after the meeting of Parliament to prepare one in form, and that it was not necessary before, as the duties would not expire till 25th of December, 1761; adding that such bill would be rejected and produce warmth, which was to be avoided in a new Parliament, and possibly end in a dissolution, the rather as they resolved in the year 1727, the day they passed a like bill on the meeting of that Parliament, that no money bill should be read before the report from the proper committees of accounts, &c., and that this should be the standing order.

"These reasons, to which I have given their full strength, were repeated instantly at the Board, urged pathetically (in my judgment) improperly, at that time and place. Departing from settled usage in affairs of government, required temper to judge of the necessity, and previous private deliberation with those in the King's service to settle the manner in which such necessary change can be effected.

"This was not done, and the effects to be expected happened; hasty resolutions and declarations of what they would or would not do, and that equally at the upper and lower end of the table. My intimations of what has since been the case were to little purpose, and spoke strongly, to my understanding, that each man saw this would be a popular point, and strove which should appear strongest in support of it. The next step was to guard against resentment on your side the water. They were warned, and therefore the Justices wrote the next day to the Lieutenant apprizing him of the then sentiments, the improbability of changing them, the consequences of attempting the sending such bill, and I think sufficiently to be understood that they could not do it, proposing the expedient of other bills which, if received, the affair would end; at least it gave time to deliberate; to which I (an eye witness to the ferment) concurred, expressing my sense to comply if the expedient should not be accepted.

"You know the event on your side. On ours, no answer to the sent letter; increased heats; more determined declarations; debate blowed the coals, they were told without effect: that the sending bills to his Majesty, to be by him returned to his Parliament to notify from him the causes of their meeting and the business they were to proceed upon was peculiar to Ireland, depended on positive laws, enacted by Parliament, Henry VII., under which they could not enter upon other acts than those transmitted by the King: that subsisting that law, supplies must be sent to them as other acts: that the 1st of Philip and Mary confirms the former at the time when it enlarges the power of the Government here to transmit to his Majesty other causes which might arise during the session of Parliament, but the former remained in full force as to such causes or considerations as were known before the meeting of Parliament: that in fact a supply was understood to be the primary cause of calling Parliaments: that the establishment in Ireland made it necessary to ask a supply from the next Parliament as it would certainly be wanted; the time of asking the quantum and the continuance were in the discretion of the crown: that this notification equally left to the House of Commons their affirmative or negative: that ancient laws were to be expounded by usage: that this appears to have been ever the usage from the journals of Parliament and the records of the Council, especially since the contest, 1692, without a single exception to the contrary: that contests with the crown were to be avoided: that the nature of the subject made it less justifiable in point of prudence, as no one attempted to urge any real prejudice that might attend the following precedents, whilst on the other it obstructed the calling a Parliament. How long that might subsist could not be known: that at that Board they were to consider what was their duty and to represent and advise it; inconveniences were expected from doing what had been done and seemed required by law. Prudential reasons were also urged without gaining ground; time has been taken for consideration, I wish it will not rather inflame.

"Possibly the event may be that no such cause will be transmitted as yet; that if required towards the necessary meeting of Parliament it may be complied with; but what will be the fate of such bill sent back, or the consequences of an unanimous rejection, is out of my ken. Turn your eye on your friend's situation. Acting with his judgment, possibly, a thankless office, recollecting 1753, considering it as productive of what has now happened, and foreseeing the many objections that arise to the present legal constitution of Ireland, the danger of changing them, the difficulties, &c., &c., &c., and I am assured you will wish for your friend a quieter situation, more suited to his principles and years.

"This country is numerous and wealthy; they have been taught to think themselves injured by their present constitution, forgetting Poynings' law was their own request, and that their form of government whilst in their present relation to England be different from that of England, and the worst which can befall them is to force England to determine what power the Parliament of England have over Ireland. As to others who want not this information, their business is, and will be, to secure such Parliamentary interest as may render them necessary to every chief governor; he may parade, but must submit. This is the present state of things, which occasions questions to be taken up here for the sake of popularity that as governors they should discountenance. This will account for the great precaution that one should not get the start of the other, and keeping together empowers them to say, change hands as oft as you please, you can only be furnished from this shop. Something of this you have seen in England, and now accept this as intended. The date will account for its length, and your honour will keep the contents to yourself. The hand requires no name or assurances of regard, &c."

Lord Chancellor Bowes to George Dodington.

1761, February 2.—As to present disturbances, "to view them in the true light we must look back on Ireland as it was after the Revolution, or rather as at the accession of the present family, since which time it has been the most flourishing state in Europe, as is evident from the rise of lands and the great increase of personal property; and probably their representatives in this Parliament have been possessed of more real property than yours in Great Britain in proportion to numbers, without taking in the disproportion of wealth in the two kingdoms; whence you will conclude that power, or attempts to acquire it, have accompanied opulence.

"They have not had any real grievance from Government, and have, therefore, quarrelled with its present legal constitution. They have considered your House as the model, and in general think themselves injured, in the instances wherein theirs upon the legal constitution must differ. In fact, they are become the terror of governors sent from England, who for present quiet, and under uncertainty of support from your ministry, have rather chose to gratify by compliance than contest points, which when acquiesced in become a foundation for future superstructures. This gave rise to undertakers who insured quiet to the Governor, in exchange for power, and are now in that state of strength to be able to tell the —— he must come into their measures or be rendered too uneasy for men of rank to remain under. You need not be told by me where that power now resides, nor how necessary popularity is to the keeping of it, especially on the election of a new Parliament; but must observe that formerly protestant or papist were the key words; they are now court or country, referring still to constitutional grievances, for of others they dont pretend to complain.

"The Chancellor of the Exchequer (when in opposition) was the popular man, and (with his abilities) of great consequence. His acceptance of this employment, with an added salary, together with his conduct in the late bank, had totally deprived him of popularity; nor could it be retrieved by his being of no use on the other side.

"The Parliament here being dissolved, the law required the Council here to certify (in form of bills) the consideration for calling a new Parliament. Usage had always sent a bill for a supply, commonly called a money bill, as one. The Commons had received these bills with reluctance. The application to Council to send over bills as usual gave the Chancellor of Exchequer opportunity to object against sending any money bill, which he enforced by such reasons as were the popular arguments against it. Prevailing in this point at that Board must have merit, as the Commons had not been able to succeed, and their attempt in 1692 ended in their dissolution. The intent was evident, as also that what one gained thereby must be loss to others, which probably occasioned that unprecedented warmth which followed. Neither could hurt the other with this advantage, and therefore joined instantly, and in such manner as to become principals; at once resolving and declaring they were ready to suffer political martyrdom in support of it, and this, before the Council had given, or been asked their opinions on the subject, though in fact the majority soon espoused the same sentiments.

"To this united strength may be ascribed the letters to the Lieutenant, in terms unusual, to say no more, and hence the difficulties arise as to the prudential part on your side the water; and are in truth of great moment with respect to the future government of this kingdom.

"There is a bill sent from hence in seeming compliance with the resolutions on your side, to which some names are wanting, because they did not consider the bill sent agreeable to former usage, or the intent of it, not being a bill for a supply to his Majesty; that it was open to every objection made against sending the usual bill, with many others, arising from the nature of the bill sent, as it related to a vote of credit for which the honour of the Commons was engaged; not desired by those who had lent their money, and could be only necessary on the supposed defective security of that vote; that it appropriated duties in the first instance, and deprived the Commons of considering the amount of the debt to be provided for, or the duties for repayment, &c.; that these added objections would probably create contests in another place, and was therefore unsafe, as well as unusual, and seemed calculated only to ascertain in the event that which they had said would happen on sending a money bill. We now wait the result from the determinations on your side.

"It is observable, and I believe true, that the opposition here is universally disapproved of, and the actors see their error, though not the way to get rid of the affair. If this last attempt succeeds, they will rejoice as on victory; if not, their having departed from their first declarations, the doing what they ought to have done, seems to be a necessary consequence, if those on your side insist upon it. Firmness (when in the right) supports Government, this much wants it."

Lord Chancellor Bowes to Lord Melcombe.

1761, March 26. Henrietta Street.—"My dear Lord, pleased I am to salute you by that title, most valuable, as it is an early mark of his Majesty's favour, and will, I hope, be followed by those of confidence. . . .

"Lord Halifax comes hither at a critical time, and his conduct will probably fix the future government of Ireland. . . . Mr. Malone, it seems, will return to the Bar—not from want of fortune—probably to be in view, and in that situation wait the changes to which public affairs are liable."

The Same to the Same.

1761, May 7. Dublin.—"Your not expecting can't prevent my most grateful thanks for your friendly representation of me to the Earl of Halifax. He, I presume, knows your warmth on such occasions, or you and I may suffer when the original shall be exhibited. However, it has already procured me a most respectful, interesting letter from that nobleman, such as, from every consideration, will bind me to his service, and happy shall I be if my experience here may assist him in that arduous affair he is entering upon. I shall with caution avoid obtrusion, but be always ready when required to submit what occurs to me to his consideration, trusting that, on his return, he will acknowledge you made him acquainted with an honest man. . . ."

The Same to the Same.

1761, October 16. Dublin.—"Lord H[alifax] had a short but rough passage, and found this coast, like the sea, disposed to calm after the tempest. The ruffles under the former administration produced a visible, and I hope sincere, disposition in those of consequence here, to show the present governor that they were not from general dissatisfaction, but particular offence. Be that as it may, the Lieutenant's reception was as he could wish. His unaffected natural civility was observed by all, and had its effect not the less from the comparison, &c.

"Your Lordship knows that Chief Governors here are ushered in with addresses from the city, the merchants, &c.; they are always soothing, and answered by general thanks. The present Lieutenant returned their compliments at large. You know his manner, which would lose by my description; in short, he spoke to each properly, politely, and sent them away dignified by this unusual treatment, and assured of his sincerity. The effects were strong, especially amongst the merchants. To me he seems to have got the start of Opposition, and they will have no easy task to persuade these people that this Lieutenant is not their friend. The scene of public business is not yet drawn. The disposing of the money bill returned as the cause for convening this Parliament may occasion difficulties, but the train in which the leading people agree to conduct it, will, if approved on your side, prevent disagreeable consequences. In truth, that bill was sent hence in wrath, knowing it would and must be rejected on its return. Your Lordship well knows what uphill work it must be to carry such a question against the inclinations, and in fact against utility or convenience. What is, therefore, wished is that it may be received, and read, and then postponed till a new bill may be framed, which will take in the substance of that act and what else may be necessary to answer the end proposed by way of supply and duration, and then drop the first upon the reason of the thing without entering on any further question.

"Questions may, and probably will, be proposed, but I think rejected by a respectable majority. The bill for septennial Parliaments will be introduced and, like your place bill, carried in, though strongly against the inclinations of many who will be silent; in what light that may be considered elsewhere you may know before I can. The question is, or rather may be, of importance to the crown, but infinitely more so to the quiet, &c., of this kingdom.

"I am sensible of and very grateful to your Lordship for the personal civilities with which I have been honoured by his Excellency, and in return have assured him that I shall be always open to his commands and serve him with the assiduity, explicitness and fidelity that I would Lord Melcombe in his station. Thus we stand at present."

The Earl of Halifax to Lord Melcombe.

1762, April 28. Dublin Castle.—"My last bills are come, I am preparing for my departure, and shall be with you within a few days as soon as my letter; but still, great as my hurry is, I cannot keep my pen from paper to tell you I have been attentive to your commands, and if I had not been so, I should have been a brute. To make your friend a captain at once was impracticable, but I transgressed rule as much as I could venture to do by making him at once a lieutenant, and Mr. Beaghar's commission as such is dated the 13th of February last in Col. Bagshaw's regiment. . . .

"What with claret and business I am almost dead, and yet I have been as sober and busy a Lieutenant as my predecessors have of late been."

THE MANUSCRIPTS OF
CAPTAIN H. V. KNOX.

I.—CORRESPONDENCE OF WILLIAM KNOX, CHIEFLY IN RELATION TO AMERICAN AFFAIRS, 1757–1808.

William Henry Lyttelton, Governor of South Carolina, to William Knox.

1757, Dec. 17. Charlestown.—"I have received your most obliging letter, and the very ingenuous tract that accompanied it, with the greatest pleasure. . . . I should be bold in endeavouring to do justice to the treatise by the freest commendations of it, if a consciousness of my own ignorance of the subject-matter did not restrain me, but I must not, in the person of a little governor, assume the self-sufficiency of some great men, and proudly give the praises of a master where I am myself but in the class of a learner. . . ." 2 pp.

The Same to the Same.

1759, Aug. 30. Charles Town.—"Your letter, which I received yesterday, gave me much pleasure, and I am not sorry I have lived to receive it instead of having an elegy made upon my death, which, though it had been as good as the verses which Orpheus sang to bring Euridice back from hell, I shou'd probably have known nothing of, nor woud it have eased any of my pains if I had been condemn'd to that place. The weather is now so hot here that if fire be the punishment of the damn'd, I think I am in a sort of hell by anticipation. . . . What do you mean by mentioning Stowe to me? If I were to suffer my thoughts to dwell but for a few minutes upon the Templum Veneris Hortensis, and some other things I have seen and remember there, I shou'd have the worse opinion of all publick employments for seven years to come. I am at present in very good health, but as irritable as if I were a poor poet or a poorer counsellor of Georgia, therefore . . . if you chance to affront me, I may, in return for the elegy you promise to write upon me when I am dead, write a lampoon upon you whilst you are living."

Postscript.—"Are you not ashamed to be so fat, while your friends, Mr. Ellis* and I, are so lean?" 4 pp.

* Henry Ellis, Governor of Georgia.

WILLIAM KNOX to GOVERNOR LYTTELTON.

1760, March 5. Savannah.—The suddenness of your Excellency's departure and the tardiness of our assembly has cut me off from all hopes of coming to you, although the consequence of your new appointment seems to deprive me of the pleasure of ever seeing you again. Yet I must congratulate you on the change, because I am convinced that it will be no less happy than honourable and advantageous to you, and at all events it shows "that the British Ministry are better judges of merit than the sordid Legislators of Carolina, of whom, I think, it may now, without any injustice, be said that no King can govern nor no God can please. If your Excellency had staid another year I should have been happy in accompanying you to England, for it is my firm purpose to return thither in that time." Neither the climate or the country are agreeable to me, and there is no other person here who either will or can do any public business; therefore, I must bear all the blame of every impalatable measure. "Could your Excellency believe that it is in the power of a man to whom I have rendered more services than can be easily conceived to raise me to public notice, and that rather than do it he is bargaining with a man who will do the business for a less sum, but not so much on that account is he prefer'd as because his administration, 'tis hoped, will be an advantageous contrast to the one before it. This being the case, your Excellency cannot be surprised that I should quit thoughts of any office on this side the water. Indeed, I have little expectation of anything valuable on t'other unless by exchange or purchase. The agency for this province is the thing of all the world that I wish for, but I have been refused even a recommendation to that, lest it might be thought impertinent. . . . I did not expect to succeed Mr. Martyn without his consent. My scheme was either to exchange offices, giving him a sum, or to have leave to hold my own and reside in England, and to be appointed to his, giving him the greater part of the sallary during his life. Your Excellency will please to note that the agent for this province is appointed by the King, and has no sallary from hence." Mr. Martyn is advanced in life, and has but indifferent health. If you think there is anything practicable in this scheme, I beg for your advice as to how to pursue it. I do not so much want the emolument as the office, as I think that, in it, I should be able to recommend myself, and should be willing even to give Martyn the whole salary. My present office I have deputed, and I believe I could lease it for 50*l*. per annum, exclusive of the salary, which is 100*l*. I am now settling a plantation, and pope, by the end of the year, to have twenty good slaves on it. A planter, with whom I have already agreed, is to pay me 150*l*. per annum for seven years, and to make good my slaves at the end of that term. So long as I can enjoy 150*l*. a year in England or Ireland I know nothing that could tempt me to renounce them for America. There are abundance of pretty things in the Revenue in Ireland not hard to come at, and if I can obtain nothing more through my Georgia connections than leave to reside there and depute my office I shall forgive them. Had your Excellency's promotion been in England I intended to make you a tender of my abilities, and should have thought myself happy in having you alone for my patron. I venture to think I should not have disgraced your recommendation to an office in the Treasury, and that I had a disposition for that sort of business I think the paper you will receive with this will be evidence of. Jamaica has put an end to my views, but, as your Excellency is going first to England, "that my labours may not be lost to my country for want of being properly introduced, I have, together with the scheme which I now present your Excellency, enclosed a paper containing a few thoughts which have occur'd to me at different times since I came to America. This is my whole political stock, on which I hoped to have set up under your Excellency's protection. I, therefore, make you my sole heir." Draft. 3 folio pp.

GOVERNOR W. H. LYTTELTON to WILLIAM KNOX.

1760, March 22. Charles Town—"I received a few days ago your very kind letter of the 5th instant, with the scheme that accompanied it, which I will take great care of, and put into the best hands I possibly can upon my arrival in London; you must not be surprised that I say no more concerning it at present, for if I was better able to judge than I am of a performance concerning finances I could not now have leisure to consider yours with the attention it deserves. . . . Had I continued in this country I should have omitted no opportunity of improving a connection with a man of your amiable turn and usefull talents, and now that my fortune carries me to England I shall be happy to bear testimony to your merit. . . . tho' much cannot be expected from my weak suffrage." As to your future purposes, "I imagine that which is most likely to succeed wou'd be the agency, unless you have any friends whose particular situation and circumstances wou'd enable them to serve you in Ireland. Your political conundrums, as you are pleased to call them, will be a most agreable present to me, and if I must consider them as the bequest of a departed politician I hope it will only be of one who dies in order to experience a happy resurrection." 2¼ pp.

WILLIAM KNOX to ——.

1760, May 20. Savannah.—"It is with real concern that I learn you have so good reasons for delaying to acknowledge the receipt of several of my letters; yet, however sensibly I feel your misfortunes, I will not give you the pain of an impertinent condolation, and indeed, as every station in life has its chequers, adversity must afford you a pleasure which you could not have tasted in affluence. You can now be assured that the general esteem you before enjoy'd was not adoration of your prosperity, and that it was not to your fortune you were indebted for your friends." My visions of securing a little competence and returning to Europe to enjoy it amongst my relations have all proved visionary, for I hear that my dearest brother has been for some time numbered among the dead, and that my poor father, not many weeks after, followed him to the grave. As the desire of ministering to an aged parent was my strongest reason for wishing to return, I have postponed my intended voyage for some years, " and as our governor [Ellis] is so soon to go for England I must begin to think of acquiring something better than my present office. You will perhaps think it strange that among all the handsome things the governor has had to give away that I should at this time be able to declare that I have never accepted of any government favour to the value of sixpence. . . . It has not been the governor's fault, for he has offer'd me several, but the fear of exciting jealousies and lessning the governor's influence have ever made me refuse them. Such is the hard case of favourites. If they have more regard for the service of their patron than their own private emolument they must be content to be the last served. Should not our superiors consider this, and annex such salarys to their offices as might give the officer an hope of being one day in a state of independence without either betraying the intrests of the crown or plundering the people. My salary is one hundred pounds, and the fees of my office about fifty. This is all I am allowed to live on as a member of council in a country where every imported commodity sells at an advance of 75 per cent., and every necessary of life is proportionately expencive. This you must suppose when I tell you that day labourers will not work under two shillings. In short, had it not been for the assistance I had from Europe I must have either left the colony or become a scandal to my office. When the governor asked me if he should mention me for his successor as lieutenant I was obliged to decline it, partly indeed from an apprehension of miscarrying, having no one here to assist me, and partly from the narrowness of my circumstances. . . . What has occasioned me to give you all this trouble is your mentioning in your last to the governor that many complaints were come against our agent for Indian affairs, and as I have some hopes that, should he be removed and my Lord Halifax was made acquainted with my being desirous of the employment, that his lordship would have the goodness to appoint me to it, I must request your good offices for that purpose, for it might look like design were our governor, who has complained of the present, to recommend a successor. . . . I have several advantages over every man in England, and many over most people here. In the first place, I have served an apprenticeship under the second master in America. In the next place, the Creek Indians, who hold the ballance of power in this part of the continent, are the very Indians with whom I am acquainted, indeed I may say personally known to ; and in the third place, I think I am not ignorant of the intrests of the colonys and of the state of our connections with the savages ; and lastly that, as our governor is going from hence and his successor has not his ability, at least in this respect, the dificiencys in the governor must be made up by the agent. I might add that I am pretty well acquainted with the white people with whom I should have to do, and indeed at this time there is something more necessary in an Indian agent than merely a knowledge of Indian customs." I, therefore, beg the favour that you will mention me to his lordship, and that you will be so good as to refer him to Governor Lyttelton, who is now in England, for my character. "Large as the salary is, I should find it all necessary, for as I should copy our governor in everything I should rather seek the goodwill of the Indians by acts of kindness and hospitality than, by an austere carrage, aim at exciting reverence. It is ridiculous in the highest degree to think of gaining an influence among a people who are as free as the wild beasts and as jealous of their liberty, by assuming a superiority over them." I have no room to speak of our affairs, but "in the meantime, as we are sure of the friendship (not assistance) of the Creeks, we are in no pain for ourselves; and as for the Carolinians, their pride requires an humbling, and get it they will." Draft. 3½ folio pp.

GOVERNOR W. H. LYTTELTON to WILLIAM KNOX.

1761, Jan. 2. Hill Street, London.—" . . . I have put your scheme concerning the National Debt into the hands of Mr. Oswald, one of the Lords of the Treasury, who has promised me to inspect it carefully and to communicate it to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. . . . With respect to the superintendence of Indian affairs, I don't believe Mr. Atkin has any intention to resign it, but I will not fail to do your talents all the justice in my power in speaking of you to Lord Halifax. . . . This is all the service I can do you, for, circumstanced as I am with regard to Jamaica, I can take no part by applying for an office for anybody that is not concern'd in that island." Direct to me under care of Lord Lyttelton, who will forward the letters. 4 pp.

WILLIAM KNOX to his brother, [ROBERT] KNOX.

1761, June 28. Savannah.—" . . . I am drawing in all my little affairs and settling them so as to be ready to leave this country next spring, yet, as the character of my fortune has always been disapointment in my views, tho' not to my disadvantage, I scarse dare flatter myself with the thoughts of returning so soon. . . . I have lately had a very extraordinary deliverance from death. I was struck by lightning on the crown of my head, but Providence gave the shaft an oblique direction which saved me, and I am now perfectly recovered of the shock and feel no injury save the loss of a hatt and the coat I had on, which were burned or tore in pieces. . . . The war with the Indians in these parts is spun out to a much greater lenth than could have been expected when it began. I hope, however, it is now drawing near a period. The Cherokees appear willing to make peace, but we all think it unsafe to make it with them, as they have not yet felt the calamities of war so as to insure their keeping it. The difficulty then lyes in coming at them to give them a good drubbing without making use of treachery, which would not only be infamous, but might prevent the Indians from ever treating with us again. . . . I think it most prudent to give them peace on their putting a few of the promoters of the war to death; even one of them would content me, and that, I believe, will be the most that can be done at last, tho' I imagine, as the Carolinians are very proud, a few thousands more must be spent before they will put up with so small satisfaction. Be that as it may, the march of the army has humbled our neighbours, the Creeks, and whenever they shall hear of our landing at Mobile I dare promise they will fall upon the French and cut twice as many of their throats as they did of ours, by way of atonement. This we might perhaps call murder, if Europeans did not do the like every day to one another and acquire glory by it. Our present governor* continues to give great content. He is a realy honest man, and acts with great caution, and in most things by advice of the council. . . . I am upon the best terms with him, insomuch that I am in no doubt of having his interest to assist me in England. I wish I had been there when Lord Halifax was appointed your Lord Lieutenant." Draft. 2 pp.

William Knox to Governor Lyttelton.

1762, Feb. 10. Savannah.—Since I received your Excellency's of January twelvemonth I have written you a very long letter, containing the second part of the history of the Cherokee war and congratulations upon your marriage. "I may now, I hope, congratulate your Excellency on your once more taking up the reins of government, tho' if I knew any way of addressing your people I should think they had a better title to my congratulations on that occasion than your Excellency. . . . I have the pleasure to tell your Excellency that I have obtained the King's leave to return to England, and that our legislature have appointed me their agent for transacting their affairs in Great Britain in conjunction with Mr. Martin, the agent for the crown." I am to have only 50*l* salary, but that is enough for my purpose, as I only wanted the appointment to make better terms with Mr. Martin. I have farmed my office of P[rovost] M[arshal] for 60*l*. a year, exclusive of the salary which is 100*l*., and let my plantation and negroes for 130*l*. per annum, so I shall have 340*l*. to support me in London as the representative of Georgia. Lord Halifax's departure from the Board of Trade is a great loss to me, but I hope your Excellency will one day exchange your government for a seat there. "At present I have not the honour to be known to any gentleman there, nor to any of the Lords of the Council, altho' my business may call me often to both places, and countenance there is often necessary for getting business done, but I must struggle with all difficulties and trust in an upright conduct, for I have few friends to depend on." I beg your Excellency to allow me to hope that you will continue to be one of them. Draft. 2 pp.

Governor Henry Ellis to William Knox.

1762, April 28. Bath.—Congratulating him on his arrival in England, and urging him to visit him at Bath, as he has a thousand enquiries to make which Knox can satisfy better than anybody. As the business of an American governor is not the most favourable to health, he is trying to lay in a stock to carry out with him, and is going presently to Tunbridge, or, if he can get the King's permission, to Spaw. Is at Mrs. Flemming's on the South Parade. Asks for Harry Yonge's address, who, he hears, has been Knox's fellow passenger. 1½ pp.

* Sir James Wright, bart.

GOVERNOR ELLIS to WILLIAM KNOX.

1762, April 30. Bath.—Your letter confirms me in my view that you would do well to consult with me before beginning to act under your new commission. "I suspect Mr. Martyn will throw every difficulty in your way in his power. . . . Were I here only for pleasure I should not hesitate a moment about returning immediately to London, but that is not the case. I am drinking these waters by advice of my physician, preparatory to a course of chalybeates, either at Tunbridge or Spaw." If you cannot come here I will go to London a week earlier, but as the stage coach comes here in a day I imagine you will be tempted to make the excursion. If you cannot defer your appearance at the Board of Trade so long "I will with all my heart send you an introductory letter to Mr. Pownall in as strong terms as I can word it. . . . As to your impatience to write by the Carolina ships the effects of your embassy, I think it is rather too great. You will not be able to do any business of a public nature so soon as you imagine. . . . You must have time to look about you, to survey the ground you stand upon and to know the men you will have to do with and the way to avail yourself of them. You may freely command my assistance in these things, who am now a veteran in soliciting and dancing attendance upon people in office." The testimonies of the remembrance of my American friends are very agreeable to me, as I have a real regard for the authors of them.

Postscript.—Mr. Rice, one of the Lords of Trade, and son-in-law to Lord Talbot, is my fellow lodger here, but leaves in about ten days. 3 pp.

GOVERNOR W. H. LYTTELTON to WILLIAM KNOX.

1762, Dec. 30. Spanish Town, Jamaica.—Congratulating him on his appointment as agent, and thanking him for his flattering expressions of esteem. Will always be pleased to hear from him on public affairs, and if he makes no remarks in return, it will only be because, owing to his distance from the scene of action, his observations would probably be wide of the mark, and also that in the office he holds, free comments might not be prudent. Is almost tempted to think he must have been born in these warm countries (not in London, as he has been told), the climate suits him so well. 4 pp.

WILLIAM KNOX to CHARLES TOWNSHEND.

1763, Aug. 27. [Paris].—"There are so few things in this country worth notice, and of those so very few are fit to be treated of in a letter, that if I did not suppose you were by this time wearied with rural diversions I should think myself very blameable for attempting to amuse you with an account of myself and my observations. I always thought England very happy in giving birth to Mr. Pitt and yourself, but I am now exceedingly thankful that neither of you are Frenchmen. I have travailed 200 miles thro' a cornfield in coming to this town without seeing a single acre of uncultivated ground—no rocks, no hills, no woods, nor even fences, so careful are the pesants to improve every inch of their holding, and so watchfull is the police to preserve the property of every individual from the depredations of another. The Government alone may here steal, or rather rob, with impunity. The immensity of the tillage and the neatness of the farms fully convinced me there was no want of hands in the country, and since my arrival in Paris I have had no reason to suppose money is more wanted. All transactions are carried on in specie, and there is neither public or private bank that issues a note. Moneyd men here are litteraly so, for they keep all their effects in cash. What sort of policy is it which cannot find means to make it the interest of the subjects to lend out their superabundant money ? But how despicably weak must that Government be which, with such resources, could not find means to support one more campaign, the issue of which, at the worst, must have brought ruin on their enemies, had they been ever so successful. Do you imagine, had Mr. Pitt or yourself been Minister to the Grand Monarque, that England would now have enjoyd the Treaty of Paris ? What then ought to be our amazement when we reflect that neither of you were then in the Cabinet of Great Britain. Exclusive of the peace, England had certainly never more reason to be satisfied with the conduct of this Court than at present. A la mode Anglois is the bon ton throughout—English horses, English dogs, English post-chaises. Their clothes are cut in the English fashion, and roast beef is brought to the politest tables at supper ; all distinctions exceedingly flattering to Englishmen, and which, I think, ought to give us pleasure, as they may serve to keep up an idea of respect much longer than our conduct may intitle us to it. But of all things that I have either seen or heard since my arrival here nothing filled me with so much delight as the sight of the procession of the King going a shooting. Figure to yourself his Majesty, attended by all his Ministers and great officers of State, setting out to shoot partridges, and think if I could refrain from crying out Vive le Roy, and wishing him, from the bottom of my heart, ability to pursue the like diversion every day of his life. If you should be so obliging as to intend me the honour of a letter, be pleased to direct it Chez le Chevalier Lambert, Banquier, à Paris. This goes by a private hand to England, otherways I should have thought it too free for a man who wishes to stay here only two months longer." Copy. 3 pp.

GOVERNOR W. H. LYTTELTON to WILLIAM KNOX.

1764, July 22. Jamaica.—"I have lately had the pleasure to receive your letter of the 16th of May, which I have not only read with that satisfaction that every account of your wellfare will allways give me, but find your observations on French affairs and the particulars you mention concerning this part of the world so interesting that I think your packet worth twenty from my other correspondents. I am not surpris'd that you shou'd have heard at the time you refer to that I was to return to England, because such reports were industriously propagated by persons who hoped to find their accompt in the falsehoods they published, both in Great Britain and here, concerning me and my administration of this Government, but everything now is in great tranquillity in this Island, and tho' I by no means loose sight of my native land in my reflections on my own situation, and hope to see you again there before I am grown old, I have no present purpose of quitting my American post by my own choice, or apprehensions of being obliged to quit it by the workings of popular discontents.

"What you tell me of France exactly corresponds with what I learnt was the state of the Court there when I was in that kingdom in the year 1752, I mean so far as relates to the influence of the women in the Cabinet; but there were then no projects, or at least no attempts to execute any, for the reformation of abuses in the Government, and if they now shou'd indeed seriously and vigorously prosecute it I am much affraid the natural resources of that country are so powerful that they will be in a condition to disturb the peace of Europe again, before we shall have paid off such a part of our vast debt as I believe every good Englishman wou'd wish we shou'd before we engag'd again in a new contest. But yet the measures of the last session of Parliament seem to have laid some good foundations towards the effecting of this, by amplifying the British revenues (by the prevention of smuggling, &c.) without laying new Brit'sh taxes, and by obliging these Colonies to bear a much larger part of the charge to be incurred for their defence and protection than they have ever hitherto done. We have not yet in this Island had any meeting of the General Assembly, since the resolution of the House of Commons concerning the proposition of a Stamp Duty to be laid in all the King's American dominions has been known here, but I think that the part you took in conjunction with your brother agents was a very judicious one; and, considering how much one American Colony differs from another in the frame of its Government, temper of the people, and capacity of bearing particular taxes, had a Stamp Duty been impos'd the last session of Parliament to take place in all alike without previous information of the local circumstances attending each, it might have prov'd in some inefficacious and in others have been productive of greater discontents than the object was worth. . . ." 3¼ pp.

William Knox to George Grenville.

1764, Nov. 9.—I have taken the liberty to present you with a paper * which contains the best information which the situations I have been in have enabled me to obtain. Such of the materials as I collected in France, when I had the honour to accompany Lord Grosvenor to that Kingdom, were intended for his lordship's use, as he then thought the circumstances of this country called upon him to exert his best ability in the public service. But "he is now so well satisfied with the conduct of the public affairs, and has such reliance upon the ability and uprightness of your administration that he thinks anything which has a tendency to serve the nation cannot be better bestowed than by being put into your hands." No other person has been made acquainted with the matter contained in the paper, and if you think anything in it worthy your adopting, "you may make it your own with confidence, for I intended the paper for your use when I began it, and to you only have I communicated it." Draft. 2 pp.

* Perhaps the paper called "Hints relative to our Commerce." See p. 286 below.

GOVERNOR W. H. LYTTELTON to WILLIAM KNOX.

1765, Jan. 10. Jamaica.—"I very sincerely condole with you upon the melancholy event which has been so just a cause of affliction to you. . . . Since I wrote to you in July, I have had but an uncomfortable time, not indeed owing to any misfortune or ill accident, but to a bad state of health. I have had an intermitting fever of the Carolina sort, which during three months returned frequently upon me and reduced me very much; but I am now perfectly recovered, and the birth of another boy, who came into the world on the 28th of last month, adds very much to my domestic satisfaction. On the other hand, the tranquillity which I have enjoyed for these two years past with respect to the publick affairs of this island has lately been interrupted," owing to my having, as Chancellor, granted writs of habeas corpus to, and discharged in open court two men who had been committed by the Assembly for executing a writ of venditioni exponas upon the coach horses of a member against whom one of the men had obtained a judgment. This so inflamed the Assembly (tho' they have right of protection from suits of law in their persons only), "that they voted me guilty of a flagrant breach, contempt and violation of their privileges, and drew the heads of an address to the King, beseeching him to restrain my arbitrary power as Chancellor and prevent such open and manifest violations of their said privileges. Whereupon, I first prorogued and then, with the unanimous advice of the Council, dissolved them. We shall have a new Assembly the beginning of March, but what temper I shall find them in, or be able to bring them to, I cannot yet judge. . . . I am glad you are improving your connexions in general, and especially your acquaintance with Mr. Grenville, whom I love and honour most cordially."

I am reading a book lately published, written, it is said, by the Abbé de Mirebeau, called L'ami des hommes, which has shown me more of the internal state of France than any other work, I believe, would have done. 4 pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1765, July 14. Jamaica.—" . . . In the month of May I had the misfortune to loose my wife, an event which was a most just cause of affliction to me. . . . I may truly say I have wanted all the fortitude I cou'd exert to support my spirits, as I believe you did also." I have read your printed letter with great satisfaction, and communicated it to such persons as had candour enough to feel the force of its very just reasoning. There are too many on this side the tropic who are obstinately deaf to all that runs counter to their old prejudices.

"The picture you draw in your letter to me of the administration of the Minister who is mentioned so honourably in the conclusion of the printed one, and who so well deserves the appellation there given him, afforded me also very sincere pleasure.* I think, indeed, he deserves more than is said of him in that conclusion, for altho' possibly Sir Robert Walpole may have had as much knowledge, or even more, from his long experience in revenue matters than the other gentleman, it does not appear that the nation profitted much by his abilities during the many years he was as absolute at the Treasury as my Lord Godolphin or any other sole Lord Treasurer ever was, and you know, at the close of his ministry, but a very small part of the National Debt was paid off.

"I told you in my letter of the month of January what had then happen'd here between the Assembly and me. I have since had the honour to receive the King's most gracious approbation of my conduct, signified to me by the Lords of the Privy Council, and with this support I am going to try whether a new Assembly which I have call'd to meet in August will not have a little more temper and discretion than their predecessors have shewn; and as many new persons will be elected to serve in it, I have reason to entertain good hopes that the necessary supplies will be voted and the factious humours subside. I thank you heartily for other parts of your letter, in which what you tell me corresponds with the best accounts I have from others of my friends. I shou'd have been glad if the gentleman who now serves the Crown out of office had not hesitated in the manner he did to take what was offer'd to him. I have had a long acquaintance with him, and much respect him for his great knowledge in his profession and his irreproachable moral conduct in private life. . . ." 4 pp.

The Same to the Same.

1765, Oct. 20. Jamaica.—" . . . As I am told the affairs of this island are more discoursed of in London than I shou'd have imagined, I suppose you will have learnt that I was obliged to dissolve an Assembly which met in August, and I have not since call'd another. You remember the difficulties I had to contend with in South Carolina, but I assure you they have been much greater here, nevertheless they have not been such as to compell me to sacrifice the essential duties of my station to factious humours. What course the new Ministry in England will think adviseable to be taken with certain provinces on the continent of America to maintain the authority, not of the Crown but indeed of the King and Parliament, I shall be the more observant of, because I conceive it is a matter of the last consequence with respect to the future government of those colonies, and perhaps of all belonging to Great Britain, for if the doctrine openly asserted by the Virginian Assembly that that colony ought not to be bound by the British Act of Parliament for imposing the Stamp Duty, and the sedition of the people of Boston, who, as you will have heard, have compelled the distributor of the stamps to take an oath that he will not execute his office. after pulling down the edifice intended for the custody of them, and committing many other acts of violence, without any interposition (that we learn) of the Magistrates to restrain them, be not animadverted upon in an exemplary manner, I do not see how the Mother Country can hope for the future that her laws will be obeyd in such distant dominions. . . .

* Probably George Grenville.

"I heard very lately of poor Governor Wright, who was then in pretty good health, but his spirits have never recovered the severe shock of that unhappy event which affected you also so deeply; but I am to blame to recall your thoughts to a subject of affliction which I flatter myself business and the dissipations of the great citty you live in will in some measure have relieved you from." 4 pp.

GOVERNOR W. H. LYTTELTON to WILLIAM KNOX.

1766, March 30. Jamaica.—"I most heartily congratulate you on your marriage, and beg you will make my compliments acceptable to your little woman. As I wrote some time since for leave to return to England, it may not be long before I shall be an eye-witness of your happiness, which I wish may be equal or superior if possible to what mine was, and of an abundantly greater duration. . . . I have lately received a copy of the King's speech and the addresses of the Parliament in January, and a very incorrect account of Mr. Pitt's speech, in which he is said to have inveigh'd against the Stamp Act as illegal upon principle, but what all this will end in we are yet ignorant here, and as an Englishman, more than an American governor, I confess I am anxious to learn. That Act has been fully carried into execution here, and I suppose that no reasonable man can doubt that the Mother Country has force sufficient to compell the obedience due to it upon the Continent, especially as I see the King has twice assured the Parliament, once in December and again in January, that there is no cause to apprehend any interruption of the good harmony that reigns at present between the several powers of Europe, but how far the consideration of commercial interests or other motives of policy or private interests may operate to produce a repeal I am not able to judge. Mr. Charles Townshend did me great honour, and I have reason to be vain of his good opinion, but I have such an obstinate people to deal with that all I dare hope for is to preserve myself from censure by doing what I think is my duty as a man of honour and the King's servant, but not to obtain that compliance with the instructions of the crown on the part of the people which, if they saw their true interest or could be made to see it, they wou'd not refuse. However, I have call'd another assembly, which is to meet on the 13th of May, and then a new trial will be made whether they will do the business they are convened for or ride resty, as their predecessors have done, on the points of privilege. . . ." 2½ pp.

Viscount Townshend to William Knox.

1767, June 6. Addisbury.—I am sorry that circumstances have deprived me of the pleasure of seeing you here, but beg that you will still consider yourself under an engagement to me for a visit.

"I am concern'd to hear Mr. Boone has acted precipitately in his manner of making grants; but . . . I have ever held that the perfect and general establishment of a sufficient American government can be the work only of Parliament. Few men are capable of conceiving the idea; still fewer are furnished with the knowledge requisite, and I doubt if any one man living has spirit or firmness enough to undertake and maintain, upon his own personal weight, a work of such infinite delicacy, extent and difficulty. In the execution of it he would find himself by turns offending the provinces and the Mother Country, or perhaps displeasing both at once by taking a middle point of moderation and good sense, between the extremes of absolute independence and absolute supremacy. To bring such a noble plan to accomplishment it must be framed with the utmost ability and discretion; it must come from a ministry possest of the confidence of the public; the two houses of Parliament must receive it with entire good will; it must have the real support of an unanimous ministry, and it must be thoroughly opened and recommended to the nation. Am I right in this? If I am I am not peevish in doubting whether, at this hour and under this ministry, Mr. Boone has overturn'd any great plan for the settlement of our affairs in America" 3 pp.

W. H. Lyttelton to William Knox.

1767, July 30. Port Eliot.—"A thousand thanks to you, my dear Knox, for your very instructive letter. . . . One of my friends says that the true cause of the rupture was Lord R[ockingham]'s insisting that Mr. C[onway] should have the conduct of the House of Commons, and that altho' what pass'd concerning America was given out to have contributed to it, it had in reality but very little. I conclude, however, it will not be very long before I hear of arrangements as to some one or two great offices at least, and nothing can seem more advantageous than the present situation of the court." Mr. Eliot presents his compliments. Seal, Neptune with his trident. 2 pp.

Addressed:—"To Will. Knox, Esqre., in New Street, Hanover Square, London."

The Same to the Same.

1767, Aug. 29. Lisbon.—". . . I have now only to acquaint you with my arrival in this city on the 16th inst., since which all my time has been taken up in formal audiences and visits. . . . All that you have heard of the noble appearance which Lisbon makes as you approach it by water is true, and in going about the town you have a most singular prospect of regular new-built streets intermixed with the ruins of vast edifices, palaces, churches and convents, overturned by the earthquake, which are much more striking from the elevation of the ground on which the city is than if it had been situated on a flat.

"I hope your little woman and my little man* are well."

GEORGE GRENVILLE to WILLIAM KNOX.

1767, Oct. 7. Wolton.—"I send you inclosed according to my promise a copy of the letter from S. Carolina, giving an account of the disposition of the people and of what had happen'd there on a seizure made under the Custom House laws. This letter was, I am told, sent to some of our newspapers to be printed, but was refused under the influence of those who have bought those channels of public intelligence, that the people of Great Brittain may be continued in ignorance of the state of things in America, a conduct which I fear will finally turn out a great misfortune both to this country and to that. I embrace with pleasure the occasion which the transmission of this paper gives me to return my best thanks to Mr. Grosvenor and to you for your kind visit to us. I beg the favor of you to make our compliments to him and to assure him of our warmest wishes that he may find his little girl perfectly recover'd and Mrs. Grosvenor free from all anxiety." 1½ pp.

W. H. LYTTELTON to WILLIAM KNOX.

1767, Dec. 9. Lisbon.—I believe your letter had been opened before I received it, and to avoid the danger of this for the future beg you to send any you write to Mr. Brown, my agent and chief clerk at Lord Shelburne's office, who will enclose them with the government despatches. I am glad you have paid a visit "to a man [George Grenville] who will know how to do justice to your talents, and who is himself such a fund of usefull knowledge that everybody who frequents him must improve from his conversation, especially when matters of government are in question. . . . I thank you cordially for your good wishes. I have not yet been long enough here to form very mature opinions, but I may tell you that several things in my situation are not unpleasing. . . .

"I rejoice that my little man and his fairy mama are well. Give her a kiss for me, and a sugar plumb to the boy."

Postscript.—Tell my Lord Grosvenor that I have hunted all over Lisbon in vain for a good picture. "They say they were all lost in the earthquake, which is so common a reply here to account for the want of anything desireable that one wou'd think everything, even to the maidenheads of the women, had been lost then." 3 pp.

[ROBERT NUGENT] VISCOUNT CLARE to WILLIAM KNOX.

1767, Dec. 24. Great George Street.—"We adjourned the board this day to the 15th of February, so you will have full time to travel leisurely. . . . My situation is not at all affected by the present arrangements, and it it was—you will be at no loss to fill up the blank. If the Duke of Bedford is to be the directing minister, I believe it a secret which no one here except your correspondent knows, if your letter has not been opened at the Post-office. I am sorry to decline any service that can be of importance to you, but altho' often apply'd to, as you will easily believe must have happen'd to a Lord of the Treasury and a member for Bristol, I never in any one instance was a suitor for myself or any other, to be admitted into a loan. Were I to depart from this rule I shou'd disoblige many of my constituents and be able to oblige but a few." 2 pp.

* Lyttelton was god-father to Knox's son.

GOVERNOR HENRY ELLIS to WILLIAM KNOX.

1767, Dec. 30. Bath.—Stating that he has recommended him to the notice of Lord Hillsborough, now made Secretary of State for America, and has also spoken to Lord Clare, who says that if Lord Hillsborough enlists Mr. Pownall he will take Knox in his place. 2 pp.

W. H. LYTTELTON to WILLIAM KNOX.

1768, March 14. Lisbon.—I am pleased to find that we have both entertained the same conjectures concerning Mr. G. G[renville], but it is probable that he may not be at liberty or may not choose to come into office unless his brother and some others are also satisfied. "I shall be curious to observe what degree of vigour the American department is exercised with. I don't expect that anything of consequence can be done untill after the meeting of the new Parliament, and yet the resolutions of the provinces of New England, and that spirit which you and I know to be so generally prevalent over the whole Continent, require the most speedy as well as the most judicious and efficacious measures to restrain their effects. . . .

"For some time past the Count d'Oeyras's illness has prevented my intercourse with him, but he is much better than he was, and I hope will soon resume the exercise of his ministerial functions."

Postscript.—Tell Mrs. Knox the women are not very likely to keep me from returning if the men do not. I wish Mrs. Smith and Miss Thomas would take a trip hither and enliven me with their agreeable company. 2½ pp.

GEORGE GRENVILLE to WILLIAM KNOX.

1768, June 27. The Grove.—I have not had time to consider your papers with the care they deserve, as I have been travelling about on visits to my friends, but they have given me much pleasure, and I perfectly agree with you "that we ought to take our materials for manufactures from our colonies, altho' we should pay higher prices for them or be obliged to reduce the price of them to our manufacturers by bounties, nor do I think it possible to prevent all manufactures entirely in our colonies, and the attempting to do it by force, notwithstanding what Lord Chatham declar'd in the House of Commons of 'filling their towns with troops and their ports with ships of war,' would be most violent and unjust, as well as impracticable; but the giving to them every possible encouragement to produce raw materials for our use would, in my opinion, be the most proper as well as the most effectual means of diverting them from manufacturing themselves to a great extent. This part of the argument may be explained and developed more at large then it is now done, and I think that and every other measure of good government and encouragement to the colonies is the just retribution which we should give to them for their support and obedience. But I own I cannot think that we ought for any consideration of Revenue from thence, even if it could amount to a million a year instead of 200,000*l.*, as you propose, to give up and sell for ever the right of sovereignty and taxation in the Parliament of Great Brittain over its colonies, which would be effectually done by the declaration propos'd in page 74—that the colonies 'should undertake to raise that sum amongst themselves, and that then every tax and duty laid on them for the purpose of revenue ought to be forthwith repealed.' If Great Britain, under any conditions, gives up her right of taxation she gives up her right of sovereignty, which is inseparable from it, in all ages and in all countries. The proposition in page 78 and 79 for 'Great Brittain to allow her colonies to carry directly from thence to all other parts of the world every production of their several climates which she has no occasion for' is an absolute repeal of one half of the Acts of Navigation, and contrary to the established principle and policy of every other European nation with respect to their colonies. It should, therefore, be thoroughly considered before it is propos'd to that extent. In some instances it has been already done; perhaps in some others it may be allow'd; but to do it universally might be dangerous, if not fatal, to Great Britain. The quit rents and the duty of 4½ per cent., which you mention in page 74 as part of the colony funds for public service, cannot be taken as such, as the former belongs immediately and certainly to the Crown, and the latter, tho' given originally for particular purposes, has for many years been disposed of and apply'd in the same manner." 3½ pp. Seal of arms.

VISCOUNT CLARE to WILLIAM KNOX, Little Chelsea.

1768, June 28. Newport.—When I mentioned my wish to forward your brother's pretensions at Bristol "I was informed that another person must be thought on, who is a great favourite of my best friends in that city, and is himself of that number." If, however, the emoluments of the office do not make it worth his while to quit Bristol and his friends there for a very troublesome employment, "I shall then be joined in recommending your brother to those chosen for Bristol. . . .

"I am come thus far on my way into Ireland, after having been yesterday unanimously re-elected, but not without some untoward circumstances arising from a jealousy conceived by the multitude of too much power assumed by the two societies in nominating their candidates; some grumbled, but all voted for me." 1¾ pp. Seal of arms.

GEORGE GRENVILLE to WILLIAM KNOX.

1768, July 15. Wotton.—"I have considered your letter of the 7th of this month with great attention, and the reasons you therein assign for adopting the plan of a requisition of a certain sum to be made upon each of the colonies, and upon that sum being raised by them, a declaration that all the present taxes impos'd by the Parliament of Great Brittain shall be repealed and no more imposed by them, except in case of refusal by any colony to furnish its contingent. I agree with you that it will be extremly difficult, if not impracticable, for the colonies to apportion a certain sum by a convention of deputies from each colony. They would, therefore, never do it, and the convention of deputies would quarrel, which would probably be attended with very bad consequences both to themselves and to us, besides the novelty of such an assembly. The difficulty of assessing the specific sums on each colony would then fall upon the Parliament (for God forbid that we should ever give that power to the King without Parliament), and as the various circumstances of the colonies would render it extremely difficult, if not impossible, to establish any permanent rate for the several quotas, the consequence would be that none would be establish'd, and no man would think it worth while to make a quarrel with the colonies for a sum of money when the right of taxation, and consequently that of sovereignty, from which it has ever been and ever must be inseparable, has in effect and in reality been surrender'd. To such a surrender I can never be a party, as I think it the highest species of treason against the constitution and sovereign authority of this kingdom to deprive it of one-fourth part of its subjects; but tho' I cannot adopt nor approve of such a plan, yet I can submitt to it, and having done my duty to the utmost by endeavouring to convince the King, the Parliament and the people of the unhappy consequences of such a measure, I shall wait the event till experience has given conviction one way or the other; and so far am I from thinking, if I had the power, that I have a right to carry matters to extremity, as you tell me it is suppos'd I would, in order to inforce my own opinions, in contradiction to theirs, upon a subject of such infinite importance to the whole, that if I were to see the King, the Parliament and the people ready to run into extremes on that side. which in the course of things seems to me highly probable, I would employ all the means in my power to prevent it, and to suggest temperate measures as long as they were practicable; being fully persuaded, that whatever blame there is, it is owing to those in England who have weakly or wickedly misled the subjects in America, and not to the colonies themselves, who have done no more than any other people would have done, to whom an immunity from taxes had been holden forth, and who had been encouraged as they have been. I agree with you in thinking that the American factors here would be greatly alarmed at the proposal to give the colonies permission to export every production, but I own that in my opinion the disputes between us and our colonies are already of so very serious a nature that I would on no account open a door to any farther uneasiness. I shall wish to know the effect of Lord Hillsborough's letters to America, as soon as you hear it. If they are writ in the style you mentioned to me they cannot remain long unanswered. . . ."

Postscript.—"I go from home to-morrow, and shall not return till Tuesday sênnight." 4 pp.

GEORGE GRENVILLE to WILLIAM KNOX.

1768, July 28. Wotton.—"The account which you gave to me in your letter of the 23rd of this month of the late transactions at Boston is so natural a consequence of the measures taken in Great Britain and of the state and temper of the government here, that whatever degree of concern it may give me I cannot feel the least surprise at it. If the eyes of those who are most interested in this unhappy situation had been sooner open'd to the most obvious truths many mischiefs might have been prevented. If the authentick proofs which they have now receiv'd of what has happen'd is not sufficient to convince them, I will venture to foretell without a spirit of prophecy greater calamities will, when it is too late, rouse them and the whole kingdom from the lethargy, as to all publick measures, into which they have been plung'd. I have long fear'd that the conduct holden in Great Brittain would encourage and delude the subjects of America, till they would come to extremities of one kind, which would too probably end in extremities on the other side. I may appeal to you as a private man and as a member of Parliament to my public declarations that my opinions upon this subject have ever been uniformly the same. They will still continue to be so till I see much better reasons for changing them than any which I have yet heard. What prospect there can now be that they will be attended with success I cannot pretend to answer, but if there is no plan form'd upon the sound principles of this constitution, supported both by firmness and temper, I can answer that no good success in the present difficult situation can arise from one desultory measure after another. The respect and affection of its subjects is the basis on which every wise government must be founded, but if that foundation has been once overturn'd it is not the work of a day to temper the materials so as to unite and rebuild them, especially it the workmen shall be daily chang'd, and each work by a different rule and line from that of his predecessor." 3 pp.

W. H. LYTTELTON to WILLIAM KNOX.

1768, July 31. Lisbon.—Expressing his hope, from what Knox tells him, that he may soon have another godson to make up for the one he has lost.

Thinks that "a certain measure will have great consequences; how extensive it is hard to say. If the dissolutions are submitted to without tumults or insurrections, will not government grow tired after some time of defraying the charges out of English funds which used to be provided for by the assemblies, or will the American duties, as now collected, be sufficient to defray them? It may very justly be apprehended that for a long time the assemblies will be obstinate in refusing to yield obedience to the requisition, chusing rather to be dissolved than to comply with it. On the other hand, if the provinces suffer many inconveniences from the want of assemblies, may not the people grow turbulent in order to compell the governors to suffer them to sit contrary to their instructions, and is there a military force there sufficient to support those governors in the execution of their duty ? " 3 pp.

GEORGE GRENVILLE to WILLIAM KNOX.

1768, Aug. 15. Wotton.—A very long letter on the relations of taxation and representation, combating the doctrine that they must go together. 18½ pp. Printed in Knox's "Extra Official State Papers."

The SAME to the SAME.

1768, Sept. 11. Wotton.—"I am very glad to hear that you have almost got through the tedious business of correcting the press, and that I shall soon have the pleasure of seeing your performance upon the state of the nation complete. . . . The facts relative to Sir Jeffrey Amherst's dismission from his government are now, I find, pretty universally known and occasion many observations. The accounts from America continue uniformly the same, notwithstanding which it is much doubted whether any measure has been or will be formed upon that important subject till the meeting of the Parliament, upon whom the whole, I suppose, will be thrown ? Have you read Mr. Pownall's new edition of the Administration of the Colonies ? which he has addressed to me, tho', as he very truely says, we differ widely in our opinions, particularly as to the doctrine which he endeavours to establish of a different mode of obedience between the subjects within this kingdom and those without it ; a doctrine very dangerous in its consequences, and which has not the least foundation in our constitution, nor do I think that the colonies incorporated in the times of King James 1st and King Charles 1st and 2nd stand upon the same footing with the Countys Palatine of Chester and Durham, or that our Kings have a right to create such independent principalities or to exempt them from any part of the jurisdiction of the supreme legislature, whatever might be the case of a new acquir'd kingdom under William the Conqueror ; notwithstanding which it appears from the preamble to the Acts of Parliament granting the right to send members of Parliament to Chester and Durham that in fact they had been bound by all the laws passed in the English Parliament, and particularly those of taxation, altho' the contrary is asserted in the petition cited to have been presented to King Henry 6th in Mr. Pownall's treatise. I do not agree with him that there has been 'a constitutional mode of administration thro' the establishment and invaried continuance of the precedent to raise the provincial quota of taxes by making in each case a requisition to the assemblys to grant subsidies '—page 152. So far from this being an invaried precedent, there have been many Acts of Parliament, as he himself admitts, for the purpose of taxation only, and there never was an instance, I believe, where the Parliament made such a requisition, nor any which I know of where the crown has required them to grant subsidies, unless the instruction to provide for their governours or a general letter to exert themselves against the enemy which has been frequently done to Lord Lieutenants of English counties in time of invasion or rebellion is stil'd a requisition to grant subsidies, and this instance will, I believe, be found to have been practised chiefly during the late war and by Mr. Pitt whilst he was Secretary of State, whose authority upon this question is certainly of no weight, tho' I think that there have been some very few instances of a similar nature before. Whether it would not be just and reasonable to grant to the colonies members of Parliament upon their petition to Parliament for that purpose, in like manner as was done in the cases of Chester and Durham, is another question, which whenever such an application shall be properly made will, I hope, be considered with every favourable disposition which their situation requires or will admitt of." 5 pp.

GEORGE GRENVILLE to WILLIAM KNOX.

1768, Sept. 19. Wotton.—"There must certainly be some mistake in the account which you give me in your last letter. You tell me that notwithstanding the confident assertions in the newspapers of the arrival of an express with letters from Governor Barnard, 'that the whole was false, no express being arriv'd,' nor any letters of a late date to administration; that you was told that there were accounts from Boston so late as August the 4 by way of Halifax, which say 'all was quiet and the duties regularly paid.' I know from the best authority that a schooner was sent from Halifax, that Governor Bernard's dispatches to the Government were sent by her, that she sail'd after the 8th of August, because I had myself a letter of that date from America, which came by that schooner. That letter informs me 'that the aspect of things is not in the least mended; that a very great disorder had lately happened upon Mr. Williams, the Inspector-General of the Customs, return to Boston, from whence he had been absent during the late riots on a survey, that a vast mob beset his house that very evening and insisted that he should immediately go to Liberty Tree, there resign his office and take an oath never to resume it, which he refused, and assur'd them that he would defend himself to the utmost. Finding this resistance, they then insisted that he should go to the Castle to the Commissioners, where they have been prisoners at large many weeks, which he also refused. Much clamour ensued, and much vengeance was threaten'd, but on assurances being given by Mr. Williams that he would meet them at the Town House next day at noon, they dispersed without doing much mischief. He went there, accordingly, thro' a vast mob of many thousands, and by his resolute behaviour quite disconcerted them; but he has often since receiv'd anonymous letters threatening his life unless he resigns his office.' Governor Barnard was very apprehensive that the Castle would be attacked, and wrote to Capt. Corner, of the Romney, requesting his assistance by all means in his power for the defence and protection of it. Thus things are at present from the information I have receiv'd. On the latter end of July Mr. Barnard pressed his Council to advise him to call for troops. The whole, except three, oppos'd the measure. Almost the whole trade of America, my correspondent says, is more or less illicit. When you compare the account given to me by this letter, which came to me but two days before yours, from a person of the greatest credit, with the information which you received from Lord Hillsborough, that the whole was false, and that no express was arrived, nor any letters of a late date to administration, and what was told you in the city, 'that all was quiet and the duties regularly paid,' you will not wonder at my saying that there must certainly be some great mistake. I do not see the least appearance of any change in the dispositions of the people, or of the Assemblys in North America, nor is it indeed probable that there should be any in the present situation. Various reports are every day propagated of the intentions of Government, from whence I should think that no plan is yet settled in this kingdom, whilst a regular system is steadily pursued in the Colonies. We shall soon see whether this is true, and I heartily wish it may be found otherwise. In the meantime, to deceive ourselves, or to indeavour to deceive the publick upon this important subject, is the weakest as well as the most fatal measure which can be pursued." 4 pp.

The Same to the Same.

1768, Oct. 9. Wotton.—"I have read over the papers which you sent to me, together with your letter of the 4th of this month, with the greatest pleasure. They are written with so much temper and force, with so much knowledge and precision, that I am persuaded they will do you great honor, if ever you shall think fit to avow yourself as the author of them. The general principles laid down in them correspond so much with my declared opinions, and are so favorable to the public measures I have pursued, that to express my approbation of them to you, who are so perfectly acquainted with both, must be unnecessary. I will therefore only return you my sincere thanks, both as a public man and as a meer individual, for having put them in so clear and advantageous a light. I have not been able to examine all the particulars contain'd in them with that attention which I will give to them, and which they so well deserve. I will, however, mention one or two things which have occur'd to me in reading them over, and which you will consider of in a second edition, as the present impression is all struck off. At the bottom of page 37 you seem to recommend it to the Parliament as 'the most expedient method to assess each colony a specific sum and leave the mode of raising it to the respective Assemblies.' This would, I think, be attended with great difficulties, and no advantage. It is a novelty, and I believe hitherto without example in the course of our Parliamentary proceedings, to tax bodies of men in particular sums, taxes having been allways imposed upon the several commodities produced or consum'd, or upon particular acts to be done, which it is in every man's power to avoid in the whole, or at least in part; but specific sums have never, as I know of, been assessed upon bodies of men, nor even upon individuals, except in the instance of poll taxes, which were allways odious from their inequality. The same objection of inequality would infallibly arise from the assessing specific sums on each of the Colonies, as it would be impossible for the Parliament to assess them in the exact proportion of their abilities; and if they did it once, the fluctuating state of our Colonies would demand an annual change of it, and be the source of perpetual injustice and altercation. Notwithstanding what has been said about Requisitions to the Assemblies, which Mr. Pownal in his late treatise calls 'the Constitutional mode of administration,' thro' the establishment and invaried continuance of the precedent, there is, I believe, no instance of such a requisition made by Parliament to any Assembly, except in the late Mutiny Act, which you know was as much objected to, and upon the same principle, with justice, as the other Revenue Laws. Many of those who have wish'd to exempt the Colonies from paying any taxes by authority of Parliament, have given way to this proposition from a persuasion that the Parliament can never carry it into execution, and tho' I do not agree that they never can, yet I think it so difficult, that they never will, which amounts to the same thing. In page 23, you say that the Ambassador Extraordinary (to Russia), when 'he had enjoyed the title and emoluments of the office for a twelvemonth, resign'd it.' I think Mr. Stanley said in the House of Commons that he had declin'd receiving the whole or part of the emoluments of that office. If so, the words 'and emoluments' should, in justice to him, be left out. There are some few little inaccuracies, possibly owing to errors in the press, which I will mention to you when we meet in town. In the meantime, I rejoice to hear that a work of this national importance, and of this great extent and compass, is likely to be as universally circulated as it deserves, and I am persuaded as universally approv'd." 4 pp.

Lord Clare to William Knox

1768, Oct. 10. Bath.—I repeat my thanks to you and Mrs. Knox "for the confidence you repose in me by confiding the conduct and education of a young lady to my spiritual direction. I shall, for the present, trust her to her mother's care, and a few years hence I dare say you will both think she may as safely be trusted to mine. . . .

"Your letter is the only piece of politicks I have read in manuscript since we parted. You tell me what is done, but wou'd to God you cou'd tell what can be done! The way is so intricate and the night so dark that he who shuts his eyes has as good a chance to go right as he who opens them.

"But you have seen the King of Denmark, and possibly may have got a ticket for the masquerade without costing you thirty guineas. What pity it is that such sights cannot last for ever. I wish they were to continue at least all this winter, and draw away many of the good company from St. Stephen's Chapel. There is, however, one chance, which has kept this place emptier than ever I knew it. Elections have cost so much that our knights and burgesses cannot afford to travel." 2 pp.

WILLIAM HENRY LYTTELTON to WILLIAM KNOX.

1768, Nov. 19. Lisbon.—". . . My errand hither has not proved so useless as you once prophecied it wou'd be, but much is still to be done. The people of New England have not compell'd their governor to call an Assembly, as I told you I thought it not improbable they might, but they are holding one by their own authority under the name of a Convention, which is as bad, or worse. . . ." 1 p.

GEORGE GRENVILLE to WILLIAM KNOX.

1769, Jan. 11. Wotton.—" I am very glad to find by your letter of the 9th of this month, which I receiv'd last night, that you have almost finished what you are about. As to the question which you ask of me, whether it is safe to blame the proceedings of the late or any former House of Commons, it has been agitated in debate during the present Session, and it was urg'd that in the case of any virulent or outrageous abuse of the former House of Commons, the subsequent House of Commons might censure it. This was strongly denied by many, and there it was left; but I imagine that those who supported that doctrine meant to confine that censure to instances of gross and scandalous abuse, for if it be true that the proceedings of former Parliaments are not to be questioned, nor the conduct of former Kings to [be] blam'd, because there may be a libell upon a dead King as well as a living one (which, if I am not misinform'd, was the doctrine laid down by the present Lord Chancellor when Attorney-General in the case of Dr. Thelbeare), it must follow that it will be utterly impossible to write any history except a panegyrick out of the Gazette. At the same time it will certainly be safer, and I think more effectual, to canvass the conduct and character of a late Parliament or King in decent and temperate language, at the same time that the facts and inferences are stated and drawn with the utmost freedom. This right is essential in the most limited idea of the liberty of the press, and I imagine will scarcely be questioned at present. The other question which you ask is whether a man may without offence express the just expectations of the subject from the present House of Commons; that they will by their conduct restore the sinking authority of Parliament, enquire into past misconduct, and punish those who dispute their right, and foment resistance to the laws? This question seems to me to admit of no doubt, for I take it for granted that it cannot be a crime to write that, which every subject has a right in decent and respectfull terms to petition the Parliament to do, and no man, I think, can deny that all these are real and serious grievances both upon the King and his people. . . . All my letters from London agree in the same representation of the unsettled, unhappy state of things and of the divisions which prevail." 4 pp.

WILLIAM HENRY LYTTELTON to WILLIAM KNOX.

1769, Aug. 5. Lisbon.—I am charmed to find that two works—one of which I think is the best upon Finance since Sir Robert Walpole's answers to Pultenay, and the other a most candid, learned and cogent exhortation to the colonies to return to their duty—are your own. "I did, indeed, as you suspected I should, attribute a considerable share in them to you when I read them, but the very great extent and variety of knowledge displayed in them made me suppose them the joint labour of different hands. . . . Now that I am assured the works are yours, I will read them again, and shall have double pleasure in receiving instruction from them. . . . I cordially join with you in lamenting evils which may, perhaps, have worse consequences than any man who is the most active in inflaming our ill humours can foresee, or the wisest and best-intentioned among us suggest a remedy for."

I have appointed Sneyd my agent in place of Brown. The payment of my arrears is very welcome, for since I came here I have been obliged from time to time to sell out of the funds to enable my banker to answer my drafts. 4 pp.

GEORGE GRENVILLE to WILLIAM KNOX.

1769, Sept. 24. Wotton.—". . . I am much obliged to you for your kind wishes and good opinion of my son, who, I hope, will deserve both the one and the other. I return my thanks to you for the information which you have given to me about our American Colonies. The consequences which have happened I have allways foreseen, and those which will happen inevitably, I fear, from the conduct of our government, and, let me add, of our people." 1¼ pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1769, Oct. 22. Wotton.—Expressing his astonishment at receiving a printed copy of his speech on the expulsion of Wilkes from the House. Begs Knox to see Mr. Almon, the publisher, and if possible stop the publication, or if too late for this, to insist upon the affixing of a statement that it is published "without the approbation, consent or knowledge of the right honourable gentleman who made it." 3¼ pp. Seal of arms.

Printed in the "Grenville Correspondence," Vol. IV., p. 471.

The SAME to the SAME.

1769, Oct. 29. Wotton.—"As I find by your letter that your application to Mr. Almon to stop the publication of my speech in the House of Commons was too late, and that too many had been dispers'd to prevent its going further, I think the alteration of the advertisement to shew that it was done without my consent is the only step which can be taken. There are some mistakes in the printed copy which you sent to me; two or three of the most obvious which struck me in reading it I have marked in the enclos'd paper. They may be corrected in the errata, particularly those in page 10 and 11, relating to Mr. Wilke's imprisonment. but you must by no means give my paper to the printer; if you do, it will be said to be corrected by me. I wish that you were in the right in your opinion that the publication of the truth is the sure means of stopping lies. I am afraid that the experience of these times has not corresponded with that observation, which has made me so averse to all publications relating immediately to myself. By a letter which I received lately from America, I am informed that the demands of our Colonists rise in proportion to the accounts which they receive from hence. . . . God grant that the difficulties which daily augment and incompass us on every side may not become too great not only for the administration, but for the King and Kingdom, to surmount." 2 pp.

WILLIAM HENRY LYTTELTON to WILLIAM KNOX.

1770, Jan. 5. Lisbon.—"I wish you and your little woman, your good little woman—which, according to the description you give of the present female world in England, is an epithet that grows every day less applicable to the greatest part of them—all joy of the birth of your son, and return you many thanks for allowing me to take a particular interest in him. I shall desire Mr. Sneyd to pay a little matter for me as the nurse's due on such occasions." Other letters received with yours seem to promise better success to Administration than you think possible. "I am inclined to think that if the Closet does not give way to anything but a real necessity of yeilding, it will carry its point." 2 pp.

WILLIAM KNOX to [J. POWNALL ?]

[1770, Feb. 5 ?].—The violent disease from which I have been suffering has prevented my expressing my gratitude for the kind things you have said of me, "though, in your manner of saying them, you sufficiently abate the vanity they otherwise would excite by showing me how far the utmost exertion of my poor abilities must ever fall short of even the sportive gambols of yours."

The reflections of a sick-bed have made me anxious about the future of my wife and little ones, as most of my income would expire with me; but I have some hopes that my office of Provost Marshal of Georgia might, by Lord Hillsborough's goodness and humanity, be continued to my little boy. The Assembly of Georgia talk of abolishing the office, which strengthens my wish that it should be in my family when that time comes. May I beg your good offices with his lordship in the business? 3 pp.

J. POWNALL to WILLIAM KNOX.

1770, Feb. 9.—In reply to Mr. Knox's kind letter of the 5th inst., states that he has taken the first opportunity of mentioning the wish contained in it to Lord Hillsborough, who expressed the greatest esteem and regard, but only said that he wished to see Mr. Knox as soon as he could venture out, and would then talk with him on the subject. 1 p.

GEORGE GRENVILLE to WILLIAM KNOX.

1770, July 19. Charleton.—I am here on a visit to Lord Suffolk, and your letter has had to be sent after me, or I should not have delayed till now wishing you joy of the situation in which you have engaged. "I am very sensible of the obliging expressions contained in it with regard to myself, and should have been truly sorry if any consideration relative to me alone had prevented you from accepting an offer which you thought advantageous and honourable to you, and which I am persuaded no man is more able or more willing to discharge with industry and fidelity towards the King and his people in the present distracted state of affairs in America. I shall see with real pleasure any measure taken which may contribute to that great object, the importance and consequences of which are, I fear, not yet sufficiently felt, and therefore, as I told you when I saw you, I despaired of anything being done, in which opinion I am still more confirmed by the accounts which I have lately received from London. I am much obliged to Lord Hillsborough for the justice which you say he does to me, and which I shall allways be ready and desirous to return. . . . I very sincerely wish you more comfort and satisfaction than my own mind can promise to any man who is to sail in the present stormy weather without a compass to guide him over the troubled sea on which you are embarked." 2 pp.

HENRY ELLIS to WILLIAM KNOX.

1770, Aug. 7. Naples.—"It is with singular pleasure I learn that you are appointed joint secretary with Mr. Pownall in the American department. This is an event, I should think, not very favourable to him, but what I have long and very earnestly wished for, as well on your own account as on that of your friends, the publick, and my Lord Hillsborough, whose great kindness must ever interest me in his happiness." After congratulating you, you will allow to recommend to you my old rough, but honest, friend, Mr. Ellis. His former intemperate behaviour towards you leaves him no just title to expect your protection, but I know your humane and liberal turn of mind will overlook his past folly, and I trust you will honour him with your countenance and advice.

"I have just now received a letter from poor Price, intreating me to write a line to Lord Hillsborough which may give some weight to a memorial which he intends to present to his lordship, praying for a five years' leave of absence from Georgia. I think the petition improper, and what can hardly be granted, but I presume he might obtain a general leave of absence for the recovery of his health, such as I had, without limitation of time. . . . A thousand things occur to me upon your new situation. . . . Your station will, as you know, subject you to many difficulties, as well of a private as publick nature; but I really think you need have no apprehension on that account, as your prudence and abilities are equal to them; and without meaning to say even a civil thing to you upon this occasion, I can truly assure you that I conceive better hopes now of our colony differences being happily accommodated than I ever once entertain'd since they began." 3¼ pp.

Lord Clive to William Knox.

1770, Dec. 8. Bath.—"I have received the honor of your letter of the 6th instant, enclosing one from Mr. Ellis in favour of a relation of his who is going a cadet to the East Indies. His wish is that I should obtain a commission for the young gentleman. Were this in my power I should not hesitate a moment, but the rule, and I believe the invariable rule, of the Company is not to appoint ensigns in England unless the persons applying have already held that rank in the King's service. All I can do is to furnish the gentleman with a letter to somebody in power abroad, requesting a commission for him as soon as possible after his arrival. But it is necessary I should be informed of his name and to what part of India he is going, both which circumstances the Governor has omitted to mention. If you can supply me with the information I shall have great pleasure in writing the proper letter of recommendation." 1½ pp.

J. Pownall to William Knox.

1772, Aug. 1.—"The business that has been so long in agitation and uncertainty is at last decided, the Report is to be made before Lord Hillsborough goes to Ireland, and the offer of the American Seals is now with Lord W[eymouth]. If he refuses (which I am almost sure he will), Lord D[artmou]th is the next upon the list, who will, I think, also decline, and then I foresee the Administration of the affairs of the Colonys will undergo some new arrangement.

"Lord Hillsborough says you wish to have your office in Georgia for life. If so, there must be a new Commission by letters patent under the Great Seal, and if you think the alteration of the tenure worth the expense, the business is done. . . ."

P.S.—"I think it not impossible that the office of Secretary of State may discontinue, and that powers and patronage may revest in a first Lord of Trade. If this should be the case, will our friend Lord Clare have any objection to come amongst us again, if he should be thought of, as is I think most natural to expect? It is of no small consequence to me to have a guess about this, for if he mounts the box I get up behind directly." 2¼ pp.

The Same to the Same.

1772, Sept. 19. London.—"Our lord and master [Dartmouth] was in town on Thursday, but went back to Sandwell as soon as the drawing-room was over, and probably will not return before the first week in October, so that there will be no manner of occasion for your coming to town sooner than you intended. . . . It will certainly be proposed to you to be Under-Secretary of State in the Southern Department in the room of Mr. Sutton, who has fallen into a fortune of 4,000*l.* per annum. I am pretty certain of what I say, and therefore you will do well to prepare your mind upon it. I beg my best respects to Mrs. Knox, to whose goodness to me I stand indebted for so much happiness at Tunbridge Wells." 2¼ pp.

J. Pownall to William Knox.

1772, Sept. 21. Whitehall.—" . . . The Duke of Gloucester has formally announced to the Court his marriage with Lady Waldegrave, and I presume it will be followed by the same interdiction that confines the Duke of Cumberland to the situation of a private gentleman.

" The India Company, disappointed in raising money from the sales of the immense quantity of goods on hand, have attempted to borrow a large sum of the Bank, but the Bank not choosing to lend, an alarm has been spread, and the stock has fallen prodigiously within these few days.

" A letter from Leyborne received to-day gives a very unfavorable state of the expedition against the Charibs. Nothing of hostility has yet passed, but the Charibs have declared their resolution to resist to the last extremity, and the business appears to me to be at present in a state of great doubt and delay. . . ." 1½ pp.

The Same to the Same.

1772, Sept. 26.—Stating that as Lord Dartmouth is about setting out for a tour in Yorkshire, he has had to take the King's pleasure through Lord Rochford, and having written the necessary letters, has sent them to Sandwell for Lord Dartmouth to sign. Has heard nothing more about the vacancy in the other department, and begins to think that " some other person may have been thought of." 1 p.

Lord Hillsborough to William Knox.

1772, Sept. 29. Hillsborough.—I enclose Mr. Smith's deed and bond duly executed, and presume that when you get the patent under the seal of Georgia you will send it to him. I do not send the letter you wished for to Lord North, because Wheelock urges that he is to hold the agency so long as you hold the Under-Secretaryship, and I rather incline to his opinion. " I know your justice and moderation, and I am sure you will not let the poor man lose anything he is entitled to. . . .

" I hope I shall hear from you that everything goes on well and pleasantly in the American department. For my part, I have totally forgotten that I was ever concerned in public business, and am so employed in church-building, road-making, farming, and every rural occupation that belongs to an estate and a country gentleman, that I go to bed every night very much tired, and find little time for anything else. I did not, you know, wish to resign, but am not now at all sorry it was necessary I should." I hope Mrs. Knox and her little ones are well. Her father is so lively and well that he thinks of paying me a visit. 2 pp.

J. Pownall to William Knox.

1772, Oct. 3. Saturday.—" Mr. Wills, second son to the Bishop of Bath and Wells (you know him), succeeds our friend Sutton in Lord Rochford's office. If I feel any regret on this occasion you will place it I am sure to the account of the love and esteem I have for you ; in every other light your appointment to that office would have been a misfortune to your faithfull friend.

" Lord Dartmouth set out from Sandwell for Yorkshire on Thursday, and I am to know nothing about him till he returns, which will be this day sennight. . . .

" I believe I mentioned to you in a former letter that the letters from St. Vincent, lately received, give but an unfavourable account of the state of the expedition against the Charibs. It meets with many obstacles ; those savages are desperate and determined, and the issue of our war against them is become doubtfull ; and in this state of it Leyborne has assumed the Generalissimo more than was necessary. This has given offence, and a resolution being taken in Lord Dartmouth's absence that the Governor should have nothing to do in the business of military operation, it was signified to me that I should propose such orders as would be necessary and settle all the arrangements with the other Secretarys of State (think, my dear friend, of my difficultys and distress). I immediately dispatched a messenger to Sandwell, and inclosed I send you in the confidence of friendship the letter I received in answer. From the general view I had of this business it seemed to be big with mischief and difficulty, and I am afraid you will think me too vain in saying that I was not sorry therefore that the arrangement of it was left to me. I had, however, soon cause to repent of my presumption, for in my first conversation with Lord Barrington, I found that an arrangement had been made respecting the changes and relief of the troops in the West Indies without the least communication to our office, that a regiment was upon the point of embarking from hence, and that all the orders had been issued by the other Secretarys ; happily those orders were so imperfect that the business was not half done, and therefore I took upon myself all the directions that were further necessary, and took care in preparing the draft that the orders should be expressed to be given by the other Secretarys in the absence of Lord Dartmouth. This was (as I imagined it would be) objected to, and Lord Rochford insisted that it did not belong to the Secretary of State for America to give any orders to the Admiralty or Secretary at War respecting troops or ships. I stuck, however, to my point ; I produced my precedent, and having, as I have reason to believe, the King with me in opinion, Rochford soon gave way. He left, however, the business before it was finished, and I had the ground to fight over again with Lord Suffolk, who took up the same pretence in a much higher tone ; but I persevered, and having the same support, prevailed, and everything has been done in point of office form as it ought to be. As to the more essential part, it was left entirely to myself, and I trust I have so conducted the whole of this business as to please the King, to avoid the appearance of disgrace or injustice to Leyborne, to give more efficacy to the operations of the troops, and to defend our office against unwarrantable encroachment. . . ." 6½ pp.

Henry Ellis to William Knox.

1772, Oct. 17. Bath.—Applauds Lord Hillsborough's retiring from Administration " upon the motives he did, which were honourable, and have been generally approved," and rejoices that Knox still keeps the Under-Secretaryship, and that his merit is appreciated by Lord Dartmouth. 4 pp

J. Pownall to William Knox.

1772, Dec. 21. Bath.—Thanking him for his very kind letter, and begging him to "continue a correspondence that gives so much comfort to a friend living here in total ignorance and oppressed with infirmity." 1 p.

The Same to the Same.

1772, Dec. 26. Bath.—Is beginning to amend, and hopes soon to return "with health and cheerfulness." 1 p.

The Same to the Same.

1773, July 23. [London].—". . . No one rejoices more than myself to find that the Spa waters have had so good an effect. It is my entreaty and Lord Dartmouth's command that you stay where you are so long as you continue to profit by it.

"Our business has hitherto been as light as you could wish, and I think it is likely to continue so, for what can Lord Dartmouth have to do whilst Bamber Gascoigne is minister for America at the Board of Trade and Lord Suffolk at the Council Office, where they will not let us have anything to say, all Councils for American business being in Lord Gower's absence held by Lord Suffolk. . . .

"If Cressener does not know more than he writes, you will not get a great deal out of him, and I think from your account of the Nuncio, he has not the infallibility of his master. Don't you wish, for many reasons, that the great powers who are making so free with what does not belong to them, would in some of their partition Treatys include North America? I believe they wou'd soon be sick of their acquisition.

"My dear Knox, Lord North's blindness, or rather indolence, in respect to the arts that are practised to ruin and disgrace our department, and ultimately himself, is astonishing and unpardonable." 2½ pp.

Henry Ellis to William Knox, at Whitehall.

1773, Nov. 10. Dublin.—Concerning his own private affairs. Before his father's death, he had near seven thousand pounds in Ireland, yet out of all this and his father's fortune, "which is so considerable in debts and landed property," he has not yet been able to collect 300*l.*, owing to legacies and donations and removing of encumbrances. These have absorbed all he had in England, "save a qualification to vote at the India House," which he has reserved for a particular purpose, and he has often wished he had been disinherited, "rather than made heir to such a load of vexation." He has, however, at last wound up his affairs to his own and, apparently, to other people's satisfaction, and hopes next day to get away from Ireland, "where the poverty and distresses of the people surpass all description. If something is not speedily done for their relief, 'tis hard to say what may be the consequences." 2¼ pp.

J. Pownall to William Knox.

1773, Dec. 3. Friday.—I am rejoiced to hear you are so much better. When you can think of business without being disturbed by it, I have got some for you that, whilst it amuses you, will greatly lighten the burthens of your faithfull servant. After so many years neglect of the business of Quebec, everything now is to be done in a hurry. Lord North has begg'd that he may have from us a précis of the affairs of Quebec from the first establishment of it, so far as regards the claims and complaints of the new subjects, and what has passed thereupon, &c., &c.

"You know how little able I am to sit down to such a work, and you know that nobody but you or I can do it. And in this you will see the wishes of, &c." 1½ pp.

Henry Ellis to William Knox.

1773, Dec. 8. Paris.—Was exceedingly grieved on calling at Knox's house to learn how ill he was. Urges him to take more care of himself, as he hears he "got this illness in a cold church." Is now well again himself, but being attacked in London with a sore throat, deafness and sciatic pains, was obliged to fly from that city with precipitation and regret. 1¾ pp.

The Same to the Same.

1774, March 23. Marseilles. L'Hotel Dauphin.—American affairs are doubtless in a state truly critical, "but still I by no means think the case so desperate or irremediable as many people imagine. We know the real inability of the Americans to make any effectual resistance to any coercive method which might be employed to compell their obedience. They are conscious of it themselves, but may well give a scope to their insolent licentiousness when they have so long been suffered to practice it with impunity. What is decided upon appears judicious, and I hope what may be farther resolved upon will be equally so. . . .

"I am glad to hear Mr. Cressener is to be so early at Spa, and I hope you will be so too, as I think it most agreeable when thinnest of company. We are to have several folks of condition there from our country this season, amongst others Lord Ely and his family, the Attorney-General and his, &c." As to the good Archbishop [of Tuam] and his family, Lady Rider is strongly disposed to revisit the Spa, but the fatigue and inconveniences of the journey incline his Grace and Mrs. Hamilton to go to Switzerland instead. Mr. Neville is in that country at present. 3 pp.

The Same to the Same.

1774, June 27. Spa.—Both Mr. Cressener and I are much disappointed that we shall not see you here, but we rejoice to hear that you are so well recovered.

"I wish the Bostonians were at the d——l, for they are likely to be a continual plague to us. I have, however, no apprehensions from their power, nor yet from their courage; we know their weakness as well as their want of bravery. I think no measures could be better calculated to bring them to reason than those adopted by Government. I dare say they will have a good. tho' I am afraid but a temporary effect, for the seeds of discontent will necessarily remain so long as the point in contest is left undecided, which it must be unless we give it up.

"We have but few company here as yet, and those what we English call foreigners; they are, however, hospitable and sociable to such a degree that we do not much miss our country folks. The houses of Prince Guémenée, of Marshall Lacy, and the Archbishop of Narbonne, I as often dine at as at the table d'hote."

I am now in very good health, but have not yet determined where I shall seek my winter quarters. I fear I must not encounter the severity of the English climate, but I may go from hence to England, and thence to Lisbon, Spain, and at length to Italy for the Jubilee. 3¼ pp.

HENRY ELLIS to WILLIAM KNOX, at Whitehall.

1774, July 15. Spa.—Your letters have quieted the uneasiness felt by Mr. Cressener and others in relation to America, though for my own part I never imagined that the colonists would dare to attempt any hostile opposition to the measures of government. "Could the combination proposed by the Bostonians take place it would, I fear, compell us to yield to them the matter in contest, but the defection amongst their brethren which you mention relieves us from that cruel necessity. The ignorance of people on this continent of the inability of the Americans to make a successful effort towards acquiring independence is truely surprising. They had actually given up the Colonies as irrecoverably lost to Great Britain, and are astonished to find it is not so. The French wished it ardently, as an event alike tending to destroy our influence and to facilitate their schemes of aggrandizement. The Dutch equally wished it, in hopes that the Americans would then buy at theirs, instead of our shop, and that thence they might be enabled once more to dispute with us the empire of the ocean. . . . As to the Quebec Law, to me it appears the most judicious, as well in point of equity as policy, that could possibly have been framed, and I have not the least doubt of its producing the happiest effects. Although, from the infatuation with which wicked and designing men had found means to infect the minds of the ignorant multitude, the authors of that monument of British generosity and benevolence might not be safe from insult and abuse, yet I am persuaded there are but very few real patriots, who are competent judges of the matter, that do not cordially approve and applaud the intention and ability displayed in it. I guessed from what quarter it came, but for prudential reasons kept my conjectures from the profane." I hope I may see you before I leave this place, which will be on the 8th or 10th of next month, and at any rate I will secure you a good horse. "This season has produced no great crowd; we have not one English nobleman or other person of distinguished rank to maintain the credit of our nation. The French take the lead of politeness and hospitality, and do it in a very becoming manner. Mr. Cressner and his family, in which are Mr. and Mrs. Astle, desire their cordial respects to you." 4 pp.

LORD CLARE to WILLIAM KNOX.

1774, July 17. Dungan, near Galway.—"I am extremely obliged to you for your very comfortable letter of the 4th. . . . I beg you will be pleased to congratulate Lord Dartmouth in my name upon this prelude, which I hope will be succeeded by a perfect reconciliation of our unhappy differences, and confer honor upon him and happiness upon all. New converts are always most violent, and the greatest persecutors of those whose cause they have forsaken; I am, therefore, not at all surprized that those who wou'd have nothing done are now for doing too much, but I hope and trust that their advice will be equally disregarded in both extremes. Such an Association as was proposed by the Bostonians, and has, I find, been accepted by some, wou'd, if generally comply'd with, complete in one year and in one article, of lumber, the ruin of this country, already distress'd beyond the power of expression; nor wou'd our sugar-islands fare much better. I am now at the house of a gentleman possess'd of a rental of seven thousand pounds a year, who does not receive one, merely from the inability of his tenants to stock his lands; and I shou'd be in as bad plight if I were as incapable as he is of stocking mine upon my own account. I am now endeavouring to convert a grazing country, where a plough never was known, into tillage; and in order to people it and intercept some of the migrations into America, I have advertised large tracts of land in Leinster, Ulster, and Munster to be let rent-free for two years, with timber to build houses. . . .

"Such is the effect of native air, that although it hath rained every day, and almost all the day since my arrival in Ireland, I am incomparably better than when I came. Dear Sir, your faithful and affect. servant, Craggs Clare." 2 pp.

LORD DARTMOUTH to WILLIAM KNOX.

[1774, July ?].—"Bulletin de Blackheath. The people of Virginia will beat out their brains against the post which their wiser brethren at Boston seem to be taking more effectual measures to remove. The accounts Governor Hutchinson has sent me of the 9th of June do not shake the hopes I have begun to conceive."

I know your mouth water'd at the contents of Sir R. Payne's letters, but you did not perceive that the turtles they announce are no longer in existence. I go to-morrow to the Chief Baron's near Tunbridge. 1 p. Endorsed with year date.

G. CRESSENER to WILLIAM KNOX.

1774, Aug. 28. Bonn.—"I am charmed you were pleased with your journey; I am sure not so much so as I was with your good company, for the hours I passed with you are the most agreable I have spent since my residence in this town. . . .

"We have heard nothing of the quarrel between the French and Swiss guards; had it been true, I think the news wou'd have reached us ere now.

"I have the joy of telling you entre nous only that a most prudent, wise and spirited answer hath been given by our Royal Master to the Declaration I shewed you of the Court of Vienna. Most of the Electors are as well pleased with it as they are piqued by the Declaration of the Imperial Court, for they don't approve le haut imperieux ton with which that Court treat the Electors of the Empire, and they are alarmed at the schemes that they have formed to inlarge their territorys at the expense of the neighbouring States. Since the division of Poland, they will have no difficulty in making out a title to whatever lyes convenient for them to take.

"You will be surprized to hear an army of 200,000 Turks have been surrounded and obliged to deliver up all their cannon (as the only hostages Marshal Romanzow would accept for the ratification of the Treaty by the Grand Seigneur) by an army of only 40,000 men; but to explain this, it's necessary to let you know that after the several defeats the Turks had sustained, and particularly after the defeat of 28,000 men the Grand Vizier had detached to meet the 5,000 waggons loaded with provisions, the desertion was so great that the Grand Vizier had not twenty thousand men in his camp when he signed the Peace.

"I fully believe the Courts of Vienna and Berlin are by no means pleased with this peace as it will thwart some of their schemes, for Russia will now be at liberty to speak their sentiments. Amongst other things, it will hinder a further division of Poland, be of use to Dantzick, and, may be, change the face of affairs.

"I must not conceal from you my fears in regard to America. The obstinacy of those rebels, the desertion (as they say) of our troops, and the small force we have there, in regard to what the Colonies may raise, gives me many uneasy hours. Though I am fully convinced of the wisdom and necessity of the measures taken by the King and Parliament, yet I wish we had taken the resolution to secure success by numbers." 6 pp.

J. Pownall to William Knox.

1774, Aug. 31. Whitehall.—". . . I have done nothing but play truant since you left us, for I found no body would do anything, and I begin to have as much contempt as my betters for that solicitude for the public welfare you have so often laughed at me for cherishing.

"Of the peace between the Russians and Turks, either as to the motives for it, or the terms on which it has been concluded, I know nothing but what I read in those inestimable State Papers that are published every day by your friend Mr. Woodfall and his fraternity, and I am not ashamed to say that they furnish me with better and earlier intelligence of what is doing in America than I receive through any other channel; for you will scarcely believe that we have not received a single letter of any moment from the continent of America since you left us.

"I do not wonder that the state of our Colonies is an object of speculation in other countrys. Our interests there grow more and more serious; but tho' the seeds of disunion begin to germinate, it must be our own fault if they ripen into maturity in the present generation. There is, however, discontent enough to give encouragement to our natural enemies in Europe, and in that light they have a very pernicious effect.

"I shall be curious to hear what passes in the general Congress of deputys. There are various opinions, but I esteem Dr. Franklin's the best, because they will probably do what he bids them to do, and he says that they will draw up a state of their claims in the form of a petition, or rather Bill of Rights, and annex to it a resolution of non-importation to continue untill those claims be yielded to. . . .

"I see in the Circulation a letter from Compeigne of the 24 of August, and therefore I conclude the flying report of a scuffle between the French and Swiss Guard is without foundation. The politicks of France, or rather the cabal and intrigue of its Court, are so fluctuating as to puzzle all speculation; but as things stood by the last advices, I think Choiseul will be the minister at last. My attention, however, is fixed to what I think more important to us—I mean the war in S. America between the Spaniards and Portuguese, for if that goes on I dread the consequences." 4 pp.

EDMUND, BARON DE HAROLD, to WILLIAM KNOX.

1774, Sept. 2. Dusseldorff.—Stating that he thinks the pamphlet sent him by Mr. Knox so masterly a performance that he has translated it into French, "as it may enable many who do not understand English to admire the wisdom and lenity of the Administration and the justice of the legislature." He also sends the petition concerning his pardon, with apologies for any faults there may be in it, as he is not accustomed to write English. 1 p.

The SAME to the SAME.

1774, Sept. 13. London.—". . . . General Gage had not on the 28 of July received the Act for regulating the Government, nor the appointment of the new Council, in consequence of it. He says the people at Boston were using every art to excite a more violent and open opposition to these last measures, and complains in language of vexation and disappointment that Government has no friends, and that either thro' duplicity or timidity those who were stated to be such will not stand forth. He says not a word of the desertion of the troops, tho' he sent over prisoner a man for encouraging desertion, whom we discharged, and I understand he is now in training by John Wilkes to start upon the first occasion.

"Everybody's eyes and expectations attend the Congress; their proceedings and manœuvres have less of violence than I expected, and more of firmness and method than I like. I think their first Resolution will be that Boston should pay for the tea.

"I think that Maurepas, unable to go through the task he has undertaken, will give place to Choiseul, and I am more and more apprehensive of the consequences of what is passing in the neighbourhood of Rio de Janeiro." 2 pp.

G. Cressener to William Knox.

1774, Sept. 20. Bonn.—After the lies of the newspapers your letter was like a bright sun dissipating the fogs and mists. Last week I had a visit from Lord Shelbourne and Dr. Priestly. "His lordship displaid his eloquence in favour of the Americans, but I did not find that strong reasoning I expected from him. When the suite of the conversation informed me he was so intimately connected with Beckford and Wilkes, I held him still cheaper, tho' I presume he only served himself of them as tools to bring about what he had in view. He is going to Paris to pick up matter for opposition next session. I hear France intend a very considerable augmentation of their troops; it's said the King has increased the pay of the soldiers. This rather looks war-like; but as I am sure their navy is in very bad order, the bottoms of the ships at Toulon being destroyed by the worms, I should not judge they will break with us, besides it requires time to concert measures and make alliances; and in the present situation of affairs that is not easily brought about. By the peace made with the Turks, Russia will become very formidable. France has in every respect treated that Court very ill; they will resent it when opportunity offers. The Court of Vienna have not behaved better to the Empress of Russia, and she now is convinced she has been the dupe of the King of Prussia. England has effectually assisted her by opening her ports to her ships, both at Port Mahon and Portsmouth, &c.; so as far as gratitude can influence States, we may expect a proper return. I believe the peace has prevented a further division of Poland; that dont please the King of Prussia. I think there is no harmony between us and the Court of Vienna, from which I conclude we are better with the King of Prussia than for some time past, but how can we trust a monarch that is tied by nothing but his interest? . . ." 4 pp.

The Same to the Same.

1774, Nov. 10. Bonn.—". . . The dissolution of the Parliament at a time no one expected it was a master-piece of politicks; the surprize is how the secret could be so well kept; it gives me the highest opinion of the Cabinet Council, and I dare say it will produce the best effects, both at home and abroad. I am sorry to see the contagion spread in America. I fear the force employed is not near sufficient to answer the end proposed if the Bostonians should prefer arms to negociation. . . . The Empress Queen is very angry that her daughter has no more influence on the King. She was desirous the Duke of Choiseul should have been restored to power; the Imperial Ambassador pushed that point, but he miscarried, and thereby he has made the present ministry enemys to his court and shut the door against the man he wanted to introduce. I know the French Ministers in the Empire have orders to oppose the Court of Vienna in everything, and I foresee those courts will hate each other very soon as cordially as they did in 1742.

"The system of France is peace, and it's absolutely necessary to bring about the changes they have at heart. The Pope was twice poisoned. The first worked too slowly for those who desired to put him out of the way; the second was so violent as to put it out of doubt of what he died. He had almost all the Cardinals and the whole Prelature against him, so it's no wonder they shortened his days; however, this will be of no use to the Jesuits, as the Courts of Spain, Portugal and France will exclude such Cardinals as do not engage to finish the work they have begun." 3 pp.

The Same to the Same.

1775, Jan. 30. Bonn.—I confess I feared the government might have been led to temporize, and "thereby encourage the colonies to interpret what was really only humanity and tenderness into fear. . . . You can't believe how different measures would have lessened us in the esteem of every court abroad. I congratulate you on the very wise steps taken, and I rejoyce that the provinces who were so forward in coming into the agreement of non-importation will feel the resentment of their Mother Country by the loss of their commerce. I am persuaded whenever General Gage advances into Boston he will be joined by many of the better sort, it being impossible that men at their ease or of common sense can be pleased with being governed by the rabble. I look on the Bostonians as men in a high fever; bleeding will bring them to their senses, and then they may be reasoned with, a new charter granted, the King's authority restored, and everything settled on a permanent equitable footing. . . .

"The King of Prussia sees with jealous eyes the acquisition the Court of Vienna have made in Moldavia and Valachia. I believe the Turks are not pleased with it. I am sure the Russians have great cause to complain of the Treaty of 1771, and I think no power will chuse to have anything to do with such a court as that of Vienna. The princes of the Empire, particularly Bavaria and Saxony, are alarmed, and, indeed, every court of the Empire has just cause to fear after what they have seen in Poland. The King of Prussia has an army equal in number to the Austrians, superior in discipline; both have greater armys than they can maintain without ruining their subjects; this proves they have something in view. It has been said the King of Prussia was ill and in so bad a way he could not live long, but I have a letter from Dr. Baylies, who was formerly a physician at Bath (and had the Middlesex Hospital), and is now physician to his Prussian Majesty as well as his Privy Counsellor, informing me that His Majesty may live these twenty years. In the present situation of affairs his death would be an evil, the more so if what I hear of his successor is true. The King some time ago sent an officer with a message that displeased the Prince; his R. H. drew his sword and killed him on the spot; on this the King sent a major pour lui donner les assets, who would have shared the same fate with the officer if he had not been on his guard and saved himself by flight, but this is only entre nous; judge what a King he will make with such a fiery disposition." 4 pp.

WILLIAM KNOX to MR. BLACKBURN.

1775, Feb. 15.—A long letter on the subject of the right of Great Britain to tax the American colonies. Copy. 9¼ pp.

J. POWNALL to WILLIAM KNOX, at Spa.

1775, June 2.—After a long dearth of American intelligence we have been alarmed with "a strange, and in many parts unintelligible, account" of an affair between a detachment of the King's troops in Massachusett's Bay and some of the provincials, who, if their account could be believed, proved bolder than was to be expected.

The account (published by an agent of theirs sent on purpose) is, however, so evidently prepared to convey misrepresentation and create alarm that it has had little effect on public credit. It is five days since the relation arrived, and not a scrap of paper has been received from General Gage or anyone else. Something has certainly happened, but it will probably turn out to amount to no more "than that a detachment sent by General Gage to Concord to seize some cannon and destroy some stores effected their purpose, but having been fired at by partys of the provincials from behind trees and houses lost a few men. Be it however what it may, the dye is cast, and more mischief will follow." 2 pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1775, June 13. [London].—"You will find in the inclosed Gazette the real truth of what passed on the 19th of April in North America, and I have only to add that Boston is actually invested by the rebells to the number of 15 or 20,000 men, who menace an attack, which every discerning man here holds cheap. I hope they do so there.

"The terror this event has spread over the rest of North America—I mean in those who are too easily frightened—is the worst part of the story. You will see this effect of it in the enclosed minute of the Council of New York, and you will also see the wretched situation of the King's affairs in that colony, and I dare say you will agree with me in thinking that this intelligence, which arrived soon after our advice from General Gage, is far the most serious and important. The fears of the Council, and the folly of their advice under the influence of them, ruin all our measures and disconcert our whole plan.

"Our meetings of consultation begin to-morrow evening; in a few days you shall hear again."

Postscript—"Governor Leyborne died at St. Vincent the 16th of April." ¾ p.

[THE EARL OF DARTMOUTH] to WILLIAM KNOX.

[1775,] July 3. Monday.—"The ruin threatened to your plantations in Carolina is the strongest reason why you should not relinquish the share you have in the plantations here, and I shall be hardly brought to consent to such an idea till you are able to convince me that you are incapable of giving any assistance to those who must now stand to the burden they have taken upon their shoulders. I dont know what business you had to receive any news from England while you was at Spa; your business was only to drink and drown care and leave anxiety and misery to us, who could not fly from them. Your confident hopes of success have sometimes kept up my spirits when they were beginning to sink; let me now prevail upon you to believe that all will yet do well, notwithstanding the gloom that covers the face of the horizon. The fate of empires often depends upon events that are little foreseen till the moment of their appearance." 1¾ pp.

Henry Ellis to William Knox.

1775, July 18. Spa.—"I heartily rejoice with you upon the particulars transmitted to Mr. Cressener from your Office in reference to the state of our fleet, our successes in India, South Carolina, the Channel, &c. The French here have had advice of the distruction of their fleet of transports, and confess that as yet but four of them have got into their ports. Last night's Paris Gazette contains an exposition of the reasons for the conduct of the Court of Versailles with respect to us. This, in my opinion, is the most extraordinary composition of false and impudent assertions that has ever been obtruded upon mankind. It is mighty easy to impose upon those who have no personal interest to investigate the truth. No nation is more sensible of this observation or profits more from the ignorance and indolence of others than the French. The performance in question appears with that view, and is written with such plausibility and art as may well deceive the multitude.

"It greatly behoves us at present that Europe should have a just idea of the perfidy and ambition of our enemies, which makes me earnestly hope and wish they may be properly and speedily answered. The French and Spanish manifestos have already made unfavourable impressions of us, which would be strengthened and confirmed by our silence.

"Nothing is so easy as to produce a contrary effect; a simple exposition of notorious facts would do it. Our friends expect this from us; our enemies dread it; and our ministers abroad stand in need of it; for how few of them, without ample instruction, have either sufficient knowledge or abilities to detect and refute the false representations and artful reasonings in those papers. Should we reply to them I think a multitude of unquestionable facts may be collected to prove the early steps taken by the French to excite and foment the rebellion in America, and incontestably fix a series of prior agressions on their side.

"The last petition from the Americans intimated an expected aid from that nation. When the troubles broke out, supplies of all sorts were sent out by the French merchants and connived at by the Court, who did the very same from the King's arsenals. The rebell vessels and agents were received and protected in France.

Treatys were made with them, and avowed with menaces by the French Ambassador. A fleet was sent to America with a public minister on board, and orders to commence hostilities there; and this, I apprehend, before any hostile orders were transmitted by us to the East Indies, with which they reproach us. Hostilities in North America and the conquest of Dominica took place before the capture of Pondicherry; and all accounts agree that the first cannon fired upon the ocean hostily were by the French. . . .

"It would be superfluous to meddle with other political subjects in this occasion, as I know Mr. Cressener will omit nothing of that sort, and that besides, he loves writing. All that I have heard of any moment here is a letter received from the Queen of France by the Comtesse Polignac, her favourite, who is at present drinking these waters, which says a force is going or gone against Jamaica." 4 pp.

VISCOUNT CLARE to WILLIAM KNOX, at Whitehall.

1775, July 19. Spa.—The Spanish fleet sail'd for the coast of Algiers on the 26th ultimo, and either is or is to be reinforced with six ships of the line, which will make the number of the line thirteen. Let Lord North know this. The letters I have received point to fairer prospects in America. I hope the storm may blow over. "If, as I am told and hope, two regiments of Canadians are to be raised, and if they are to be officered by Roman Catholicks, why may not some be taken out of the French and other foreign corps who have served with reputation, and who, I dare to say, wou'd be willing, upon very reasonable terms, to enter into the service of their country. Their religion would, I suppose, render them agreeable to the Canadians, and their long experience more useful to us than Canadian officers." Mr. Cullen, now a general in the Dutch service, and who is well acquainted with the disposition of our countrymen in foreign service, is strongly in favour of this measure. "There was not very long since a project for raising some Roman Catholick corps in which he was to be employed, and upon which he was in correspondence with General Conway and Sir Philip Yorke. . . . There is now a general discontent among the Irish in the French army, occasioned by some very hard treatment which they have lately received in the reduction of some regiments and the incorporating of others into one. A spirit of œconomy which has dictated this measure in France, wou'd, I believe, easily induce the French ministry to part with the whole or a great part of what remains. . . . ." 2 pp.

EARL OF DARTMOUTH to WILLIAM KNOX.

1775, Aug. 6. Sandwell.—"I shall say little to you now but that I rather wish than expect a settlement of our differences upon the ground of the terms stated in the article from Philadelphia. However, I see no reason why we may not set our feet upon that or any ground that can be given, and tho' both sides will have a great way to go before they will be within the sound of each other's voice, it is not impossible that they may come near enough to shake hands at last. If they mean to admit of duties for regulation of trade, and will add to that a revenue for the support of civil Government, and such military force as they shall themselves desire to have among them, I think we may soon be agreed. God send that day as soon as may be." 1½ pp.

J. Pownall to William Knox.

1775, Sept. 6.—General Gage's despatches contain literally nothing, but our information through other channels is more important.

"Lt.-Col. James of the Artillery, who brings our letter, is a sensible, intelligent man; he makes but an unfavourable report of the state of our army, diminishing every day by disease, and beginning to lose men by desertion; of the state of the rebells' army, or of their situation and designs, General Gage had no intelligence except what had been collected from a sergeant that deserted from them, and came into General Howe's camp on the 24th of July. His account was that the army besieging Boston did not exceed then alltogether 14,000 men, but that four or five days before, they had sent orders for the minute men of the four New England Governments to attend, which amount to 20,000, and also for all who had leave to go home to return, so that in a very short time they would be 50,000, and that their train of artillery consisted of 92 pieces of cannon. . . . Our army also was preparing for operations, the object of which seems to be to pass Mystick River with about 5,000 men in order to draw the enemy into a general engagement in the open country on that side; but the generals did not think it would succeed, or that even if it did, and victory was the consequence, it would much mend our situation, especially if it was as dear bought as the last.

"To balance the gloomy appearance of the present hour, Providence opens to us a prospect of better things hereafter; for to you I may whisper what ought to be on many accounts, and I hope will be, a profound secret, that we have secured the assistance of 20,000 Russians; an excellent thing, my dear frend, to begin the Session with, on the 26 of October, which is the day fixed for Parliament meeting." 2½ pp.

G. Cressener to William Knox, at Tunbridge.

1775, Sept. 25. Bonn.—". . . I am sorry your estate in Georgia is in so bad hands, but I flatter myself it will not long remain so. All this might have been prevented by more vigorous measures. . . . I should think Montcalm's letters might have convinced our ministers of the views and sentiments of our colonies I am sure their conduct ever since Mr. Grenville's time could leave no doubts of what they aimed at. . . . I rejoice to hear you are firm and united, that our stocks rise, that our manufactorys flourish, that plenty once more reigns, and that the great majority of the nation are desirous of asserting and fixing the dependence of America on Great Britain.

"I am glad General Gage is recalled. I am not better pleased with your Admiral than with your late General. General How is a very good officer; but I should think some lieutenant-general should be nominated if the army is augmented to 50,000 men. I fear you include Canadians and such Americans as may join our troops in that number. The present French system is certainly pacifick. The King of Spain is desirous to be revenged of the Algerians, and I believe he will make use of all force next spring to bring about what he has so much at heart; therefore, we should profit of the next year to finish our quarrel with our rebellious subjects. . . ."

"Postscript—It's amazing the Northern Colonies should have kept their designs so secret for so long a time; it proves our want of intelligence or inattention. I fear the retreat from Boston will be attended with loss and disgrace to our arms." 4 pp.

J. Pownall to William Knox, at Tunbridge Wells.

1775, Oct. 10. [London].—". . . As to measures for America, I know nothing about them, for since I have been deserted by our principal, that business is got into other hands, and my friend Eden knows a great deal more and does a great deal more of the American business than your faithfull servant. In short, my dear friend, our office makes a most pitifull figure and is most thoroughly disgraced by a conduct in Lord North that I cannot understand. Whether this proceeds from any personal dislike to me or from some fascination in Lord Suffolk and his secretary I cant tell; but so it is that I am as ignorant of what is intended, tho' I know a great deal is in agitation, as you are at Tunbridge." 2¼ pp.

Sir Grey Cooper to William Knox.

1776, Jan. 2. Worlington.—"Many thanks to you for your letter, bad as the news was it conveyed. The taking of the Ordnance brig is a most unfortunate and mortifying accident. My accounts say she was seen by the Cerberus man-of-war about the 16th of November, and that the man-of-war, after having put some men on board her, parted with her in a hard gale. If the town of Boston and the cantonments of the army should be burnt by the very carcasses and bombs which were sent for in order to burn Roxburgh and Cambridge, the saints of predestination will have it to say that the Lord hath delivered them into their hands. I see their proclamation for a fast ends with God save the People. The loss of the two companies of the 32nd is another instance of the ill-luck with which this business has been hitherto accompanied. God grant this new year may be more prosperous than the last." 2 pp.

Lord George Germain to William Knox.

1776, April 9. Stoneland Lodge.—Stating that he fancies Lord Dunmore's demands will not, or rather cannot, be immediately complied with, but that if his cruisers are as successful as he relates, it is to be wished he had the command of the fleet, "and then, perhaps, the Delaware river would not be so neglected." Is glad to hear of the safe arrival of the Jane transport ship, and wishes the Speke hospital ship had accompanied her. 1¼ pp.

G. Cressener to William Knox.

1776, April 25. Bonn.—Regrets the delay in the shipping of the Brunswick and Hessian troops from Stade and Bremen, as it gives the rebels more time to prepare for the campaign. Fears Quebec may be besieged in force before the succours can arrive, but finds it is the opinion of military men "that the rebels will not be able to resist such a number of old disciplined troops, let their numbers be what they will. The affair of Corsica and many others make this very probable."

Hears that the King of Prussia is in a fair way of recovery, "appears in publick rides, and has ordered the usual reviews. If he appears at them, it will mortify the Court of Vienna, as they had advice he could not recover, and had taken their measures in consequence. . . It's he and only he who keeps the Imperial Court in awe and preserves the liberty and privileges of the Empire. . . ." 3 pp.

The Same to the Same.

1776, May 27. Bonn.—Sir Robert Keith has been here on his way to Vienna. "He has in some measure removed my fears in regard to Quebec, and given me hopes means will be found of gaining some of the provinces. If we can once break the chain, I hope peace will be restored ere the year is ended." The troops from Ireland and the Brunswickers have had a fair passage, and we may expect the Hessians to arrive at New York in June.

"The report of a treaty, offensive and defensive, between the Courts of Vienna and Petersbourg causes much speculation, and the breaking up of the visitation of the chamber of Wetzlar may produce bad consequences. I was much surprised yesterday to see our stocks fallen two per cent. without any apparent cause. This makes me apprehend a war between Spain and Portugal." 3 pp.

William Knox to Lord [Dartmouth.]

[1776, June 24].—Is informed by the Lieutenant of the Lizard, just arrived from Quebec, that the troops from Ireland arrived there the night he left, May 26, and that on his passage down the river he met the Brunswick troops at anchor at Condre. General Carleton was gone up as high as between the Grenadines and St. Ann's, and had left orders for the transports, store, ships, &c., to press up after him without stopping at Quebec. "Some of the savages who had come down from the party at the Cedres [Cedars] informed him that the whole body of the Western Indians were in motion, and within two or three days' march of the Cedres." Nothing was expected but the total rout of the rebels, who were in the utmost confusion and consternation. 2 pp.

Date given in endorsement only.

Lord George Germain to William Knox.

1776, July 27. Kew Lane.—Has but just received the despatches from the King. Wishes Carleton's letter to be put in the Gazette, and also "the agreement of Capt. Forster about the exchange of prisoners,* as a paper enclosed in the General's letter, as it will show the Indians have not massacred all the prisoners." 1 p.

LORD GEOPGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1776, July 28. Kew Lane.—"I am sorry the Gazette could not do justice to Capt. Forster's good sense and humanity. As the agreement about the prisoners could not appear as part of Gen. Carleton's despatch, it will come awkwardly in on any other day, so that we may leave it quietly in the office. I cannot consent to the smuggling it into the public thro' the channel of any common newspaper. I thought the contents very unexceptionable, as they were the acts of an officer without any orders of his General, adopted from necessity and humanity, and refusing to treat with the rebels upon equal terms, since he took hostages for securing the performance of them. I do not remember any scruple about publishing the capitulation of the garrison of St. John's, a much more exceptionable transaction than this agreement, for you may observe that Arnold does not presume to sign in any rank as an officer, tho' Montgomery did. I am sorry to hear that the rebels are driving our fleet from every part of the coast. If Massie mentions nothing of the Highland transport being taken, we may have some hopes of its being safe." 2 pp.

THE EARL OF DARTMOUTH to WILLIAM KNOX.

1776, July 29. Sandwell.—"I return you many thanks, with my hearty congratulations, and if you have always such news to send, I don't care if you have the trouble of writing to me every post. One great part of my sollicitude, now, is for sundry of my kinsfolk and acquaintance, who are in durance under the power of those, some of whom may, and some may not, be inclined to use them well. I wish you could give me, for the comfort of their nearer relations, some prospect of their release, and now I will keep you no longer; you have enough to read without me; and besides, my hay will be spoiled if it is not got in with all the expedition possible, and my men won't work, if I don't go and look at them." 1 p.

LORD TEMPLE to WILLIAM KNOX.

1776, July 30. Stowe.—Thanks him for sending the Gazette, and hopes that the good news therein contained "is a happy prelude of still more decisive success." ½ p.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1776, Aug. 12. Marble Hill.—Understands that Lord Sandwich has gone to Lord de Despenser's, and desires that the summons for the Cabinet Council may be sent to him there, as his presence will be necessary. ¾ p.

---

* This agreement is printed in Force's American Archives. See also Report on the MSS. of the Royal Institution, vol. i., p. 41.

The Same to the Same.

1776, Aug. 16. Kew Lane.—" . . . By Lord Amherst's letter it appears as if the Ordnance transports were not arm'd in any degree. Pray enquire whether that is the case; if it is, they must have forgotten the letter I sent to the Board in January last, and which I refer to in the enquiry about the loss of the Hope. . . ." 1 p.

The Same to the Same.

1776, Aug. 19. Kew Lane.—" The Ordnance store ships seem but slightly provided with guns, &c. They do not say whether a naval officer is to be received on board each of them." If I remember rightly the Board omitted to insert that condition on a former occasion. I hope it is provided for now. " Something must be said to the Admiralty upon Lord Barrington's suggestions with regard to the ships which carry the cloathing. Mention what you say to be in consequence of a representation from the War Office. No convoys, I should think, can be necessary for Gibraltar." 1 p.

The Same to the Same.

1776, Sept. 1. Kew Lane.—Desires him to send extracts of the Governor of St. Vincent's letter to the Treasury, as there are many points in it worthy of immediate attention. 1 p.

The Same to the Same.

1776, Sept. 13. Kew Lane —" I wish you would enquire at the War Office what transports may be wanted for the business of that department before next spring. . . . I should wish to be empower'd to direct the Admiralty to discharge the transport ships as fast as they arrive. Get me the best information you can from the different offices upon this subject, that I may take the King's pleasure upon it." 2 pp.

The Same to the Same.

1776, Oct. 10. Kew Lane.—" The demand of the Hessian General, as stated by Sir G. Osborne, is warranted by precedent in the last war, and I conclude must be comply'd with. Lord Sandwich desires an extract from Mr. Forster's letter to Mr. Robert Knox, relative to the ships of the Americans loading at Bordeaux". May I trouble you to send the Gazette to the Duke of Dorset at Knole, and to Sir John Irvine and Major-General Cuninghame in Dublin. 1 p.

Lord Hillsborough to William Knox.

1776, Oct. 11. Hill Park.—Thanking him for the Gazette. Is happy in the thought that this " detestable rebellion " will soon be crushed, and languishes for the account of the taking of New York, which event he considers as almost certain. 1 p.

Marquis Townshend to William Knox.

1776, Oct. 19. Rainham.—" . . . The suspense we were in has convinced me that I ought to yield [to] no man in real patriotism," for the critical situation of affairs in America has superseded every private concern in my mind. I guessed that Mr. Howe would lay hold of Long Island, " but doubted whether the enemy would be sufficiently there in force to afford so capital an advantage. It has indeed been taken with great judgment, and executed with a vigor which will unquestionably be followed by the most fortunate effects for the country. When I have the pleasure of seeing you, we may, perhaps, consider ourselves as men of property once more in America." 3 pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1776, Oct. 19. Kew Lane.—" I have made a little alteration in your letter to Mr. Howe, for I could not say I approved of a cartel with rebels, tho' I am glad the prisoners are to be exchanged. . . . Sir James Wright can be of little use at present ; his ideas of military operations are most extraordinary. He gave me a plan for keeping a few oxen in an island, which would employ a fleet. I have another plan for subduing Georgia and S. Carolina, where he desires the alliance and assistance of all the Indians, and only 11,000 regular troops." 2¼ pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1776, Oct. 22. Knole.—Hears from Ireland that a regimental surgeon has arrived there who says that New York was in Howe's possession the 8th of Sept., and that Capt. Gardiner was sent with the news. 1 p.

The SAME to the SAME.

1776, Oct. 23. Kew Lane.—" A thousand thanks for your news. I believe it true, and a most fortunate circumstance that the rebels will collect their force at King's Bridge, tho' I am very certain their numbers cannot amount to 40,000 men. General Lee's attack, or march towards Augustine, is only to be lamented by you and Sir James Wright." 1 p.

J. POWNALL to WILLIAM KNOX.

[1776], Oct. 23. Saturday.—Lieut. Dacres has just arrived, and from him I collect " that Carleton is wholly uninformed of the state of Ticonderoga, or of the rebell army, which some reports make to be no more than 5,000, and others 25,000 ; that after his arrival at Crown Point with the Fleet and the Artillery, he sent orders to the first brigade of the army, consisting of about 3,000 men, under Burgoyne and Philips, to advance over the Lake, and when Dacres came away they were got the length of Pointe au Sable. The main body under Reidhesel remained at Pointe au Fer, St. John's, &c." Burgoyne told Dacres he should be in England as soon as he. 2 pp.

SIR JOHN BLACQUIRE to LORD HARCOURT.

1776, Oct. 28. Greenwich.—Recommending William Knox's brother as agent for the Irish Linen Board in London, on the death of Mr. Ellis, and speaking strongly in praise of Mr. Knox's exertions for Ireland, especially in the case of the Fisheries. 2 pp. Copy.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1776, Oct. 29. Thursday.—Certainly does not wish the convoy to sail without the Ordnance store ships, which he believes are in their passage to Spithead. As to the regiment from Ireland, he cannot take it upon him to delay the whole trade to the West Indies without knowing when to expect it, but imagines that it will arrive in time for the convoy. 1 p.

J. POWNALL to WILLIAM KNOX.

1776, Nov. 13.—". . . Our friend D'Oyley is in business a little like the dog in the manger, which, combined with the indisposition of our chief to take much trouble except in capital leading cases, creates some difficulties, more especially as I am out of the Cabinet in Pall Mall, and therefore not able to do all you wished in domestick matters. However, I shall make shift to manage matters tolerably well till you return."

Postscript.—No letters except one from the Governor of Newfoundland, " who is arrived at Portsmouth, having parted from many fishing ships that came out with him. I fear they will meet with privateers in abundance on the coasts of Spain and Portugal. The rebels have not disturbed the fishing much." 2 pp.

The SAME to the SAME

1776, Dec. 2. Tuesday.—". . . Upon the ground of the intelligence we have of the intention of France to send a squadron of six ships of the line and four frigates to the West Indies, I have induced the consideration of the state of defence of all our islands, which, indeed, became highly necessary, and Lord G. Germain will write a circular and secret letter to our governors on the subject of this armament, which, if it sails, as I am almost confident it will not, will be followed by a British squadron of equal force."

I know not what to say about Grimaldi's resignation or dismission. As a friend to the Choiseul faction his removal has a certain advantage ; on the other hand, I fear his backwardness in some points respecting the Spanish armaments has been the occasion of it. " The packet that carried out Le Maitre is returned with him and his despatches after getting into the gulph. The Union, that carried out MacLean, put back to Halifax in the same situation," and I fear the Richmond will do the same. 3 pp.

CHRIS. D'OYLEY to WILLIAM KNOX.

1776, Dec. 3. Whitehall.—I am glad to hear you intend to stay another week at Bath, though sorry that a cold is the cause. " What business had you in a shower! 'Tis too late for you, my friend, to be playing such tricks. . . .

" Grimaldi is certainly out, but it is by no means decided that his removal will produce any advantage to us." 2 pp.

EARL NUGENT to WILLIAM KNOX.

1776, Dec. 17. Bath.—Rejoicing in the news brought by the Active, that the rebels have been driven from King's Bridge. Signed, "Craggs Nugent." 1 p.

EARL OF HILLSBOROUGH to WILLIAM KNOX.

1776, Dec. 29. Hill Park.—Concerning Knox's health. The letter ends—"Whether I shall ever be a public man again I do not know, nor do I think it of any consequence. I shall always be a well-wisher to the public, and in my private capacity, thank God, I am a very happy man." 1 p.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1776, Dec. 31. Drayton.—Sir Wm. Howe finishes his campaign honourably and advantageously; but I cannot approve of the general pardon from the Commissioners.

"It is poor encouragement for the friends of Government, who have been suffering under the tyranny of the rebels, to see their oppressors without distinction put upon the same footing with themselves. I perceive it strikes Tryon in the same light it does me. This sentimental manner of making war will, I fear, not have the desired effect. I am surprised at Clinton's coming home. Burgoyne will not be sorry to see that he is not the only General, second in command, who takes that liberty without the King's leave." 2 pp.

G. CRESSENER to WILLIAM KNOX.

1777, Jan. 2. Bonn.—Stating that the physician tells him that Mrs. Cressener cannot live more than a few days. 2 pp.

LORD NORTH to WILLIAM KNOX.

[1777, early in]. Monday.—"I do not much like your Gazette, if the paper of intelligence you have sent to me is intended for it. It gives a worse colour to Lord Cornwallis's march and retreat, and to the action between Col. Mawhood and the rebels, than they deserve. I hope this account will not [be] published in its present shape. . . ." 1 p.

Endorsed:—"1776, account of affairs after Trenton."

[But Trenton was not taken until Dec. 26, 1776, and Col. Mawhood's action was in the first week of January, 1677.]

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

[1777], March 12.—The King has been enquiring in what state the Bute * armed ship is. He was informed by General Harvey that she was ready a fortnight ago, but the guards are not yet embarked. As she has the camp necessaries for Howe's army on board, it is very important that she should arrive early in the spring, and his Majesty wishes a letter to be sent to the Admiralty, to know the real state of the ship, and what has occasioned the delay. 1¼ pp.

* For year date, see Report on the MSS. of the Royal Institution, vol. i., p. 90.

G. Cressener to William Knox.

[1777, March].—Concerning the loss of his wife, "the best wife, the best friend, and the most cheerfull, agreeable companion. God rest her soul."

"The loss of the Hessians had very near destroyed me. It was augmented in all the Empire (where the generality are good Americans); they said the rest of the corps had laid down their arms and deserted. Though I know this was false, it still made an impression on a mind ill at ease. . . .

"On this occasion, the Dutch have done us more harm than the French, for they have furnished the rebels with everything necessary for carrying on the war; we had better treated them as enemies than as friends. France, I believe, waits to see the event of this campaign ere they declare themselves; the Vox populi at Paris is War, but the sentiments of the King and his ministers are, I believe, pacifick for the present. Spain has enough to do with Portugal and the rebels in their provinces in America. . . . The Turks are disposed to quarrel with Russia sooner than comply with the conditions of the last Peace in regard to the Crim Tartary. I hear France blows up the fire. However, I think the Russians are in a condition to give the law to the Grand Seigneur. The Courts of Vienna and Berlin are armed, as the French say, jusqu' aux dents; one sword keeps the other in the scabbard. Many events may unsheath them, but as the troops of Prussia exceed those of Austria in number and discipline, and as the confusion and discontent in Bohemia rather increases, I think the Empress Queen will avoid a war as much as she can and as long as she lives." 4 pp.

Lord George Germain to William Knox.

1777, April 2. Stoneland Lodge.—"I am sorry Burgoyne cannot avail himself of this fine wind. . . . I didn't know two winds were necessary at Plymouth before they could put to sea. . .

"Sir Robert Fletcher's letter is the strongest attack upon Lord Pigot I have yet seen, and his lordship's behaviour to the Nabob gives the Council full right to represent and protest against that part of his conduct. But I am yet to learn how the Council at Bengal can approve of the deposing and imprisoning a Governor upon the accusations laid against Lord Pigot. I hope the Directors will immediately send Mr. Rumbold to Madrass to prevent this new kind of rebellion.

"Your news from Portugal is most pleasing, and I should hope Spain will now renew their negotiations, and that a war in Europe may be prevented. If that should be the case, we shall soon see whether France means to break with us on account of America. If her naval armaments continue, I shall have no doubt of her bad intentions. At present the strange conduct of Portugal may give a fair pretext for having a formidable fleet ready to act upon any emergency." 3 pp.

The Same to the Same.

1777, May 22. Drayton.—I am sorry the Bristol is not yet ready, but suspect she will be hurried as soon as the transport with the Guards arrives at Spithead. "I have always observed that the Admiralty can be expeditious when the King is inquisitive or anxious about their preparations." Capt. Sinclair may certainly go in the packet, and I should think with more convenience to himself than to be the unwelcome guest in a man-of-war. You had better write a line to Sir Wm. Howe in his favour.

"I shall rejoice to hear that Lord North explains the rum contract to the satisfaction of the House, but as I am already persuaded that Mr. Atkinson made a bad bargain for himself, I shall not lament my being absent upon that occasion." 2½ pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1777, June 11. Stoneland Lodge.—"I conclude you have by this time settled what will be the consequence of the success of the Spaniards in the Brasils. Had M. de Pombal continued minister, every advantage would have been taken by Spain, and the Portuguese must have been demolished before England could have interpos'd. As it is, the King of Spain, with appearance of family affection, will dictate his own terms to his niece, and we shall have the satisfaction of seeing Portugal acceed to the family compact."

I hope that Balfour will have convinced Sir Wm. Howe that he distresses us "by not communicating his ideas more frequently and more explicitly." 2 pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1777, June 13. Stoneland Lodge.—As regards the Admiralty and the Letters of Marque, "Lord Sandwich will have one more battle in Cabinet before he agrees to the delegating his powers to the Governors. He disputed as long as possible about the legality of the act, and when the other lords said that might easily be put out of doubt by sending for the opinion of the Attorney, &c., and all inclined that the power should be granted, he ended by saying that, if it was legal, much might be said as to the policy of the measure which could only come under consideration when the point of law was settled. I think, however, that the next conversation we hold upon this subject, the affair will be put upon the right footing; in the meanwhile, I wish you would apprise Lord North that the Attorney and Sollicitor have given their opinion in the manner I suspected they would."

The share the captors have had granted to them should be made public by inserting it in the newspapers, "and foreign papers might be desired to copy that article as they do many others of much less importance." 3 pp.

The SAME to the SAME

1777, June 15. Stoneland Lodge.—". . . I hope Lord Suffolk guesses right about the effect the Attorney and Sollicitor-General's opinion will have in the Islands; I mean as far as encouraging the inhabitants to make prize of the ships of the rebels whenever they can sieze them. My motive for publishing that law opinion was to convince the King's loyal subjects that the Admiral had been too precipitate in treating them as pirates. . . . I perceived there was no haste in granting any effectual relief ; I was resolved to give them some hopes that their situation would be considered ; and I am certain the letter was sufficiently guarded, and directly pointed out to the Governors that they were not authoriz'd to grant Letters of Marque. The Sollicitor-General proved sufficiently that Letters of Marque would be much more desirable than the present mode of seizing ships for the disposal of the Crown. I hope Lord North will soon settle what ought to be done. . . . Lord Sandwich may not think himself call'd upon to remind him of it, tho' I flatter myself the letter I wrote to the Governors may induce the Admiralty to give some instructions to Admiral Young.

"Lord Howe is the most disinterested man I know, in permitting the trade of Charlestown to be carry'd on without interruption, when he might avail himself of so many rich prizes." 4 pp.

The Same to the Same.

1777, June 23. Stoneland Lodge.—"If the Board of Ordnance think Mr. Cleveland's demand necessary, they will, of course, apply for the order. . . . If the ship is not immediately taken up, no stores will arrive at New Yorke till next spring. If this additional demand is necessary, the detaining of the present store ships will have ruined the campaign.

"The permitting Cunninghame to arm another privateer at Dunkirk is such an insolence (if true) that I do not see how the Ministry can avoid taking serious notice of it." 1 p.

The Same to the Same.

1777, June 24. Stoneland Lodge.—"I cannot guess by Sir Wm Howe's letter when he will begin his operations, or where he proposes carrying them on. His saying that Lord Cornwallis is obliged to use the old camp equipage, the new not being yet arrived, inclines me to think that he may wait for the Isis before he takes the field in force. Sir G. Osborn's letter is very alarming, such a sickness among the best of the Hessian troops is dreadful, as we cannot repair the loss of those that die. I hope the New York Gazette gives us in general true accounts, but I am sorry to see such falshoods inserted with regard to the expected reinforcements. I wonder those who inspect the paper do not prevent such notorious blunders, as it must bring discredit upon the rest of the intelligence I do not understand why Sir G. Carleton sends a part of his force to Crown Point so early as the beginning of May if Sir Wm. Howe's intelligence is right, that he does not propose being upon the Lakes himself till the beginning of June. I incline to hope that his preparations are in greater forwardness ; if they are not, Burgoyne's arrival may cause him to change his dispositions and create a delay. The New Yorke paper mentions the alarm at Ticonderoga upon the supposition of Carleton's arrival. If it is only an advanced party it is giving the rebels time to prepare for his reception. I shall be glad of an opportunity of applauding the General's conduct this campaign." 3 pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1777, June 24. Stoneland Lodge.—Be so good as to lay the enclosed papers before Lord Weymouth and the Admiralty.

"I hope this fair wind will carry out the powers of granting Letters of Marque to the respective Governors; that will be the best remedy to these complaints. . . . Lord Stormont will have frequent occasion to trouble Mr. Vergennes with our complaints, and he will, I fear, get nothing but fair words instead of redress." 1½ pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1777, June 27.—The Comte Grabowski [Gaborowsky], a Polish Colonel, aide de camp to the King, is going to America. Will you write a line in my name to Lord Howe, to say he has his Majesty's leave to serve as a volunteer?

"The King wishes to know if there can, from enquiry, be any distinction made between Mr. Petrie, Mr. Lincoln and Mr. P. Campbell, for Lieut.-Governor of Tobago. He inclines to give it to Campbell, as senior, but is open to give it either of the others."

Postscript.—No orders relative to the Percy letters. 1 p.

The SAME to the SAME.

1777, July 1. Stoneland Lodge.—". . . As Burgoyne went up towards the Lakes in May, I flatter myself that he will be in action by the middle of June. I shall wait with impatience for Carleton's despatches. I do not wonder he is displeased at receiving such particular directions from hence, as he must see they proceed from the inactivity of the last campaign. I do not see why you might not say something civil to Tryon, as he commanded a successfull expedition, and as Sir William Howe returned thanks to the officers, &c., for their behaviour. The General's silence in his last letter is remarkable, but I should hope he is not dissatisfied with Governor Tryon's conduct. . . ." 2 pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to [SIR GUY CARLETON].

1777, July 10.—"The very extraordinary manner in which you express yourself upon the measures which his Majesty thought proper to adopt with regard to the different operations in Canada must have arisen from your supposing that such measures had been taken upon no better authority than my advice and suggestion.

"Affairs of such importance receive the fullest consideration from his Majesty's principal servants, and they are then submitted, with their humble opinion, to the King, who, after mature deliberation, gives such commands upon them as his Majesty judges most proper. The executing such orders belongs to my department, and if the manner of conveying them is improper, I stand alone responsible for it. The last letter, however, relating to General Burgoyne's taking the command of the troops, and to the disposition of the forces in Canada, however displeasing it may have been to you, was particularly directed by the King, after his Majesty had taken into consideration every information which could be furnished from the Secretary's office, or from the report of Gen. Burgoyne, so that all my business consisted in putting his Majesty's commands into the form of a dispatch; but I must add that there was not a part of it which I did not think most wisely calculated for the publick service.

"Since I have had the honor of being in office, his Majesty has uniformly declared his intentions that as he had appointed two commanders in chief by commission under the Great Seal for different provinces, that they should not interfere with each other. Had that not been originally his Majesty's pleasure it would have been impossible you could have commanded the army in which Sir William Howe served from the time it was judged necessary to appoint only my Lord and Sir William Howe his Majesty's Commissioners.

"It would ill become my situation to enter into an ill-humoured altercation with you upon various parts of your letters relating to the operations of the last campaign; all I shall say is, that every possible exertion was made here to supply you with such a force as we flatter'd ourselves would have been sufficient not only for recovering the province of Canada, but for enabling you to assist Sir William Howe in his operations by sending part of your army to penetrate as far as Albany. The expectation of such success was not the result of idle conjecture, but was encouraged by the opinion of many officers who had served in that country; and, indeed, if the intelligence we have since received be true, the rebels intended to have abandoned their post at Ticonderoga had you marched your army towards it.

"I must now assure you that whatever reports you may have heard of my having any personal dislike to you are without the least foundation. I never had any disobligation to you, and if I had look'd upon you as my greatest enemy I should, in the situation you stood in, have given you every assistance in my power which could have contributed to your honor and success; a contrary conduct would be repugnant to those principles upon which I shall ever act, but could I have been so mean as to have been influenced by private pique or resentment, my duty to the King and the interest I must feel in the suppression of this rebellion, ought to have convinced you that your suspicions were unjust and ill-grounded. I cannot finish this subject without expressing my astonishment at your supposing that I could descend so low as to encourage faction and cabal in your Government. I trust that you did not so lightly give credit to intelligence when you were to decide upon measures relating to the publick service." Draft. 4 pp.

Endorsed with date, and also :—"This was shewed to the King and approved by H.M."

Lord George Germain to William Knox.

1777, July 27. Stoneland Lodge.—"I thank you for the embarkation returns; if that army is not able to defeat any force the rebels can oppose to it we must give up the contest. If I had not been so often mistaken in my conjectures about the military operations in America, I should say that the transports going to Rhode Island were to be employed in carrying on some expedition in that part of the world. As the best troops of New England are sent to Ticonderoga, what should prevent the attack of some of the ports adjacent to Rhode Island ?"

I think it will be better to send out the clothing in the early spring than to begin preparations now, and I hope Gen. Harvey will let us know what is wanted, that the Admiralty may have timely notice from my office for providing the ships early in February. 2 pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1777, Aug. 2. Kew Lane.—The safe arrival of so many ships gives me great satisfaction ; I feared that some of the victualling ones at least would have been intercepted. If the news from Ticonderoga proves true, we may expect a glorious campaign there. "I wish the merchant who mentions the surrounding the Fort may mean the investing it in such a manner as may prevent the garrison from evacuating it when it can be no longer defended." 2 pp.

HENRY ELLIS to WILLIAM KNOX.

1777, Aug. 4. Spa.—". . . I wish for my own sake, for yours, and for the sake of the public that you had had something more comfortable to communicate ; but still I am not discouraged with the present appearances, unfavourable as they seem ; for I think I can account for and even justify General How's measures, provided my information is founded. I had heard, from pretty good authority, that his intention was always to transport his army by sea to Pensilvenia, and to land it on the shore of Chesapic Bay, in order to avoid a long march by land, which could not but be extremely hazardous in the face of an army, at least in numbers equal to his own. We have also been told that a body of our troops have been sent southward, probably to land where the General himself intends to carry the grand army. Should these facts be true, the motives of General How's conduct are evident. By seeming determined to march thro' the Jerseys, he has obliged Washington to collect and retain the principal part of the rebel army there, whereby no considerable body of troops could be detached either to obstruct the landing of the troops sent southward or the army from Canada, which must have surmounted the principal difficulties before How changed the direction of his operations. . . . We have many politicians here at present whose eyes are turned towards us. I have many a battle to fight with prejudice and ignorance, which, altho' I often silence and confound, I cannot conquer. I have much discussion, too, with Messrs. Stanley and Jenkinson, with whom I am upon the most friendly terms imaginable, but I find neither of them know so much or judge so well as yourself. . . ." 4 pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1777, Aug. 8. Kew Lane.—I see no objection to the list of stores if the Treasury will advance the money for such as the troops will repay. I spoke to Lord North about it, who said the practice was new, but he would have it taken into consideration. Tell Gen. Harvey this, and that I have also given a memorandum to Lord Suffolk about the Hessian clothing, &c. "I think your letter to Morris is too strong, and I have left out a part of it, which I hope you will not disapprove." 1½ pp.

The Same to the Same.

1777, Aug. 12. Kew Lane.—"I thank you for your invitation to the turtle, but as I do not care to be robb'd in returning hither at night I hope you will excuse my being of the party."

I think the island of St. John's, if not taken more care of, had better be given up entirely; "the precarious protection of a cruiser can be no encouragement to the inhabitants to improve that country."

I know nothing of Sir Basil Keith's death; when I know the fact I shall hear what the King thinks about a successor, but in your state of health I should not wish to see you the object of his choice. "What you could mean by offering yourself to be one of the commissioners to go to Madras I never could understand. Such climates must be immediate destruction to you." 2 pp.

Henry Ellis to William Knox.

1777, Aug. 13. Spa.—Your good news is very acceptable; I have imparted it to Mr. Cressener and Mr. Tisdall. This place is excessively crowded. "You would think all Ireland had flown from their country to drink the waters. The English are but few; but we expect an after crop of them soon." I have had much pleasant intercourse with Mr. Rice, Mr. Jenkinson, and Mr. Stanley. This last leaves to-morrow, but I shall be here until the end of the month. Before that time I hope we shall see the extraordinary Gazette you predict, but dare not depend upon it, "for nothing is more true than what Voltaire so frequently repeats in his works, that 'le probable n'arrive presque jamais.'" 3 pp.

Lord George Germain to William Knox.

1777, Aug. 16.—". . . The intelligence from the Missisippi is very disagreeable, but no representations can be made officially till we hear from Governor Chester. But if we write to Pensocola, he should be directed to enquire into this report, and, if true, make the strongest representation for satisfaction to the Spanish Governor." 1 p.

The Same to the Same.

1777, Aug. 17. Kew Lane.—Col. Ogilvie has been here, and I sent him to the King. He hopes Sir Wm. Howe is going to Boston, and not to the southward, but everything is kept a profound secret. Ticonderoga, he hears, from one who saw Burgoyne's express to Howe, is taken, and Burgoyne pushing forward. "Prescot is again prisoner, surprised in his bed at Rhode Island. Pigot sent to take the command there. Clinton arrived and commands at New York.

Capt. Finch of the Guards kill'd in an attack upon one of Washington's posts, in which the rebels were beaten and lost three pieces of brass cannon." 1½ pp.

LORD WESTCOTE * to WILLIAM KNOX.

1777, Aug. 17. Hagley.—Regretting that he will not be able to partake of the turtle and malmsey, and hoping that when Knox has time to play truant he will come down and taste the lampreys and venison of their country. 2 pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1777, Aug. 19.—" All I know of the hospitals of the foreign troops is that they are separate from ours, because the officers commanding those troops insisted upon their own surgeons having the care of them. Sir Wm. Howe has always assigned them the most convenient houses for their sick, and as to the Anspach troops, those that were wounded (in the skirmish where Capt. Finch was killed) were order'd to the English hospital, their own not being then ready. I am persuaded there will be no objection to take all the sick of the Anspach troops into our hospital if the Margrave approves of it. Capt. Loftus does not believe Capt. Loring's history of Ticonderoga, as he, Capt. Loftus, was in New York since Loring saw his brother, the Commissary."

Postscript.—" The exchange of prisoners seems to depend on Lee's release. I wish the rebels had him, provided we had Col. Campbell, &c., &c., &c." 2 pp.

EARL OF DARTMOUTH to WILLIAM KNOX.

1777, Aug. 20. Sandwell.—I am heartily obliged to you for your intelligence, though the joy it gives me is much alloyed by the death of Capt. Finch and the capture of Gen. Prescott, whose sufferings, I am afraid, will not be light.

" What have you been about that you have suffered the Treasury to overlook a claimant whose pretensions have been fully laid before them ? If they do not include you in the herd of sufferers it must be because they mean to distinguish you in a way that others are not entitled to expect." 1 p.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1777, Aug. 22. Stoneland Lodge.—I think we should relate what Sir William Howe says of his intelligence from the Canada army, and Burgoyne's letter to him should also be in the Gazette. If we are silent concerning Ticonderoga it will alarm, as Capt. Loring has given so particular a detail of what he believes passed there, and as Sir William Howe believes it to be in Burgoyne's hands, it will give some satisfaction to the public.

I hoped our letters would have given us some reason why the campaign began so late, but we are to remain in ignorance.

---

* William Henry Lyttelton. Created Baron Westcote (Ireland) in 1776 and Lord Lyttelton in 1794.

The King's letters, dated 55 m. past 4, have only just come at 20 m. past 7. "I wish the messengers for the future would take places in the stage coach when they are too fat to ride above five miles an hour." 2 pp.

The Same to the Same.

1777, Aug. 22. Kew Lane.—It occurs to me that it will have a bad effect if we say nothing of the taking of General Prescot. The fact is too well known to be concealed, and the account given by Brigadier Smith has nothing in it improper for publication. "If there is anybody in town you can advise with, I wish you would ask what their opinion is; as for me, I am always for telling as much as can be done with propriety." 1 p.

The Same to the Same.

1777, Aug. 29. Kew Lane.—General Haldimand readily accepts the government of Quebec, &c., and hopes to be here the first week of September. Will you be so good as to order what is necessary for his appointment that we may send him out this year if any ship goes to Canada, or he might go to New York, trusting to the Hudson River and Lakes being free for his passage. 1 p.

The Same to the Same.

1777, Sept. 1. Kew Lane.—As regards the French contracts, I fear nothing can be done without a general embargo. "As long as the merchants can clear out for England they will certainly carry their provisions to the best market. I am not surprised that the Virginia ships know nothing of Sir William Howe's army. I hope their intelligence about Burgoyne has no foundation. If they would not date their reports they would gain more credit. . . . You perceive how disinterested Lord Howe's cruisers are, since they permit such rich prizes to pass unmolested." 1¾ pp.

Endorsed:—"Irish provisions."

Henry Ellis to William Knox.

1777, Sept. 4. Spa.—Your intelligence is always the earliest and most circumstantial of any received here. Mr. Jenkinson's was generally a post later, which I think touched his pride a little, "for if I mistake him not he is not displeased to be thought a principal mover, or at least to be in the inmost secrets of government." I always imparted first to him what information you sent me, telling him I had your particular direction to do so. "This flattered him, and was useful in supporting the idea he seemed to wish should be entertained of him." He leaves Spa to-morrow. Mr. Tisdall is still here. I doubt much of his complete recovery, and he certainly ought to pass the winter in the South, but he is determined to reach Dublin by a certain day. I am much pleased with the activity of Gen. Burgoyne and with the ardour and intrepidity of the troops under his command. We regret the escape of the Ticonderoga garrison, but perhaps they may be reserved to grace another triumph.

People here are greatly puzzled by General Howe's conduct, but if he can get between Washington and his magazines, by possessing himself of Philadelphia, his last motion will have decisive consequences. Washington "cannot then move northward to obstruct Gen. Burgoyne, and in going south he must meet the Royal Army under great disadvantages. Meanwhile, it were much to be wished that some attempts were made to destroy Boston and the other nests of privateers on the New England coast, which annoy our commerce so prodigiously." 4 pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1777, Sept. 6. Stoneland Lodge.—"I wish you would enquire at the Admiralty whether any ship of force is to be or can be sent to Quebec this year, as the King is very desirous that General Haldimand should, if possible, take possession of that Government immediately. I must also beg the favour of you to inform the General of the state of that country and of its civil constitution. He has had no experience of the Canadians since the passing of the Quebec Bill; he lived and commanded some years among them before they were taught to be bad subjects." ¾ p.

The SAME to the SAME.

1777, Sept. 19. Kew Lane.—". . . I understood a convoy was now ready to sail for New York. . . . The number of guns and seamen, with the assistance of the soldiers, may make a good defence against a privateer; but there is a little article at the bottom of the paper which I do not like—that the desertion of seamen may occasion some little variation in the numbers mentioned. That circumstance may serve for an excuse of sending the ships out very short of men. It is certainly to be wished that they should all sail with convoy; if that cannot be done, their safety must depend upon the character of the person who commands, for, indeed, I think the force sufficient if properly conducted. I like the letter to Sir G. Carleton very well in general. I had rather not have said that the information which Haldimand was to receive could not fail of being of the greatest use in the conduct of his Administration. As I do not believe a word of that sentence, you must absolve me from the crime of signing what I do not think true." 3 pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1777, Sept. 20. Kew Lane.—"You will see the King's orders about the ship bringing Haldimand back to England if he should fail in his attempt of reaching Quebec. Pray hurry the Ordnance ships if possible, that they may not miss this very fair wind. It is impossible for me to order the stores to Chesapeak Bay, as most people differ with you and me about Sir William Howe's destination. I am still persuaded he will attack Philadelphia from that side." 1 p.

The Same to the Same.

1777, Sept. 25. Kew Lane.—" The King has read the despatches, and approves highly of Burgoyne's conduct." Sir Guy Carleton wants the power of issuing Letters of Marque ; perhaps Haldimand may carry them out with him. Burgoyne's letter will do well for the Gazette. 1 p.

The Same to the Same.

1777, Sept. 29. Kew Lane.—" . . . The story of Sir William Howe is so strange, and comes in so extraordinary a way, that little credit can be given to it, yet I should think Philadelphia must be in possession of our army by the 26th of August if the General had not changed his plan of operations. . . .

" I am sorry the Canada army will be disappointed in the junction they expect with Sir William Howe, but the more honour for Burgoyne if he does the business without any assistance from New York." 2½ pp.

Lord North to William Knox.

1777, Oct. 7. Bushy Park.—" I return you my best thanks for your intelligence ; it is good in itself, and, I hope, promises better. By all the attacks of the rebels on Staten and Long Island, they seem to shew a degree of activity, upon which I hope we shall improve with better success, as, I dare say, what our troops attempt will be executed with more resolution. Your conjecture about Sir William Howe's army is verified. It has appear'd, as you expected, in Chesapeak Bay. I am neither soldier enough or well enough acquainted with the country to reason upon the situation of the army, but it seems to me that if Sir Henry Clinton and General Burgoyne make themselves masters of the North River, and Sir William Howe cuts off Washington from the Southern Provinces, Washington must, after a little time, be reduced to fight or disband his army. In either case I flatter myself that the war seems to be taking a more decisive turn than I thought a little while ago." 2 pp.

Lord George Germain to William Knox.

1777, Oct. 7. Kew Lane.—" The King has seen Mr. Watson's letter, and is pleased with the contents, but he cannot believe that Burgoyne is advanced so far. I differ with his Majesty, for I think Clinton's preparing to march gives authenticity to that part of the report. If the repulse of the rebels from Staten Island should prove true, and that their loss was as great as represented, I should hope another body of troops would not easily be collected, and then Clinton may act offensively. The landing at Baltimore will create a terrible alarm in that part of the continent, I believe. Maryland has never felt the miserys of war. . . ." 1½ pp.

The Same to the Same.

1777, Oct. 9. Kew Lane.—" I am sorry for Haldimand's disappointment, but I could not expect he would reach Quebec this year.

I fear Sir G. Carleton will do nothing but scold all the winter. . . . Washington's army cannot exceed the number you mention, but you may depend upon it he will not fight with the King's troops." 1 p.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1777, Oct. 31. Drayton.—"I am sorry to find that Burgoyne's campaign is so totally ruined; the best wish I can form is that he may have returned to Ticonderoga without much loss. His private letter to me, being dated the 20th of August, contains nothing material about the affair near Bennington but military reasoning about the propriety of that attack; but what alarms me most is that he thinks his orders to go to Albany to force a junction with Sir William Howe are so positive that he must attempt at all events the obeying them, tho' at the same time he acquaints me that Sir William Howe has sent him word that he was gone to Philadelphia, and indeed nothing that Sir William says could give him reason to hope that any effort would be made in his favor. This action of the 19th of September, as McClean represents it, can have no material consequences farther than it may enable General Burgoyne to retreat to the Lakes; had he lost the field of battle, his whole army would have been destroyed. The communication between this country and Canada being now shut, we can neither send instructions nor reinforcements. I conclude nothing will be put into the Gazette to-morrow relating to this business unless Lord North should think it necessary. . . ." 3 pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1777, Nov. 3. Thursday night.—"The King approves of the drafts to Gen. Burgoyne. He started at the foreign being mentioned before the British, so I have alter'd it as he liked it, according to his own words. He said hearty would not have done, highest approbation was the proper expression from him. He spoke to me about the packet boats; he order'd me to represent the bad state of them to the Post Office. . . . You will be so good as to prepare a proper letter to the Post Masters." 1 p.

The SAME to the SAME.

1777, Nov. 5. Pall Mall.—Lord Stormont has made repeated complaints of the protection given to the rebel privateers. The two Jamaica ships are to be restored to the owners. Admiral Montagu has taken three rich Carolina ships, and the ship of the line, sent to Newfoundland, in her passage took a rebel privateer of 24 guns. 1¼ pp.

VISCOUNT TOWNSHEND to WILLIAM KNOX.

1777, Nov. 5. Rainham.—"I thank you for your last Gazette. It left me, however, in some pain for Burgoigne, and wishing he had had something on the Connecticut to have restrain'd those bandetti from inquieting his left and his communications.

"A retrograde motion for want of this, at a late season, may be very delicate; however, the decisive stroke I hear Sir William Howe has struck will, I hope, be followed by so general a dismay that Burgoigne's progress will be clear. . . . If this general and decisive action has taken place, it may require some ingenuity to prove that General Washington was a Fabius, either cunctando or restituendo, or that Lord Sandwich told a lie when he said the Americans would never meet our people in fair conflict. . . I will pay you no compliments on all this, but you shall have some pheasants." 3 pp.

J. Pownall to William Knox.

[1777], Nov. 11. Monday.—Nothing material has come into this office but a short letter from Arbuthnot, of Oct. 8, saying that during the absence of the King's ships the rebels' privateers infested that coast, and did a great deal of mischief, but they all disappeared upon Sir G. Collier's arrival. Also letters from Lord Maccartney, "representing the defenceless state of his Government, which indeed is a lamentable one." 3 pp.

Viscount Townshend to William Knox.

1777, Dec. 29. Rainham.—Though your news has not answered my hopes, yet I can feel for the sufferings of those in office, and "instead of cursing them and immediately imputing all our misfortunes to them (as the ignorant do with witches, whenever their crops are bad, or they have the rheumatism, or their children the worms), three of the fattest pheasants killed this day are to be delivered at your office. Partridge we have none. Would it had been a day of carousal. For such I hoped by this time at Rainham. . . . If bad news should come from Sir William Howe or New York, a strait waistcoat will suit me better than my robes.

"My son may think himself a patriot, but he may find himself an antient peer in a little Kingdom." 3 pp.

The Same to the Same.

[1777].—". . . The marches I see by the New York Gazette backwards and forwards of Sullivan across the Jersys must be very severe on his people, but the resolutions of the Congress of recalling all their generals in their army against Burgoyne, and their recalling that order and leaving them to fight with halters round their necks, is very amusing, and must speak very plainly their situation to their own people as well as the whole world. . . ." 2¼ pp.

Lord George Germain to William Knox.

1778, Jan. 16. Knole.*—"There was no great hurry for the messenger; I only had a desire of writing to Lord Suffolk, hoping that if my necessary absence from the Office or Parliament should be prejudicial to publick business, that no personal consideration for me should prevent the Seals being put into other hands; for I really feel so little able to return to the business with the activity that our present situation requires that I should act unfairly by those with whom I have served if I did not wish and advise their adopting the best measures for the publick service. I do forsee there may be difficulties in prevailing upon any proper person to undertake so responsible an office in such times; all I can say to that is, that when I came in there was as little appearance of success, and as I never had any view but the giving every assistance in my power, so that if my being permitted to retire answers any publick end I shall rejoice in having proposed it. A man at my time of life, depress'd by misfortunes, will make but a bad figure in an office that requires full vigor of mind, activity and diligence. I can not expect anything good from New York; if Sir William Howe had met with success, it would have found a shorter road to us. I hope Lord Suffolk will want no explanation of the papers which you will not be able to give him." 2½ pp.

* Written the day after the death of his wife. Lord Suffolk's letter, refusing to accept his resignation, will be found in the Report on the Stopford-Sackville Papers, 8vo edition, vol. ii., under date Jan. 20, 1779.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL [THURLOW] to WILLIAM KNOX.

1778, Jan. 20.—Asking if he may be allowed to see the two précis of the operations of 1776 and 1777, which Mr. Knox mentioned, drawn up by himself, "as he can expect nowhere else so clear a view of the whole subject." 1 p.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1778, Jan. 23. Knole.—"I am obliged to you for the care you take of the office without sending any papers to me. I am glad the Attorney-General informs himself so fully of the Canada business; as to the measure of carrying on the war from that quarter, it was the opinion of every officer and of every American I ever convers'd with that an attack from Canada was the only method of crushing the Rebellion and of bringing the New England Provinces to their senses. Whether the force was adequate, or that force properly conducted, were, I thought, the great objects of enquiry. What papers may be asked for, or what Lord North may give, I know not; but for my own part I should wish to come soon to a decision, for nothing is so disagreeable as to have enquiries of this sort hanging over the heads of Administration. I see no use in my being in town till I can act in business, and I really cannot hitherto bring myself to undertake it. I propose being in town on Tuesday, and I will then do the best I can. If I find myself unequal to the dutys of my office, I trust I shall be relieved from it, for I shall be hurt to the greatest degree if the publick business suffers by my being in a state of mind which renders me too inactive and unfit for the office I now hold." 2 pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1778, Jan. 25.—I shall be in town to-morrow, Monday, instead of Tuesday, as Sir John Irvine tells me that "Lord North did not chuse to consent to the papers from my office being laid before the House till I had been acquainted with the particulars of the motion." 1 p.

LORD TEMPLE to WILLIAM KNOX.

1778, Feb. 12. Pall Mall.—Stating that Lady Mary Duncan is unwilling to accept Mr. Knox's plan, but that, when the division is made, it may be adopted for "the Grenville shares." ½ p.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1778, Feb. 18. Pall Mall.—"The Cabinet thinks no time should be lost in sending the dispatches to New Yorke by the Andromeda, and you will desire the directions of the Admiralty to Commodore Hotham to forward the letters as soon as possible to Lord Howe and Sir William Howe. Sir William Howe will have one of the circulars as Commander-in-Chief; I suppose that directed to the Commissioners will be sent to Lord Howe. Tryon and Sir Henry Clinton will likewise have copies of the Bills sent to them. . . .

"The lords have advised some little alterations in the two drafts, and they think that some general intimation of the plan of the campaign should be given to Sir William Howe. I think it might come in at the end of the draft to him, by saying that as we may not be able to send early in the spring any large reinforcement of troops, to enable him to act offensively at any distance from the coast, yet his Majesty wishes that such a detachment may be made from his army which, in conjunction with the fleet, might be able to attack the ports of the rebels in the Connecticut, Massachusets Bay, or New Hampshire, and destroy the ships of war and privateers which have so greatly annoyed the trade of this Kingdom. I do not mean to confine you to my words; I only mention the purport of what the lords wished might be added." 2½ pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1778, April 19. Stoneland Lodge.—Is happy that there is "nothing bad" from Philadelphia. Has long been without hopes of hearing good news from America. 1½ pp.

HENRY ELLIS to WILLIAM KNOX.

1778, May 15. Spa.—I have been very ill with fever and dysentery, and called in three physicians "to avoid the reproach of having died to save the fees. They were contradictory and apparently ignorant; I knew my own case, prescribed, and cured myself in a few days." I am very miserable about public affairs. "I cannot blame the intentions of our ministers, nor excuse their measures, which appear to me to have been extremely unwise and improvident." I could never, when in the south of France, learn certainly the destination of the Toulon fleet, but the general idea was that it was bound to the Delaware, to block up or destroy our ships there, and thus reduce General Howe to General Burgoyne's condition. We here can form no favourable opinion of the event of the embassy to America. Could no abler men be found to conduct a business of such moment? I could question a multitude of ministerial proceedings, which seem to pass all understanding. 4 pp.

LORD CHANCELLOR BATHURST to WILLIAM KNOX.

[1778, May 30 ?] Saturday, 12 o'clock.—Requesting Mr. Knox to lend him the letter from Sir William Howe of October 22, wherein he desires his Majesty's permission to quit his command. ½ p. Seal, with monogram and coronet.

Noted by Knox :—" The day Lord Bathurst notified his intention to quit the Cabinet." *

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1778, June 29. Stoneland Lodge.—" I see no alteration necessary in the letter to Sir H. Clinton. You have given proper credit to the conduct of the officers and troops employed in destroying the ships of the rebels, and I hope they will perceive that we have the power of distressing them, whenever our commanders please to exert the force which is under their command. . . .

" You are very severe upon the poor Ministers who are breathing the country air to enable them to eat a good dinner on Thursday, and to consult upon the momentous affairs of State." 2 pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1778, July 5. Stoneland Lodge.—" I cannot say I have much fear about Halifax till after Mr. D'Estaign has been at Boston, and if Admiral Byron should arrive at New Yorke in a short time, after the junction of the French with the rebel fleet, I shall not despair of an engagement at sea to our advantage. I long to hear of Mr. Keppel's return to Brest, and if ever I am concern'd in drawing instructions for Naval operations I will strike St. Helens out of my Dictionary.

" Cressener's news seems so probable that I give full credit to it, and when war once begins upon the Continent we may hope France can not keep out of the scrape. . . . If your weather is as hot in London as it is here, the Lord have mercy upon you." 2½ pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1778, July 23. Stoneland Lodge.—" The Commissioners' letter and Mr. Johnston's protest are a melancholy beginning of our negotiations with America. I can not say I expected much good from that quarter, but the Commissioners begin by taking care of themselves in laying the blame upon Administration, and will soon declare that peace would have been settled had Philadelphia been held by our troops. What their opinion will be upon the appearance of the Toulon Squadron is still to be learned. I think the orders sent by Drummond were discretionary, tho' even at that time the keeping of Philadelphia was thought unadviseable unless it could be done by a small force. The delegates to Parliament from the States of America is a new idea, and by no means any part of the Instructions, as I can recollect, and I think the whole of the proposal is rather premature, but as the Congress will not treat with them unless Independance is acknowledg'd, we shall have nothing to trust to but the sense of the people at large, should they be tired of their connection with France, and I still believe if we have any success in the opening of the war that it will have a great effect upon the minds of the Americans.

* Bathurst resigned on Wednesday, June 3.

"Tonyn's dispatches are not pleasing; as there is no harmony between him and Prevot there must be bad consequences arising from their squabbles and jealousys. . . . I do not believe any invasion will happen, as there are no number of troops in S. Carolina, and I should hope Sir H. Clinton will soon send the reinforcement order'd for that country, which will secure it from any attack." 3½ pp.

The Same to the Same.

1778, July 26. Stoneland Lodge.—I return you the draft of the letter to the Commissioners and the letter signed for the Admiralty. You have done very right in speaking to Lord North, "and if he and the other Ministers approve of the answer I had rather it should be convey'd in the gentlest manner possible that they have acted not quite within their instructions. . . . Is it improper to take any notice of d'Estaign's squadron being probably destined for N. America, which might make the collecting our force necessary? I should wish Lord Suffolk, Lord Sandwich, and in short all the Cabinet if possible to see the draft before I sign it." 1½ pp.

The Same to the Same.

1778, July 27. Stoneland Lodge.—I doubt whether we are wise (in our letter to the Commissioners) to give so many reasons for evacuating Philadelphia, as it is acquainting our enemies with our defence. Perhaps if we said in general that the certainty of a French war made it necessary to alter our measures it would be more prudent. It would prevent a laboured reply, and if possible, "I had rather have something new to say in debate than to enter into a paper war before the meeting of Parliament." I wish you would speak to Lord North about this. I suppose Keppel's letter to Lord Sandwich must relate to the Brest squadron. Probably a junction with the ships from Toulon is the object of France; but I do not see how it can be effected unless the Brest squadron ventures nearer to the Straights of Gibraltar than is prudent.

"There is intelligence from Paris that several pilots, &c., were ordered from thence to Cadiz, from which it was conjectur'd that Spain was to join with France. Now I think it more probable that those pilots are to wait at Cadiz for the Toulon fleet, as the Mediterranean seamen are not the most proper for the ocean. We are still pursued by ill-fortune in Byron's fleet being so little advanced, and in having one of his ships disabled. There is a great deal due to us from fortune, and I hope our luck will turn before we are quite ruin'd." 4 pp.

Lord North to William Knox.

1778, Aug. 8. Bushy Park.—"I do not see anything in your letter to the Commissioners that will prevent them from treating with any province that may be inclined to treat upon the footing of their Proclamation, and, in that respect, I approve of it, but think that the alterations [which] are made (except that which left out our reasons for evacuating Philadelphia) were rather for the worse.

"Great care must be taken now in everything we say and write not to give our enemies in America the least pretence to say that we do not mean sincerely, and that, when we have brought the Colonies to treat, conjointly or distinctly, we mean to disavow our Commissioners.

"The news you heard from France has not, I believe, been since confirm'd, and is, therefore, not at all to be depended upon. What is true, I am afraid, is that part or all the French fleet have sail'd by this time, by which, exclusive of the mischief they may do, they will persuade all Europe that the advantage of the last action was with them.

"I shall be in town to-morrow, and hope soon to see you and to talk with you upon some method of permanently providing for the American sufferers, who will soon be too numerous to be provided for as they have hitherto been. Cannot a practicable and advantageous plan be devised of settling them in the provinces which still remain connected with England, and of granting them lands with other encouragements to induce them to settle there? This is the first and most obvious idea that suggests itself. Nobody knows better than you do what difficulties are in the way, or is better able to point out the proper methods of surmounting them." 3½ pp.

Lord North to William Knox.

1778, Aug. 15. Bushy.—"I am much obliged to you for your intelligence and early communication of the advices from America, which I received at Windsor, and sent immediately to the King. I own that I am in pain for Gen. Sir H. Clinton, and shall think him in great peril unless we soon hear that he is arrived at New York. If his present situation should terminate in a battle, it may end prosperously for him, and in that case the liberal offers of the Commissioners may yet have some effect. I mention this to you for your consideration, for perhaps you may agree with me that care should be taken, that nothing in any letter written in these times to America should look like an intention to disavow the Commissioners. The use that would be made by our enemies of any circumstance of that kind would be to raise an opinion in America of our intending to deceive them, in which they have been too successful on former occasions, and which they consider as one of their principal means of preventing any reconciliation with Great Britain. The letters from hence (though it is impossible to deny that the Commissioners have exceeded their instructions) should not give the least ground to suspect that we will not confirm any agreement they may make. I am more of this opinion, since I do not expect that any treaty will take place as yet. As the Commissioners will, probably, come away, re infectâ, it is right that the Colonists should suppose that the whole extent of the Commissioners' offer would have been granted, which, indeed, would be supposing no more than the truth, for, as little pleased as many people are with the terms, I do not [think] the Nation would refuse them, if they should produce an immediate peace. Should matters turn out less favourably for the Americans hereafter, the remembrance of what they have lost will operate strongly for us and against France; it is, therefore, of great importance that they should not consider the offer as merely captious and insidious." 3½ pp.

HENRY WHITE to WILLIAM KNOX.

1778, Aug. 17. New York.—On my arrival from England, finding that inconveniences and loss of fees would arise from the office lying dormant, I appointed Mr. Moore to act in it, the Rebellion having put an end to your agreement with Mr. Bayard. I have paid Mr. Moore at the rate of 50*l.* out of the moneys he has received. Mr. Bayard has been obliged to deliver up the Records to the new rulers, and I hear he is expected to be in New York very shortly.

"I have as little inclination to touch upon our publick affairs as yourself, still I have not patience to refrain from giving vent to what I feel; the series of blunders and mismanagement will be better known to the world when the transactions on this side come to be more generally understood. That there has been a determined resolution in some body not to inforce unconditional submission, I have no doubt; their conduct cannot be accounted for by us on the spott on any other principal (sic). We find a great deal said about the Canada expedition, most certainly it was badly conducted, but the expedition to Chesapeak Bay is the real occasion of all the mischief that has happen'd; had it been left to the Congress, they cou'd not have plan'd a more destructive measure to the King's affairs; and it was foreseen and foretold by every man of sense who was well acquainted with the country. This unaccountable movement is well deserving a national enquiry, and also the reason why so much time was wasted, to the middle of July, without makeing any effort, without that ridiculous Parade in the Jerses can be call'd one, I mean the going to look at Washington, and returning again as they went. There was time enough to have opened Hudsons River, fixt the Canadian army at Albany, and taken possession of Philadelphia as soon as they did, notwithstanding your Red Banks and Mud Islands; had the former event only taken place, you wou'd not heard much of the Rebellion existing now. This Province, you have had an opportunity of securing, and so you have still, and I still insist upon it, a great majority of the people wish to return to their alleigeance. This idea is, I know, laugh'd at by those whose misconduct makes it necessary for them to exagerate the numbers of Washington's army, as well as magnify their prowess. If you were to recall all your Generals, and let your army with their officers remain, and leave it to them with the people of the country, who will assist, and go their own way to work, you wou'd soon see a surprizeing alteration for the better. The Commissioners are humble suitors to Congress; the latter would not condescend to answer the last overtures, they have not yet been offer'd the estates of those who wou'd not joyn in taking arms against the King, nor to exonerate those who owe money in England from paying it, nor exchange the continental money for real specie. When these things are engaged for, perhaps the Commissioners may be more attended to by their high mightinesses. Timidity in politicks on your side has done much harm ; you'l know before the receipt of this that the French fleet has been rangeing along this cost for more than a month; had you sent one after them, D'Estaing and all his ships must [have] been yours, which wou'd [have] been a decisive affair ; but it seems everything must goe wrong. After laying a long while before Sandy Hook they went to Rhod Island, which induced Lord Howe to goe their with his inferior force to draw D'Estaing off, and thereby raise the siege, which he has affected by the last account. Since his lordship sail'd, the weather has been very stormy, very uncommonly so at this season ; I fear his ship has suffer'd, and I have no doubt that the French fleet are much damaged, they are very large ships, not well man'd nor well acquainted with the coast ; its supposed they have made for Boston if the wind wou'd let them go their. What great national advantages wou'd been acquir'd had Lord Howe received a reinforcement only ten days ago ! The French had a very long passage, and its a very luckey circumstance, or they had fallen in with our transports from Philadelphia or taken them in the Delaware ; then they wou'd come here where no force was collected to oppose them, so that all your shiping and stores at both places wou'd have fallen into the enemies hands. Happily D'Estaing did not make his appearance on the American coast before all our force was collected to defeat the destructive vews of his expedition.

" Butler, you'l hear, is going on very rapidly on the frontiers ; he strickes more terror and occasions more distress to the rebells than all your other military operations put togeather ; if that man had a few thousand men with him that is now here adoing nothing, he wou'd give a mortel blow to the Rebellion in a very short time, but instead of being assisted, I shou'd not wonder if he was ordered to desist, least his going on shou'd give such offence to Congress as occasion that virtuous and magnanimous body (as one of the worthy Commissioners stile them) from even reading the next application to them. You know they did answer one, and deigned to reade the second. Had you put these Colonies on the footing they were on in 1763, and passed the law you have now done with regard to Taxation, and persisted with firmness in not going further in the way of concession, you wou'd have found this a more likely method to bring these people to reason than any other way. You have offered everything but the Name of Independence, in substance you give it to them in the fullest extent, and equally in my humble opinion destruction to Great Britain ; future ages will produce factious and ambitious men as well as the present, and such a Naval power will grow out of this country as will conquer your West India Islands before you can prevent it. . . . I fear I have gone on so long as to tire your patience. Not knowing whose hands this may fall in before you receive it is the reason why I don't sign my name." 7 pp.

Noted by Knox—" Henry White, one of the Council."

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1778, Aug. 17. Kew Lane.—"I hope Sir H. Palliser is in the right, and that Keppel's fleet will sail on Wednesday; probably the French ships may be longer in repairing than they expected, but whoever is first at sea may fairly claim the advantage in the late engagement." I hope the Treasury will send some provisions to Antigua, or a famine may be the consequence. Burt's extracts relating to provisions should be submitted to their lordships on Wednesday.

"The Quebec letters are curious. I did not know a Governor could dismiss a Chief Justice. I thought he could only suspend." I am sorry the Dutch Admiral and Burt disagree. 2¼ pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1778, Aug. 21. Pall Mall.—What Admiral Montagu means "by being surprised at having no orders I do not understand; as I recollect, he was to defend the Island with those troops and attack St. Pierre and Miquelan when hostilities commenc'd. He says in his private letter that a master of a ship from Hallifax saw off Isle Sable twelve large ships steering westward on the 9th of July. Surely that must be d'Estaign's squadron." 1¼ pp.

MARQUIS TOWNSHEND to WILLIAM KNOX.

1778, Aug. 22. Portman Square.—I wish in God your intelligence were of another sort. "I needed not this testimony of the hazard, nay impracticability, of all land enterprises without an indisputable superior naval force at the proper stations. The consequence of 30,000 veteran troops and as many excellent seamen captur'd at this crisis is certainly as decisive as immeasurable to the British Empire. I fear Mons. d'Estaing has force enough to leave off N. York at the same time he detaches for Rood Island." 2 pp.

JOHN ROBINSON to WILLIAM KNOX.

1778, Aug. 22. Parliament Street.—Lord North wishes Lord George Germain to be informed that Mr. Carmichael (who has been with the Congress) is expected to arrive by the Ostend or Helvetsluys packet either to-morrow or next day, at the house of Mr. Samuel Wharton, 8 Craven Street, Strand. [Description of his appearance.] There is also a Mr. Parsons, an Irishman, lodging at a baker's in Fleet Lane, who has been with Dr. Franklin, offering his services to him, and is lately returned from France. His wife is shortly expected from France by Dover, and it is believed that she will bring many letters with her. 2 pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1778, Aug. 30. Kew Lane.—I have made some alteration in the drafts to the Commissioners and Sir H. Clinton. "That to the Commissioners is certainly necessary, because the King say'd he could not refuse them leave absolutely, but wished it should be given to them in a manner that would show he expected they would exert themselves to the utmost before they avail'd themselves of it." The alteration in Clinton's is because the King told me on Friday not to forget "to mention the judgment the General showed in making the rebels recall their detachments which were sent to attack the baggage, by his bringing on an action with the main body." 1½ pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1778, Aug. 31. Kew Lane.—I have waited with impatience for news from Keppel. "Brereton's being dismissed for drunkenness convinces me that Keppel did not wish to have a ninety gun ship under his command in the next action, and yet I suppose he could not be broke for any misconduct in the late affair." 1 p.

The SAME to the SAME.

1778, Sept. 14. Drayton.—". . . The French fleet being off Cape Finisterre must be either to invite the Spaniards from Cadiz or to secure their junction with the Toulon squadron. If the latter, and Keppel has had intelligence of it, he may more eagerly desire a re-inforcement. Lord Howe, having been re-inforced by the Cornwall, may look after Mr. D'Estaign with more security, but I hope he will have no occasion to risk an engagement till some more of Byron's squadron have joined him. . . . I do not like Clinton's dispatch so well as I expected; he is magnifying the force of the rebels and diminishing his own by the new-fashioned way of computing his army by the number of rank and file fit for duty, and even in that manner of stating his strength he has a formidable body of troops, capable, I should think, of withstanding any attack of Mr. Washington, &c. He surely cannot think seriously of evacuating New Yorke; but my comfort is, he will not have the transports for effecting it after all the other supposed services are comply'd with." I suppose I shall see Sir Guy Carleton at the Levée, "for I conclude he will not do me the honor of reporting to me the state of his late Government before he has related all his grievances to his Majesty." 4 pp.

LORD NORTH to WILLIAM KNOX.

1778, Sept. 20. Bushy Park.—"Though affairs are in a ticklish situation in America, yet I still think they are not without hope, unless Sir Henry Clinton hastily determines to evacuate New York. His letter alarm'd me till I read Lord George's secret instructions, which are so clearly written and so cautiously guarded that I think it impossible that he can think himself justified in abandoning New York unless the forces of the rebels are vastly increased and his own very much diminish'd from their present numbers. . . . If Sir Henry Clinton determines upon that measure, he must see our circumstances upon the spot in a very different light from what they appear to me. By his letter, it appears to be his opinion that if he does not evacuate the place before the end of this month, it will be too late; I think, therefore, that he must continue in his post all the winter." I do not find that General Haldimand has made any requisition for troops, so the best support Sir Henry can afford to Canada is to keep his army at New York, ready to make a diversion to the southward in case of any attack on the province of Quebec. 3½ pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

[1778], Sept. 21. Kew Lane.—"Lord North's letter is very satisfactory. . . . I still flatter myself that if no requisition is made from Haldimand, that Sir H. Clinton cannot take a measure so contrary to the interests of this country, but all will depend upon Lord Howe's success. If Clinton should go to Halifax towards winter the army will be ruin'd, for the troops which went with McLean are encamp'd, and no barracks could be provided for them in less than two months. . . ." 2 pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1778, Oct. 4. Kew Lane.—I am as unhappy as you can be about the Brest fleet getting safe into Brest, but as to the return of D'Estaign's fleet to Europe, Admiral Arbuthnot is now convinced that what he saw was d'Orvillier's, not D'Estaign's.

"What you say of America is indeed alarming, but I still hope that Sir H. Clinton will remain at New York. . . . I have nothing to say to Haldimand; he must do the best he can with the forces he has, and with the re-inforcement he may receive from Clinton should he apprehend an attack. As to Massey, the King approves his diligence in putting Nova Scotia in a proper state of defence, in his successful attack, in conjunction with Capt. Fielding, upon the ships of the rebels, &c." In compliance with his request, the King gives him leave to come home, and has therefore sent Col. McLean, an officer of experience and abilities, to take over his command, to whom he is to give all the information in his power. 3½ pp.

LORD DARTMOUTH to WILLIAM KNOX.

1778, Oct. 16. Sandwell.—"I am bound to thank you for your news, such as it is; it might have been worse; I wish it had been better. I have lately been what I have hardly ever been in my life before, an invalid. I am going immediately to Bath, and if you should have any very good news to send me . . . it will do me more good than the water." 1 p.

WILLIAM KNOX to LORD [GEORGE GERMAIN].

1778, Oct. 26. Bath.—Lord Dartmouth came here two days ago, and from him I have had particulars of the Spanish Declaration. "Spain has seen that France, notwithstanding all her boastings of having a marine superior to England, is likely to be worsted. It is not her interest that France should be depressed by us, nor that we should increase our possessions and strength in the West Indies. She has seen the change in our plan of carrying on the war, and from that and the failure, and, perhaps, discomfiture of D'Estang's fleet, she may easily conclude that the French Islands will become our object. Before the French power is too much broken, therefore, she thinks it prudent to step in, determined that if she can't save France by negociation, to assist her. The American business is the pretext, but the saving France is her object. Her demand of having our claims stated is, I think, favourable for us. We have no claim to make upon France but the fulfilment of the Treaty of Paris, and of that Spain is a guarantee; for by that Treaty the Treaty of 1667 is renewed, which gives an exclusive right to each European State to its dominions in America, and the Treaty of Paris describes our possessions in America. We then want no more than to have our right to those possessions acknowledged, which, of course, will oblige the French to abrogate their Treaty with the Colonies. So simple a state of our case must place us in a dignified light in the eyes of all Europe, and embarrass France and Spain to evade acknowledge[ing] the justice of our demand. I do not conceive it will be right to hold back or wait the motions of France; there is, I think, more dignity in openly avowing our demands at once, adding a reserve in case they are not complied with, that we are not bound to adhere to them. I feel much concern on account of our Minister at Madrid; a great deal will depend upon his management, and I am afraid Lord Grantham is not sufficiently painstaking. The Brest fleet will no more come out, while there is any risque of meeting Keppel, but I hope we shall have some other accounts that will give spirits to Parliament.' . . ." Copy. 3 pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1778, Oct. 29. Pall Mall.—"Your opinion upon the situation of this country with regard to Spain strikes me to be perfectly just. If Treaties and the most solemn assurances could bind a Court, that of Spain is pledg'd to take no part in this war; but an arm'd mediation, and its family compact with France, must create the strongest suspicions in our minds that its intentions are hostile towards us. Our business is to endeavour to delay the evil if it cannot be totally avoided, and to put ourselves as much in the right as possible. Every prudent step is taken for attaining those ends, and I trust we cannot go to war with Spain without wasting some time in negotiation. The letters from Clinton and the Commissioners you will have an account of. . . .

"Governor Johnstone is seemingly in good humour with the Ministry, at least he makes no complaints, and is very communicative. He says peace may still be had if we shew ourselves in a situation to make war, and if the opinion can be destroyed that we mean to grant Independence to America as soon as the Parliament meets. Dr. Franklyn has assured the Congress that Mr. Hartley acquainted him that such was Lord North's resolution, and therefore it would be folly in them to treat upon any other terms, and above all, that they should put no trust in whatever Mr. Johnstone might say to them. You may imagine Lord North is much displeas'd at such a misrepresentation of his intentions, and I hope he will for the future not permit such negotiators as Mr. Hartley to have access to him. Clinton's troops are in motion to endeavour to attack Washington's army, as the Militia have left it, and the Regulars are divided. Washington was at Fishkill with about 5,000 men, and La Fayette at the White Plains with between two and three thousand. Lord Cornwallis with 6,000 marches into the Jerseys, another party goes up the Hudson's River, and the Hessians are advancing towards the White Plains. This account comes to me in a message from Sir H. Clinton by Captain Omanny of the Tartar. The arrival of the India men is another piece of good fortune we were not entitled to, and the Jamaica fleet, with so small a convoy, coming safe, is beyond all computation. Lord Howe has not yet made his appearance. He is reposing himself after his fatigues, and probably consulting upon the language he is to hold in the Closet, &c." 5 pp.

WILLIAM KNOX to [LORD GEORGE GERMAIN].

1778, Oct. 31. Bath.—"I am very happy that your lordship thinks my reasoning upon the state of affairs just. Lord Suffolk has communicated to Lord Dartmouth the resolution of the Cabinet, and I draw very comfortable conclusions from the line taken. What a proof is the Bedford enterprize of the propriety of the orders so repeatedly given for attacking the rebel sea ports, and what a reflection is it upon Lord Howe's character that Gambeir, in his short absence, has done more to subdue the Rebellion than his lordship during the whole of his command. It was always clear in speculation that the Militia would never stay with Washington or quit their homes if the coast was kept in alarm, but the experiment having now been made the effect is reduced to a certainty. Surely somebody will ask Lord Howe why he has never attempted anything of the kind, and if your lordship's orders for making use of the provincials and the garrison of Rhode Island in this manner comes before the public, as I hope they will, is Burgoyne so weak as not to avail himself of the information and to charge at least some part of his misfortune upon Lord Howe's refusal to execute what is there pointed out? The destruction of the French stores at Shrewsbury is, I suppose, the object of Lord Cornwallis's expedition; that stroke would complete D'Estang's disgrace. I much fear he will go to the West Indies, as our expedition has been so long delay'd and its object so generaly known in America, and the defeat or prevention of it is certainly the best service he now can do France; but perhaps Byron's enterprizing turn may discover the practicability of burning his fleet and the town of Boston together, and then everything will succeed with us. The Commissioners appear to write for Parliament rather than to your lordship, but their state of affairs is by no means a desperate one. I do not suppose you will send out any other reinforcement than recruits, but if the garrison of Rhode Island was withdrawn, Sir Henry Clinton would have a sufficient force to maintain New York, and carry on a destructive war upon the coast, and also to take possession of Carolina. I submit it therefore to your lordship, whether it would not be proper to propose this to his consideration, for the importance of Rhode Island is, I think, greatly diminished, since all our batteries and an army of near 6,000 men could not prevent the French fleet going in and going out of the harbour without mischief, or give protection to our frigates stationed there. . . .

"Poor Nutting and the Penobscott orders have missed their way for this year, and I fear something will happen to prevent our taking possession of that country in the spring. We muster very strong here in great folks—the Dukes of Montagu and Northumberland have increased the list of dignified personages, and Lord Shelburn, Col. Barri and Hartly have reinforc'd faction, and Lord Cambden." Copy. 5 pp.

LORD NORTH to WILLIAM KNOX.

[1778, Nov. 25.]—"I thank you much for your good news and return your manifesto. By this time I suppose that the Commissioners are upon the sea, and I expect to have them here during the Christmas recess. Their return will please those who were afraid of agreement with America, but, in no other respect will it relieve me from the difficulty I shall be in to-morrow; but the arrival of the victuallers gives me spirits at this impatient juncture." 1 p.

Endorsed with above date.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1778, Dec. 4. Pall Mall.—". . . The House of Lords intend calling for the state of Dominica, &c., from 1775. I told Lord Suffolk they must begin from an earlier period; you will be so good as to send him the date when the first applications were made and the orders issued in consequence of them. I said I thought the commencement was in 1769 or 70. If you will, in a note, write him what you told me upon the subject, and then if the Lords give any papers they will know to what date they are to go back. The motion will probably be made on Monday by the Duke of Grafton." 1½ pp.

LORD THURLOW to WILLIAM KNOX.

1778, Dec. 5.—Stating that he should be extremely obliged for any papers which would throw light on the business of the convention with Prescot or Preston, which was broken off by the rebels. 1 p.

With note by Knox :—"Sent him Forster's agreement with Arnold."

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1778, Dec. 13. Pall Mall.—Is Lord Weymouth's office or mine to send the order for embarking Picton's corps, &c., for the expedition to the West Indies? Whichever it belongs to, it would be done at once. "As to Governor Roberts, Lord North consents to advance the 1,700*l.*, and the ship may go its voyage.

"The embargo matter of doubt, but agreed to have a Council on Monday to take it off. Lord President says it cannot be done without the King. I quoted the butter, which Mr. Cottrell and I settled without thinking of his Majesty, but Lord Gower says it must have been afterwards reported. I believe it was not, but I was satisfy'd if the thing was to be done, not to dispute about the mode." 2 pp.

The Same to the Same.

[1778, end of ?*]—Thinks that what Lord Macartney says, in his clear and able despatches concerning the stationing of ships of war, should be communicated to the Admiralty, but fears that, "as the proposal comes from a landman, it will not be attended to." It seems absurd to leave Grenada, &c., so exposed, when a few cruisers would give security to those islands, and at the same time be of great service to the trade from Africa. 1½ pp.

The Same to the Same.

1779, Jan. 2. Drayton.—I wish you could send me more agreeable news for the opening of this year. If this country can triumph over its enemies, what becomes of a few individuals is of little consequence, "and I should be happy to see the administration in those hands which could most effectually relieve us from our present distresses, but if I was to be asked where the men were capable of such exertion I must confess I knew no such. I fear the Senegal dispatches contained apprehensions of attack, or at least of distress for provisions. This last stroke must be attended with fatal consequences, as it will stop all supplies to the West Indies, besides the mischief done to the shipping. . . ." 3 pp.

The Same to the Same.

1779, Jan. 7. Pall Mall.—Lord Gower, Lord Weymouth and Lord Sandwich will be out of town, as well as Lord Carlisle, on Saturday, but Lord North wishes that we may have some conversation on that day with Messrs. Eden and Johnstone, so be so good as to summon these two and also Lord Amherst to be at Lord North's at twelve o'clock on that day. 1 p.

The Same to the Same

1779, Jan. 12. Pall Mall.—I understood it was agreed in Cabinet that a regiment should be sent to Jamaica, and, in consequence, told Mr. Fuller that the petition from the Council, &c. there would be complied with. "I must now tell them that what was resolved to be recommended by his Majesty's servants is not agreed to by his Majesty." I did not understand that the King objected to it when I spoke to Mr. Fuller, and must now explain the whole transaction or he will think I have deceived him.

Postscript.—"I hope Lord North understands the paper I sent him as design'd for his information, not as propositions from me to the Cabinet. If he adopts them they may be of use; if they come only from me, I know their fate." 2 pp.

John Scott to William Knox.

1779, Jan. 20. Harcourt Street [Dublin].—". . . I trust you will not think it inattention if I omit to write to you as often as

*See Lord Macartney's letter to Lord George, dated Oct. 31, 1778, in the Report on the Stopford-Sackville Papers, vol. ii. (8vo edition).

I am bribed away by two guineas, or by a client that looks as if he would give them were they in his power, for he too must have a preference. I now write to you to say that your very disinterested conduct deserves from this country, and especially from the present Government, much more than you ask for Mr. Smith, and much more than from the bounty of his uncle he has occasion to be solicitous about, for I am told that his part of the residue amounts to 20,000*l.* However, if that should not be the case, or if, as it happens, men's wants multiply with their wealth, and that Sir Richard Heron should not be able to spare you anything out of the Dean of Cork's livings, Doctor Chinnery, promoted to the bishopric of Killaloe, . . . desire Lord G. Germain, or write boldly yourself to the Archbishop of Dublin, whom you have made, and ask for the next thing his Grace can spare, worth not less than 500*l. per annum,* for your brother-in-law and the nephew of his Grace's predecessor. . . .

"The deanery of Cork is, I understand, given to Sir Richard Heron's nephew, Mr. Ractal, which, with the living given him by Cloyne upon his arrival here, makes him a young candidate for a bishopric and may smooth your approaches to the Castle."

Postscript.—Thanks for your ridding us of the embargo. . . . What delays Heron amongst you? 2 pp.

Noted by Knox :—"Now Lord Earlsfort."

Lord George Germain to William Knox.

1779, March 12.—"The drafts are approved, the warrants are signed, &c., but it is to be understood that Mr. Charles Pryce will not be permitted to act or continue in office should he return to Savannah, if he has taken the oaths to the Rebel States.

"Sir James Wright's queries are very minute, and many of them must be decided upon as his own judgment shall direct. If one of his opinions proves true, that he cannot trust the loyalty of the first Assembly when chosen, it argues against the putting the Colony at the peace of the King, and it must continue under military government. That opinion of his I trust is erroneous, and, among other things, makes me doubt much whether he is equal to the undertaking of governing a province under the circumstances of Georgia."

Postscript.—"I have heard of such jobbing about the provincial clothing that I wish some enquiry was made about it, both as to price and quality. Some military inspection should be made, that the Government may not be imposed upon and the soldiers discouraged by such usage." 2¼ pp.

The Same to the Same.

1779, March 15. Pall Mall.—Stating that he little imagined that private correspondence would have been wanted for parliamentary inspection, but that what he has kept Sir Wm. Howe may have the use of. ½ p.

The Same to the Same.

1779, March 27. Pall Mall.—Lord Sandwich wishes to keep all the troops where they are, but this must not be. We meet on Monday to decide the matter. "About the Miquelon prize money Lord North thinks I may signify the King's pleasure about it. If it should go through him officially he is ready to do what is proposed." 2 pp.

The Same to the Same.

1779, March 31. Pall Mall.—The Scotch regiments will probably be at Spithead to-morrow morning, and the fleet will sail as soon as the Chatham recruits join, without waiting for the Germans. The memorial from the Dominica proprietors deserves consideration. I wish you could send it to Lord North and ask him whether the Attorney-General's opinion ought to be asked. The King permits me to do it if it is thought expedient. 2 pp.

The Same to the Same.

1779, April 4. Stoneland Lodge.—". . . I hope the fleet will sail before the Hessians can arrive. Sir H. Clinton will not lament their delay. Your account about Spain is just what I could wish, for if our proposals are comply'd with, this campaign in America will not be interrupted, and if France begins a treaty with us the Provinces will be too wise not to close with England upon the best terms they can get. If France does not shew a sincere desire for peace it must be owing to the dependance she has that Spain will soon assist her, for she cannot risk immediate distress for the uncertain profit of the American alliance." 1½ pp.

The Same to the Same.

1779, April 6. Stoneland Lodge.—Concerning Admiral Arbuthnot's intended voyage. If he "is in a puzzle," Knox is prayed to set him right.

"The post is so obliging as to come every day to Tunbridge Wells, which it did not do formerly till after the 27th of June. We have charming weather, but we farmers are never contented; the wheat wants rain, and we shall be all undone." 2 pp.

The Same to the Same.

1779, April 7. Stoneland Lodge.—Stating that the Chancellor has returned the Dominica Memorial, and agrees that the request cannot be complied with. 1 p.

The Same to the Same.

1779, April 9. Stoneland Lodge.—"Lord Cornwallis now offers his service, when he knew everything was settled. I suspected his intention some time ago. I did not understand the delay. Vaughan's commission may be recalled, but I cannot advise doing so slighting an act to an officer who has behaved so well, and who has the merit of remaining steady whilst others were so ready to resign. If the King and Lord Amherst like this new arrangement it must be their measure not mine. . . ." 2 pp.

HENRY ELLIS to WILLIAM KNOX.

1779, May 5. Brussels.—I congratulate you on our late successes, especially in Georgia, where I hope you will be re-instated in your property. In France they had great hopes that that province would be a trap à la Burgoyne, and I confess I was not exempt from fears. G. Provost's success has relieved them, but there is still much at hazard in the West Indies. Present appearances are good, but I see the possibility of disaster there.

I arrived here two days ago from Marseilles, where I passed the winter very agreeably, "particularly as none of my own country-folks were there, who are the most restless and discontented people upon earth. From the general order to exclude every English subject from the sea ports in France, Princess Guimenée obtained an exception of the King in my favour. . . . So singular a mark of confidence from that jealous government laid me under the strongest obligation to an exact conduct, which I rigidly observed." I, nevertheless, associated pretty freely with the French, who treated me with uncommon attention. "The winter in Provence was the finest imaginable, four months passed without the appearance of a cloud," but the unseasonable mildness relaxed me so much that I am on my way to the Spa to brace up again. 3½ pp. Seal with crest.

GOVERNOR GEO. JOHNSTONE to LORD GEO. GERMAIN.

[1779], June 19.—Private. "Mr. Eden desired me to put upon paper some measures which I think expedient to be adopted in case that an attack on New Orleans should be determined upon.

"I apprehend 1,500 men to those already in the Province of West Florida will be necessary. They should be sent in the men of war destined for the expedition, with the necessary stores, provisions and artillery which may be deemed necessary. They should pass by the Windward Islands and Jamaica, or if sent from the forces under General Grant, they should call off Jamaica and pick up what they can.

"The success will depend on a judicious negotiation with the inhabitants of New Orleans, who are disgusted to a degree of irritation hardly to be believed, from the government of the Spaniards and the cruelty practised by Oreilly when he reduced the revolt in that colony. They are also dissatisfied with the French for leaving them a sacrifice to Spanish crueltys on their appeal to that court. Not less than fifteen of the principal familys fell victims on that revolution, with all their property and effects. Several were put to death, and some lost their lives in iron cages. Your lordship will see how ticklish this must be, for fear of giving the alarm before the force arrives, and yet it would be better done before the force arrives than afterwards, in order that the inhabitants may be assured that there is no design against their effects or estates.

"The Chickasaw, Creeks and Chactaw Indians must be secured by presents and good management; this is absolutely necessary. Pensacola must be guarded against hostilitys as well as Mobile, and the inhabitants regimented and armed. A number of canoes and flatt boats, drawing little water, must be provided. They may be got in the country. The island on the mouth of Lake Ponchartrain must be seized and fortifyed by redoubts.

"The attack by the river is very difficult, tho' a diversion should be made that way also. If the fort at the Balize could be seized by a coup de main it would be well, and facilitate all future operations by the river and prevent supplys. Not less than two forty gun ships and three frigates and two sloops should be employed on the service of the expedition. But the matter of all others the most to be attended to is fortifying Egmont Island and securing the Harbor of Espiritu Sancto, which is of more consequence in annoying the commerce of Spain than the Havannah, or of Gibraltar for the Mediteranean trade. I consider this as an object not to be neglected for an hour, and the means certain and easy, while the advantages are innumerable in this contest.

"Provisions necessary for the forces by sea and land should be provided in time, but I know no place where they could lie in perfect safety against an enterprize from the Havannah, as we are now fortifyed; and therefore the necessity of fortifying Egmont Island appears more essential on that account also, as well as being the best rendez-vous for all the privateers which may be fitted out and sent to that part of the world, where the riches of all the Spanish colonys are passing afloat." 3¼ pp.

HENRY ELLIS to WILLIAM KNOX.

1779, July 13. Spa.—". . . You are the most pleasing coresponsdant in the world, as you always present the brightest sides of ideal objects, and have the talent of reviving expiring hopes." Your letter had a prodigious effect upon Mr. Cressener, who was in the most desponding disposition, and seems to have collected new life from it.

"Spa is but very thin of company, and likely to continue so by the war, and the shutting up the passage from Calais to Dover, or rather from Dover to Calais. This was certainly a right measure; I greatly approve of it, although it is to be highly inconvenient to me. Had it not taken place, I should have been in England ere now. . . . Of the French nation who are at this place, the most distinguished are the Dutchess of Bourbon and her suite, the Duke de Coigny, Count Polignac, le Marquis Vaudreuil, their ladies, &c. These latter are of the Queen's partie and consequently not well with Madame de Bourbon, but both sides court the English with as much zeal and assiduity as if they liked them. The Spencers, the Dutchess of Devonshire, Lady Clermont and the Archbishop of Tuam and his family are the whole of our country of any note who are here, tho' it is said Lord Northington is daily expected. There are, besides, a considerable number of persons of condition from other parts, but principally Russians, who are neither the most opulent or the most animated people, and consequently the diversions are more languid than usual. A general intercourse, however, is maintained, and were it not for the newspapers and some puffing letters now and then from Paris, such is the tranquillity that reigns at private and publick resorts, that one might well imagine there were no wars in the world. . . ." 3½ pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1779, July 27. Stoneland Lodge.—"I cannot believe the rebels will make any serious attack upon Canada unless the French send some ships up the River St. Lawrence; indeed, the proclamation which alarms General Haldimand gives the Canadians no assurance of such a support. It is unlucky that Governor Hamilton should be taken at this time, as it will give spirits to the Americans, and when the declaration of Spain reaches them, they will think we shall not be able to resist such powerful enemies as are now united against us. I fear much the supplies of provisions will be so late sent out from Cork that the ships will again lose their passage; in that case Haldimand cannot support his out-posts. . . .

"Sir Charles Hardy's fleet will have a powerfull squadron to contend with, if the enclos'd intelligence be true. I think confusion must be the consequence of such a number of large ships attempting to manœuvre together, especially when not composed of the ships of one nation. . . ." 2½ pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1779, Aug. 1. Stoneland Lodge.—". . . The arrival of the Leeward Island fleet must give spirits to the city. When I heard of the number that passed Breghthelmstone yesterday I was in hopes the Jamaica fleet had joined them; possibly Hardy may have resumed his station, so as to protect those which are expected from Jamaica and the East Indies, but I think we have more reason to trust in Providence than in our Admirals. By a letter I have seen from Cadiz, the 25th of June, everything was then preparing and embarking for a siege, and by their being ordered to Algerias, they must be intended for Gibraltar, which I think the best thing that can happen to us. . . ." 2¼ pp.

THOS. FALKNER to PETER POOL.

1779, Aug. 23. Plowden.—I give you my hearty thanks for so many notices of my old cronies, and send you some information concerning Thomas Brown from the dispenser in the College where he was bred, and who, from Brown, had information of me and my missions. I have had no correspondence with the province since you came away, and so know not who lives nor who dies. I am not of opinion that Buenos Ayres is an object worthy of our arms, nor would it be teneble without great expense. It is a wide, open town, and though I have as little opinion as you of the Spanish valour, the governors of the provinces round might harass us with incursions, and the people cannot be depended on, even when it might suit their own interests—lazy, idle, faint-hearted wretches. And to keep Buenos Ayres, those provinces must be conquered, and all the places to the foot of the Andes must fall. They are mostly, I confess, defenceless villages, but the long marches through mostly barren countries, "sometimes over vast sandy plains, others through hundreds of miles of thick woods, and at others over vast high mountains and precipices," would dishearten our men more than to meet with a well-disciplined enemy. I should imagine a blow might be better directed against some other of the Spanish settlements. "I have been credibly informed that the city of La Vera Cruz is but sorrily fortified by the landside, and that the only defence of the haven is the island and strong Castle of Don Juan de Ulloa, which might not cost us a week to take. This is the key and only port to the rich Kingdom of Mexico, whence comes the greatest part of the Spanish treasures, and if this was taken I believe that upon good treatment and promise of protection and making 'em independent, those countries might be tempted to revolt." They are heartily tired of the Spanish Government, and if they had courage to fight for their liberty much might be done, but they are accustomed to peace and luxury, and are no soldiers. But they will not, thus, give us much trouble, and we should only have to do with the troops from Spain. The black vomit, which rages upon those coasts, is a great obstacle, but it lasts only the summer months, so if the expedition was undertaken in September, that difficulty would cease. Three or four thousand men might be sufficient if the object was kept a secret and the enemy taken unawares. This place is much nearer than Buenos Ayres, and might be succoured from our Colonies.

"I have likewise heard our missionaries talk much of the new Kingdom of Leon, its great fertility and abounding with rich silver mines, lying near to our Colony at Pensacola. The Spaniards are there at war with a nation called Seres, formerly our neophites, whom the avarice and barbarity of a Spanish governour drew upon 'em by seizing their lands and making a butchery upon 'em in cold blood in time of peace, and being Christian converts, and carrying off their wives and children to slavery, which they have since dearly pay'd for. The missionaries early made strong remonstrances to the Governor and Viceroy, but in vain. Farewell . . . Jube et ora pro me." 2 pp.

Addressed to Mr. Peter Pool, 5 Great Castle Street, Oxford Market, London.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to ——.

1779, Aug. 29. Stoneland Lodge.—"I am glad Hutchins is taken. As to the keeping his confinement a secret, it is too ridiculous to found any proceeding upon, or that Mr. Wharton can be induced to give intelligence thro' Mr. Hutchins is not possible. There may be difficulties in convicting him, and the only use that can be made of the fright he is in will be to convince him that the only way he can have any chance for mercy will be to give usefull information to Government, and that it will be improper that he should see either Lord North or me till he can shew that he can be of real service. He is too sensible to imagine that anything can attone for his conduct, but the most open and unreserved communication of all he knows. . . . Encourage him to be honest, but make him no absolute promise of pardon." Let Lord Weymouth know of this proceeding. Knox will be in town to-morrow. 3 pp.

LORD DARTMOUTH to WILLIAM KNOX.

1779, Sept. 4. Sandwell.—I see from the papers that Governor Browne is superceded. If this is the case, his wife, who is my near relative, will be reduced almost to a state of absolute want. "I don't say that this is any reason for sparing a man who is convicted of misconduct, and I have no doubt that there is sufficient ground and good occasion for so summary a proceeding. I know that complaints have been made of him, and I know the character of his accusers, and therefore I don't suppose he is dismissed without an opportunity of clearing himself."; but I shall be much obliged if you will tell me what the grounds are. 2 pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1779, Sept. 20.—"We must now determine whether the war in America is the first object of our attention, or whether the defence of the remainder of the Leeward Islands is to be preferred to the expected acquisitions in North America. Admiral Barrington's whole information is so desponding that I flatter myself he is only diverting our attention from enquiring into the reasons of his quitting his post instead of assuming the command as he was ordered. The Cabinet dinner is on Wednesday at Lord North's." I want the papers relating to the bombardment of Havre, "for I will not let that idea be treated as one that was improper to be pursued. Admiral Mann professes knowing nothing of that coast, so that his opinion is no better than mine, and Admiral Rodney's account confirms the propriety of the attack proposed." If we do not finish on Wednesday I shall propose a meeting on Thursday morning, when we shall be less sleepy than after dinner. 2¼ pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1779, Sept. 26.—I am sorry there is a doubt about D'Estaign's arrival in Europe. It must be distressing to Sir H. Clinton to be left in such uncertainty. I shall think Jamaica in the utmost danger if D'Estaign is gone to St. Domingo. "I cannot understand why the merchants, &c., disagree with the Governor about the Mullatoe regiments. I should imagine he was the best judge of that proposal. It will be impossible for Lord Amherst to give all the recruits to the service of Jamaica whilst the regiments in the Leeward Islands and in North America want so many men to compleat them. The capitulation of St. Vincent's ought to be mention'd in the Gazette, with as little of the Governor's performances as may be."

Tobago must fall whenever the French please. "If Paul Jones escapes he is in luck, for the Admiralty have sent more than one squadron after him, and, as the wind has been, I do not see how he can avoid them, but our sea expeditions, except under Sir G. Collier, are not fortunate." 3 pp.

LORD DARTMOUTH to WILLIAM KNOX.

1779, Oct. 4. Sandwell.—Mrs. Brown has been in correspondence with Lord G. Germain, but does not know whether she is to continue to receive her husband's salary or part of it for her subsistence "during the pendency of the affair. . . . I can hardly persuade myself that the governor is to receive a temporary punishment before he is found to have deserved it." 1½ pp.

CAPT. THOS. HUTCHINS to WILLIAM KNOX.

1779, Oct. 11.—Praying for an interview. 1 p.

The SAME to the SAME.

1779, Oct. 14.—Declaring that his confinement prevents his putting into practice his sincere wishes to promote the King's service, and begging Knox to obtain his enlargement. 1 p. Seal of arms.

R. ATKINSON to WILLIAM KNOX.

1779, Oct. 28.—"Never was any absence more unfortunate than your's. What think you of Lord Amherst disavowing the directions given by Mr. Morse last Saturday concerning the recruits, and standing the whole fire of the Cabinet in persisting to refuse a man more than some trifling quantity under two hundred. The ships are all engaged, the provisions laid in, and the whole expence incurred; nothing will move him.

"He has also refused Campbell's rank, who, under the advice (I believe) of a friend of your's, has written him or was to write him to-day declining the battalion and giving his reasons. In short, the devil has set in (sic) foot in everything since you left us, and in spite of my having devoted myself day and night to this object, I see it will end probably in our having one of the worst men in the whole world sent instead of one of the best, and instead of the West India interest being conciliated by the measure adopted, this disappointment will occasion a clamour that will be not only unpleasant, but really pernicious.

"Since writing what precedes I have (near midnight) received Lord Amherst's letter in answer to one we wrote him to-day as a last effort, in which he maintains his character, and all the recruits we are to get are a hundred and twenty-five. A thought strikes me by which I think the shame of this transaction may be hid. I will see Lord North upon it in the morning if he is not gone (as Lord George is) into the country. In the meantime I wish you would commit to writing what you recollect of the declarations on which the orders to the Admiralty were grounded, and favour me with any other hints that occur to you. The Canada victuallers are returned to Cork. The Howe is arrived there. A failure of their crop of corn, and the price almost as high as ever. No publick news that I hear of, but this infernal blunder has prevented my having time to look into Day's returns farther than in general to see that they are eating at a great rate." 3 pp.

LORD HILLSBOROUGH to [WILLIAM KNOX ?].

1779, Oct. 29. Hillsborough.—I have every hour been expecting a summons to your side of the water, but have yet no direct information that the measure of making me secretary is resolved on. I cannot enter into the affairs of this distracted country, "but I cannot refrain from saying that our ministers are mad if they do not instantly seriously go into our measure." 1 p.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1779, Nov. 24. Pall Mall.—"Surely you must have dealings with the d——, or how could you be so positive that Lord Hillsborough would not have the seals this day. It is put off, as they say, for a few days. I am told Wedderburn will not consent, tho' he was yesterday with the King, and all then was good humour." ½ p.

The SAME to the SAME.

1779, Nov. 28.—". . . I have a thousand letters from the Havannah, all in Spanish. What am I to do with them? They contain, as Arbuthnot writes and Stuart says, the plan of D'Estaign's campaign. The Admiral fears the Experiment is taken. It is sea news, and Capt. Chinnery says the man who brought it varied in his story." 1 p.

LORD DARTMOUTH to WILLIAM KNOX.

1779, Dec. 7. Sandwell.—". . . Things certainly look well in some quarters of the globe. There are two spots, however, in which they don't appear with quite so good an aspect; I mean the West Indies and the House of Commons. If a squadron of French ships of the line should be got thither, which I hope is not true, they will have time to frighten our planters a good deal before they can be checked. In the House of Commons I read of nothing but very unjust attacks upon Lord George Germain and those who act with him from the men who have had the most respect and attention paid to them. Such, alas, is human nature.

"I have had less of my nervous sensations since I returned from Bath, but intend to indulge myself until after Christmas. Then, well or ill, I must launch out into the troubled sea, and take my share of the storm." 2 pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1780, Jan. 1.—Your letter to Vaughan is very right. I hope it will be ready for signing before twelve o'clock to-night, as I set out at seven to-morrow morning.

"Dalling's drafts I suppose must be accepted, but the island should be required to find funds for repaying, or if the provisions are not issued the governor will sell them and account for the profit. This is my opinion. If you have a better I am ready to subscribe to it. . . ." 2½ pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1779–80 (sic), Jan. 8. Drayton.—". . . I cannot imagine that Jamaica is in danger at present, nor will it be till Spain prefers the conquest of that island to the attack of Gibraltar or the defence of its possessions in South America.

"The Dutch Admiral has behaved with proper discretion, and the States General are put under no difficulties by his conduct; if they wish war we have given them sufficient cause for declaring it, and so indeed has every other power concerned in the present contest; they must soon determine whether they will be governed by France or make common cause with us, for I think they will soon be driven out of an impracticable neutrality. . . .

"I wish Lord Hillsborough would not strive so hard for popularity. What business had he to write to the Lord Mayor of Dublin, as if His Majesty's Lieutenant could not have more properly notifyed that event thro' his own secretary? How my Lord Buckingham feels upon that slight I know not; had I been in his place the King would have been troubled with very loud complaints." 3 pp.

William Knox to Lord North.

1780, Feb. 8.—Stating that his long intimacy with the Grosvenor family gives him the opportunity of knowing their wishes and dispositions, and that he lamented to find that Lord G[rosvenor] felt himself slighted by not being made lieutenant for Cheshire, and so had held back from supporting Lord North's government, although his chagrin did not lead him to take part with Opposition, "for the family principles are too strongly monarchical to allow of a combination with republicans; and, besides, his lordship does not forget, as some others have done, that he owes his peerage to the grace of his present Majesty." His lordship has lately come up to town, and states that L[ord] C[holmondeley] has been stirring up mischief in Cheshire, which he withstood upon principle, but he feels awkward in opposing a Lord Lieutenant in what has the appearance of being for the good of the people. He candidly avows that the lieutenancy is his great object, and (if Lord North feels that he has made a wrong choice and thinks of removing the present man) "should consider the appointment as a band of reconciliation and friendship." Knox is aware of Lord Grosvenor's inattention and neglect, but ventures to say that "both him and Mr. Grosvenor and all their connexion will feel exceedingly obliged by the appointment, and the public cannot think the change unwise." Copy. 2 pp.

Lord George Germain to William Knox.

1780, Feb. 24. Pall Mall.—Stating that nothing had been said in the House the day before about Boyd, but that all were surprised to hear Mr. Pulteney arraign ministers for their timidity in not employing Sir H. Palliser. "By the cry of the House" it was perceived that he had many friends. The King gave an audience of an hour to the Margrave of Anspach. 1 p.

The Same to the Same.

1780, March 12.—"The Cabinet in general inclined to Halifax, but, as Lord Sandwich was so strongly of a contrary opinion they would not give any directions about it till he was present. When that will be I know not. I wrote to him last night to show him the distress his absence occasioned." ½ p.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1780, March 20. Stoneland Lodge.—Thinks Lord Sandwich might have empowered Rodney to have ordered Walsingham to return to him from Jamaica, as he does not believe M. de Guychen will attack any of the British islands unless he fights and beats Rodney. 1 p.

WILLIAM KNOX to LORD GEORGE GERMAIN.

1780, March 24.—I have had much conversation with Lord Sandwich on the state of the Leeward Island squadron. He had given Stephens directions to write the strongest letter he could draw to Admiral Rhodney not to dismantle the three ships of the line, but to send them home if unfit for service; and on my suggesting that, upon the arrival of the Intripid with such part of the regiments as have kept with her, Vaughan would be able to spare some troops to assist in manning the squadron, his lordship wrote himself to Rodney, pressing him not to dismantle the three ships, but if he wanted men to apply to Vaughan or use some other means to procure them. He "thinks the troops cannot be trusted from the Leeward Islands to Jamaica with fewer than two ships of the line and a frigate; three of Walsingham's will therefore remain with Rhodney, and the other two go on to Jamaica."

He does not fear anything being sent out of Brest to intercept the fleet (for I hinted it might be prudent to order Graves to see him into the sea), and he imagines if De Guichen has blocked up Rodney he cannot detach force enough to overpower Walsingham. "The convoy will therefore probably arrive safe at Barbados, but if Rhodney be obliged to shelter himself in St. Lucie we may expect to hear of attacks on Tobago and Barbados, for I do not think De Guichen will venture to send a detachment to Leeward." 3 pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1780, March 24. Pall Mall.—Your letter surprises me, as Lord Sandwich said nothing about the bad state of the Leeward Island fleet, and Capt. Byron assured me the squadron was complete. I know no remedy unless Arbuthnot joins, for Walsingham will arrive too late to prevent the effect of Guychen's superiority. It is a very serious business.

As to the Brest fleet, I have no doubt its destination is N. America; it is less forward than I imagined, "and it is impossible the French should fit out a squadron for the West Indies which cannot get thither before June, and they will hardly keep so great a naval force in those seas during the hurricane months." Our preventing them from quitting Brest is more to be wished than expected.

Lord Amherst wished to wait to settle the recruits for N. America and the Leeward Islands till he saw more of the intentions of France, but I represented to him that unless we could now order the transports we should have no use of the troops this campaign. I understand he will have near 3,000 men. They cannot embark till France's intentions concerning invasion are known, but I see no inconvenience in making preparations. 4½ pp.

The Same to the Same.

1780, March 29. Stoneland Lodge.—You have done all possible to prevent surprise in N. America, and I hope Arbuthnot will be able to withstand M. de Chaffaud. I am more uneasy about the Leeward Islands, for if the three ships of the line from St. Domingo have joined La Motte Piquet's squadron, we shall be very inferior indeed to the enemy there, and much stronger than necessary in Jamaica.

"The Spaniards may order 10,000 troops from Cadiz, but the transports cannot be soon prepared or victualled for such an expedition. The whole weight of the war will fall upon America and the West Indies. If nobody was wiser than I, four ships more would go with Walsingham and two with Greaves, for I think we have little to fear at home, but Lord Sandwich will not risk this country upon any account, so that I apprehend we shall have some misfortunes abroad . . . unless Rodney's abilities and good fortune save us." 3 pp.

John Robinson to William Knox.

1780, April 21, 7.20 a.m.—"I hear that we are to be very much attacked in the Committee on the extraordinaries upon the provincial corps, as a great job. The Secretary at War knows nothing about them, and cant answer any attacks; at the Treasury we are as ignorant, and can only say that all the stores and necessaries we send out are on the requisition of the Secretary of State." If Lord George wishes Lord North to be able to answer any questions, will you send us the necessary information. It you would add a short precis relative to Indian presents it would be useful. 2 pp.

The Same to the Same.

1780, May 3.—Thinks it better, in the letter to Knyphausen, to say nothing about his possible junction with Clinton, as it might perhaps "give jealousy to Clinton to enter into his future intentions with the Hessian general." 2 pp.

Lord George Germain to William Knox.

1780, May 27. Pall Mall.—I am glad to hear of your safe arrival in Dublin. I sincerely wish that the Mutiny Bill may be so changed as to make it admissible here, and that then we shall be wise enough to adopt it, and avoid a discussion which cannot end to our advantage.

"You will see what Rodney has done. What he might have done is a melancholy consideration. About four of his captains are particularly mark'd. He writes me word that his success would have been decisive had his orders been obeyed. No news yet from Clinton. I begin to fear some misfortune. . . The French squadron from Brest and the Spanish squadron from Cadiz having sailed, and our fleet under Walsingham still at Torbay, leaves room for many apprehensions."

Our House of Commons business goes on prosperously. When you have settled Ireland pray return and take care of us. 4 pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1780, July 13. Drayton.—"I am glad to hear everything remains quiet in London. Taylor's information about the threatenings of the mob gives me but little uneasiness,* and I believe neither Lord North or Lord Sandwich will attend to it. I am apt to believe that Mr. Grenville's information may be so far true as that we shall hear the Congress are removed from Philadelphia to Hertford, and that change of residence may be productive of much good. I wonder the Court of Spain had received no accounts from Pensacola. Had Sir G. Rodney commanded at Jamaica he would not only have saved the Floridas, but have made the expedition fatal to Spain. How miserably we have been served this war! . . . By your account Sir G. Rodney will look in vain for the Spanish fleet. I doubt much whether ten ships of the line will be sent to the Havannah, as they have so many other ports to attend to, but if the ships and transports are so ill-provided we may hope their forces will not be so formidable as we apprehended. . . . 'I am glad the poor Americans will be at last attended to. I hope the list will be revised, or many deserving sufferers will not be included." 3 pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1780, July 15. Drayton.—I am glad to hear of Geary's success. I fear you need not have desired the Admiralty to delay the sailing of the recruits till his return. "I trusted to the natural sloath of sea operations . . . and all I pray is that your precaution may not be better attended to than you desired."

Taylor's intelligence about the state of Guychen's fleet is very comfortable, but if Tearny is to join him so soon, "he can only touch at N. America, land his troops, and then reach Martinico about the season the hurricanes prevail. The French commonly quit the Leeward Island station before that period, as they have no port of safety for a large fleet. However, if Mons. de Ternay does not remain in America I trust . . . that Graves will join Rodney, and give him such a force as may enable him to face and defeat his enemy." 2½ pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1780, July 30. Stoneland Lodge.—Thinks it must be left to the

* The Special Commission for trying the Gordon rioters had begun its sitting on July 10.

Board of Ordnance to judge whether the very large demands of New York and Charlestown shall be complied with. Wonders that such a quantity of artillery should be needed at the latter place, "after seeing in the Gazette how many were captured." 1¼ pp.

The Same to the Same.

1780, Aug. 7. Stoneland Lodge.—I hope there may be no need of sending General Haldimand's letter before I have shown the draft to the King. I think Mr. Haldimand's conduct so blameable that it would be improper to say less, "but as the reprimand must be so directly in his Majesty's name, it would be more satisfactory to me to have his approbation of it." That province will never be properly govern'd till Mr. Cramahé is recalled. The more I think of Oliver for governor of New Ireland the more I like it, but to find the proper system of government for that immense continent will be a difficult task. I wish you could come here for two or three days, that we might prepare some plan for the consideration of the Cabinet. "I dread nothing so much as the hurrying out of this war before we are prepared for peace." 3 pp.

The Same to the Same.

1780, Aug. 11.—Stating that the King "likes Oliver for governor, so it may be offer'd to him." He also approves of Leonard for Chief Justice. His Majesty comes to town again on Friday, and the Cabinet dinner will be on that day. 1 p.

Lord George Germain to [Mr. Irwine ? *].

1780, Aug. 19. Pall Mall.—"The King has not declared his intentions of appointing any person to the government of South Carolina, nor do I suppose his Majesty will do it till the province is more settled. If you desire to know my opinion with regard to your pretensions, I should imagine a military officer will more probably be appointed . . . than the Attorney-General of the province." 1 p.

Henry Ellis to William Knox.

1780, Aug. 20. Brussels.—"A very particular friend of mine, first President of the Parliament of Aix, in Province, has written to me in the most pressing terms to engage my interest towards bringing about a speedy exchange of three persons taken on board a French St. Dominique ship by Admiral Geary's squadron." Having no interest at the Admiralty, I apply to you, hoping that the thing will not be difficult or very embarrassing to you. Mr. Cressener has also written to Lord Sandwich, but I must say I expect more effect from a few words of yours to Mr. Stephens. The parties are M. Michel, captain; M. Bassiley, second lieutenant, and M. Alari, secretary of La Courière, taken by the Royal Sovereign, and now at Oakhampton, upon their parole. As they have large families at Marseilles, where I spend so much of my life, it would be of great use to me, as well as an act of humanity in itself to obtain their liberty, and I pray you to employ your kind endeavours as soon as you can.

* See letter of Aug. 27, below.

I left Spa in its full splendour. "The presence of the King of Sweden had brought a prodigious crowd there from all parts and of of all ranks. . . . But few English appeared there this season, and those single people of no great condition or distinction; but multitudes of French, who seemed to rule triumphantly. I had the tiresome and oppressive honour of being much distinguished by the great of all countries, but more particularly by his Majesty, who is one of the most amiable and captivating persons I ever met with. I had declined being presented to him, but some of my friends had raised his curiosity to be acquainted with me, and it then became unavoidable. Our first conference, for it seemed to be such, was before a hundred and fifty people of rank in the publick salle. A variety of topicks were then started and discussed; among others, the revolution in Sweden, with the circumstances of which I happened to be well acquainted, and, of course, took occasion to say some things which he seemed to like; others, that were rather too bold and plain for that audience. However, as I used a language apparently new to him, he was pleased with it. In mentioning the virtues and qualities of my own sovereign, one of the lords of his suit said, 'What, the King of England?' 'Yes,' said the King, 'I know what the Governor says is strictly true; he is a most worthy and well-informed Prince.' Our subsequent discourses he chose should be tête-à-tête.

"The evening before I left Spa I had a full hour of private conversation with him, wherein the subjects of war and peace, the northern confederacy, the accident which befell his frigate, the actual situation of affairs throughout the world, &c., &c., were seriously talk'd of, and I thought to his satisfaction. Our discourses ended by his saying, 'I have a great friendship for the King of England, and shall never forget le bien qu'il m'a faite, and I wish you would make this known to him when you go to England,' which I promised to do, and which I believe Mr. Cressener has done. . . . I am ignorant what good our court has done to the King of Sweden, but it seems to have made a deep impression on his mind. He was continually beset and watched by the French, and, if I mistake not, was impatient of it, from some words which escaped him. He seems to know much, and to have a strong passion to know more; is very mild, sensible and candid; very easy in his manners, which are simple and elegant, and absolutely destitute of all pretension or affec[ta]tion, as far as I could discern. . . . Upon the whole, he seemed pleased with the energy and firmness of the British nation, and said, 'I should like to be King of such a people,' which drew a compliment from me in return. . . ." 5½ pp.

Sir Grey Cooper to William Knox.

1780, Aug. 23. Worlington, near Newmarket.—I am at my cottage here for the recovery of my health, and have left all business behind, "but I carry with me all my anxiety for the present fearfull and wonderful situation of public affairs. We are fighting a good fight, but we are sorely beset and surrounded on all sides. The old stag is standing at bay, and I hope will beat off the whole pack and be at last saved to be hunted another day." If you will send me the news, I will send you my thanks and some Suffolk partridges when the shooting begins. 2 pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1780, Aug. 27. Stoneland Lodge.—Explaining that the Mr. Irwine who solicited Knox about his office in Carolina is not the man Lord George took him for—a member of the Council at Boston in very affluent circumstances, who spells his name Erwing. 1 p.

The SAME to the SAME.

1780, Sept. 3.—" I brought Vaughan's letter with me by mistake. I could not have believed our loss had been so very great. The fleet might well return to Cadiz with such a capture. Drummond's intelligence from Paris says that Ternay, on the 21st of July, was blocked up by Arbuthnot in Rhode Island. This is too good to be true, but the date makes it possible." 1 p.

The SAME to the SAME.

1780, Sept. 5 Stoneland Lodge.—" . . . I am fully persuaded that Knyphausen's march into the Jerseys was a right measure, tho' from accident it did not fully answer. Sir H. Clinton is of all men the most jealous, and when he has not the whole credit of a measure is apt to dislike the plan, however well concerted. In this case, he is not sorry to attribute the disappointment to the disaffection of the inhabitants, as an argument to support his opinion against civil government." I am not surprised at his silence concerning Ethan Allen, as " he is not apt to communicate reports, however favourable." I only kept your messenger till I could read and sign the despatches and kill the partridges for you. 2 pp.

HENRY ELLIS to WILLIAM KNOX.

1780, Sept. 6. Brussels.—Concerning his health and the capture of the merchant ship. Does not dare to look across the Atlantic, in spite of the gleam of sunshine Knox throws upon it. Explains his financial position at length as a reason for not complying with Knox's request for a loan. His rents in Ireland are paid very ill, or not at all; it is three years since he received anything out of his offices in the West Indies, which were much in arrears when the French war began; his little pension from Government " is in the same state "; he has been obliged to give his brother Bob a thousand pounds to save him from ruin, has paid 960*l.* towards Major Ellis's commission, and Lord Bellamont and Mr. Montgomery owe him 8,000*l.* Conequently, although Knox's terms and security are perfectly satisfactory, he has not the money at command. 5½ pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1780, Sept. 18. Stoneland Lodge.—I sincerely pity poor Cunningham, and hope the Assembly will never obtain the repeal of the 4½ per cent. duty which Lord North last year seemed to intend if possible. I hope the Treasury will help the poor Governor, and a rigorous exaction of the duty complained of may afford a revenue for him.

"I am sorry the New Ireland business is in so bad a train. Lord Stormont's expedient I should have no objection to adopt, if we were not to apply to Parliament for money, but as the House of Commons will certainly start the difficulty, we shall make but a poor figure in not having the support of the law servants of the Crown. Can we not take possession of it as a conquered country, and establish a government in it . . and leave the discussion of the rights of the charter to the final settlement of the Colonies or till we can legally annul it ? 3½ pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1780, Sept. 28. Pall Mall.—Stating that as the letters from America plainly show the disagreement between the Admiral and the General [Arbuthnot and Clinton], it is thought better not to print extracts, but merely to relate the facts which they contain. 1½ pp.

SIR GREY COOPER to WILLIAM KNOX.

1780, Sept. 29. Worlingham Cottage.—"I fear the golden dreams we had after the taking of Charlestown are all over. There was a period of the French history under their Kings whom they called Les Faineans. The whole war in America has been conducted by such generals. What is all this mighty fleet riding for at Torbay. I trust Darby has orders to relieve Gibraltar and to support the Queen of Portugal. If not, Parliament will meet in thunder, lightning, and in rain. What does this emeûte in Chili amount to ? Our conduct with respect to our Colonies was perhaps founded in error, but that of the Spanish councils is absolute dementation. Swift says, how shou'd a man take advice when he will not take warning." Would that we could give General Lee his pardon, send him to head the Indians and steal a march through Paraguay, and so redeem the crime of one rebellion by the merit of another. I think Cumberland ought to be told to acquaint the Spanish ministry that it is contrary to the principles of the King's Government, as well as of the law of nations, to abet or aid rebellious subjects ; that we should never do so but in self-defence and case of absolute necessity ; that peace alone can prevent such necessity, " and that such peace ought to be cemented by the execution of Lord Rochford's admirable plan ; a treaty of mutual guaranty of colonies against all the world." 4 pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1780, Oct. 3. Stoneland Lodge.—Stating that if the Ministers have no better place to dine on Thursday, his house is at their service. Considers Mr. Lawrence's papers a most valuable prize, and hopes there will be no difficulty in committing him for high treason in America, to prevent his being admitted to bail. The Amsterdam project for a treaty of commerce may be of infinite service. Trusts that they have negotiated the affair without the knowledge of the Prince of Orange or the other provinces. 2 pp.

The Same to the Same.

1780, Oct. 8. Stoneland Lodge.—Thanking Mrs. Knox for her goodness "in permitting the girls to wait upon her to the ball," and enclosing "the answer of a ready acceptance on their part." 1½ pp.

Viscount Townshend to William Knox.

1780, Oct. 11. Rainham.—"I was just ordering some game to be pack'd up for you, for the late Charles Town success, when your Gazette from Lord Cornwallis arrived, and hath filled us all with joy. The very masterly, decided, and persevering conduct of my noble relation has made this family compleatly happy. Would to God it did everyone in this country. We should no longer contend about preservation or loss of territory we can never abandon without being perfectly insignificant.

"Accept, dear Sir, my usual small tribute whenever favorable events occur, and allow them to contribute to a chearful glass to our worthy friend in Carolina. Lady Townshend joins me in sincere congratulations and wishes."

P.S.—4 brace of pheasants, 1 brace of hares, by the Fakenham coach, will arrive at the Green Dragon, Bishop Gate Street. 1½ pp.

Lord George Germain to William Knox.

1780, Oct. 28.—General Clarke is still at Cork. Lord Amherst says it is to be left to him whether he waits there till spring, comes to London, or takes passage to New York, by which last plan however, he would probably not reach Quebec much the sooner. 1 p. Seal of arms.

The Same to the Same.

1780, Dec. 17. Pall Mall.—I wish you could call here before dinner, as the Dutch business presses. There will be another Cabinet to-morrow if the Chancellor can attend. "The mediation from Russia is not absolutely offered, but held out in a manner that the not accepting of it would be an affront." 1 p.

James Robertson to William Knox.

1780, Dec. 19. New York.—Has consulted Chief Justice Smith and Superintendent Elliot about the propriety and practicability of collecting the usual duty, formerly payable at the Custom House, on goods imported, meaning, when he gets their report, to lay a clear statement before Sir H. Clinton and learn his pleasure. The only alteration he has made about letters of mark is to drop a great part of the fees, which were complained of as too high. Mr. Tryon paid a clerk out of this fund, but that is not now possible. If the campaign has ended with less eclat than was hoped, he trusts Lord Amherst will not blame him, as he "proposed and took every measure to make it active, of importance here and popular at home." 1½ pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1780, Dec. 29. Pall Mall.—I suppose you will publish in the Gazette on Saturday our accounts from Barbadoes. Cuninghame wishes the address of the Council to the King to be taken notice of; probably he is the more anxious as it ends with a compliment to himself. Dalrymple may perhaps throw some fresh light on Clinton's intentions, but I expect little exertion from that quarter. I feel more disappointed and less sanguine about the success of the war in America than I have ever yet done. I must beg you to correct with attention what I wrote hurriedly last night to enforce the establishing a port in the Chesapeak. "When we are to act with such a man as Clinton we must be cautious not to give him an opportunity of doing a rash action under the sanction of what he may call a positive order. We can only state our wishes and our expectations in the strongest light for carrying so favourite an object into execution when the other services he is engaged in will render it practicable." 2½ pp.

Enclosing :—

Rough draft of letter to GENERAL CLINTON.

I cannot sufficiently lament the loss of Col. Ferguson and the detachment under his command, especially as it obliges Lord Cornwallis to retreat and to recall General Leslie from the Chesapeak. It is very unfortunate that Portsmouth should be abandoned after being possessed a second time, as a port established there would be of the utmost consequence, "by annoying the trade of the enemy, securing a safe port for our ships, and by giving the friends of Government an opportunity of effectually exerting themselves for the restoring his Majesty's authority. . . . I am much concerned that you could not spare any detachment from New York for so important an object, as Mr. Washington's army must be diminished considerably by the discharge of the three months' men in October, and of those of six months whose time of service expires in January. . . . Whenever the service will permit it, his Majesty trusts that you will take the earliest opportunity of establishing a permanent port in the Chesapeak, that the people may see that effectual protection will be held out to them"; but it is not to be wondered at if they are backward in declaring themselves when they see ports abandoned, and loyalists left to the resentment of the enemy. 3 pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1781, Jan. 1. Drayton.—Those who read the correspondence with Clinton must see that we have never altered our opinion as to a settlement on the Chesapeak. "He has always adopted the idea, has promised to execute the plan, but is never steady when the most favourable circumstances invite him to pursue it. I should think he will feel hurt at seeing his conduct set in its true light, and that, if the jealousy of Lord Cornwallis does not outweigh, he will take the opportunity of quitting his command. . . . What Haldimand says about his force is very fair. I wish we could reinforce him with 3,000 men. . . . I fear Lord Amherst will not be prepared for complying with his demand, but the sooner his lordship receives extracts of his letters upon that subject the better. I believe the old Swisse is not now governed by Cramhé, for he has not taken the least notice of him since they differed in Council about fixing the price of corn. One of the judges, whose name I forget, has his chief confidence. . . ." 4 pp.

The Same to the Same.

1781, Jan. 4. Drayton.—I am much concerned at the dismal accounts from Jamaica, and fear that the Thunderer and the other missing ship are lost. Capt. Walsingham's family must feel greatly distressed by the letter of Sir P. Parker, published in the Gazette. The dispatch from Haldimand is very satisfactory, but "I doubt whether it might not be better to leave out of the returns the particulars of the houses, mills, barns, &c., that were destroyed. The returns would stand very well without them, and there are only three or four short sentences in the letter which relate to the burning and the plundering. What he says of the Indians will please everybody, as that force might be most usefully employed if any degree of discipline could be established among them, and Major Carleton seems to have succeeded in a point which others have represented as impracticable. . . ." 3 pp.

The Same to the Same.

1781, April 16. Stoneland Lodge.—I am more in hopes that the Spaniards mean to engage our fleet than I was. While such an event is depending we can only pray for success; but "I will not suppose such a fleet as Darby's can be defeated by the navy of Spain.

"The accounts of Lord Cornwallis' progress are most promising as he drives the enemy before him. . . . I dare say Arnold knows that his detachment can safely join Lord Cornwallis, and his sending it is a fresh proof of his zeal and activity. . . . If Arbuthnot is ignorant of the destination of the Rhode Island fleet, and has not attempted to destroy the ships in the Chesapeak which have taken the Romulus, he will have afforded sufficient matter of triumph to those who state him as unequal to his command. . . .

"The extract of Rodney's letter to Mr. Stephens should be communicated to the Council Office before the Committee takes the London and Bristol petitions into consideration. You will see by Lord Lisburne's letter that we shall probably have disagreeable disputes between the navy and army. I do not think that we can as yet do more than has been done from my office, relative to the distribution of the prizes. I do not like Ramsay's letters, as I fear, if half what he says be true, that the love of plunder has too much engrossed the attention of the army." 4 pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1781, April 17. Stoneland Lodge.—Thinks the news from the East Indies less alarming than he expected, and hopes Sir Eyre Coote will collect such a force at Madras as will set things right again. Cannot conceive "what Rumbold can say for leaving his Government in such a state, for he must have known of the war that was impending." 2 pp.

HENRY ELLIS to WILLIAM KNOX.

1781, May 10. Spa.—"Whilst I continued in the enemies country, it would have been equally useless and improper to have written to an English Under-Secretary of State; extremely improper for my own security, and certainly useless, as I could neither impart, or receive, any interesting intelligence. As soon, however, as I arrived at this friendly asylum, one of my first thoughts was to make a direct enquiry about you and your's. . . . Placed as I have been for six months past, at the southern extremity of France, I was not in the way of acquiring the knowledge of any important secrets, much less of transmitting them. It was with difficulty, even, that I could know with tolerable accuracy any particular event that happened, or the shadow of any political truth, disreputable to the character, or prejudicial to the interests of a people warmly attached to their Prince and to the honor of their country; and amongst whom faction dares not shew its head a moment. All that I could discover was that our conduct embarrassed and astonished them; and that, altho' the effects of the war were generally and pretty severely felt, yet there was no appearance of discontent, or hardly any open murmuring abroad. The state of the French Finances, published by Mr. Neckar, produced a very great sensation at first, not only in France, but in other parts of Europe, and gave a high idea of the resources of that Kingdom, and of the candour and ability of its Minister. But the sentiments of the publick in these respects are mightily changed since it has been known that he prohibited the publication of a review of his performance, after having appealed to those in office to confirm or refute it. A very enlightened friend of mine, who was in the Bureau of Monsieur de Turgot, has assured me that he could point out above 160 millions of debt, in one shape or other, concealed from the publick.

"If you are not already possessed of M. Neckar's paper, and desire to have it, I can easily procure and convey it to you. I have had frequent occasions of late to hear the British Nation spoken of with respect, and even admiration, for its firmness and magnanimity, as well as its ministers, who, in every country but their own, are regarded as wise, active and able statesmen. Foreigners were particularly struck with the boldness and good policy of resenting the conduct of the Dutch ; and a gentleman of much consideration and veracity, who passed the last winter at Vienna, told me that before that measure took place, the Emperor often expressed his surprize that we did not attack them, adding, that Mr. Pitt would not have had so long patience ; and that when the Declaration of Hostility appeared, the marks of satisfaction he shew'd and the things he said upon the occasion, were almost beyond the bounds of decency and prudence. . . ." 4 pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1781, June 7. Drayton.—On behalf of a "poor woman"* who wishes to remain in England. "What Lord Dunmore could mean by ordering her to Virginia in the present circumstances of that province," Lord George cannot conceive. 1¼ pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1781, June 9. Drayton.—"Governor Martin must naturally despond when he is disappointed in his expectations of immediate assistance from the inhabitants of N. Carolina. Those poor people have suffered sufficiently from the cruelty of the rebels, and those who have been induced to declare in our favour have not been protected, so that I cannot suppose many will expose themselves to be murdered till they see the King's troops able to drive Mr. Greene out of their province, and proceed to punishment and not to proclamations of pardon in consequence of victory." If Martin sees the case desperate, he is right to inform the King's ministers, but I hope he will not proclaim it to the public. If his health is the cause of his resigning, it may lead him to see things in an unfavourable light. Lord Sandwich was very averse from sending any of his fleet to meet the Jamaica trade. I thought he risked much by withstanding the merchants, but I conclude he is alarmed by some fresh intelligence or fears the clamour which would follow a second capture.

I rely little upon Mr. Jenkinson's Virginia intelligence, unless we knew how the person was able to find out the sentiments of so many people ; the prisoners in general being confined on parole within very narrow limits, and quartered where the inhabitants were not friends to our Government. But I am not sorry for Lord Dunmore to delay his departure, as we may be able to enquire further about his influence in the back settlements.

"I hope Rodney will not remain too long at St. Eustatius. His stay there may be fatal, for I suppose Le Grass's squadron will arrive at Martinico before the end of May, and I should be sorry indeed if he trusted an engagement of such consequence to any other admiral. Sir George Rodney and Vaughan certainly judged wrong in not attacking Curasoa at the same time they took Eustatius.

* Probably the Mrs. Thornton mentioned in Lord George's letter of July 22, below.

. . . They gave more credit to the false intelligence about the French fleet than it deserved, for Sir S. Hood, in a letter I saw from him, doubted much of its authenticity." 5½ pp.

HENRY ELLIS to WILLIAM KNOX.

1781, June 17. Spa.—". . . Our company is not much augmented, since my last, by any persons of consequence, if I except the Prince and Princess Leichtenstein, whom, as you know, are the greatest subjects of his Imperial Majesty; and the most amiable persons in the world. They expect to meet their Master here; are much attached to the English, whom they distinguish on all occasions by marked preferences. I have the honor to be the first favourite with them. . . . With these great people, we have some of high rank in the Republick of Letters, the most remarkable of whom is the expatrioted, ingenious, and most imprudent Abbé Raynall. I have much connection and many discussions with him, in which he frequently is candid enough to avow that an unjustifiable partiality for the Americans has led him into many errors. He lived at Lord Shelburne's house whilst he was in England, and from that factious chief and his satellites imbibed those American doctrines which he has so injuriously employed against us; and those dangerous principles which threaten a general subversion of every system, religious or civil, hitherto respected by mankind. He confesses he fell into bad hands, and attributes to their reasonings the wrong he has done, and the misfortunes that menace him. I am persuaded if he writes, and which he certainly will do very soon, he will endeavour to disabuse mankind in reference to the charges he directed against us.

" You see the fate of M. Necker; the circumstances which produced his disgrace I suppose you are not ignorant of, otherwise I might, in few words, suggest them to you; the principal, indeed, were his designs against the Parliaments and the Intendents of the Provinces, whom he looked upon as in the way to obstruct the operation of his new system of Finance; and his ambition to force himself into the Council."

Your letter gave me great pleasure. You are the most interesting, instructive and encouraging of all my correspondents; and though the events you predict do not always happen, the expectation of them is no less agreeable. 4 pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1781, July 7. Pall Mall.—Lord Stormont will lay Comte Byland's application before the King. Had the Comte applied only for himself there would have been little difficulty, but he desires the same indulgence for so many others that there may be objections raised to sending such a number of officers home upon parole. 1½ pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1781, July 13. Pall Mall.—Is not pleased with the dispatches, and wishes to talk them over with Knox before seeing the King or any of the ministers. Has not been feeling well, and these dispatches have done him no good ; therefore he dares not trust himself at a turtle feast, and hopes there will be time to supply his place with some one more worthy of a good dinner. 1½ pp.

The Same to the Same.

1781, July 22. Stoneland Lodge.—You will see by Lord Bathurst's letter that Mrs. Thornton's request has not been complied with. "I wish you would speak to the Treasury about it, for it certainly was not the intention of Lord North to strike from the list any persons who could not be of the least use in Virginia, or who could not have a chance of living upon their property ; at least I did not understand the order I issued to extend to that length." I have written to his lordship as civilly as I could, and hope the poor woman may not be distressed. 2 pp.

General Robert Cuningham to William Knox.

1781, Aug. 23. Mount Kennedy.—Is anxious about his brother, who seems to have been intemperate and injudicious at setting out, but, since he began to recollect himself, has done better. Is thankful to hear that none of his actions are censurable, and prays Knox to prompt Lord North on his behalf, as he must be distressed for money. 2 pp.

Lord George Germain to William Knox.

1781, Sept. 21. Pall Mall.—"Rodney is arrived at Plymouth in the Gibraltar. Sir S. Hood had not sailed for America when he left Eustatius ; he waited for the return of the six ships sent with Drake off Martinico by a false intelligence of Sir Thos. Rich. As soon as they join him, he steers for the Chesapeak, where he will arrive too late, unless De Grasse convoys the trade from the Cape till they are in safety."

The merchants say the Dutch fleet is sailed, but the Admiralty have a letter saying they were still in Texel on the 12th. "Ireland is all zeal and loyalty, and the volunteers are ready to fight and obey the King's Generals. The embarkation is going on at Brest, the destination only guessed at. The letters from New York all complain of the inactivity of our army ; the refugees are now supported and are doing real service." Lord Sandwich is still ill. 3¼ pp.

Sir Grey Cooper to William Knox.

1781, Oct. 16. Worlington.—"I received your budget with very great pleasure. . . . It made me sleep better and sigh seldomer, but still I cannot sleep well, and still I ingeminate the sigh of Falkland. It cannot, however, be said that the providence of God fights against us by the operation of second causes. The King may have the line of Claudian quoted for him as appositely as King William or Queen Elizabeth : 'Oh nimium dilecte Deo, cui militat æther.' . . . The 4th of September did as much for us as any day in the autumn of 1588 did for Elizabeth."

We have a formidable league against us, "but the conduct of those powers who planned the ruin of the State of Venice was great and magnificent . . . in comparison to the paltry ambition and impotent exertions of the Family Compact, and the Dutch faction grafted on the original stock of American rebellion, and yet it has well nigh ruined Great Britain and the Colonies by the mere wear and tear of an indecisive war. . . . Nevertheless, I am inclined to hope we shall get through the plunge though half drowned, and a proper object for the care of the Humane Society. . . . Shall we ever have another victory on that element where we used to command?" 5 pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1781, Nov. 1. Drayton.—". . . It is in vain to argue upon the operations or destinations of fleets when it is impossible to know the true situation of our naval force. If Lord Sandwich proposes or fully approves of any plan, we seldom want resources; on the other hand, if he does not heartily adopt what other ministers think right, official difficulties occur, and the state of our fleet is such that no new measure can be pursued. . . . We cannot possibly save Jamaica or the Leeward Islands unless eight ships are immediately dispatched to re-inforce our squadron in those seas, and if we cannot have ten or twelve ships cruising in the bay, we must fairly declare we are unable to continue the war. . . . I will write a few lines to Lord Stormont, tho' my opinion or his will signify little if the Admiralty do not seriously adopt it.

"Many thanks for your congratulations. We have every reason to be pleased, and I trust that this marriage will be productive of all possible happiness to Mr. Herbert and my daughter." 4 pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1781, Nov. 4. Drayton.—Your news is indeed very alarming. "Lord Cornwallis's situation is most critical; but I should not fear so much for him if there was a prospect of his being relieved by the fleet; but I confess, after Mr. Greaves' ill-success, I cannot be over sanguine about his forcing his way into the Chesapeak against so superior a force. . . . If our fleet should be repulsed, Lord Cornwallis will then have no resource but attempting, at all events, to retreat into Carolina, in which I cannot conceive he will succeed. . . . I cannot say what ought to be in the Gazette. As little as possible should be published. The preparations making for the sailing of the fleet and the sending a re-inforcement by it of troops ought, in my opinion, to be mentioned, as Washington is marching to Virginia." 4 pp.

GENERAL JAMES CUNINGHAM to WILLIAM KNOX.

1781, Nov. 17. Barbados.—"You will see by the answer of the Assembly to my speech, that they afforded me, at the close of it, an opportunity of making the proposition to commute the fees for the full salary, which, they declining, I now send you home my defence to the charges exhibited by the Assembly and Mr. Estwick against me." When you and Lord Geo. Germain have read it, you will send it to the Board of Trade. Our Assembly has at last brought in a bill for distributing the Parliamentary donation, but possibly our Council may amend or reject it. I wish a part of the money could have been applied to the fortifications of the island. The Fortune, Capt. Christian, is arrived from New York, having taken three prizes on his way. "He informs me that upon Admiral Digby's joining our fleet they had determined to proceed, on the 15th October, with Sir Henry Clinton and 6,500 on board the ships of war, to attack the French fleet in the Chesapeak and relieve Lord Cornwallis. We expect daily an account of this important event, upon which the safety of these islands so much depends." 3 pp.

The Duke of Northumberland to William Knox.

1781, Nov. 23. Northumberland House.—Informing Knox that he has been placed on the New Commission of the Peace for Middlesex. ½ p.

Lord George Germain to William Knox.

1782, Jan. 10. Drayton.—If the French fleet should be effectually dispersed, the whole plan of the campaign may be changed. I have no apprehensions for Charlestown; but Georgia will be exposed to inroads if Green's army should be re-inforced from Virginia.

"We go on here with our usual amusements, as if all were peace and quiet. Lord North perhaps is doing the same at Bushey; but if he intends to make any change among us, it is almost time to let us into the secret." 1 p.

George III.

1782, Jan. 14.—The covering sheet of a draft, endorsed with the note in Knox's hand: "Lord Sandwich having shown Mr. Knox the minute of Cabinet of the 10th inst., he prepared a letter in consequence and sent it down to Lord George Germain, who has returned it signed, with orders to send it to the Admiralty if your Majesty approves of the draft." Underneath, the King has written:— "Approved, 10 aft. 8 a.m., 15th."

Lord George Germain to William Knox.

1782, Jan. 27 —"You will see Lord Sandwich wishes to keep clear of ordering an inquiry or a Court Martial upon Admiral Graves. You will be so good as to prepare what materials we have, and send them to the Admiralty, but I shall certainly not signify the King's pleasure upon this subject until the papers have been considered by the Cabinet." 1 p.

Enclosing:—

1. Lord Sandwich to Lord Geo. Germain.

"Upon considering the subject of our conversation yesterday, and looking into the papers we have in our possession at this office, it is clear to me that we have not any materials that can serve as a sufficient ground for ordering a Court Martial to enquire into Admiral Grave's conduct. We have his letter containing his own account of the action off the Chesapeak, but I do not think there is anything in its contents that conveys any idea of criminality on his part; for want of success I can never allow to come under that description.

"We have another letter from him after his return from New York, an extract of which I enclose; it is all that he says about the Council of War, of which he does not send us a copy.

"I cannot, therefore, see how we can proceed to order an enquiry without materials and directions from your lordship's office, and I think we should not only have the Council of War sent to us, but Sir Henry Clinton's letters, or any others you may have received from America, complaining or a dilatoriness on the part of the Admiral in the equipment of his fleet; and that at the same time you should signify the King's pleasure that an enquiry should be ordered with as little delay as possible.

"Your lordship will observe that in affairs of magnitude, the King's pleasure has been usually so signified. Mr. Matthews and his officers were ordered to be tried in consequence of his Majesty's pleasure signified to the Admiralty by the Secretary of State; there was the same proceeding with regard to Admiral Byng, and, in the latter case, there was no Parliamentary interposition; that, therefore, is a case exactly in point, and, indeed, I think the other is so likewise, for it appears that the order to this Board came directly from the Crown. . . ." Admiralty, Jan. 27, 1782. 3½ pp.

2. Rear Admiral Graves to Philip Stephens.

Stating that it had been decided at a council of flag and general officers that, as it seemed impossible to relieve Lord Cornwallis by land, the ships of war should take on board what provisions they could, embark Sir H. Clinton and 6,000 men, if possible, and make an attempt to force their way. Three fire ships were to be added, every exertion was being made, and it was hoped that in ten days all would be ready. Sandy Hook, Sept. 26, 1781. Extract. 1 p.

[William Knox ?] to Governor Robertson.

1782, Feb. 6.—You have now the power in your own hands of restoring the province to peace, and I earnestly recommend you to call an Assembly at once "to consult upon what terms they will unite with Great Britain; holding out pardons and safe conduct to all who should come duly elected. I would propose only one thing to them to deliberate upon, which is, whether they chuse to continue connected with Great Britain as members of the same Empire, or chuse to renounce all the privileges and advantages of Britons, all protection and benefits, and so become aliens. If they chuse the former, then I would only say to them: 'It is your interest as well as that of Britain never again to quarrel; consider therefore what will best serve to cement the union, I will consent to whatever has that tendency, and I will propose or desire nothing from you that has it not'; and so leave them to themselves. If any of them resolve to have no connection with Britain: 'You who are of that opinion, go to your homes in peace. I will not consider you as enemies, but you must not expect to be treated as countrymen. Ye are aliens; live upon your lands in peace; none of our laws shall go among you, you can have no trade with us, nor come into our country with any of your commodities. Take care you do us no injury, for if we find you doing mischief, we shall punish you according to our laws.' This is the experiment I would try. Keep the law in your own hands." Extract, in Knox's handwriting. 3½ pp.

Lord George Germain to William Knox.

1782, Feb. 7, Pall Mall.—" . . . The King thinks what you propose about the pension very reasonable, and approves much of your continuing your assistance to Mr. Ellis. The House of Lords have been attacking me, but without great success. 1 p.

Dated, Jan. 7; but endorsed correctly. The attack in the Lords was on Feb. 7.

Viscount Sackville* to William Knox.

1782, March 2. Pall Mall.—These letters were brought by Capt. Skinner, and I find them to be official; I therefore send them to you. This officer says that when he sailed from Charlestown, on Jan. 25, Leslie was encamped about four and a half miles from the town. There were a thousand reports of a French and Spanish army being expected by the rebels. St. John's Island was not in their hands. 1 p.

William Knox to Lord Shelburne.

1782, April 23.—" When your lordship was pleased yesterday to inform me that the resolution was taken to suppress the American department entirely, and so obliging as to assure me that attention would be shown to my services and situation, your lordship could not then spare the time to hear me fully upon the subject. I, therefore, now take the liberty to give your lordship a more particular relation of my office, history and present situation." When Lord Hillsborough brought me into office as one of his Under-Secretaries, I had an estate in Georgia of from 1,500*l.* to 2,000*l.* a year, and also a large property in Dominica, purchased at the public sale. Mr. Pownall took all the fees, and there remained for me only the salary of 500*l.* a year, but Lord Hillsborough promised me the first office that fell. The grant of the Ohio Laws obliging his lordship to resign the seals about two years after, and nothing having fallen, he got for me the reversion of the secretary's office of New York, and the then Patentee being advanced in years, I purchased his interest for 3,000*l.* in the year 1774, and let it to a deputy for 1,000*l.* per annum.

* Lord Geo. Germain ceased to be Secretary and was raised to the peerage in February, 1782.

"But the fatal revolt of New York and Georgia deprived me in the next year of my whole income. My office was abolished and my deputy, with the records, carried up into the county of New York, and my estate in Georgia was sequestered, and the produce applied to the purposes of the Congress." I applied to Lord North but could obtain nothing until I presented a memorial to the King, who was graciously pleased to order that my income as secretary of New York should be made good to me until I was restored to it; and then I obtained a warrant for a pension of 1,200*l.* When Lord Sackville was about to retire, he professed himself much obliged to me for the assistance I had given him, and (it being probable that both New York and Georgia would be lost to the King and Dominica retained by the French) he obtained for me a promise from the King that my pension should be distributed between my wife and three daughters, as a provision in case of my death. Lord North, however, objected to this distribution, and ordered the sum to be divided between myself and my wife. I offered to resign my half if appointed to either of the Boards of Customs or Excise, but, Sir Stanier Porten having a prior promise, that arrangement could not take place. Your lordship will see by this, that no part of the Royal bounty was intended as a compensation for my going out of office, but I am too sensible of the King's great goodness to me in my misfortunes to think of requesting any further allowance on account of the suppression of the office, and shall be content "with the continuance of my salary until I am otherways provided for which, as there is no Under-Secretary to succeed me, will be no burthen upon the public. . . . I must entreat your lordship to inform his Majesty of my grateful sentiments, and how far I have manifested them by my conduct since your lordship came into office; and, as it will be the great comfort of my life that my conduct is known to have been approved by his Majesty, I would beg your lordship to lay my humble request at his Majesty's feet, that he will be graciously pleased to honor my dismission by a mark of his royal favour." Draft. 10¼ pp.

Sir Archibald Campbell to William Knox.

1782, May 3. Spanish Town.—"You will have learnt ere now the fortunate turn of affairs in this quarter of the globe, by Rodney's defeat of the Count de Grasse to windward. The most of the enemy's shattered fleet have got into Cape Francoise, and by one of my spyes, who left Cuba the 19th of the last month, Solano's fleet had also reached the same port; by which means the Spaniards have twelve sail of the Line and twelve thousand regulars at the rendevouze, where I hope Sir Geo. B. Rodney will detain them until they have expended their provisions and health in the service.

"Should Don Galvez take this occasion to push for Augustine, it is my opinion that Sir George will knock up Solano's fleet, as well as that of the Count de Grasse. I have a thousand pick'd men to co-operate with him in that event.

"I am much obliged to his Majesty's Ministers of State for their favourable opinion of my exertions. Indeed, Sir, they have far exceeded my most sanguine expectations. The Militia were few in numbers, but have made such a rapid progress in discipline that astonished the most dejected subjects amongst us.

"Our Artillery from twelve pieces only fit for service, I increased in the course of six weeks to sixty-four pieces in excellent order for service; and had the pleasure to make the Count de Grasse and his officers gape when they entered the squares in which they were arranged.

"As Sir George must quit those seas about the hurricane months, I shall always take it for granted, if the enemy do not disperse by that time, they will certainly visit us whenever the bad weather is over; and I mean to take my precautions accordingly. But I would hope that this blow to the French fleet will put an end to their views upon Jamaica for this war. However, as it would be bad policy to trust to events so precarious, let me advise the sending out of regulars to compleat us to three thousand, and I will venture to insure this valuable Island to his Majesty at the risk of my head." 2 pp.

Viscount Sackville to William Knox.

1782, July 9. Stoneland Lodge.—"If Lord Shelburne really intends to act the part of a faithfull and honest servant of the Crown and the country, I have no doubt of his being chearfully and earnestly supported by Lord North, and all those who acted with him upon principle. What still puzzles me is to account for the conduct of Mr. Fox; as he means granting independance to America, and to have the lead and direction in Government, why does he resign without waiting for some measure being proposed which might justify his leaving the King's service, and at the same time secure his popularity, for he cannot imagine to create a clamour against the King because he will not permit the shatter'd remains of the Rockingham party to nominate the first Lord of the Treasury. If Lord Shelburne would publickly avow and repeat what he has frequently declared to be his sentiments about maintaining the sovereignty of this country over America, I do flatter myself that he would find his ground popular, and meet with a support from the most respectable characters in Parliament, as he might offer terms to the Colonies, which, if they refused, no sensible man could justify their conduct. I should be glad, indeed, if you were employed in carrying into execution any plan similar to that we have so often convers'd upon; I am persuaded it would tend to the happiness of both countries, particularly to that of America. If Mr. Pitt should accept of office and take the lead in the House of Commons, Mr. Fox will have little chance of being again a minister; and you will see him act as a desperate opposer of the new Administration.

I trust Lord Keppel will be too wise to follow such a leader; his resignation, I should think, would be only acceptable to Lord Howe. The Duke of Portland, I conclude, will not remain in Ireland after the Session there is closed, and I hope great care will be taken in appointing a proper successor to him. That country must not be neglected, as its new constitution has not yet taken root. I wish it was in my power to contribute in any shape to the forwarding or supporting such measures as the King would approve; my best wishes will ever attend him, and I shall sincerely rejoice when I see him releas'd from those fetters which he has lately been obliged to wear." 3½ pp.

Viscount Sackville to William Knox.

1782, July 13. Stoneland Lodge.—Congratulations on the birth of a son.

"If I can believe newspapers, Mr. Fox and Lord Shelburne must settle their disputes in Hyde Park, for I never heard such language given by one gentleman to another, as Mr. Fox used in the last minutes of this Session.

"Lord Shelburne's plan for America is mere speculation, for I am persuaded the Congress will not make Independance the basis of a Treaty, and if my accounts from New Yorke are true, Washington is in motion with his army, with a view to attack Sir Guy Carleton. Then we shall see what construction Sir Guy puts upon the resolution of the House of Commons; I am apt to think he is too good an officer to remain within his lines when the rebells divide their force for the different attacks they may intend.

"If Lord Temple prefers the Blue Ribbon to the Lieutenancy of Ireland he is, in my opinion, a wise man. Surely General Burgoyne will return that he may support his friend Mr. Fox; and, if he does, the command will probably be offered to Lord Cornwallis. What a curious explanation of his creed Lord Shelburne made in the House of Lords; it is almost as intelligible as the King's speech. But, however, I am glad the Session is at an end, and if the D. of Richmond and Conway resign in the course of this summer, I shall hope Providence has not deem'd (sic) this country to total destruction.

"Lord Howe's fleet, I hear, is sail'd many ships short in number from what I expected. Had he had thirty under his command, I should have wished him to have met the enemy; as it is, I conclude, it will be a campaign of manœuvre. His lordship will have great advantage by having to do with a combined fleet, which can not move or act together unless his lordship will be as complaisant to them as Admiral Parker was to the Dutch. I see no Paymaster appointed in the place of Mr. Burke, the Advocate [Dundas] I suppose is settling his terms, for a man ought to be pay'd before he accepts of 4,000*l.* a year. . . ."

P.S.—"I have now seen Lord Walsingham; he tells me Barré is Paymaster; the Advocate if he pleases Treasurer of the Navy, and that Lord Temple certainly goes to Ireland." 3½ pp.

LORD WESTCOTE to WILLIAM KNOX.

1782, July 14. Hagley Park.—Some of the appointments made since Mr. Fox's resignation are, perhaps, best accounted for from the difficulties Lord Shelbourne must have found in making his arrangements. His taking the lead did not surprise me, "and I am glad to see the powers of government placed in his lordship's hands rather than in those of any other man who was in opposition to Lord North, for I have allways had a very high opinion of Lord Shelburne's talents, and had for many years a very friendly connexion with his lordship, which grew weaker as our politicial sentiments were widely different, and in Parliament I attached myself to Lord North." Lady Westcote, my daughter, and Mrs. Fitzmaurice join me in congratulations on the birth of your stout boy. 2 pp.

VISCOUNT SACKVILLE to WILLIAM KNOX.

1782, July 29. Stoneland Lodge.—"The Advocate has done fairly by Lord North and wisely for himself. Lord Shelburne, I dare say, will have no objection to have it known that Lord North approves of the Advocate's taking part in the present arrangement.

"Lord Howe is certainly strong enough to attack the combined fleet, for which reason I conclude they will avoid an action. . . . Lord Temple's appointment of his youngest brother [W. Wyndham Grenville] to be secretary in Ireland may be a wise measure; he is a young man of great parts; it is pity he has not had a little experience in business before he enters upon an office of such importance." 1¼ pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1782, Aug. 1. Stoneland Lodge.—Will gladly stand godfather to Knox's son.

"Lord Shelburne may negotiate with Franklin as long as he pleases, but he will not succeed till France is satisfied; for I am persuaded both Washington and the Congress are in the pay of France. . . . I do not see the policy of evacuating Savannah and Charlestown. The Congress will then have but one army to maintain, and when their force is united, New York will not resist it." 2½ pp.

LORD WESTCOTE to WILLIAM KNOX.

1782, Sept. 7. Hagley Park.—". . . Poor Sir James Wright I hear, is come home, and I hope he has done travelling for the rest of his life, and will have a competent allowance from Government to make him live comfortably. If you have sent your negros to New York, I presume it will only be in their way to one of the few West India islands left to us, where you may dispose of them to advantage.

"When I left London in June to come hither, I flattered myself that peace would be concluded before the winter set in, because I believed the ministry of that day were resolved to make it at almost any price, but now I am afraid no conjecture can be formed when we shall have one. . . .

"It seems to be the universal opinion of all I converse with that the line of battle, as now formed, cannot stand their ground; that some changes will be made, and some allies taken in." My eldest son and my sister Fitzmaurice are here with me. I join my wife at Cheltenham next week. 3 pp.

Sir Archibald Campbell to William Knox.

1782, Sept. 15. Spanish Town.—I thank you for your kind attention to my interests, especially in relation to the salary of this Government. Without his Majesty's favourable decision, my private fortune must have been sacrificed in the service, "for, as Governor Dalling had unfortunately lost the confidence of the people, it became necessary in me, by acts of address and liberality, to regain for Government what his inattentions and abstractedness had lost; the good effects of which were conspicuous during the last martial law by the unanimity and cheerful spirit which diffused itself thro' the community at large."

As to the fate of Georgia, ignorant as I am of the causes which led us to withdraw our handful of troops, I cannot judge of its necessity, but its effects must be injurious "to a degree beyond what the speculative politicians have calculated. If it is true that the evacuation of St. Augustine and Charlestown is to follow that of the Savannah, our curtain over America will drop," and we must expect serious losses in our homeward bound fleets from Jamaica during the continuance of the war. Hearing that some of your and Sir James Wright's negroes had arrived in this island. I have done all in my power "towards employing them in a way useful to their owners and agreeable to themselves." Don Galvez and his army are still at Hispaniola, the combined forces being about 15,000 men. So long as they remain there I shall think Jamaica exposed to an attack. 3 pp.

Lord Hillsborough to William Knox.

1782, Oct. 9. Hillsborough.—When I look at the date of your letter, I am covered with shame, "and the worst of it is that I have no excuse to offer in my favour but that which is really none; that much company and dissipation are productive of idleness, forgetfullness and want of attention. I flatter myself, however, that long friendship and connexion will secure me your belief that my esteem and regard for you are as warm and sincere as ever."

I thank you for securing me so good a substitute at the christening as Lord Welles, and hope you were so good as to make the proper presents to the nurses on my behalf.

"I am truly concerned that your private fortune is too likely to suffer very much by the disgracefull and afflicting end of the American War; but I trust our Governors will not allow private possessions to be taken away without compensation. . . . I know as little upon Irish affairs as I do upon English; in general I hear the Lord Lieutenant well spoken of, and I trust he will restore a little vigour to Government." 2 pp.

VISCOUNT SACKVILLE to WILLIAM KNOX.

1782, Oct. 31. Drayton.—Prays God that the next news may be of a battle and a victory. No man can have a fairer opportunity of gaining honour than Lord Howe now has, and if the enemy's loss by the storm is what it is said to be, the inequality of numbers is not alarming. 2 pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1782, Nov. 11. Drayton.—"These are anxious times indeed. I see it is impossible the present ministers can stand the Session of Parliament; but I agree with you that no changes will be made till after the meeting, as the Earl of Shelburne will tread cautiously and not enter into engagements till he sees he can derive effectual support from them. If Lord North should be prevailed upon to risk himself again in office, I hope it will be in support of some important national measure. . . . No good can happen to this country whilst the Duke of Richmond and General Conway make a part of the Cabinet. When they are swept out I shall not despair of better measures being adopted, but it is not possible that Lord Shelburne can act with men who professedly distrust him. I only hope that some one man will have the decided lead, as unanimity in Council is now more than ever necessary.

"The different reports I hear about the negotiations for peace confound and distract me. Something must be settled before the meeting of Parliament. If peace is now to be obtained, it must be too humiliating to meet with the general approbation, and if the giving up Gibraltar should be one of the articles, I am certain Mr. Fox will make his stand in opposing that measure, as I believe he kept clear of that subject, tho' he shew'd the most yielding disposition upon every other."

I hear General Gray is to succeed Carleton. I fear little attention will be shown to the Loyalists' interests. I hope you have accepted Lord North's invitation to Bushy, that he may at least have one man about him that will give him honest and true information.

"If Mr. Dundas negotiates, I shall not flattter myself that measures will be the chief object; if his taking the seals himself will promote harmony and good humour in Council, I wish him success." 1½ pp.

LORD HILLSBOROUGH to WILLIAM KNOX.

1783, Jan. 16. Hillsborough.—Asking him to put into the hands of the gentlemen appointed for the business of American Loyalists, a petition from Mr. Haddon Smith, rector of Savannah in Georgia, who was driven thence by the rebels, and has lost not only his living of 300*l.* a year, but everything else that he was possessed of. 1¼ pp.

Henry Ellis to William Knox.

1783, Jan. 22. Marseilles.—Condoling with him on the loss of his brother. Hopes his health has not been affected "by the late astonishing ministerial and political changes, nor by the atrocious proceedings which have brought them about." Hears a variety of incredible rumours with regard to the "expected and singular blessing of peace."*

Postscript.—Desires to know how the vindictive act of the Jesuit Earl [Shelburne] will affect the patentees of employments abroad. 3 pp.

The Same to the Same.

1783, March 10. Marseilles.—Concerning their losses. Had made up his mind to meet the worst with firmness and resignation, being confident of saving as much out of the wreck as will secure him from indigence. Is extremely glad to hear that this is Knox's case also, but greatly regrets that, at his age and with his talents, he is retiring from public affairs. Believes Lord Shelburne had an eye to him [Ellis] in his West Indian reform, in which he has failed, but he may have succeeded better in his list of pensions. Thanks God, however, that he is as much above the reach of a minister as he ought to be below his vengeance. Hopes the King's protection will save Knox from the enemies whom (in spite of his inoffensive and beneficent behaviour in office) he made by his uprightness. Rejoices in the peace, but is surprised and indignant by some parts of the American treaty, "which is so notoriously marked by ignorance and negligence, as well as by injustice and ingratitude." 4 pp.

Col. George Augustus North to William Knox.

[1783, May], Tuesday. Whitehall.—Requesting him, on Lord North's behalf, to prepare the draft of an Act "for regulating the commerce between our remaining British Colonies, our West India Islands, and the United States, as well as any other acts it may be necessary to pass this Session" with regard to the intercourse between England and America. 1½ pp. Dated by Knox, as above.

Underwritten:—

Memo. by Knox, that Parliament having empowered the King in Council to make regulations, there was no need for an Act, and he therefore prepared Orders in Council instead.

John Scott to William Knox.

1783, May 17. Harcourt Street, Dublin.—Hearing that Knox has resolved to return to the Secretary's office, he hastens to express his sincere pleasure. Cordially loves and respects Lord North, knows of what value Knox will be to him, and wishes them "a long tenure of each other." Offers good wishes on Knox's second marriage. 1 p.

---

* The preliminaries had been signed in Paris two days before.

VISCOUNT SACKVILLE to WILLIAM KNOX.

1783, June 21. Stoneland Lodge.—"I little expected that there could have been any chance of a change in administration till after the signing of the Treaty of peace. I am glad, however, that everything remains quiet, particularly as it is owing to the proper behaviour of the Prince of Wales. I conclude the King will incline to do what is right, but I never saw any good consequence arising from any branch of the Royal Family being made independant of the Crown. What a dressing Mr. Pitt gave Lord North about whipcord, &c.! . . .

"Lord Temple's visit to the Queen's House must have created some alarm and much speculation, and I am greatly mistaken, if the ministers do not behave with a degree of decency and respect, that their reign will be of short duration." 2½ pp.

LORD SHEFFIELD to WILLIAM KNOX.

1783, July 3. Sheffield Place.—Is sincerely pleased that the order in Council has passed exactly as Knox drew it. The country had nearly suffered the greatest mischief, but its carrying trade, and consequently the foundation of its navy, is now safe. The pamphlet about which Knox kindly asks will be out next week. The subject proved so prolific that the work was doubled. An appendix has been added, containing "some curious accounts of imports, exports, &c." Urges Knox to visit him when he is at Stoneland. 3 pp.

VISCOUNT SACKVILLE to WILLIAM KNOX.

1783, July 4. Stoneland Lodge.—"I am happy in hearing that your plan is adopted, and that the trade between the Islands and the States is put upon the best footing for this country that the present circumstances would admit. . . . I did not expect that the Cabinet would have proceeded with so much firmness and vigor in preferring the interest of Great Britain to that of America, supported by the West India planters." I am persuaded they would not have known how to proceed had you not lent them your assistance. What you propose for Canada strikes me as right.

"Lord Shelburne plainly intended it should be given up, or he could not have permitted Mr. Oswald to have settled such a boundary. The grants to the Loyalists in Nova Scotia and St. John's are really beyond my expectations. . . . Lord Walsingham sent me some account of the debate upon Mr. Pitt's bill, and I perceive he has at last ventured to vote in opposition. I am glad he takes any decided part; it was too unbecoming in him to be suing to every minister, without attachment to any individual or to any settled system. I think he cannot do wrong if he is admitted into Lord Thurlow's train, for Lord Temple and his lordship will probably form the next administration. Lord Loughborough's conduct appears very able, and if this ministry stands it will be owing to his support in the House of Lords." 3 pp.

VISCOUNT SACKVILLE to WILLIAM KNOX.

1783, Aug. 12. Pall Mall.—There are so few people in town that he hears no news, and cannot find out what stops the signing of the Treaty of peace, "tho' they give out there are no alarming objections to it." 2 pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1783, Aug. 16. Drayton.—I am happy that your reception at St. James' proves that justice has been done to your endeavours, and hope you will be called upon, in a manner you cannot refuse, to continue your assistance, although, while I urge you to the undertaking, I doubt if I should have either temper or perseverance to execute it myself.

"The Americans begin as I expected they would, and I am persuaded Washington, by the part he is taking, will be called forth again to settle something like a government among these wild and absurd leaders of the different States. He may, perhaps, know them too well to trust himself again amongst them. I suppose the definitive treaty will not be delayed much longer. . . . It is ridiculous to keep all the powers in Europe in suspense till thirteen provinces can agree upon what form of government they will adopt." 3 pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1783, Sept. 20. Drayton.—My son George was so ill here that I sent him up to town. I have to-day a very alarming letter from Sir J. Elliot about him, but am thankful he is in such good hands.

"It is some merit in Lord North in adopting part of the good advice you gave him. I wish the islands may adopt a plan which appears to me so unexceptionable, but I fear there is little attachment to this country or to this Government to be found among them, and if America once flourishes as an independent state, our islands will seek the first opportunity of belonging to them." 2 pp.

JOHN SCOTT to WILLIAM KNOX.

1783, Oct. 29. Harcourt Street.—Suggesting that he should try to obtain the office formerly held by Wilmot, and, since, given to Jenkinson and Weston. Allan, the Commissioner, looked towards it in Lord North's administration, but is probably now too rich, too old, and too fond of ease to care for it. 1 p.

WILLIAM KNOX to LORD NORTH.

1783, Nov. 8.—Stating that at the time of the suppression of his office, in 1782, his circumstances had not permitted his soliciting the honour of a baronetage (sometimes conferred on retiring Under-Secretaries after a less term of service than his own), but that he had requested Lord Shelburne to mention him to the King as a candidate for that honour at some future time. Has had the good fortune to save his negroes, and Parliament holds out good hopes of compensation for his property, in consequence of which he has purchased an estate of 1,000*l.* per annum, and believes himself to be in a position to support the dignity. Hearing that several baronets are speedily to be created, he prays that the name of William Knox of Lanstinan in the county of Pembroke, may be inserted in the list carried to the King. Copy. 4 pp.

LORD AMHERST to WILLIAM KNOX.

1784, Nov. 5. Whitehall.—Thanking Knox for his kind thought of him in his correspondence with Mr. Samuel Bayard concerning the Archbishop of York's lands; mentioning the fresh military appointments, and stating that the Dutch Minister is this day arrived; that the Emperor has ordered his troops to march from Upper Germany, and is coming in person to Brussels; and that the Dutch are making great preparations for war, but may probably "stop the march of the Imperialists. and not by force." 2 pp.

WILLIAM KNOX to THE KING.

1785, July 6.—Reminds his Majesty of his efforts on behalf of Irish affairs, which, however, he fears have created a prejudice against him; "for he has the misfortune to find his name as an American sufferer placed in the class of neutrals, or such as rendered no service to your Majesty during the war; and thus is he deprived of any share in the late grant of compensation on account of his confiscated estate in Georgia, which yielded him in England full 2,000*l.* a year. . . . He most earnestly and humbly implores your Majesty to rescue him from the most ignominious stigma that is now fixed upon him, by deeming him neutral in the cause of your Majesty at a time when he was exerting his utmost endeavours to promote it." Prays to be removed into the class of those allowed to have rendered service to his Majesty, although he does not desire any of this year's grant, seeing that the distress of others is greater than his own. Copy. 2½ pp.

WILLIAM KNOX.

1785, June 25–July 9.—Copies of certificates from Lords Sackville, Dartmouth and Hillsborough, testifying to William Knox's satisfactory conduct as Under-Secretary of State. 1 p.

LORD HILLSBOROUGH to WILLIAM KNOX.

1785, July 9. Hillsborough.—"I am much concerned you meet with any harsh treatment from Administration, and I am certain it is very underservedly. I send you with all my heart and from my heart the certificate you desire." ½ p.

JOHN FISHER to WILLIAM KNOX.

1785, Sept. 1. Savile Row.—"You will have felt (sic), from what you have seen in the public papers, the irreparable loss we who loved him have sustained. . . . The chasm, my dear friend, his death has left, alas, who shall fill? You will be glad, tho' not surprised, to hear that he was greater and more sublime in his death if possible than in his life. We who knew his heart knew its firmness and its principle. The prejudiced world seem now disposed to do him justice, and I believe no man, at least in my time, has been more universally lamented upon public ground. As to his friends and connections in private life, Heaven knows they pay in abundance the genuine tears of gratitude and affection. He was otherwise happy in his death, for he suffered little and retained his clear senses to the last. He was convinced of his dissolution from the moment of his relapse, and had his children and servants about him, talking and settling his affairs and wishes with them all in a state of coolness and composure that was the admiration of all about him. . . . Adieu, dear Knox! Let us mingle our tears for the greatest of men and the best of friends, for our loss is irreparable." 3 pp.

Endorsed:—"Upon Lord Sackville's death."

LORD WESTCOTE to WILLIAM KNOX.

1785, Oct. 14. Hagley.—Concerning the death of his daughter* and her infant boy, at Stourhead. Addresses his letter to Slebech [co. Pembroke], where he hopes Knox is more and more pleased with his purchase. Trusts also that he is included in the intended distribution of the 150,000*l.* granted for the American loyalists. 1½ pp.

WILLIAM EDEN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1785, Dec. 27. Parliament Street.—"Tho' you are to certain intents and purposes a county gentleman, as you describe yourself, I utterly deny that a man of your talents and information has a right in this country to consider himself as withdrawn from the public interests," and, while thanking you cordially for your kind and friendly expressions respecting the situation which I have recently accepted, "I solicit you to state in confidence and currente calamo, what you would propose if you sat as arbitrator between France and England in a new settlement of commercial arrangements, upon the principle of a fair interchange of reciprocal facilities and advantages in trade and manufactures. In doing this, you will, of course, keep a filial eye upon Ireland, and the attentions of a statesman to Portugal, Spain, Germany, and Russia; but let me entreat you to turn the subject in your mind, and speak and spare not. . . . I am anxious neither to raise mischievous alarms, nor to create unreasonable speculations, but I am also anxious to gain all usefull information, and in that view I now leave you." 2 pp.

WILLIAM KNOX to WILLIAM EDEN.

1786, Jan. 7. Slebech.—You honour my communications too much by calling them obligations. I have always been happy to promote the public advantage by putting ideas or information into hands capable of using them. "I never had a political attachment to any minister but to George Grenville, nor do I feel obligations to any of them, for it is to the King's goodness alone that I am indebted for the comforts I enjoy." It is not probable that I shall ever take office again, for though not too far advanced in years, I have bodily infirmities which prevent intense application, my anxiety, mortifications, and misfortunes, in consequence of the war, having so strongly affected my nervous system that my hearing and eyesight are much impaired, and I can seldom sleep without an opiate. This being so, "the field of discussion you have opened to me is much too large for me to travel over," and I can only offer you my sentiments upon the general view of it. [The rest of the letter is a treatise upon international trade, in answer to Mr. Eden's letter of Dec 27.] Copy. 15 pp. [The letter actually sent to Eden is at the British Museum. Add. MS. 34,420, f. 351.]

* Hester, wife of Sir Richard Colt Hoare, F.R.S.

William Knox to The King.

1786, Feb. 26. London.—Laying before his Majesty a paper "which an application from Mr. Eden gave him the occasion of writing," and praying him to believe that his motive for complying with the request was not attachment to Mr. Eden, but pure duty and gratitude to his Majesty. The paper was written before the opening of Parliament, consequently none of its ideas can possibly have been taken from the speeches of the first day of the session, though the similarity of some of the sentiments makes it probable that Mr. Eden had communicated the letter to some of his friends. 2¼ pp.

Lord Rodney to William Knox.

1786, March 11. Kensington Gore.—Praying Mr. Knox to call upon him, as he is confined to the house by a cold, and wishes to converse on business of very great importance. ½ p.

The Same to the Same.

1786, July 1. Kensington Gore.—Stating that as "the affair of Statia" [St. Eustatius] will be agitated in the House of Lords next Wednesday, he will have to move on Monday that Mr. Knox may be ordered to attend, to prove the delivery of papers into the office during Lord Sackville's administration, and to show when and by whose order they were afterwards delivered out. 1 p.

Order of the House of Lords.

1786, July 3.—Order that Mr. Knox shall attend on Wednesday next. Signed, Ashley Cowper, Cler. Parl. 1 p.

Lord Westcote to William Knox.

1786, Oct. 15. Hagley Park, near Birmingham.—"How does the High Sheriff of Pembrokeshire do? I will not, dear Knox, let the year pass without making some enquiries concerning that worthy gentleman, and expressing my regret that my early departure from London disabled me from learning what progress was made in the furtherance of his just claims." I hear that Parliament will meet before Christmas. "The convention with Spain and the commercial arrangements with France and Portugal will afford matter enough for those who delight to make long speeches, but all I will say upon them here is, that if we get good wine cheaper than we used to do, I shall be glad to bury in a bumper of it all thoughts of politics with old friends." 1 p.

Lord Westcote to William Knox.

1787, Jan. 10. Hagley Park.—What you told me last year gave me but little reason to think the Treasury would be favourable to your claims, nor do I suppose that an application to Parliament would prove successful, but an exchange of your pension for an office may very probably be effected, and I heartily wish it may. You do wisely to try to dispose of your mansion house and part of the estate; and though I regret that such a change in your affairs should bring you and your family to London, it will be a pleasure to have you there. I am sorry that you are likely to be again interrogated by the Lords. "It seems to be an ugly business to the two lords principally concerned, and how they will extricate themselves will be matter worthy of observation. It was very lucky for you that you were High Sheriff last year, as the address you drew and presented did you so much honour." 2 pp.

Mr. Knox's Case.

1787, May 5.—Was Under-Secretary of State in the American Department from 1770 to the suppression of the office in 1782, and not only discharged his duty satisfactorily (as appears by the annexed certificates), but maintained the rights of Great Britain by several publications, for which he was hung in effigy at Boston. As soon as Independence was declared, the State of Georgia passed an Act for the sole purpose of confiscating his estate and attainting his person, setting forth as their reason "that he had always shown himself inimical to the liberties of America, and was then, as Under-Secretary of State, counselling and advising the King of Great Britain in his arbitrary and tyrannical designs."

After Georgia was recovered, in 1779, by General Campbell, and the loyal inhabitants required to return, Mr. Knox re-established his plantations at considerable expense, and, by the beginning of 1783, his attorneys promised him that the produce of the year would pay him 2,000*l.*; but before the crops were ripe, orders came to evacuate the province, and his plantations were abandoned. He gave in his claim for compensation, as one who had rendered services both officially and individually, and the more especially as his property had been given up by order of government, notwithstanding the solemn assurances given in the royal proclamation in 1779. He is most truly thankful for the pension given him by his Majesty in consideration of the loss of his office of Secretary of New York; but, notwithstanding the express terms of this grant, it was charged to him in 1782 as compensation for his office of Under-Secretary, and, although every clerk in that office had their full salaries allowed them, he was dismissed after twelve years' faithful service without any compensation at all. Moreover, although the Commissioners reported in his favour as to his claims for losses, he has been laid aside by the Treasury as a neutral person, and has received nothing whatever. Prays for a place in the list of such Loyalists as have rendered service in opposing the Rebellion, and that he may be allowed "the like proportion of the sum reported by the Commissioners to be due o him, as others of that class have received." 7 pp.

Endorsed :—"Marquis of Stafford and Lord Chancellor."

MEMORIAL from WILLIAM KNOX to the KING.

[1787, May ?]—Has written the pamphlet which he humbly presents to his Majesty, to prepare the public for the propositions he intends to make in the House of Commons if he obtains a seat there, "with the view to restore the royal influence, and to oppose that democratic system which threatens the depression of the Monarchy." He has already felt the effects of the ministerial enmity excited by his avowed attachment to his Majesty alone, and expects further marks of ill-will; but trusts that what he has done to promote his Majesty's service since his removal from office has given his Majesty as much satisfaction as he had the happiness to experience when Under-Secretary of State. The pension granted to him (and afterwards divided between Mrs. Knox and himself) has been perverted into a means of oppressing him, for it has not only been made the reason of refusing him any compensation for his office, but is also set up against his claim "as an American sufferer for compensation for his patent offices," as will be seen by the printed case herewith humbly submitted. And, what is still more extraordinary, his offer to resign the whole of his Majesty's bounty to him "on condition of being allowed the same justice as every American waggoner, or even deserter from the rebel cause, has experienced, has been refused, because his pension disqualifies him from sitting in the House of Commons;" and ministers do not choose to see him there, well knowing his attachment to his Majesty. Nevertheless, he is resolved to resign his pension if he can procure himself to be elected. "He has seen three Under-Secretaries raised to the Peerage, and two more of his colleagues appointed Commissioners of the Customs and retaining all their patent offices and pensions, and the Secretary of the Board of Trade, who was suppressed along with him, allowed his full salary," while he, who served much longer than any of them, is denied common justice for no reason but because he has dared to avow himself attached to his Majesty and not to his ministers. Draft. 3 pp.

WILLIAM EDEN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1787, June 7. Seve, near Paris.—I return you many thanks for your letter and the copies of "Helps to a right decision." I had already (not knowing it to be yours) lent it to some friends here who like to read our best publications.

" I was very sanguine as to the success of this great measure, and if I had not been so, I should not have had the courage to accept the negociation; but tho' I consider'd it, with you, as possibly fraught with infinite blessings, both to the two great nations immediately concern'd in it and to mankind in general, I confess to you that I never expected it to pass thro' the British and Irish Parliaments without many adverse petitions. That there was not one petition against it, notwithstanding the impression of old prejudices and the pains taken to revive them, is a curious proof of the good sense and general information of the times in which we live. I have now remain'd here to see this great and complicated operation carried into compleat and regular execution, and this has been done, and is doing, with perfect good faith, and with no material difficulties, notwithstanding the various changes which have taken place in every department of the French Government." 2 pp.

William Knox to Lord Walsingham.

1787, Aug. 20.—" I am not going to request any favour of your lordship upon the foot of old friendship, for I was too long in office not to know that those who are obliged to the minister for their own situations are of all men the least fit to be applied to to solicit for others," but as the matter which I have to mention might occasion an open breach between the administration and one of its occasional supports, I hope I may be able to give you the means of showing them a civility while doing me a kindness. " Ever since I was called upon to give evidence at the Bar of the House of Lords respecting the St. Eustatia papers, I have felt very unpleasant under the imputation of having acted offensively to administration . . . though I think it extremely hard that offence should be taken at my uttering of any truth when I am sworn to declare the whole." But as I certainly know things of others which it would not be for their advantage to have told, I think my further examination should be prevented, if this can be done with propriety on the part of administration. My absence from the kingdom appears to me the only proper expedient. Mr. Ord's ill-health affords a fair opportunity of sending me to Ireland to carry through the business of the next session in his stead, as was intended to have been done " when Sir Richard Heron took fright at the view of the business, Lord Sackville consenting to spare me for so long; but Sir Richard feeling bold again, ventured to remain." This intention, however caused me to obtain the consent of the ministers to all the measures for extending the trade of Ireland which I was the sole mover of, and afterwards carried into execution in 1778. These circumstances and my perfect knowledge of the country give me advantages beyond any other, and Lord Sackville was so sensible of this that he made my going with him an indispensible condition of accepting the Lord Lieutenancy if it should be offered to him. I think, therefore that I am doing a service to administration by offering to go, nor will a refusal be any mortification to me. In this last case I shall expect to stand excused, whatever the ill-effects of my examination may be.

At the great change of 1782 I was the only person connected with the old administration who continued in place without appointment under the new, "merely for the purpose of giving information and assistance to those who succeeded, and Lord Shelburne expressed himself under the greatest obligations to me on that account, and assured me, at parting, with his hand upon his left breast (I am afraid his heart lay on t'other side), that my behaviour had made so strong an impression on his mind that he should always remember it, and that, when compensation came to be made for the suppressed offices, I might depend upon being properly considered. I am, however, the only person who has not been compensated. When Lord North became Secretary of State I made all the arrangements for America without office and without allowance, and the Order of Council of July 2, 1783, was of my suggesting and preparing, and I carried it thro' against the opposition of Mr. Fox and Mr. Burke, and thereby saved the navigation and maritime importance of this country and strangled in the birth that of the United States, and your lordship knows the share I had in supporting that measure before the Committee of the Privy Council the next year, by which I lost Atkinson's friendship and probably a legacy. I transmitted to Mr. Pitt, thro' Lord Temple, my ideas of a plan for the reduction of the National debt soon after he came into office, and when I saw by the newspapers that propositions for opening the trade between Great Britain and Ireland were under his consideration, I immediately sent up from Pembrokeshire to Mr. Rose the copies of my correspondence with Sir Richard Heron in the year 1778, when I obtained for Ireland the liberty of trading freely with the colonies, and your lordship, who has read them, can judge whether they were capable of giving any information upon the subject.

"Mr. Eden, at the time of his appointment to negotiate the treaty of commerce with France, applied to me for my sentiments. I freely gave them to him in a letter of fourteen folio pages, which he has acknowledged was very useful to him, and has since given me the pleasure to know that my subsequent pamphlet, intitled Helps &c., in defence of the Treaty, had given great satisfaction to the French ministers* . . . . I trouble your lordship with this detail to show you how unjustly I have been deemed hostile to the present administration, and to enable you to remove any prejudice that may have been entertained against me on that account." 10½ pp.

Underwritten :—

List of letters stated to be enclosed.

John Nutt to William Knox.

1787, Sept. 16. Grainge.—"A thousand thanks to you for one of the most interesting, informing letters I ever saw. . . . It appears to me that France is at present in a distressed, trobled situation; but what is that to us. We have trade and country enough, let us mind and cultivate both. . . . As to the lubbers on the continent we have had enough of them in former times, and I should think Pitt mad if he attempted to involve us in their disputes. Let them fight it out." I see by the papers that the Prussian minister at the Hague has presented a further memorial. Surely the King is not going to play the Emperor's game, talk much and do nothing. It appears singular that his army has not yet begun to move. 3 pp.

* See pp. 194, 197 above.

William Knox to the King.

1787, Oct. 5.—Although he still meets with neglect from ministers, his zeal for his Majesty's service is not abated, and he has much satisfaction in learning from Mr. Eden that his little pamphlet stifled all opposition to the treaty of commerce with France, and has done much good there, having been translated into the French language.

"The same motives actuated him to communicate to Mr. Pitt his plan for establishing the Church of England in the colonies, when he understood the appointment of a bishop for Nova Scotia was in contemplation," and, on application from Lord Walsingham, he has formed a complete system for improved packet correspondence with America.

The only attention shown him has been the offer of knighthood when he came up with the address from Pembrokeshire, but this he declined, as having already submitted to his Majesty, by the Earl of Shelburne, his humble request for a baronetcy. Draft. 3 pp.

William Knox to W. W. Grenville.

1788, March 22.—As the passage over the Pyrenees will soon become practicable, and I presume Mr. Eden will then proceed on his embassy to the Court of Spain, I venture to communicate to you my ideas of the advantage he might derive from "the authentic information of the sentiments of the Spanish Court respecting the Americans which my former situation put into my hands," but which is no longer in the Secretary of State's office, Lord Lansdowne having returned Mr. Lawrence all his papers. Among the interesting papers taken with that gentleman were copies of the correspondence of the American Commissioners at Paris, which gave an account of their negotiations with the Court of France and with the Spanish Minister there during the time he [Laurens] was President of the Congress. From these it appeared that Spain was so jealous of the future designs of the Americans, who contended for the free navigation of the Missisippi in the same manner as it had been allowed to Great Britain, that they held back from the treaty France was then entering into. The emigrations of the Americans towards the Missisippi and the Gulph of Florida have since then been so prodigious that no great address would be necessary to alarm the Spanish Court for the safety of their possessions, "and as some Americans have already ascended the Missouri as high up as the first Spanish guards, which are stationed to prevent the approach on that side to the silver mines of New Mexico, the danger of that valuable country might also be easily pointed out. The inability of Spain to defend these possessions against the Americans must be evident to her ministers, and it would not be difficult to show them that the nature of the assistance she requires is such as France cannot give her, nor can she derive it but from Great Britain alone." Copy. 2¼ pp.

WILLIAM KNOX to LORD WALSINGHAM.

1788, May 25.—"I was too early in my declaration that I could do no good out of office, for I have this day found I can do a great deal, not, indeed, for the credit of Administration, as I wished to do; but, however, my object will be obtained as the public will be benefited. Your lordship has probably heard of a middle party that has sprung up from the inattention and partiality of Mr. Pitt in disposing of offices. He avows an inattention to men, and reliance upon measures. I applauded the principle, and would have walked barefoot from Pembrokeshire to have given it support, but how has he adhered to this principle? Inattention to influence and connexions he has indeed shewn with a vengeance, but if his disregard of men had any meaning, it ought to have been that he would chuse such as were fittest, without consideration of other circumstances. Look then into the offices, and say how are they filled? is the common exclamation of the gentlemen I allude to. Behold two Secretaries of State who cannot write a sentence of English, Commissioners of the Treasury who do not understand arithmetic, and Commissioners of the Admiralty who do not know larboard from starboard! Since the Heptarchy, we do not believe the offices were so ill-filled. His two substitutes for Secretaries of State, Lord Hawkesbury and Mr. Dundas, are certainly able, but they are both much disliked, and one of them at least suspected of want of sincerity. The circumstances under which he (Mr. Pitt) took up Government, abundantly excuse his availing himself of such men as offered to serve under him, and, perhaps, it was wise in so young a man to decline the assistance of the experienced; but he has now established himself with the nation, his ability is beyond all comparison, his integrity is above suspicion. The reasons which excused his acceptance of inefficient men for his offices have now lost their force, and he is highly culpable for pursuing the same plan. He has it in his power to fill his offices in a manner that will give satisfaction to the public, and restore the expiring confidence of Parliament; but if he continues to play at Tom with the great officers of Government, he will sink in character, and be driven from Ministry. Such is the language I hear. I shall greatly regret his fall, for though he has used me ill, I admire his talents and pray for his continuance, but I owe a superior duty to the King and the country, and as he will not avail himself of my experience and judgement, I must carry them where they may be rendered usefull. I want not the paltry salary of office, but I expect civility and attention. The party I have already mentioned have applied to me for information. They disavow factious opposition, and profess attachment to the King's authority. In these points we perfectly agree; the King's servant is my minister, be he who he may. I have, therefore, consented to direct them, and give them creditable business to transact. I will do no mischief, but I will stimulate the Minister to do good; and as he does not chuse to avail himself of my knowledge, he cannot expect the credit of the measures I suggest. There is no individual whose service he wants so much as mine, nor is there any candidate for power I would so willingly serve as him, and yet it is highly probable we shall never meet, and that I may become a principal instrument in his overthrow, through the mere desire of doing good, for if all good measures are proposed by others, and he is to have only the secondary merit of consenting to them or the odium of opposing them, he must decline in character, and in the present constitution of the House of Commons, the loss of character must be attended with the loss of power. I write thus freely and confidentially to your lordship to justify my own conduct. . . .

"I should have addressed this letter to Mr. Pitt himself if I did not apprehend that he would throw it into the fire without reading it upon seeing my name at the end of it, for I am an enemy to all concealment or simulation of any kind. Perhaps to-morrow will furnish an occasion of judging, in one instance, of the probable effects of my direction. I shall save the African trade, though I bring censure upon the Bishops; but as they deserve it, I have no compunction in so doing. A much more important consideration will be opened in a few days, and if Administration have the wisdom to pursue the plan which will be suggested, the Constitution of Quebec may be saved.

"Your lordship did not tell me whether Mr. Pitt had accepted the volume of my Tracts I requested the favour of your lordship to present to him. I am sure he never read the one which defended the Quebec Act, or he would not have suffered the ignorance and falsehood uttered against it to pass without detection. If the volume be still in your possession I should be much obliged to your lordship for it, as I cannot find another copy of that pamphlet, and I intend to reprint it before the next Session, with additions applicable to the present state of the province." 5 pp.

Lord Walsingham to William Knox.

1788, May 29. Upper Harley Street.—"I thank you for the communication you so obligingly make to me of your designs. Though I don't at all doubt the purity of your motives, I question much how far you will contribute to the prosperity of the country in a moral or political point of view, by lending your talents to men who may not be able to substitute so good an administration as that which it is their object to subvert. How far such a system will meet his Majesty's approbation you best know.

"If you wish for your own volume of Tracts, they are at your service; but I hope I shall have either this volume returned or a new edition of them, as I value them much, from the esteem I bear to the author and from the information they contain."

P.S.—"Is it your wish I should tell Mr. Pitt of your letter to me or not? For some of the sentences are not expressed in phrases that I will put into his hands." 1½ pp

J. Pownall to William Knox.

1789, Jan. 7. Lewisham.—Thanking him for his two last publications, and especially for the honourable mention, in the Extra Official State Papers, of an old friend and fellow labourer who loves and esteems him "in the true and genuine spirit of friendship and affection." 1 p.

William Knox to the Lord Chancellor [Thurlow].

1789, May 26. Soho Square.—Sending him his last books, and a volume containing one or two of the tracts referred to in the others, the Review of the American Controversy, in which the late Mr. Grenville assisted him, and the Defence of the Quebec Act, which silenced all clamour against that judicious measure, to which his lordship lent such powerful support. Has also added to the Observations on the Liturgy, three little tracts drawn up twenty years ago at the desire of Archbishop Secker. "Had proper attention been shown to what they recommend respecting the treatment of the negroes in the Colonies, much of the present outcry against the slave-trade would have been prevented, and it is a little extraordinary that the present Bishop of London [Porteous] was then one of Archbishop Secker's chaplains, and consenting to that letter to Benezett from the Society, which was drawn up by the Archbishop himself." As a former owner of negro slaves, Knox is well-informed respecting the whole business, and believes he could point out a method of getting rid of the present difficulty. 2½ pp.

Lord Thurlow to William Knox.

1789, May 26.—Thanking him for his valuable present, and stating that the subject of the slave trade has now become of such great importance that he shall take the first opportunity which his engagements admit to be more particularly acquainted with Mr. Knox's ideas concerning its management. 1 p.

[Francis] Lord Rawdon to William Knox.

1789, Nov. 18. Donington.—Thanks him for his news, but does not intend to come up to town until the meeting of Parliament. Knows well that in the formation of an administration, a man's presence often advances a claim which is more effectual than sounder pretensions, but the nature of his connexions does not allow the seizure of an opportunity which would secure but a solitary advantage for himself. 3 pp.

The Same to the Same.

1789, Dec. 19. Donington.—"That the Chancellor and Mr. Pitt are upon bad terms does not at all surprise me; I believe it impossible to serve with the latter upon other terms than so complete a waver of one's own judgement, and of all the attentions due to one's rank in society as can never be long reconcileable to any man who has an honest feeling of what is due to him in these respects. The Chancellor is sensible of it, but rather late. When I first estranged myself from Mr. Pitt my object was to maintain with the Chancellor, by every testimony of personal attachment, that connection which had subsisted between us, not only from motives of unfeigned regard, but in the view also of political junction when that disunion should happen between him and Pitt, which required little foresight to predict. This purpose Lord Thurlow intentionally defeated, for he took the tone of replying to me on every occasion with a peculiar virulence of manner; adopted, on the one hand, to discourage me from contest, on the other to convince Pitt of his entire devotion by such a sacrifice of the connection which I professed to seek. Lord Thurlow knew me very imperfectly when he imagined I was to be so kept down, or that the licence he assumed would pass unchecked beyond that point to which the sense of private obligation dictated forbearance. In the other view, whether he acted spontaneously or upon remonstrance from Pitt, there was a littleness which could only be equalled by the impolicy of the measure. He deprived himself of other support to throw himself on the gratitude of Pitt; a security which he should have known could last in that quarter no longer than it corresponded with convenience. With this opinion of the Chancellor's conduct towards me, you must comprehend that my personal inclination to any league with him cannot be strong. Indeed none such can take place but at the desire of the Prince of Wales. I say this, because the proposal of an explanation to the King of our political sentiments is obviously to open communications which may lead to such a league. I can never give my consent that such an explanation should be made to his Majesty, altho' your assertion of the principle on which we have been acting was strictly just. The line which we took respecting the Regency had been determined by us without any intercourse, direct or indirect, with the Prince, or with any other set of men. We adopted it as most consonant to the Constitution, without looking to favor for the decision; and it was not till late in the business that we came into concert with the Duke of Portland. I felt at the time personally grateful to the King for my peerage, a favor which he has since been pleased to balance by a wand to Lord Huntingdon; but, as gratitude is not with me mere matter of declamation, no views of party could ever have prevailed on me to countenance a plan injurious to the interests of the King, unless indeed a case could be conceived in which those interests could be imagined opposite to the primary duty of citizen. I did believe that I consulted those interests no less than the public welfare by endeavoring to preserve to the Royal function in his son those powers which if, dispensed with at one period may be held equally unnecessary at any other; powers, however, which could not have been contested, had they not militated against the rapacious views of individuals. It was the utmost impudence of dark design to advance an opposition of interest between the father and son in that respect. The creed took a fashionable currency, as mountebank pretences generally do, but to no man who thinks for himself can it ever appear other than an artifice of party, and, in my mind, an illicit one. The arrangement which took place between our set and the Duke of Portland's friends was upon written stipulations, not one of which included a private object. The first was, that the utmost facility should be secured for the King's re-assumption of the government, whensoever it should please God to restore his health; this showed our object. The second was that our set must not be considered as melted into the Duke of Portland's party, but that we would hold our separate consultations as long as we thought fit to act in alliance with that party; this showed the terms on which we supported our object. In consequence of this condition, I can have no claim upon Mr. Fox; he can have none upon me. But, as to myself, I will tell you what goes much beyond engagement between us, I should say on my part, for I know not his sentiments. The extraordinary liberality and manly frankness which I found on that occasion in Mr. Fox and his friends have bound me more to them than any articled compact could have done. For, as I should hold a league of indiscriminate support very profligate, no engagement would have implied farther contract than for so long as I should approve the general measures of the party; and to this extent I am, as I now stand, called to assist them by a common objection to the present administration; but with this additional incitement, the remembrance of a generous confidence reposed in me by those men at the very moment in which I asserted a separate interest from them. It is, however, to the Prince that my attachment immediately directs itself. The magnanimity of his character has impressed me with a sincere respect for him, but his kindness towards me has bound me to him by a much warmer sentiment. I am rejoiced that the King takes his R. Highness more into his confidence. Designing men have forged an opposition of interest between the Prince and the King, that they might claim a merit with the latter for supporting him against the fictitious antagonist; and, as things are circumstanced, were that to go on, the King would be only the member of a party, not even the leader of it. I should ever strongly remonstrate with our friends against countenancing any administration that fomented so mischievous a dissension; much more against forming a part of one which should ground itself on so unworthy a practise; and I well know that our friends would revolt at the idea. As for myself, I never will take office but at the desire of the Prince. . . ." 8½ pp.

Endorsed with note by Knox.—"This letter was an answer to what I had told him of a conversation I had with Lord Thurlow while he was Chancellor."

Lord Rawdon to William Knox.

1789, Dec. 29. Donington.—"I received safely, and have perused carefully, the pamphlet which you were so obliging as to send to me. As it is not yet published or circulated, I will obey your desire in expressing my opinion upon it without reservation or disguise. Your object, as you have sketched it in the prefatory letter, represents you in the true spirit of a citizen anxious to benefit the community by the dissemination of useful observations. I am convinced it is not ostentation but reality of purpose that induces you to step forward; you would therefore wish your performance to make impression as extensively as possible. With this view it surely is not politic to engage the passions of a considerable number against the reception of your reasoning, yet this you cannot fail to do if you let your argument go forth in its present garb. Men will readily confess past errors of judgement, when no immediate interest counsels their adherence to them; but it must be on the fair pretext that considerations have been sub-minister'd to them which they may be supposed at the moment of action to have overlooked. Now you make it essential to those who composed the administration of 1782, and to all their supporters, to abide by their principle, because it is a point which you do not argue with them, but upon which you condemn them with an asperity that must blacken them were they to admit its justice. You must be aware, also, that the hostility of your language cannot but be considered as an attack which must make you personally obnoxious to the leaders of that party. Indeed, if you decide to retain that tone in your publication, I must entreat you not to do me the honor of addressing it to me and my friends, lest it should be supposed that you announced our sentiments. It is not that we should not agree with you perfectly upon your principle, for it has been often distinctly discussed by us, but the nature of this country does not countenance permanent enmities upon mere political differences. In a government where the prosecution of a private interest that is to run parallel with the service of the State is to a certain degree avowed, it is difficult to prescribe what shall be the precise boundary of efforts, for, in despite of any possible regulation, men would understand one another and would by mutual support advance their joint fortunes. Hence a sort of indulgence has established itself respecting excesses, both in measures and in the comments on those measures; that is to say, as long as they stop short on the one hand, of deliberate violation of the constitution, on the other of personal malignity. In the hour of contest, therefore, you are supposed to combat the measure with little reference to the man; for whom the extenuation is always admitted that he does not see all the mischief of his project as clearly as you do. But this reciprocal allowance, which is grounded on the warmth of action, cannot be understood in the case of a cool attack made in print upon an after-day. To its possible operation with regard to yourself you would probably be indifferent; but regarding it as an inevitable obstacle to that conciliation of sentiment which is your aim, you may be induced to give it further reflection. To us the imputation of joining in any sarcasms must be injurious, since we have the opportunity to make our animadversions where the parties concerned may answer, and it would thence be unhandsome in us to seek another field. Again, I say that it is to the mode of illustrating your principle, not to the principle itself, that my objection lies. I do not consider the constitution of this country as a phantom that is to be twisted and turned just as may suit the convenience of public representation. It is a defined compact, for the maintenance of which every individual is bound to his fellows, and neither the interests of a party, nor personal attachment to the Sovereign, can justify the playing loose with it. I believe every man of our set opposed the India Bill, because we thought it an attempt to shackle the due powers of the Crown. We similarly opposed the Regency Bill, because we conceived it a plan to embody upon stipend such a party as must have outweighed the legal influence of the chief magistrate. And I repeat what I said in a former letter, this determination was taken and acted upon without any communication having taken place with His Royal Highness, or with any other individual, or with any set of men. I know not to whom the saying is ascribed 'that he hoped to see the King have no more power than the Doge of Venice,' but I know that an attempt to insinuate such a principle into practice would be as violent an invasion of the Constitution as the most direct effort to extend the Royal Prerogative beyond its marked boundaries. The general compact has lodged certain powers with the Sovereign of the country, as being in those hands most expediently deposited for the public good; and the effective exercise of those powers cannot be usurped by Parliament or party under any color that will not leave it a direct infringement of the Constitution. The powers to which I have alluded allot to the Sovereign all appointments, &c. On the other hand, the subject cannot be forced to execute Ministerial Office, and, under the authorised plea that he cannot depend upon the public conduct of a particular minister, he may always indulge his personal dislike to political connection with that individual. This latitude being admitted (and it cannot be prevented) it will be impossible to preclude the private engagement of two or more men that they will not serve but in company. If thro' any consideration the Sovereign forms his ministry of persons avowedly so leagued, it must be supposed he takes them assenting to that league. Then observe upon how nice a shade of representation the discrimination must stand between their claim to dispose of the Household Offices, and the implied engagement of the Sovereign to support them as his ministers. For the language of every administration must, unfortunately, be nearly the same: 'Sir, you know but too well how debauched all public principle is in this country. By nominating us your ministers we have to suppose that your Majesty would wish that we may be able to carry forward the business of your Government. We, therefore, trust that you will give us the means of bestowing upon those who will support this administration those favours without which no administration will meet support.' If you say that this is a shameful vice in the times, I will agree with you; but it is the vice of the times, and the imputation of it to one set of men exclusively may irritate them against you, but will do nothing towards correction. I have long considered it, as you do, a grievous error to enable any minister to marshal a party which must hold the Sovereign in a kind of bondage; and when I resisted your wish that the sentiment of our set should be made known, it was not on account of this immediate position, but because any communication of that kind to the Chancellor would certainly have borne the appearance of an overture, tho' nothing of the kind could be in our contemplation.

"I hope, my dear sir, I have not taken too much freedom in these remarks. If I have erred in that respect, I have been betrayed into it by conceiving that sort of confidence due to the attention with which you have honored me. I was well aware that it would have been less tender ground to have simply entreated, under some pretext of advertence to the possible feelings of some of the other gentlemen, that you would forbear addressing the performance to me. But, concurring with you clearly in the principle, I thought it would be a failure towards you did I not state an objection to the mode of argument, which, by standing in another point of view, I was enabled to perceive tho' you had overlooked it. Reasoning it upon general principles, you will do it as forcibly, and you will not close minds against conviction. To this too tedious detail I must still add a word upon the qualification by which you have designated our Dinner Set at Parsloe's. We do hope that we shall act up to the spirit of what you ascribe to us, but we have never had the vanity to assume that honesty of principle exclusively, by professing any association for the preservation of the Constitution. We have been christened the Armed Neutrality ; by what godfathers I know not. It is, however, a title to which we make no pretension, for our object has not been to hold an ideal balance between parties, but to give a consequence and effect to interference upon points of public importance which, as individuals, without such concert we could not have carried.

"I am so tired, and you will probably be so too, that I must answer you very shortly about Leicester. Macnamara has not a thought of standing again, having been assured that he should be opposed. He could not influence any one there, and at this moment the attempt to introduce any one not of the neighbourhood (upon any interest) would give the certainty of a contest, which, with 6,000 voters, is desperately serious. I have no doubt that I could carry it, but it would be at enormous expense ; I therefore wait in patient observation of it." 12 pp.

William Knox to Lord Hawkesbury.

1790, February.—A long letter on the fisheries question, pointing out the danger of its decline in consequence of the "mischievous" concessions made to the United States by the treaty of 1783, and offering suggestions for its preservation. Feels the better qualified to speak on the subject as he has lately added the practical experience of a fisherman to the knowledge acquired officially. The Americans, by overstocking their markets, have so brought down the price of fish that it is impossible now to sell at a profit. The great houses engaged in the trade, to indemnify themselves for this, encourage the shallop (i.e., coast) fishers to settle in Newfoundland, and then oblige them to take their payment in goods, on which they charge a most enormous profit, and so purchase the fish at half or even a third of the nominal price ; while those who carry out their fishermen from Great Britain and Ireland, by paying them in cash, give the full value for their fish, and consequently are considerable losers by the sale. The advantages these monopolisers have over the British adventurers was clearly proved during the previous season, for, although the writer's "bankers" caught more fish than any others, and he got the best price for it, his sales only amounted to 70 per cent. of his expenses, whereas the monopolizers made a considerable profit.

If more of the fishermen are encouraged to settle in Newfoundland it will soon become a colony, and not a British fishery at all. Proposes that a bounty should be paid to the "shallop fishermen" upon their return to Europe, on their showing that they went out within two years preceding. Some men must be left on the island to cure the last cargoes of fish, which cannot be cured in time for that season's markets, also to provide fuel and do other winter work, but these shoremen should be converted into seamen or fishermen the next season, and the green men left in their places. The residents, however, are all so much in debt to the monopolizers that if they attempted to leave the island they would be arrested. To strike at the root of this abominable and crying evil, the governor should fix a tariff of prices at which European or West India goods should be sold to the fishermen, and an Act of Parliament should prevent any person from recovering a debt against a fisherman contracted in Newfoundland above twelve months ago. 12 pp.

William Knox to George Rose.

1790, April 23. Soho Square.—Sending a copy of the petition which is to be presented to the House of Commons on Monday next, and of the paper of reasons to support it, both of which he prays may be put into Mr. Pitt's hands. Mr. Welbore Ellis (the last principal Secretary under whom Knox served) has promised to present the petition, and both he and Lord North are authorized to say that if full compensation be allowed for his patent offices, Knox is willing, if required, to resign the whole of his pensions. Copy. 1 p.

Underwritten:—"Mr. Rose having recommended to me the course of presenting a petition I prepared one accordingly, and when it was presented Mr. Rose moved its rejection."

George Rose to William Knox.

1790, May 22. Old Palace Yard.—Informing him that the pensions of 600*l.* a year each, granted to him and Mrs. Knox during pleasure, have, as he wished, been changed into grants for their respective lives, the King having signed the warrants presented to him by Mr. Pitt to this effect. 1 p.

William Knox to Mr. Pitt.

1790, May 30. Soho Square.—Enclosing papers containing "the grounds and motives of an expedition which, though it failed in the execution through the avarice and presumption of the then Governor of Jamaica in making the attack that he might share in the plunder, when he was only ordered to make the preparations," might perhaps be renewed in case of a war with Spain. And as no military officer would, he believes, find the indemnity for disobedience of orders under Mr. Pitt's administration that they universally experienced under that of his predecessor, there could be no doubt of success. Copy. 1 p.

Underwritten :—" Papers enclosed. Capt. Sheer's plan. Lieut. Carden's memorial. Mr. Hodgson's plan."

Lord Rawdon to William Knox.

[1790, June ?], Monday. St. James' Place.—" . . . We had flattered ourselves that we had secured the writ for Lincoln, where my brother stands. Just as I was setting out for Soho Square, I received intelligence that Hobart had not only gotten the writ, but was gone down to hurry the election, so as to prevent our principal force, the out-voters, from arriving in time. At the same moment I was informed the qualification I had given my brother was invalid ; therefore lawyers, agents, coachmen, and all the etceteras of such an undertaking were to be summoned instantly, the bare mention of which company will fully suggest the occupation in which they have kept me." The Prince has been out of town, but I sent your letter to Capt. Payne, as I wish his Royal Highness to see that mark of your attention. 3 pp.

William Knox to William Pitt.

1790, Oct. 4.—Stating that he knows authentically " that the King of Sweden has sent over full powers to Baron Nolkin [Noleken] to enter into a subsidiary treat with his Majesty, but restrained him from making any overtures until he has reason to think they will be well received. Draft. ¾ p.

William Knox to Sir John Parnell.

1791, Oct. 30. Bath.—On his projects for improving the trade and promoting the prosperity of Ireland, illustrated by his proceedings in Georgia. When he went there not a man had credit to import goods from England, or to procure a cargo of negroes. He formed the plan of a public loan office, and passed an Act empowering Commissioners to issue paper bills to a certain amount, which were to be taken in payment for all taxes, &c. These bills were lent to the planters upon mortgage of their lands and negroes at a rate below the legal interest, which was kept high to encourage lenders, and to indemnify the traders for the risk of trusting the new settlers, who, as they got their lands for nothing, could well afford to pay a high interest for the means of improving them. The interest paid by the borrowers of these bills (for they carried no interest themselves, but were to pass as money, and called the provincial currency) he appropriated to the construction of churches and other places of worship, salaries to schoolmasters and clergymen throughout the province, provision of boats and pilots for the principal harbour, and the erection of a beacon or lighthouse at its entrance. He "was tender of issuing at first, and did not let more out than the produce of the taxes would amount to for the first year, so that every man was sure the bills would not lay upon his hands if he took them," but they soon became current, and as he "gave all the bills which were drawn by the Governor upon the treasury for the pay of the troops and civil officers in exchange for the paper currency in preference to silver and gold, its credit rose so high that negroes could be purchased with it in the next province." Emboldened by success, he undertook to raise a fort for defence of the principal harbour with another species of paper bills, called certificates, to sink which he laid a small duty upon the trade, "and as that duty came in, the certificates were to be taken up, but to give them currency, the Treasurer was obliged to take them in all payments to him, and he might reissue such as were not to be paid off. In both instances the Legislature was not only bound in honour to make the bills good, as having authorised the issuing them, but actually compelled to do so, by their being receivable for all taxes. . . . And as no one was obliged to take them in payment from the Treasurer, they would, in case of their depreciation, remain with him instead of money, and all the public services would be defeated and the public creditors unpaid. The Assembly, therefore, was under an indispensable necessity to keep up the credit of the bills, and when that was known to be the case, no one refused taking the bills, and they were considered as money, and the province virtually enriched by their amount."

Does not propose an exactly similar plan in Ireland, the circumstances of the two countries being widely different, and the credit of Ireland higher than that of any state in Europe, but proposes the issue of Exchequer bills, with part of which Government might buy "the very large tracts of unimproved lands which are too great for the proprietors to manage" and lay them out in townships, giving each a local magistracy by Act of Parliament, as is done in America, and granting lots to settlers at something higher a rent than the rate at which they were purchased; the rent to cease upon repayment of the purchase money, and to diminish on part repayment, and all profit above four per cent. interest on the Exchequer bills to be laid out in improvements. "This is taken from Pen's management in Pensylvania, but he was not content with the quit rent and stipulated purchase money, but he reserved lots in every township to sell when the lands surrounding them were improved. His astonishing success, however, is a good reason for following the other parts of his plan." From the surplus, Government might give grants for making roads, building bridges, erecting piers and wharfs, &c., and as the tenants would be eager to become proprietors of their lots, Government would speedily be re-imbursed the purchase money, and with it pay off the Exchequer bills.

Offers suggestions for reducing the nominal value of money to the English currency, and the nomination of a House in London to give specie for Irish notes (as is done for Bristol and other bank notes, payable in London a few days after sight), with explanations of the advantages which would result to Irish trade. Draft. 15 pp

Elections in Wales.

[1791 ?].—Notes concerning Pembrokeshire. The present members are Lord Milford for the county, Lord Kensington for Haverfordwest, and Mr. Owen (now Barlow) for Pembroke. Lord Milford has no heir; Lord Kensington is above fourscore, and has one son about 14 years old; Mr. Barlow has no child, and is a widower, the present heir of the Owen estate being a child of eight years. "Lord Milford is of no use to Government; Mr. Barlow is in opposition; and Lord Kensington is only valuable as a sure vote."

If Lord Milford were gratified with an English peerage, Lord Kensington would then come in for the county, and Mr. Knox would be chosen for Haverfordwest, being sure of his election from his services to the county and his possession of the public good opinion there. Mr. Barlow's connexion is with Lord North, and he is anxious to secure the county for the young Sir Hugh Owen when he comes of age. Mr. Knox can effect this for him, and is pretty confident that he could prevail with him to adopt the same line of conduct Mr. Knox himself proposes to hold—i.e., that of a supporter of the King's measures and of the monarchical authority, and being with the present Administration, although not attached to it. The only person likely to obstruct the plan is Mr. Campbell, of Stackpoole Court. His connexion with Lord Carlisle will probably lead him to take a strong part with Opposition, and to attempt county Pembroke. He cannot succeed against the present connexion, but as neither Lord Kensington or Mr. Knox can afford to stand a contest, it would be prudent to wait until after the General Election, when Mr. Campbell will be chosen for Cardigan and, consequently, could not offer himself for the county when Lord Milford made the vacancy. 3 pp.

William Knox to Lord Macartney.

1792, July 30.—In answer to his lordship's request for his ideas concerning the great national objects of his embassy. With a view to promote an extensive trade with China, his lordship will no doubt make every possible enquiry into the nature and state of their commerce, what they produce and what they import, and, as some treaty with them may be necessary, will inform himself of the civil policy of the state, and its military force and resources. An accurate knowledge of their religion and domestic economy will serve to improve our science, correct our errors, open our minds and enlarge our conception of the Divine Benevolence. Does not believe in the immense antiquity claimed by the Chinese for their civilization, and considers that the state of mankind is exactly conformable to what might be expected "upon the supposition that four men and four women were landed out of a great ship four thousand years ago in the plains of Armenia." Hopes his lordship will be able to investigate fully the causes leading to the present state of China, in which his former residence at Madras, and acquaintance with Hindoo customs, will give him advantages beyond those of any other person. 7 pp.

J. Pownall to William Knox.

1793, Nov. 9. Great George Street.—As it was through your polite attention that I was nominated of the Committee of Magistrates for revising the rules and orders of Friendly Societies, I return to the Committee, through you, the papers sent me by the Clerk of the Peace. Some appear to be nothing more than the rules of Ale House Clubs, instituted before the passing of the Act of last session, "and with regard to the Female Society, a committee of their own sex will be the best judges of their rules and orders, for I am afraid I could not comment upon them without indecent laughter. Whether these societies do or do not fall within the intention and meaning of that most extraordinary Act must be left to the determination of those who know what its intention was, and can construe its meaning into common sense, for it is far beyond the scope of my understanding." With these sentiments, I must beg you to withdraw my name from the Committee, and fill my seat there with a magistrate of more ability and discernment. 1¼ pp.

Lord Westcote to William Knox.

1793, Dec. 10. Hagley Park.—Is reading a work called Letters on the Subject of the Concert of Princes, with a motto Facilis descensus Averni. The writer appears to be a dissenter, and his object is very different from Knox's own, but he shows a great extent of political information, and the book is worth perusal. 2 pp. Seal of arms.

William Knox to the New Brunswick Committee.

1795, Nov. 4. Soho Square.—Advises them not to make any application to the Treasury which would bring the circumstances of their estimates under consideration, as he has known, in other instances, "considerable reductions made in the grant of Parliament from such like discussions as that which the dispute with Mr. Odell would give occasion for." The warrant under which Mr. Odell holds the office of Clerk of the Council certainly gives him a right to attend the Council, in whatever capacity they act; his right to the office necessarily includes personal performance of the duty, and "as the salary is given for the duty, it must be understood to extend to the whole office," but Mr. Odell is not thereby obliged to furnish the stationery or make fair copies of his minutes. In the money bills of every colony there is a provision for defraying the expense of the Assembly, in which these things are included. Offers suggestions concerning the preparing a bill in relation to Courts of Justice, for which, if passed, he will "solicit the Royal allowance," and which, if rejected, he can lay before the King's ministers as a specific proposition, and ask for their opinion and instructions to the Governor. This temperate mode of proceeding will prevent the exciting of personal animosities, which distract and divide a colony, injuring its credit and obstructing its settlement and cultivation. Prays the committee to pardon this freedom "in one who feels himself less interested in the prosperity and happiness of New Brunswick as the Provincial Agent than as its earliest friend and most zealous well-wisher." The ratification of the Treaty with the United States has arrived. 6½ pp.

WILLIAM KNOX to HENRY DUNDAS.

1795, Dec. 14.—Although Mr. Dundas has declined to have any conversation with him on the subject of East India affairs he has so long been in the habit of serving Government without the patronage of Ministers that he ventures to submit some propositions which he conceives it would be more for the honour of the Board of Control to adopt of themselves than to have them originate in the Court of Proprietors. The rest of the letter is an attack upon the financial system of the company, the result of which is, he states, "that while every other individual in the nation is the better for the vast extension of the East India trade," the proprietors of the stock derive no benefit from it. 6 pp.

HENRY ELLIS to WILLIAM KNOX.

1796, March 18. Pisa.—Complaining of the extraordinary delays and irregularities of the posts, some of his letters from England having taken five and six months to reach him, while others have come "with regularity and expedition" in less than a month. As Knox's political opinions "so nearly quadrate" with his own, he has little to say except to express his approbation of them, especially as regards the impolicy of multiplying foreign possessions, and the injudicious conduct of the West India expedition. Is very glad to learn that Knox is interested in East India affairs and connected with those who govern them, having always blamed the present ministers for not availing themselves of his judgment, talents and experience. Notes that Knox's letter, written Nov. 25, and received March 17, has "via Dublin" in the corner, and "Lisbon" printed in red letters on the back. 3½ pp.

LORD LYTTELTON* to WILLIAM KNOX.

[1799, Nov. 22], Friday. Hagley Park.—When in town, called several times at Knox's house, but always missed him, and therefore writes, not to obtain political information, but as an old friend to learn how he and his family "do." As to public matters, the political atmosphere over Europe is much clouded, and he fears the new revolution in France will not tend to clear it, but, on the contrary, will produce more storms. 1¼ pp. Seal of arms. [Date given by Lyttelton on cover.]

Petition of WILLIAM KNOX to the KING.

1799, Nov. 28. Soho Square.—On the erection of the Province of New Brunswick in 1784, his Majesty authorized the Governor and Council there to make grants of vacant lands to American loyalists and other industrious subjects, in pursuance of which authority, the said Governor and Council have set out allotments and made grants of lands to many faithful subjects who have applied for the same, "most of whom zealously engaged in the settlement and cultivation of their respective lands, tho' many of their allotments were situated in the bosom of immense forests, without any roads of communication and at a distance from navigation," in the confident belief that they would speedily be helped in the labour of opening such communications by the influx of industrious settlers. But these expectations have been severely disappointed, and progress to prosperity fatally impeded, by the Additional Instruction of 1789, prohibiting further grants until his Majesty's further pleasure should be signified; which restraint still continues in force, although no complaint has ever been made of any abuse by the Governor and Council of the authority vested in them. By a late determination of the boundary between the province and the territories of the United States, a considerable tract of valuable land has been awarded to the province, into which many industrious persons in the neighbouring states, impatient of the rule of their present Governors and anxious to return to his Majesty's benign rule, would remove, but for the restraining Instruction of 1789, which petitioner, as agent for the province, now humbly prays his Majesty to be pleased to withdraw. 3 pp.

* Lord Westcote was created Baron Lyttelton of Frankley, co. Worcester (the title which had expired at his nephew's death in 1779) in August, 1794.

COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

1800, Jan. 31.—Resolution, on reference of Mr. Knox's petition for the withdrawal of the Additional Instruction of March 5, 1790, that it is not adviseable to submit any opinion thereupon until the boundaries of the province are "definitively settled," and, also, that as in the Additional Instruction it is stated "that great advantage will arise by the introduction of some further regulations to be observed in the disposal of the said lands," inquiry be made at the Secretary's office for the Home Department with respect to these further regulations, "and what the same were intended to be." Present—The Duke of Portland, Earl of Liverpool, Mr. Greville, Sir Joseph Banks. 2 pp.

WILLIAM KNOX to the CLERK OF THE COUNCIL.

1801, Jan. 26.—With whatever neglect or contempt his Majesty's servants may continue to treat the remonstrances made by him as agent for the province of New Brunswick, he must incessantly repeat them in the hope that their truth and justice will prevail. The prevention of the improvement and development of the province is not the only injury which the "cruel and impolitic Instruction" may bring about, for the desertion of the country by the few inhabitants who have been seduced into it may be seriously apprehended. A late American newspaper contains the following paragraph:—

"'Congress on the 3rd December appointed a committee to regulate the grants of land appropriated for the refugees from the British Provinces of Nova Scotia and Canada,' from which it appears that the American Ministers are sufficiently enlightened statesmen to be able to discern that the increase of industrious inhabitants constitute the strength and riches of the State," and that they hold out an invitation which probably many of the loyal but suffering inhabitants of New Brunswick will accept, "worn out as they are by the long and unaccountable continuance of a restraint which they cannot now hope is ever intended to be removed, as they have too high a respect for ministers to suppose that the great talents of three successive Secretaries of State, with their well-informed assistants, which have filled the Home Department during its continuance, were not able to devise any of those important regulations which were said to be in contemplation eleven years ago, and were then stated as the ground of the fatal suspension." 4 pp.

GOVERNOR EDMUND FANNING to WILLIAM KNOX.

1801, Sept. 25. Prince Edward* Island.—Sending him the journals of their House of Assembly appointing Knox and his son as agents for the island. "Although no salary is annexed to the appointment, fifty or sixty pounds per annum, it is said, will certainly be given, perhaps more." In process of time, Fanning hopes, it will increase and become something more than honorary, and he will use his best endeavours to make it so. Extract. 1 p. Numbered 3. [See Fanning's letter of May 22, 1804, below.]

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

1802, Nov. 3. Assembly Room.—Resolutions of the House of Assembly:—That the best thanks of the House be given to William Knox, colony agent, for his eminent services: That Mr. Knox be requested to sit for his portrait to some eminent artist in London, at the expense of the House, and that the portrait shall be sent out and placed in the first public building hereafter to be erected in the colony: And that Sir Robert Chalmers, Bart., Thomas Cochran, Robert Shuttleworth, John Stewart and William Townshend, Esquires, or any two of them, be requested to wait on Mr. Knox to communicate the foregoing resolution, and to fix on a painter, and settle the mode of payment when the portrait shall be finished and framed.

With note, dated Nov. 13, that his Majesty's Council [in the colony] concur in the above resolutions. Certified copy. Signed, Peter Dagowan, C. Stewart. 2½ pp.

LORD LYTTELTON to WILLIAM KNOX.

1803, April 12. Tuesday. Hagley Park.—"How do you do, dear Knox? . . . I write these few lines to request a little information of your state, and that of your family. My own has escaped the influenza; even my daughter has, though in town at her aunt, Mrs. Fraser's, and going to balls and routs. The distemper has been very prevalent at Birmingham and other towns of this neighbourhood, and has been in this village, but the high ground on which my house stands has been clear of it.

* Formerly St. John's Island.

"I am in mourning for my very old cousin, Lady Chatham, who survived all her brothers many years. It is no personal loss to me, for she lived at so great a distance from me that I have had no society with her for a long time past." 1 p. Seal with initial and coronet.

The Same to the Same.

1803, April 18. Hagley Park.—"I am heartily sorry, my worthy good friend, that you have suffered so much from that cruel distemper the gout. . . . Considering what a temperate life you have led, I suppose the malady has come to you from your forefathers. I have sometimes made free with wine, and never have had a touch of gout, which, as far as is known, did never infest my progenitors for many generations, and I have not been intemperate enough to acquire it myself. Since I wrote the letter you have answered so kindly, I have had a slight attack of the influenza, but am now recovered. I thank you for your Speculations, which perfectly coincide with and confirm my own. Upon the whole I will only say 'Give peace in the remaining part of my time, O Lord,' for had the war with its income tax continued, my affairs would have been much deranged." 1½ pp.

William Knox to the Committee of Correspondence, Prince Edward Island.

1803, June 1. Soho Square.—I beg you will thank both houses for their very flattering testimony of their approbation of my services, and assure them, that I shall not cease my endeavours to render Prince Edward Island a favourite object of government. The gentlemen you appointed have fixed on the Baroness de Tott to execute my portrait, and I have already sat twice for it. I have written to Lord Hobart in relation to your letter of Jan. 5, but unfortunately the rupture with France has called his attention to the military division of his office, and no steps have been taken except to press Mr Stewart's departure, "and to refer him to the intimation contained in the Treasury letter to him for the appropriation of 3,000*l.* of the money he is expected to receive, to re-instate that sum to the credit of the colony, and to apply it as was originally intended." The gentlemen you appointed to call on me tell me that you have a decent church at Charlotte Town, but neither State House nor prison. The former, with Council Chamber, Assembly room, and offices for the Clerk of the Council, the Secretary and Register, and the Surveyor-General, they suppose might be constructed for about 1,500*l.*, and a prison, with separate wards for debtors and criminals, and a house for the keeper, may be fitted up for less than 500*l.* more. As the Courts of Law will probably not have occasion to sit when the Assembly is convened, the same room may, for the present, do for both. This leaves 1,000*l.* for erecting two more churches and three parsonage houses, for I understand there are two situations where churches are wanted, and, indeed, nothing can more contribute to the population of the island. "I have no doubt of obtaining an addition to the annual estimate of 70*l.* to each and 50*l.* each from the Society, and also an allowance of 15*l.* per annum to a schoolmaster in each parish, as the vestry room of the church will serve for a schoolhouse. I wish much to interest Lord Hobart in the prosperity of the island as its patron, and it would be a pleasing compliment to him if you called the seat of one of the new churches Hobartstown, and if you called the other Addington, I would take care it should be considered as a compliment to the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. Your Act contains no parochial regulations, which will become necessary when you have churches, as they must be kept in repair, and wine must be provided for the communion table." As the war will put a stop to emigration from Europe, you ought to exert your powers in doing what will hereafter be wanted, and so encourage respectable settlers to come to you when peace returns, which I trust will be before long. Enquiries concerning the escheated land have been made by very respectable persons in Scotland, and government had under consideration a plan for re-granting it when the renewal of hostilities called off their attention. "I will not however, suffer the island to be forgot, even among the din of arms, and it will be for its own legislature to raise its character and keep up the public opinion of its advantages by just and beneficial laws and regulations." 5¼ pp.

William Knox to General Fanning.

1804, March 7.—Has not yet received the 50 guineas to pay for his picture. The frame will cost ten more. When appointed agent, in 1801, he was told by his Excellency that, though no salary was appointed in the Act, it was intended to grant 60*l.* a year, but he has never heard anything of it. As he will have been the colony's agent three years next July, it is certainly time he knew whether he was to have a salary or not, and he cannot help fearing that the picture is meant to stand in lieu of a year of it, which would not be very handsome.

In a search in the Office of Trade he has found several un-approved Acts of the island, of all of which he ought to have had copies. Had he known of one of them, "passed in the year 1786, confirming titles to portions of lands proposed to be given by certain proprietors to Loyalists," he would have been able "to remove all blame from the legislature of the island for the want of measures for settling the island, and to have laid it on the heads of the administration who advised the dis-approbation of that Act." Extract. 1 p. (No. 2.)

Governor Edmund Fanning to the Committee of Correspondence, Prince Edward Island.

1804, April 17. Charlotte Town.—Sending them an extract from Mr. Knox's letter of March 7. "The zeal and ability which Mr. Knox has displayed, and the success which has attended his unremitted endeavours for the public interest and reputation of this island has been so meritorious and distinguished" that he is certainly entitled not only to the immediate payment of his arrears of salary, but to the best gratitude and liberal consideration of the legislature of the island. 2 pp. (No. 1.)

COMMITTEE OF CORRESPONDENCE to his Excellency, LIEUT.-GENERAL FANNING.

1804, April 19. Charlotte Town.—Acknowledging his letter. Will at all times be ready to acknowledge with gratitude the zeal and ability which Mr. Knox has manifested in promoting the settlement and prosperity of the island, and although, as a Committee of the House of Assembly, they do not conceive it to be within the scope of their instructions to interfere in regard to the subject matter of his Excellency's letter, as individuals they are clearly of opinion that Mr. Knox ought to be immediately paid the arrears of salary due to him. Signed, C. Stewart, Peter Dagowan, Rob. Hodgson, David Ross, Robert Lee. 1½ pp. (No. 4.)

COUNCIL OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

1804, May 10.—Minute that the Lieut.-Governor having laid before the Board the letters, &c. in relation to Mr. Knox's salary, a warrant was ordered to be made out immediately "for three years' salary, at 60*l.* per annum, to be paid as soon as provision shall be made by the House of Assembly for defraying such arrearages due to Mr. Knox for his meritorious services. True copy, signed by Robert Lee, deputy Clerk of the Council. (No. 5.)

GOVERNOR FANNING to WILLIAM KNOX

1804, May 22. Prince Edward Island.—By the enclosed papers, numbered 1–5, you will see that I have not been inattentive to your just claims, and have not stopped until I had signed a warrant for your three years' agency. "Between ourselves, and in friendly confidence, the Assembly are sometimes strangely wrong-headed, and I am confident it was not intended that you should receive any other acknowledgement for your agency than the picture, and I was glad to receive your letter signifying to me the contrary. But you will observe that I have fixed the whole three years' salary, and the amount shall be paid you." Your kind and friendly attention to my private affairs gives you the strongest claim upon me. [The rest of the letter relates to Fanning's private financial affairs.] 3 pp.

WILLIAM KNOX to LORD CAMDEN

1804, June 9. Soho Square.—The West India planters and merchants having applied for an Act permitting the importation in American ships of lumber, cornflour and other articles, taking away in payment the produce of those islands, it becomes his duty, as agent of New Brunswick and of Prince Edward Island (while not denying that such permission is necessary at present), to pray that it may not be continued "beyond the existence of the necessity which calls for it, but that whenever the North American [British] Colonies shall manifest ability to supply the several articles wanted by their fellow-subjects in the West Indies, the permission to import them from the United States may be discontinued." He begs further to represent that an article in the treaty with the United States limited the burden of their vessels allowed to trade with the West Indies to 70 tons, but this article the States refused to ratify, and it must be acknowledged that such vessels are too small to receive the beams of timber needed in the islands, as also that the expense of navigation cannot be defrayed by the freight of such timber as they can store. But it is supposed that if the limitation was extended to 130 tons the objection would be obviated, and yet a sufficient guard provided against the abuse which an unlimited tonnage might give occasion to. While the American Colonies are so liberal in their dispositions to their fellow-subjects in the West Indies, it is surely not unreasonable to expect a return of good-will, yet Knox is informed "that in the islands of Barbados, Antigua, St. Kitts and Jamaica a stranger duty of 2½ per cent. or more is levied upon all imports from the British N. American Colonies (and in the island of St. Vincent it is 3 per cent.) from which the imports from the United States are exempt." It is humbly hoped that through his lordship's powerful recommendation, the legislatures of those islands will be induced to relieve the British Colonies from these strangers' duties. Draft. 5½ pp.

WILLIAM KNOX to the CLERK OF THE COUNCIL.

1804, July 5. Ealing.—Suggesting means by which the British possessions in North America may be improved, "in order to render them as beneficial to the commerce and navigation of the Empire as possible." Upper Canada is more fitted for the production of grain and flesh than any other colony, but its only channel for export and import is the St. Lawrence, which for several months in the year is not navigable, and which is commanded by the forts on the American side. It "can no longer be expected to remain a British Colony than the United States continue in friendship with Great Britain," and by their entire command of the Missisippi and its tributaries, it is to be feared that the States "will share with Great Britain in its commerce, and thus by extending our settlements in that country, we may be promoting the prosperity of the United States and preparing a valuable acquisition for their ambition." In Lower Canada, the St. Lawrence is closed for a much shorter time, and "as New Brunswick runs back to meet its frontier," it is much less exposed to be seized by the United States, or to have its trade diverted into their channel; on the contrary, much of their produce comes to Quebec, and is exported thence as British Colony produce, and paid for with British goods. Lower Canada, therefore, connected as it is with New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, may be considered as a permanent possession of the Crown. Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are open to the Atlantic, and therefore only for a short time in the year inaccessible to shipping. The bay of Fundy abounds with fish, which is to be found also along the whole east coast, &c., and the interior of both colonies abounds with timber. Many ships have been built there, but were of such "short duration" that Knox learnt at Lloyd's Coffee House that the underwriters refused to insure them for a second voyage. On enquiry, he found that they were built hastily and of green wood, owing to the legislature offering a premium if a certain number were built in a given time. The evil has now been cured, and the ships of those colonies are of good reputation. Their inexhaustible timber and abundance of fish make them very valuable, although their soil is not fertile enough for them ever to be great exporters of p ovisions. A part of New Brunswick, on the Gulf of St. Laurence, is admirably adapted for the growth of hemp.

Prince Edward Island is the most fertile of the colonies. Of its 1,300,000 acres not a thousand are unfit for cultivation, and its freedom from the fogs which infest the sea coast of Nova Scotia make it fit for corn. Its pastures are well adapted for sheep and cattle, hemp will thrive there luxuriantly, fish abounds on its coast, plenty of timber for small vessels can be got from Labrador; nothing is wanting but inhabitants and a wise government to make it a most valuable colony.

Soon after Cape Breton was ceded to Great Britain, in 1763, it was discovered that the whole island was a rock of coal. Mr. Charles Townshend, then first Lord of Trade, asked Knox what was best to be done with it. He told him that the then British provinces possessed iron ore which they smelted with charcoal and sent to Ireland and Scotland, where it was manufactured into implements and tools, and so sent back to America. If then, the coal mines of Cape Breton were worked, the Americans would supply themselves thence, work up their own pigs, and Great Britain would lose the trade. This determined him to shut up the colliery, and "he added the consideration of the probability that the collieries of this country might fail, and that Cape Breton would then be a useful source to apply to." This island is well situated for the fishery, and has an excellent harbour, but is not fit for cultivation.

As to the utility of these colonies, "all ideas of extracting a revenue from them must be totally abandoned. They have no money, nor ever can have any, nor ever ought to possess any; the whole of their commercial transactions must consist in barter—the exchange of their labour and its produce for our manufactures." The exaction of a high quit rent or purchase for the lands would prevent their settlement, from which alone advantage to this country must arise, and yet so little has this been understood by those who have had the conduct of the colonies, that since the defection of the States the quit rents in most of those that remained have been doubled, although every consideration of policy, justice and humanity demanded measures for drawing the loyal inhabitants out of the revolted provinces, and so strengthening the colonies which still adhered to the Crown. The King's governors were restrained from making grants of land, not only to new comers, but even to the grown-up sons of the inhabitants, who therefore were obliged to settle in the revolted States, where they were gladly received, free grants given to them, and some aid in tools and provisions as well. The restraint has lately been taken off, but the quit rents are raised from 2*s.* to 4*s.* 2*d.* per hundred acres, with a premium of two dollars as well, while Upper Canada has no quit rents at all, as if the intention were to draw the inhabitants of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick thither. The governors very wisely tried to counteract the mischief by giving warrants of location to the settlers, with promise of grants when the restraint should be taken off, but its long continuance destroyed confidence and stopped the ingress of settlers ; and some ships bringing settlers from Europe chose to go on to the United States rather than remain on such assurances. Common justice, as well as good policy, requires that the grants should be made on the terms originally proposed, and it would be no more than equitable to place the settlers on the same footing with those in Upper Canada, and relieve them from the payment of quit rent, which would encourage them very much. Prince Edward Island has been lately the object of much discussion, and as the measures adopted for its improvement have not yet had effect, there can only be recommended the exercise of great temper, judgment and impartiality. If these colonies are properly encouraged they will soon be in a condition to supply the West Indies with fish and lumber.

At the upper end of the Bay of Fundy there is a vast mine of gypsum, or plaster of Paris, which the farmers in the United States make great use of as manure, employing the craft of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to bring it to the islands in Passamaquoddy (which have been allowed to remain in their possession, although the right of Great Britain to them has been fully proved), whence their own vessels carry it to the States. As it is material that our shipping should have the whole transport of this manure, such orders should be given as would compel the Americans to employ our large vessels to carry it the whole distance. Draft. 14 pp.

Henry Ellis to William Knox.

1804, July. Naples.—Sympathising with him on the death of his son, and thanking him for his "literary productions." The State Papers were first conveyed to the Political Inquisators appointed to examine all foreign publications, but happily they found nothing to object to. Sees with concern Mr. Wilberforce's success in the House of Commons respecting the African trade, but hopes he will be disappointed in the Lords.

The French Ambassador is this instant passing in pomp to the Palace "to present his Imperial credentials" to the King, who will probably, from good policy, receive him respectfully. 3 pp.

[The covering page of this letter has 5 postmarks and three Foreign Office stamps upon it, of date from Sept. 10 to Sept. 13.]

The Same to the Same.

[1804], Nov. 27. Naples.—After a long interruption of the posts from England, a courier is just now arrived from the north, who brings me your kind and instructive favour of September, which afforded me the highest satisfaction, both as regarded yourself and public affairs. "We remain here pretty much in the same state as when I last wrote to you, though under the greatest anxiety to know what measures the French will force this Court to adopt upon the present occasion. The King ardently desires to remain neutral, which, in case of a war with Spain, I am afraid he will not be permitted to do. Meanwhile, we are totally uncertain what is to be the event of our disputes in case of a war with that power, for we learn nothing here upon this subject authentic or to be depended upon. . . . As to the part I shall be obliged to take hereafter, in consequence of the French power and influence here, I am as yet perfectly ignorant. 2½ pp.

English post-mark, "Jan. 28, 1805."

Lord Lyttelton to William Knox.

[1805]. Hagley Park. Tuesday.—I am very glad to hear that you think of visiting us. "Since you were here my much lamented friend Champion has, by a legacy, added his library to mine. We have also a card table allmost every night to amuse those who had rather look into the Devil's books, as some people have call'd cards, than either the Bible or the Koran." 1 p.

Henry Ellis to William Knox.

1805, Sept. 16. Naples.—Will gladly, if possible, accede to Knox's request to borrow 5,000*l.* upon the security mentioned. Has 28,000*l.* in the house of Sarjent, Chambers & Co., with whom he has dealt as bankers for fifty years, but of late he has had some hints that their circumstances are doubtful, and he will, as soon as possible, draw out of their hands what Knox needs. On the 26th of July, there was a violent earthquake at Naples, and every moment they expected to be buried in the ruins of the city, but though "every house bears the strongest marks of immediate destruction, yet few have suffered, and not many of the inhabitants. In the provinces great numbers of lives were lost, and multitudes of buildings destroyed, however all is tranquil now. Vesuvius gives the evil some vent, and continues to pour out torrents of flaming lava." He himself had a very violent fall, and soon after an attack of a paralytic nature, but is, thank God, pretty well recovered from both. 3 pp.

The Same to the Same.

1805, Nov. 5. Naples.—The English post is stopped in Germany and in Italy, so that they can neither send nor receive letters by that way. A merchant has promised to send this by way of Hambro'. "It is said our Government means, in time, to establish a packet between Trieste and Malta, in which case correspondence will be open again." [In relation to the loan alluded to in the previous letter.] 2 pp.

HENRY ELLIS to WILLIAM KNOX.

1805, Dec. 15. Naples.—Has just received a letter from Sarjent's house in response to his notice that he wished to withdraw 5,000*l*., praying him to draw upon them for half the sum at six months and the other half at nine months. Fears the house is on the point of failing, which will be a terrible loss to him; he cannot help it, however, so must submit.

P.S.—"A body of English and Russian troops are arrived here, which will force this King into a war again with the French in a month's time, and, of course, in all probability oblige me to retire again to Palermo." 3 pp.

THOMAS J. STIKEMAN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1806, Jan. 28. Naples.—Informing him of the death of Governor Henry Ellis, on January 21. Mr. Knox, Samuel Marshall, Esq., of Sergeants' Inn, and Mr. Francis Ellis (nephew of the deceased) are appointed executors. Sends a copy of Governor Ellis' will, authenticated by Mr. Scott, the British Vice-Consul, and has placed another copy, signed and sealed by the late governor, in the hands of Mr. Christian Heigelin, Danish Consul, an old friend of the deceased. The original he keeps in his own hands, being authorised by Gov. Ellis, to whom he was secretary, to take charge of his papers and effects. 2 pp.

WILLIAM KNOX to the CLERK OF THE COUNCIL.

1806, June 16. Ealing.—Has great pleasure in furnishing the Lords of the Committee [for Trade and Plantations] with his ideas of the best modes of disposing of the crown lands in New Brunswick. Three classes have to be considered—present inhabitants, emigrants from the United States and emigrants from Europe. The present inhabitants are mostly loyalists or descendants of loyalists, and have strong claims on Government. The grants of land so long withheld from them should be immediately expedited, quit rent suspended for ten years, and all arrears of quit rent remitted. Thus their confidence and good humour will be restored and they will communicate their satisfaction to their friends in the United States, and induce emigration. Lands in many of the States have risen in value, and it is a characteristic of Americans to have no local attachment. "They play at leap-frog with their lands; so soon as they have cultivated a spot that any new comer likes they sell it and remove higher up in the country . . . I have known them remove four times in the space of a few years." Therefore there can be no doubt that many will remove into New Brunswick, and, although some may be republicans, the superior respect in which the King's governor and servants are held, compared with the Republican governors and officers, and provincial rivalries and jealousies, will soon counteract their sentiments. The emigrants from Europe come out either with money to seat themselves on vacant lands or as indented servants brought over by the masters of the ships, who dispose of the indentures to the residents, and so repay themselves for the expence of bringing the men over. These indented servants are not entitled to lands until their apprenticeship expires, but, as they are a valuable acquisition to the country, the purchasers [of the indentures] should be allowed to claim lands on their account, with assurance to the servants of receiving them when their time expires.

The province should be divided into counties and sub-divided into parishes and townships; the surveys to be made at Government's expense, and accurate maps returned into the Surveyor's Office for inspection by new comers. Each township should be on or near a river or creek navigable for boats and canoes, and they should be connected by roads with each other and the seat of Government; these roads, in the first instance, to be made merely by blazing trees into lines about 12 feet from each other and cutting away the brush, &c., between. Bridges to be made by logs of trees pinned together with cross pieces, and covered with brush and earth, and the same method to be taken for roads across swamps; both roads and bridges to be made at the public expence under the direction of Commissioners and an Act to be passed by the Legislature for their maintenance. As the country becomes settled better roads and bridges will be made.

There are three methods of granting lands:—(1) By the King's warrant or mandamus; (2) on the claim of a settler in proportion to the number of his family; (3) by "the grant of an additional quantity in proportion to his ability by purchase." The 1st plan has always been a job, and has greatly impeded the settlement of the colonies; the 2nd is the wisest, as it operates as a premium to persons with families, and children born or brought up in the colony will become its best defenders. The settled proportion is a hundred acres for the master, 50 for the wife, and 50 more for each child or indented servant. The additions made by purchase must be regulated by the discretion of the Governor and Council.

It has been the disgrace of all administrations, since the first settlement of colonies in America, that no legal provision has ever been made for the ministers of the Established Church, or any care taken by Government for the religious instruction of the inhabitants. Begs to refer them to two letters (Appendices 4 and 5 of his Extra Official State Papers) drawn up by him for the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. This Society is now in very affluent circumstances and, with the assistance of their funds, Government might find means to make a permanent establishment for the ministers of the Church of England in the British provinces at very small expense to the public. Draft. 8 pp.

William Knox to Lord Auckland.

1806, July 22. — Prince Edward Island was originally divided into lots of about 20,000 acres each, and granted to as many proprietors as there were lots, who were to provide a fund for the support of the Governor, civil officers and clergy by a large quit rent. Many of the proprietors never paid their quit rents, the officers were left without salaries, and the island was likely to be abandoned, when the Crown took up the officers' case, and made a scanty provision for them; the public, by way of indemnity, taking the quit rents into their own hands. Little was got from the proprietors, however, and the arrears mounted up to 60,000*l*., more than double the price the island would sell for. When I was appointed agent I submitted a mode of inducing proprietors to dispose of their lands in small portions to actual settlers and so reduce the arrears to 7,000*l*., which, I calculated, would pay off the arrears of salaries and reimburse the grant of 2 000*l*. meant for a church, State house, and gaol, but which the governor and officers had taken to themselves for their maintenance. I also suggested the remission of arrears of quit rent to small holders "beyond the due proportion of the liquidated sum charged upon the whole lot." Lord Hobart, however, thought it improper to reduce the amount of the arrears lower than 22,000*l*., and continued the quit rent at its old rate, and an Act has been passed by the Legislature of the island enforcing the payment of arrears. I would suggest that the late Lieut.-Governor Fanning (now living at 57 Margaret Street, Cavendish Square), Mr. Stewart, and myself should attend your Lordship with maps and papers, and I make no doubt you would collect sufficient information to form a plan which would render the island beneficial to the public. Orders should be given for the admission of ships from foreign parts to land their passengers in the British possessions, as otherwise the Dutch and Germans will still go to the United States, as they have done during the continuance of the suspending Instruction. I have made several attempts to engage the Society for Propagation of the Gospel to assist in providing a religious establishment for the island, but Dr. Morrice, their Secretary, objects on the ground that it is private property, and that none of the proprietors are subscribers to the funds of the Society.

Your Lordship must, therefore, speak with the Archbishop of Canterbury and other of the Bishops on the subject. There is only one poor minister of the Church of England in the island, with a salary of 70*l*. a year from the estimates; he has a large family, whom he supports "by labouring in a check shirt six days in the week, but on Sundays he attends his duty in the church very regularly." Glebes are reserved in every parish, but there is neither church nor minister except at Charlotte town. If the quit rents were made a fund for the support of the Church of England ministers, and some help given from the Society, an establishment for ministers and school-masters would soon be made: and if the same plan were carried into Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, "the want of attention to the affairs of religion in the colonies will be no longer a reproach to the British administration." 8 pp.

Lord Lyttelton to William Knox.

1807, Jan. 4. Hagley Park.—". . . I will not omit to tell you, my very worthy old friend, that I am this day completely eighty-two years old, and shall give and partake of a chearfull dinner with some of my neighbours. What a pleasure would it be to me if I could add you to their number! Yet I will not propose a journey to you in the winter; I believe I shall outlive it, and shall be happy in your company if you will favour me with a visit in any one of the next summer months.

"I have here my grandson, young Henry Hoare, but William, my son, is engaged in the House of Commons, where, as you say very rightly, he has gained a very honourable seat, but time alone must shew whether it will produce beneficial effects to him and advance his fortune." 1¼ pp. [Written in a clear, firm hand.]

LORD AUCKLAND to WILLIAM KNOX.

1807, Feb. 21. Palace Yard.—Private. "I have reason to believe that it would be a concession highly beneficial to the colony of New Brunswick, and in some degree to Nova Scotia, if it could be made practicable to allow the vessels of the United States of a certain description, and British vessels, to carry from some specified port or place to the United States the gypsum or plaister of Paris. Will you have the goodness to give to me a little of your strong sense and information on this subject, so as to facilitate such a measure in the least exceptionable shape. I have reason to believe that the United States would annually purchase an immense quantity of the article for the cultivation of lands, and the furnishing of it would be highly advantageous to New Brunswick." 1 p.

E. COOKE (secretary to Lord Castlereagh) to WILLIAM KNOX.

1807, May 13. Downing Street.—Requesting him to furnish Lord Castlereagh with a copy of the communication from Lord Auckland which he sent to Prince Edward Island, as Governor Desbarres mentions it, but gives no particulars. 1 p.

WILLIAM KNOX to LORD CASTLEREAGH.

1807, Oct. 15. Ealing.—In consequence of the hostile appearances in the United States of America, he begs to draw his lordship's attention to the unprotected state of New Brunswick; its extended frontier and the thinness of its inhabitants (owing to the fatal continuance of the Instruction preventing grants of land) holding out an invitation to the Americans to attempt its conquest in case of war, and their possession of the islands in the Bay of Passamaquoddy affording shelter for their cruisers and enabling them to intercept British trading vessels, and in a great measure to destroy the valuable fishery in the bay. There is not a military man in New Brunswick, nor any of his Majesty's vessels stationed there, and, though it is too late in the season for an arrival from Europe, he prays his lordship to advise his Majesty to direct some naval and military force to be sent from Halifax and Quebec as soon as war with the United States becomes inevitable. Copy. 2 pp.

WILLIAM KNOX to E. COOKE

1808, Jan. 27. Ealing.—On the importance, in case of war with America, of taking possession of Penobscott, thus obtaining an excellent station for the British cruisers, and at the same time covering the Bay of Funday and Nova Scotia from attack by sea. Also the Americans would never think of attacking New Brunswick by land if British troops were in possession of the Penobscott River, which they must cross and leave in their rear. Even Lower Canada would be protected by a force there, as it was by going up the Sagadahock River that Arnold made an irruption into Canada and had nearly taken Quebec, and Sagadahock Bay being very near Penobscott Bay and the two rivers nearly parallel, nothing could be done on the one without being known and probably frustrated by the force on the other. "These were the reasons which induced the attack upon Penobscott by Sir George Collier in the American war, and it was the determined purpose of Lord George Germain and the whole administration to have retained possession of the country and to have erected it into a province, under the name of New Ireland, had not Mr. Wedderburne, then Attorney-General, in resentment of not being made a peer at the same time with Lord Thurlow, refused to give his fiat to the Commission; and Lord Shelburne, from ignorance of its importance, ceded it to the Americans."

The Americans, holding Lake Champlain, will undoubtedly attack Montreal by that route, as Montgomery did in the American war. Does not know if the British have any fort on the Sorel. The French had one, but too small to hold troops enough for any use, so that Carleton abandoned it to Montgomery, calling the garrison to him at Montreal, which place, however, he had not sufficient force to defend, and so made his escape from it in a canoe to Quebec. Fears Montreal cannot be defended, as the Americans can come down from Oswego as well as from Lake Champlain, and if Montreal is lost the whole of Upper Canada must fall into the enemy's hands. Some armed vessels on Lake Ontario might prevent the attack from Oswego, but, as the Americans could bring in an overwhelming army by Lake Champlain, and could soon construct armed vessels at Oswego and Niagara, this would only delay, not prevent, their conquest of Upper Canada.

If hostilities be determined upon, it would be best to send troops out directly to Penobscott, as the Americans are not prepared for such an attack, and, as before said, troops stationed there would better cover the British possessions than if sent to Nova Scotia or New Brunswick.

Sends a printed copy of the plan of Sir George Collier's attack, in case that in the office cannot be found. "It is most unfortunate that General Carleton is prevented from going out, as the Governor is quite imbecile." 3 pp.

William Knox to the Clerk of the Council.

1808, Feb. 11. Ealing.—In answer to the inquiry of the Lords of the Committee for Trade and Plantations, begs to state that he has received instructions from New Brunswick to oppose any attempt to procure his Majesty's disallowance of the Act mentioned, passed in that province in the last year, intitled An Act to ascertain the *rights of Fishery. Will attend their lordships at any time, but prays first to be furnished with a copy of the petition from the Corporation of St. John's against the said Act, as he is ignorant of the nature and grounds of their objections to it. Draft. 1½ pp.

WILLIAM KNOX to the COMMITTEE OF NEW BRUNSWICK.

1808, April 6. Ealing.—The Lords of Trade have had under consideration the Act of their Assembly concerning the rights of Fishery. The agent for St. John's stated his objections to the Act; Knox answered, "to the apparent satisfaction of the Lords," who expressed much impatience in hearing his antagonist's reply; but the Act was disallowed, partly because an Act of Assembly cannot repeal an Act of Parliament or alter the Common Law of England, and, also, because Ministers are doing everything to conciliate the United States, and the Act would deprive their fishing vessels of the stipulations made in their favour in the Treaty of 1783. It is not yet known whether it is to be Peace or War with the States, but meanwhile, their embargo must be of great benefit to New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and, perhaps "the accounts Congress will receive of the treatment their ships meet with from the French and other allies will indispose them to go to war" with England. Copy. 2¼ pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1808, Sept. 7. Ealing.—All negotiation between England and the United States being suspended, it appears a fit time to consider the business of their province. The question of the intercourse between the United States and the British West Indies must be comprised in the general measures adopted for the good of the nation, but there must be no relaxation of watchfulness and nothing should be left undone to enforce the importance of the Colony. Mr. Nathaniel Acheson's most valuable book is not entirely favourable, and Knox wishes to do away with disagreeable inferences to be drawn from it. General Carleton stated, in his evidence before the Committee on West Indian Commerce, that when he left New Brunswick there were five ships employed in bringing home masts and spars, but Mr. Idle, before the same Committee, said that he has a contract to furnish masts, &c., for the Navy from Canada solely, they being very far superior to those of New Brunswick or the United States; and Mr. Venner stated that the American fishermen come to the New Brunswick lines, catch the fish on their banks, and carry them to their own adjacent islands for sale. This is a severe charge against the industry and skill of the New Brunswick fishermen, and the other statement is highly injurious to the character of the timber of the country. In the same volume is a judgment by Mr. Botsford, Judge of the New Brunswick Vice-Admiralty Court, clearly laying down the boundary line of the province as passing between Deer Island, Campo Bello, and Marvel on the British side, and Moose, Dudley and Frederick Islands on the American side; and after this peremptory decision by a very able judge appointed by the Crown, it would be difficult to support any claim to the last three islands, but they might be obtained by treaty. Hopes that the termination of the present war will enable Great Britain to grant America equivalents for a much greater concession. "The happy expulsion of the French from Spain and Portugal, to which Great Britain has so greatly contributed," must dispose both those nations to gratitude, and it may be possible to obtain East Florida for the United States as an equivalent for their ceding to Great Britain the country up to the Penobscott, or the Kennebiche. At all events, the favourable termination of the war would put it in England's power to amend the unfortunate treaty of 1783, so as to insure the future safety and prosperity of British North America. Hopes to have a reduced copy of the great map of New Brunswick at the Board of Trade engraved ready to send to Germany, to encourage emigrants, as soon as peace is declared. 5 pp.

* The words in italics are cancelled.

William Knox to Dr. Herschel.

1809, Oct. 9. Great Ealing.—Stating that as "the contemplation of a future state leads to astronomical disquisitions," he begs to ask Dr. Herschel for some information concerning the rotatory movements of the planets on their own axis, concerning which neither Sir Isaac Newton, nor any of his successors, seem ever even to have hazarded a conjecture. Gives the data of the times, &c., of the revolutions of the Earth, Mars and Jupiter, stating (inter alia) that, as Dr. Herschel well knows, the Earth is computed to be 81 millions of miles from the Sun, and its rotation on its axis about a thousand miles an hour; Mars 120 millions of miles from the Sun, rotating at 500 miles an hour; Jupiter five times the Earth's distance from the Sun, rotating at nearly 26,000 miles an hour. Does not pretend to accuracy in his numbers, "as small differences are nothing in such extensive calculations," and has not made these statements to inform Dr. Herschel of the facts, as he knows them better than anyone alive, but as the ground for his enquiries. Begs, in the first place, to know "if there has been any use discovered for placing so vast a body of some sort of matter in the situation of Jupiter in our solar system. . . . That a great body should move with greater velocity than a small one in making its revolution, is so contrary to all mechanical rule" that he cannot conceive what the law is which governs the case, and he prays Dr. Herschel, as the most likely of all practical astronomers to make the discovery, to employ his great talents in the consideration of the subject, for he is apt to imagine that a nearer knowledge of the heavenly bodies will help in forming a juster knowledge of Heaven itself. Dr. Herschel has "supposed the whole created universe forms one great concave, and Milton has made Satan, after passing through Chaos, to land upon the convex or outside of that concave. If this be so, where shall we place the seat of bliss, or the place of the Assembly of the 10,000 times 10,000 angels, who we are told surround the throne of the Deity. We have local descriptions of Heaven and of Paradise; indeed we are told of three heavens . . . In what part of space are we to look for them?" In conclusion, assures the Doctor of the great obligations which he, in common with all others, owes to him. Copy. 5 pp.

Dr. William Herschel to William Knox.

1809, Oct. 13. [Slou]gh, near Windsor.—" Dear Sir,—Among the astronomical particulars you have mentioned, although the purpose for which they are intended does not require great accuracy, there are some that should be corrected. For instance, the distance of the Earth from the Sun is not less than 95 millions of miles, that of Mars 144, and of Jupiter 494 millions. The diameter also of Jupiter being 91,714 miles, the velocity upon its equator arising from rotatory motion will be nearly 29 thousand miles per hour.

" The question about the cause of the rotatory motion of the planets has not entirely escaped the inquisitive minds of astronomers; it is probably connected with the projectile motion, as one could hardly be given without the other. You may see a quotation on this subject at the end of my paper printed in the Philosophical Transactions for 1783, page 283, On the Sun and Solar System. The quotation is from Mr. De la Lande, as follows :—

" ' Une force quelconque imprimée à un corps et capable de le ' faire tourner autour de son centre, ne peut manquer aussi de ' déplacer le centre et l'on ne sauroit concevoir l'un sans l'autre. ' Il paroit donc très vraisemblable que le soleil a un mouvement ' réel dans l'espace absolu.'

" Now as in this paper, and two more published in 1805 and 1806, the solar motion in space has been proved, we are authorised to admit that the same cause which gave it that motion may possibly have also been the cause of its rotation.

" It is true that the heavens appear to us as one great concave, but this, we also know, to be a mere consequence of the principles of optics; the real extent or form of the universe is far beyond what we can have any conception of. An attempt to assign ' a space for the seat of bliss or the assembly of angels ' does not fall to the lot of astronomers, who keep always within the range of facts that may be ascertained. In hopes that what has been said will partly answer your expectation, I have the honour to remain, dear Sir, your most obedient humble servant, Wm. Herschel."

II.—LETTERS AND PAPERS RELATING TO IRELAND.

The State of Ireland.

1767 —Paper on the state of Ireland, noted by Knox as " delivered to Lord Frederick Campbell when appointed Secretary to Ireland in 1767." Draft. 14 pp.

Sir Lucius O'Brien to William Knox.

1776, April 2. Dublin.—Sir John Blaquiere has communicated to me your letter relative to the possibility of attaching the southern whale fisheries to Ireland. I thought not a moment should be lost, and, though the Parliament is too near dissolution to introduce a bill, I have laid some resolutions on the subject before the House of Commons, who have unanimously agreed to them.

The import and export duties on oil, whalebone and seal skins have been taken off by an Irish Act this session, and by these resolutions a bounty is promised similar to the Greenland bounty, but whereas this is to be reduced from next Christmas to 30*s*. per ton, ours will continue, for three years at least, at 40*s*. With regard to the premiums for erecting furnaces and boiling the oil, we have funds of our own proper for the purpose. As you have opportunities of communicating both with the London and American merchants, I pray you to perfect your work, and help to "prevent this body of industrious fishermen (many of whom are Irishmen) from transporting themselves and their art to France or Holland." 3½ pp.

Sir John Blaquiere to William Knox.

1776, May 14. Dublin Castle.—Assuring Knox that his ideas are carefully attended to, and likely to prosper for the good of Ireland. Is sorry he has not been able to enter into the correspondence as it deserved, but the cause has not suffered, as his friend, Sir Lucius O'Brien, has followed it up with his wonted diligence.

Hopes to be able to do Mr Smith a good turn, but, since Lord Harcourt's arrival, "priests have refused to die, the clergy have been, as they deserve to be, immortal; and engagements ecclesiastical, [made] upon his first landing, are some of them yet unaccomplished." 2 pp.

With note.—"This letter transmitted copy of a bill for the improvement of the Fisheries of Ireland; giving bounties to the Newfoundland ships."

Sir Lucius O'Brien to William Knox.

1776, July 7. Dublin.—"The infinite confusion into which I have been thrown by a very unfairly contested county election" is my only apology for leaving your letters so long unanswered.

"The times are certainly favourable in many respects for us, as England seems sufficiently apprised in general of the advantage that must result to herself from increasing the maritime strength of Ireland. . . . One matter formerly hinted at by you would, no doubt, be highly conducive to this. I mean a clause in some Act declaring Irish ships to be English to all legal intents—that is if duly registered and manned. You know how far the English laws go allready to this point, so that the clause would rather be declaratory than any new grace to Ireland."

With respect to our fisheries, I think our Parliament has done almost all that could be expected from them, and yet our merchants have none of them availed themselves of these encouragements. The cause you have pointed out—the want of capital in this poor country. You have also given the remedy—that the moneyed agents of London would furnish funds if the trade should appear profitable, yet I cannot hear of any of our merchants availing themselves of this supply. Without this they can do little, yet we are making some beginning. 3½ pp.

The Same to the Same.

1776, Sept. 30. Dromoland.—As to the African trade, "the disabling Acts of 15 and 23 Charles II. I believe prohibit Ireland to trade to or from any place or plantation belonging to England in Africa, but, as to such parts of the trade as is carried on with countrys in which England has no dominion, I think there is no law which interferes with us, unless it be that one which directs the African trade to be carried on under the direction of a company, and that Act, I think, while it fixes the seats of direction in London, Liverpool and Bristol, yet leaves the trade open to all his Majesty's subjects."

Might not some encouragement be given to our fisheries and also to the captains of our men of war, if the Irish merchants were permitted to register prize ships as British ships for the Fisheries? 4 pp.

Irish Trade.

1776.—Paper endorsed by Knox himself as "delivered to Sir John Blaquiere; the ground of the first measure for opening the trade of Ireland in 1776." 4 pp.

1776.—Notes showing that the Irish are cut off from the Newfoundland fishing, since Irish ships may not enter its harbours, nor may fishing tackle or provisions be carried thither by ships belonging to Ireland. The same may be said respecting the whale and oil fishing in the Gulf and River St. Lawrence, as, by the Navigation Act of 15 Charles II., all ships carrying commodities to the colonies must be "English built, or belonging to England, Wales or Berwick," and only by such ships may fish be brought home. Imperfect. 4 pp.

Sir Lucius O'Brien to William Knox.

1777, Aug. 5. Dromoland.—Your observation is striking "upon the profit which the New Englanders made of their molasses spirit, and on the probability there is that the Irish could afford a malt spirit at as cheap a rate. With a view to this very trade I obtained in the last session of our Parliament a drawback of all duties upon the exportation of Irish made spirits," but I think we shall need to have more liberty given to us, if we are to go extensively into the African trade.

With regard to importing West India goods directly into Ireland, you think we might succeed if a higher tax is laid on these than on such as come through England, and if we can prove risk and loss by the present circuitous route. As to the first, it is done already by the Irish Act of Customs, which subjects plantation goods coming by way of England to but half the duty charged in the Book of Rates.

And does not this difference in favour of importing from England prove the loss also? "For either the loss must exceed that sum, or else, even after permission given to import directly, men will prefer the present practice, and then no complaint can be made by anyone."

The rest of the letter is a discussion of one of the clauses in the Fishery Act. 8 pp.

SIR RICHARD HERON to WILLIAM KNOX.

1778, April 29. Dublin Castle.—Introducing Mr. Wetherell, a gentleman whom Sir Lucius O'Brien desired should attend the Committee. He is assistant examinator of the Customs, and of great knowledge in his branch, and brings with him the Books of the Customs for the last seven years. 2 pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1778, May 10. Dublin Castle.—I last night received your letter, stating what had passed in your conference with the deputies of the iron and hemp manufacturers, and desiring an opinion from hence upon the proposition that Irish manufactures "shall carry out with them a duty equal to that which remains upon those of the same denomination exported from England." By the Lord Lieutenant's direction, I have informed the Speaker, Prime Serjeant, Attorney-General, and other important members of the House of Commons, of the import of your letter, and am to assure you that they have no apprehension that so reasonable a proposal can fail to be cheerfully adopted. Pray, therefore, have bills drawn in England, and send the drafts over, that we may see exactly what you expect from our Parliament.

The Lord Lieutenant desires me to thank you for your attention to him in this business. 3 pp.

The SAME to the SAME.

1778, May 22. Dublin Castle.—In my former letters I stated that there was no doubt but that the Parliament of Ireland would cheerfully concur in your proposition for equalizing duties, but, as it seems to be expected that the clause you send me should be inserted in the Act, I have conferred to-day with many of the principal gentlemen of our House, and, being persuaded that our Parliament would immediately lay such duties as this clause is calculated to obtain, they wish the bill to pass "without a clause which seems to express a doubt of the Parliament here doing what is right in this respect, and which is the less necessary as Ireland hopes for further benefits, and cannot be so impolitick as to forfeit her claim to them by an ill-use of what is now to be granted." But, whether the clause is insisted on or no, you are prayed to send a most exact account of how goods, &c., imported from Great Britain stand charged, that Parliament, in laying on the duty here may be sure they proceed correctly. I cannot conceal that the "long train of excepting" in this Bill, and the postponing the Import Bill to next session, were a great disappointment. 3½ pp.

With note by Knox.—"I procured the bill to be brought on again and passed."

The SAME to the SAME.

1778, May 24. Dublin Castle.—"I am exceedingly obliged by your letter of the 19*th acquainting me the Export Bill had gone thro' the Committee. . . . Now people's minds begin to cool, they are* sensible of the advantages you have procured to this country; I mean all reasonable people, who will soon satisfye the rest how thankful they ought to be to England for their concessions, and to the friends of this country for having procured them; but the unanimity with which the Resolution passed had flattered Ireland everything would be granted, and being afterwards alarmed with the apprehension of losing everything, the minds of people of all ranks were strangely agitated, and the lower order feeling at the same time great distress from the scarcity of provisions and the want of work, it is certain the disappointment would have produced a violent convulsion in this Kingdom. The crisis of this fever is passed; that which will be produced by agitating questions respecting the Popery Laws, will, I see, be very violent, but does not seem of so dangerous a tendency as the other. The question is between the individuals of the same country, and the party which is beat will have only to lament its being the weaker. The other would have become a question, and an ugly one, as it should seem, between Nation and Nation. Mr. Gardiner will, I believe, move to-morrow for leave to bring in Heads of a Bill for Relief of His Majesty's Roman Catholick Subjects of Ireland. He is not yet determined what to propose. There is a general idea of putting the Roman Catholicks of Ireland upon the same footing with the Roman Catholicks of England. Government will support the motion for leave to bring in Heads of a Bill. There will be a strong opposition against any alteration whatever and a violent one against repealing the gavelling clause, which the Roman Catholicks abhor, and their opposers, even moderate men, consider as the Paladium of Ireland. It will, therefore, be very difficult to get rid of this clause, but having done that, you will be supposed to have done everything, and may, in another Session, blot the word Papist out of their statutes. I conclude your Parliament will soon rise. When we shall be able to do the same one cannot even conjecture." 3¼ pp.

EDMUND PERY to WILLIAM KNOX.

1778, Oct. 23. Edmundsberry.—Sir Richard Heron assures me that he and the Lord Lieutenant have "used every argument they could think of to have the embargo upon small beef taken off, or, at least, relaxed, but in vain." He has promised to make another effort, but I fear the principles upon which it was first laid on still subsist, and will continue it, although I am certain "it has answered no other purpose but that of reducing to the utmost distress a people who have deserved better. You say there are two objects to be attended to; . . . the securing a sufficient supply for our own forces, and preventing the French ships and Colonies from being victualled. With respect to the first, I am confident that none of our beef which is fit for the English market ever goes to any other; the price of it, which no other country will, or perhaps can, pay, is the best security against that. With respect to the second, . . . I confess I cannot see what advantage it is to Great Britain that France should be obliged to take her provisions from other countries rather than from Ireland. It has, I know, been the policy of very wise nations to supply their enemies, even in time of war, with what they wanted, and I believe they never had occasion to repent having done so. . . .

"I confess to you I have for some time judged it prudent to remain silent with respect to the affairs of this Kingdom, which, indeed, I think are in a most deplorable state. I found that what I said had no other effect but to offend, which I wished not to do. The time is certainly not far off when this country must be attended to, and very different measures adopted with respect to it. That time should be expected with patience." 3 pp.

Underwritten :—

Note by Knox.—"I succeeded in getting the embargo taken off in December following, in consequence of the representation annexed, but I left the merit of the measure to Administration, and said nothing of it in my correspondence to Ireland. How much did I save Ireland by both revaluations?" [This note, and the last paragraph of Pery's letter, have been subsequently cancelled.]

Dr. Tucker, Dean of Gloucester, to William Knox.

1778, Oct. 28.—Thanks him for his sensible, judicious, and truly patriotic letters. As regards the direct importation of sugars into Ireland, the Dean has himself laboured a good deal in Bristol. "The opposers of the Bill used to object 'that whatever quantity of sugars were imported from the West Indies directly into Ireland would prevent the like quantity being imported from England,' to which the Dean used to reply: 'Make the native Irish somewhat less miserable than they are, and then they will consume a greater quantity sent from England, and also a large quantity imported directly from the West Indies. For example, there are at present at least a million of poor Irish peasants who, one with another, do not consume a pound of brown sugar each in the year; whereas, were they in a little better circumstances, each would probably consume nine pounds . . . and so in proportion of every other commodity.

"In regard to the Bills for repealing the persecuting laws against the Roman Catholics, the Dean has this short remark to make. That when the Papists are reforming the very worst and most mischievous parts of their religion, by their open disavowal of persecution, some of us, who call ourselves Protestants, adopt those very principles which they are casting off." 1½ pp.

Sir Lucius O'Brien to William Knox.

1778, Dec. 17. Dublin.—Sir Richard Heron has gone over to you with many plans of improvement for Ireland. He has a delicate part to play, for, on the one hand, nothing should be attempted without the full concurrence of Administration, and especially of those two great friends of Ireland, Lord North and Lord George Germain; and, on the other, "opposition must be so managed as to prevent their raising a cry or attempting to render what may be done for us unpopular." This, I think, might be easily effected, as there is nothing which should be asked for by Ireland that will not be for the benefit of the majority among you who are interested in the subject. "Whatever you do for us is much wanted, for I cannot see how it is possible to go on in the present train, or even to find subsistence for the army much longer. And yet the greater part of what is to be done must be done here, where, believe me, an extensive plan of regulation is essentially wanting, for the revenue, the encouragement of Trade, the adjustment of the establishments, the peace and order as well as the defence of the Kingdom." 3¼ pp.

IRISH TRADE.

1778, December.—Paper endorsed by Knox as being delivered to Lord Geo. Germain for the Cabinet, "which was the ground of taking off the embargo on Irish provisions to all parts of Europe." 4 pp.

1778.—Paper in Knox's hand, headed "1778. Reasons in support of the Bill for encouraging the Trade of Ireland." 21½ pp.

SIR RICHARD HERON to JOHN SCOTT.

1779, Sept. 28. Dublin Castle.—Wishes much that he could do something for Dr. Smith, as he knows Mr. Knox has his promotion at heart; but the Lord Lieutenant "is so circumstanced with regard to the arrangements on the vacancies of the sees of Cloyne and Waterford" that he cannot comply with Mr. Knox's recommendation; and so few vacancies have happened in the church during his government that he has many original applications yet unsatisfied. 1½ pp.

Endorsed with note from Scott to "Mr. Ford," regretting that "matters do not wear a better appearance for Mr. Smith or my friend, his patron."

WILLIAM KNOX to LORD [THURLOW ?].

1779, Nov. 14. Bath.—The Irish gentlemen here are told by their correspondents in Ireland "that a tax upon the estates of Absentees will make the most natural of the ways and means for paying off the arrears of the last two years. If a union be the measure it is determined to promote, such a tax will create it many advocates. The chief objection of the landed people to it who either are, or intend to become, absentees, which is that of its involving a land tax, will be removed, and they will be stimulated to forward it by a resentful desire of seeing others charged as well as themselves, and the hope of being less heavily burthened when the equal system of British taxation is wholly adopted. In this light, therefore, I cannot help wishing the tax success, for, in my poor opinion, it is by the means the people themselves offer that all great changes in a constitution should be exacted."

There are three principles, either of which I think the Parliament and people of Ireland might be led to adopt, "but they are all exclusive of each other, and therefore one, and one only, can be pursued. The first is a complete and intire union or incorporation of the two islands, with the single exception of Ireland's retaining a local subordinate legislature, similar in authority to that of the Isle of Man. The second is to leave the Constitution of Ireland untouched, and to give it all advantages in its trade that England enjoys, but in a way that shall secure to the English Government the command of a considerable portion of the national wealth and population which those advantages shall produce. The third is to do everything for Ireland that shall have a tendency to promote its prosperity, without prejudice to England, and to leave it to the Government there to avail themselves of it; and, for that purpose, to make such alterations in the Constitution of Ireland as shall serve to strengthen the hands of the Irish Administration. . . . Whichever your Lordship shall think the most fit to be the foundation of a system, I will do my best to frame one upon it." 3½ pp.

IRISH TRADE.

1779, December.—Resolutions drawn up by William Knox for enabling Ireland "to participate with the inhabitants of Great Britain in all the advantages of foreign and domestic trade, under the like duties and regulations." 7 pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN to WILLIAM KNOX.

1780, June 1. Pall Mall.—"The Lord Lieutenant has sent the articles you mention to Lord Hillsborough, or something like them, and desires fresh instructions. They will send him none, as they are of no consequence but to be read by his Excellency to twenty people, and an extract of them by Sir R. Heron in the House of Commons. The use made of official letters is rather new, and, in short, this last transaction makes such a puzzle that no good can arise out of it. I hope as unexceptionable a bill as possible will be transmitted, and if any alterations are necessary they must be made here, and then the Parliament will say whether they please to accept it or not. If they reject it, there is an end of the army; if we admit it in an improper form, there is an end of the constitution. . . . What concerns me greatly is to find my friend Lord Buckingham so unassisted in Parliament; no minister capable of directing, no leading men agreeing in support of the Castle; all professing, as we are told, to have no confidence in the Secretary, and every man, uncontradicted (except by the Attorney-General) declaring against the legislative authority of Great Britain."

You being on the spot will, I am sure, give Lord Buckingham the best advice in your power. "Nothing will be more improper, in my opinion, than to give a formal opposition to the bill in Council; only to shew he is obeying his instructions and to throw the odium upon administration here." 3 pp.

GENERAL R. CUNINGHAM to WILLIAM KNOX.

1780, Aug. 10. Dublin.—". . . The mutiny bill is not arrived, but the alteration is generally understood, and greatly allarms.

Our patriots have declared publickly in the House of Commons that if there should be a majority against them in rejecting a perpetual Mutiny Act they will secede from Parliament, appeal to the people, and publish an instrument setting forth their reasons for so doing. What I consider as the settled Opposition of this country seem united on this point, but I am confident Government has strength enough to carry the Bill through both Houses, if it is willing and knows how to exert it. It is more than probable we shall have a mob the day the subject is discussed, still I think we may pass the Bill, and, if we do, we shall soon get into smooth water. If there was any vigour left in Government it could not admit of a doubt, but, you must know from what you saw in Ireland, there is none. Is it not amazing that Grattan should have been permitted to talk of seceding in the manner I have stated, when the Speaker was in the chair, and the Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant and the Attorney and Solicitor-General in the House, and yet not to be called to order? But so it is, and so it must be till there is a vigorous Government in this country to set its face against the specious doctrines of ill-designing men, and to contradict, or at least counteract, the vanity of Irish publications that poison the minds of the people."

The Sugar Bill will be the next thing, and when that is over I hope this country will have rest for twelve months. 3¼ pp.

Underwritten :—

Note by Knox.—"This was soon after my return from Ireland, where I had assisted Gen. Cuningham in the business of the Mutiny Bill, for a particular account of which see my letter to Lord Hillsborough, which his Lordship was so good as to let me have back."

William Eden to William Knox.

1781, March 11. Phœnix Park.—Your letters deserve the best acknowledgments both from me and my Principal. It has happened to many of our predecessors to be often the last and the worst informed at seasons of great events, but hitherto we have every reason to feel grateful to Lord Hillsborough and our private friends, and shall certainly use their kindness with all discretion.

The Attorney-General [Scott] and I live and act together most cordially, and I am as well pleased with my situation here as I expected, "but it is at best a most incessant teazing to the temper and faculties. The expence, too, from the general system of luxury and dissipation thro' the kingdom, is become enormous to the Secretary, who must not be undone (sic) by any man in the folly of a fine table, good carriages, horses, &c. . . ." 2½ pp.

The Same to the Same.

1781, Nov. 28. Dublin Castle.—This messenger carries our money bills, which I hope will be returned without delay or alteration, as our House ought to adjourn very soon. Nothing can stand better than our Government does now, if we are only supported as we ought to be. Pray give me your sentiments on the subject of a National Bank for Ireland. I have many ideas, when I can find time to digest them, and I see the importance of the present Government taking the lead in the measure. I dare not mention America! 1 p.

William Knox to William Eden.

1781, Dec. 6. Whitehall.—"I begin to fear for you from my faith in the literal denunciations of Scripture—'Woe to you when all men speak well of you.' If they expel you from Ireland, it will be upon the same principle Aristides was banished from Athens. . . . In truth, you have done admirably, and everybody here thinks so, and there is the most hearty disposition to give you full support. . . . You desire my thoughts upon a National Bank for Ireland. It is an ill-time for one who is just become a bankrupt in one part of the world to think of establishing a system of credit in another, but you shall have what occurs." [The rest of the letter is on the subject of the Bank and is printed in Knox's "Extra Official State Papers."]

William Eden to William Knox.

1782, Feb. 11. Dublin Castle.—"Whatever becomes of the American department I do not conceive that it can exist without you;" give me leave therefore to recommend Lieut.-Governor Hamilton to your kindest attention. If you can be of use to him, you will give much pleasure to the Lord Lieutenant, and confer a great favour on me. 1 p.

William Knox to Lord Temple.

1782, Nov. 2.—It gives me great pleasure if my papers have furnished your lordship with any useful information. "From the pure motive of doing good to both Kingdoms, I was led to take a considerable share in Irish affairs in the administrations of Lords Harcourt, Buckingham and Carlisle, without having any personal connexion or even acquaintance with any of their lordships, and I had the great satisfaction of seeing my endeavours attended with considerable success, and gratefully acknowledged by my countrymen." I lament that my present opportunities are not equal to those my then situation afforded, but I flatter myself that your Excellency will allow me to communicate anything which may possibly be useful.

A notice I saw lately in an Irish paper from Mr. Grenville to the merchants, respecting the contract for supplying the troops in America, has brought to my mind the inconveniences which, while I was in office, the contractors would have found from want of a speedy conveyance if I had not used the power I had of sending expresses on pressing occasions by way of Milford Haven. So frequent were these that "some persons found it their interest to station vessels for the purpose, but I am informed they are now discontinued, some of them having been captured by the enemy. What I would therefore suggest to your Excellency is . . . to represent the necessity of establishing regular packet boats to sail three times a week, as the Dublin boats used formerly to do, between the most convenient port in Pembrokeshire and Waterford." Independent of their utility to the public service, the advantage to the commerce of the two kingdoms would infinitely overbalance the expense to the Post Office; indeed if, during the war, stout armed cutters were used instead of defenceless boats, great advantage and protection would accrue to trade. When Lord Hillsborough was a postmaster, he established the packet between Donaghadee and Port Patrick; and I procured the addition to the American packets of a boat direct to Charlestown. I trust your Excellency's administration will be the era of the establishment of the Waterford packet. I have not mentioned the matter to Lord Shelburne, as I wish the measure to be wholly yours. Draft. 7 pp.

William Knox to the Marquis of Buckingham.

1788, Feb. 27.—Reminding his Excellency of his efforts to promote the welfare of Ireland, and sending plans for improving the correspondence between England and North America, in which he has not failed to point out the manner in which Ireland might share the advantages proposed. As his present private situation gives him no official intercourse with ministers, he can only point out the method, and must leave the enforcing it to abler hands. Of these he knows none so able as his Excellency's, and hopes he may find it an object worthy of his interposition. Is happy to see his Excellency take the lead in a matter which his ever dear and honoured father [Geo. Grenville] considered very necessary to be adopted—viz., the reduction of legal interest—and will always be glad to give what little assistance he can to any measures for the welfare of Ireland. 3 pp.

Marquis of Buckingham to William Knox.

1788, March 4. Dublin Castle.—Acknowledging Mr. Knox's flattering expressions both as regards himself and one whose memory must ever be most dear. Cannot give an opinion on a plan so extensive, but will consider the subject maturely, that he may be prepared if the part in relation to Ireland is referred to him. He must, however, state that the people of Limerick have unanimously requested that the mails may be sent by way of Dublin, owing to the hazards and delays of the Waterford route, and that orders have been given accordingly. 2 pp.

Archdeacon Thos. Hastings to William Knox.

1789, Feb. 11. Dublin.—As soon as your two books came I put the State Papers into Mr. King's hands, to go to press at once, and by this time I suppose it is printed off. I saw the first sheet, which was very correct. The corrector of the press, a very intelligent person, promised occasionally to bring me a sheet, but has not done so. To furnish each member of the two Houses with one will require five hundred copies. Mr. King thinks each copy will cost 3s. 6d. English. He proposes to print 1,500 copies, and supposes that the sale of a thousand will go near to paying the expence. This I doubt much, "for in this country, a work of the greatest merit, and of that class I esteem your book, will not have three hundred readers. . . . I thank you heartily for your remarks on our Liturgy. They exhibit a benevolent heart, and, indeed, a good head. I have, however, thought it imprudent queta movere. This you will say is the old cant . . . but I say these are subjects for the discussion of which we have not adequate ideas. My faith is fixed, and the Scriptures are the rule of it. . . . As to our politicks, the Lord Lieutenant, with great difficulty, obtained bare thanks. Upon every question majorities increase against him. He cannot do anything. Gratton carries everything. This very night it is supposed the Prince will be declared Regent in the House of Commons without any restriction whatever; on Friday in the House of Lords. Opposition is vain. . . . Most of the placemen and many pensioners against government. The Marquis, I will not say how justly, but certainly he is the most unpopular governor we ever had. Never was Lord Lieutenant so abused and mauled as he has been in the House of Commons; indeed the language was most indecent. We are at present in a state of anarchy and confusion. God grant all may end well. Mr. Pelham is daily expected, and Lord Spencer about the 23rd inst. He has appointed, it is said, Dr. Norris his first and Mr. O'Biern his second chaplain. Lord Rawdon, we hear, is to be one of the Secretaries of State. If it were a department you liked, I wish you were his secretary. If he comes in he might be of use to me. I have seventeen hundred a year to give up—one thing a desirable dignity, 900*l.* a year clear, and the other a prebend, 800*l.* per annum. I stand as well as I could possibly wish with the Moira and Granard families, and if Lord Ailesbury had power he would serve me, but his interest clashes with the politics of the day." 2 pp.

Archdeacon Hastings to William Knox.

1789, March 14. Dublin.—Concerning Knox's proposed provision for his children. Warns him not to encumber "Thomas" too heavily, as a large estate, deeply charged, is an unpleasant situation, unless a prudent marriage extricates him from the difficulty.

The Irish edition of the State Papers is finished. A thousand copies only are to be struck off, and Mr. King "hopes the expence will not exceed 30*l.*" Our House of Commons is very furious. It is supposed the Pension Bill will be thrown out in the Lords, but by a small majority. The King's recovery will have a great effect in that House. There will be a strong contest as to an address to the Lord Lieutenant for his message to both Houses. "If an address of thanks can be obtained it may remove the sting of the censure. A certain personage is very unpopular, and it is hard to say for what, but so it certainly is. Opposition has numbers but not abilities." The Attorney-General has displayed talents which will probably secure him the seals. He is honest and able. An addition of six to the Upper House is daily expected—a temporary but dangerous experiment. 2 pp.

SIR JOHN BLAQUIERE to WILLIAM KNOX.

1789, April 4. Dublin.—Is so jaded and worn with politics that he has scarce breath for a refined pleasure, but the honourable mention of his name has roused the vanity of French blood; he is highly gratified, and returns hearty thanks for the Extra Official State Papers which has announced it to him. Regrets the poor return made for Knox's efforts on behalf of Ireland, but believes it was the interest of the great to pass them by, as, if justice had been done to them, "many is the man whose state ability had been perfectly unnoticed at the present moment." 3 pp.

ARCHDEACON HASTINGS to WILLIAM KNOX.

1789, May 14. Dublin.—Your great services to Ireland are allowed by all, yet there is no one to state them to Parliament. Opposition will ask nothing, and perhaps the powers that be do not wish to grant any pension. I have spoken to many, especially Sir L. O'Brien, but they all think nothing will be done for you. The Bishop of Cloyne says he cannot speak to Mr. Conolly, as he is in opposition and averse from granting pensions. The session is now just at an end, and you must wait for the next unless you can get a King's letter. The leaders of the volunteers are said not to be pleased at a remark you made, and Lord Pery and others, I hear, are dissatisfied at the publication of their letters. Many doubt whether confidential letters to a secretary should ever be published during the life of the writers.

The church owes you gratitude for your dissertation upon tithes. In the year 1788 we exported 345,000 barrels of grain. What an amazing increase! In 1771 half the grain consumed in Ireland was imported. To check too great an exportation tithes seem the only restraint, or we shall soon have neither beef to eat nor wool to clothe our people. 2 pp. Seal of arms.

SIR J. PARNELL to WILLIAM KNOX.

1791, Oct. 2.—I am favoured with your observations concerning the advantages which facility for borrowing or raising money on discount has in enabling merchants to carry on their trade; and also pointing out "how much the commercial capital of this country was capable of increase by adding to the paper currency, and bringing into circulation the value of the dead stock of houses, lands, &c." These principles appear to me to carry self-evident conviction of their truth. "Since I have been in the public service I have always acted under the conviction that by increasing the fictitious capital, so far as it bore a reasonable proportion [to] the real capital, the wealth of the country would be increased and its progress to prosperity accelerated. It was with this view that I introduced the Bill for the reduction of interest. . . . Had not this measure been defeated in the House of Lords (after it had passed the Commons by a large majority) they who, by their votes and influence, defeated it (viz., the bishops and bankers of Ireland) would not have been the only monied men in this country. However, the measure, so far as it succeeded, has had its effect. Immediately after the Bill had passed, the interest money fell a half per cent.; the growing wealth and commerce of the country has continued and increases, though not so rapidly as if it received judicious assistance. . . .

"The part of this subject to which you allude when you mention houses and lands finding their representation in paper is not here on the same footing as with you; the value of landed property is much depreciated here, and there is no facility in borrowing on its credit . . . but if means could be suggested to enable the owner of land to bring its value into circulation by easily procuring money on the pledge of it, it would greatly add to the national capital. . . .

"I have sometimes thought of following the example of the Roman State, where the Government act the part of pawnbrokers and lend money on pledges at a reasonable interest. I think the institution is called monti di pieta. Why should not publick money to a certain amount be vested in a body, to be lent on pledges of lands and goods? It would answer the purposes of charity and of promoting the publick monied interest." 7½ pp.

William Knox to Sir John Parnell.

1791, Oct. 4.—Soho Square.—Explaining the inconvenience suffered by merchants in their Colonial trade from the "long detention" of their capital, and the means taken by them to obviate the difficulty by the use of bills; also the special difficulties which Irish merchants have to overcome. In order to place the Irish factors upon a more advantageous footing, he "followed the grant of a free trade with the scheme of a National Bank," and if his whole plan had been adopted, would have still further increased the commercial capital by "coining the dead stock of unproductive lands and bringing them into cultivation and their value into circulation."

By this means he raised Georgia from indigence to comparative opulence in six years, and it is the secret by which England has attained such amazing wealth, "for every acre of land and every house throughout the kingdom, as well as every bale of goods, either actually is or may be brought into constant circulation." 4½ pp.

The Same to the Same.

1791, Oct. 31. Bath.—Thanking him for the obliging terms in which he has expressed his concurrence in Knox's views, and sending him a paper concerning "the proper means to be employed for the furthering the improvement and prosperity of Ireland, and giving an effectual check to the emigration of the useful people." Copy. 1 p.

Enclosing.—The paper above mentioned. 14½ pp.

Irish Catholic Question.

[Undated]—Paper by William Knox endorsed as above. "However deservedly the late Ministers have been charged with precipitancy, ignorance and self-sufficiency in their general conduct, there is no instance in which they have so decidedly merited those reproaches as in that of what is called the question of Catholic Emancipation, which, however, if they say true, has been productive of the great good—their resignation." It is well known that the only bar to Catholics holding any office, civil or military, is the declaration against Transubstantiation, for the Conformity Acts are as penal upon Protestant dissenters as on Catholics, yet such dissenters freely enter into office, trusting to the annual Indemnity Acts for protection. The Catholics, however, are stopped by the declaration against Transubstantiation which has to be taken previously to entering into any office. In the letter of Lord Petre and others to the Vicar Apostolic of Nov. 25, 1789, they expressly declare that they only wish to be placed on a level with Protestant dissenters, and do not demand the repeal of the Conformity Acts. To believe in Transubstantiation certainly implies submission to the judgment of the Church, and if the same submission was carried into everything the Catholics would certainly be unfit to be trusted with any post under a Protestant government, but the English Catholics "unequivocally profess to confine their submission to the authority of their church to matters purely spiritual," and the mere attitude of submission to authority is favourable to government, "as it disposes to obedience, and by no means to resistance." And as regards the doctrine in question the only difference is that the Catholics believe more than the Church of England. The latter inculcates the belief of a spiritual eating the flesh of Christ, the Catholics believe that they eat it carnally, but the Protestant dissenter denies both, and is therefore further removed from the Church of England than is the Catholic. The Church of England disavows all persecution, and consents to complete liberty for everyone to worship God in his own way. The laws requiring persons entering into office to conform to her ritual are merely defensive, to prevent attack, but not to be used for offensive purposes, as is shown by the annual Act of Indemnity. This Act would cover the Catholics from all the penalties of non-conformity and of continuing to go to Mass, and, therefore, by merely removing the Declaration against Transubstantiation, this great business would be settled "without any danger to the Established Church or violation of his Majesty's Coronation oath." 9¼ pp.

III.—REMINISCENCES, POLITICAL ANECDOTES, AND NOTES OF CONVERSATIONS WITH PUBLIC MEN.

Georgia.

"The 3rd September, 1756, I arrived in London. I was appointed Provost Marshal of Georgia by Lord Halifax in November, and the 8th of December we sailed for Charles Town, after a stay of near three weeks at Portsmouth. We arrived at Charles Town the 26th January. There we were entertained very splendidly by Mr. Lyttelton, to whom I was not introduced by Mr. [Ellis] for three days, although he and his secretary went there every day; nor then, but after an invitation to dinner from Mr. Lyttelton, who had heard of me from his secretary, with whom I had (by design) made an acquaintance. This neglect I attribute to the same cause which deprived me of the honour Lord H[alifax] intended me by asking Mr. [Ellis] in my presence to bring me with him to his house (which he never did). Mr. Lyttelton was particularly civil to me, and often attempted to engage me in a separate conversation, and once in a private one, but I avoided every occasion, through fear of giving offence to the other. There and on our journey to Georgia he was incessantly throwing out the jealousy of Wood, lest he and I should unite and so make ourselves of consequence. By Wood's frequent neglects of me I apprehend he had been practised on in the same manner. At last, at Mr. Bull's, we came to an open rupture, in which, as Wood had made himself disagreeable to everybody, especially to Mr. Bryan, and because of the insults heretofore offer'd me, I was countenanced.

"We arrived at Savannah on the 15th of February, and the day after Mr. [Ellis] took the government upon him. The Assembly was then sitting. Mr. Little, the Speaker of the Lower House, waited upon Mr. [Ellis] to beg two favours of him—one to dine with their House, and another to receive an address from them. Both he declined, the latter (he said) because he had refused the like from the Council. Notwithstanding, I afterwards learned that an address was prepared, in which Mr. Reynolds was intended to be complimented at the expense of his successor, and upon my communicating it an adjournment was sent next day. Little was yet undetermined whether he should stay behind his master till after the day in April the Assembly was adjourned to. . . . His great object was to make the government uneasy to the governor, that he might avail himself of his complaints of the refractory disposition of the people, and, at the same time, shew by the Address he had before procured that it was more the fault of the governor in employing improper people than of the people, that things did not go well. This we were soon sensible of, and, therefore, as the majority of the Assembly were his creatures, I was strongly for their dissolution before they were met, but not before Little was gone. . . . . The governor was still of a different opinion. He thought that by his continuing these he would highly oblige them, and as most of them were placemen he was not afraid of their being stubborn; he therefore would have all the advantage of a tractable Assembly without any of the odium of procuring it. . . . It was, however, resolved to prorogue them till the end of May. Little, we resolved, should go home, or be sent, with his master, and I then took my seat in the Council and enter'd upon my office, 3 March, both of which I had delayed doing till then lest it should be necessary for me to go into the Assembly. The governor, however, did not approve that scheme, nor would have suffered it but through necessity, for he then perceived I was acquainted with parliamentary affairs and might make myself of too much consequence in that House. In truth, I was desirous of going in there for a little time, to gain a character, because I imagined my youth might make me overlooked in the Council, and I should be under the disadvantage of being thought the governor's echo. Addresses were now presenting from different parts of the province, and, as the fate of the Assembly was still undetermined, I contrived (with the governor's privity) to have a wish for its dissolution inserted in several. This proved of infinite convenience, for whilst it furnished the governor with good reasons to the Ministry, if he should dissolve them, and would lay an extraordinary obligation on the new members, as having done it at the people's request; on the other hand, it made the present members more dependent, and gave the Governor an opportunity of manifesting his confidence in them by continuing them. . . . Mr. Reynolds and Little embarqued for England the 25th March. After their departure I had an opportunity of getting acquainted with their party, and as I perceiv'd they were almost all Europeans, tho' very ignorant, and the persons who were likely to compose a new Assembly were mostly Carolinians, from which province they drew all their precedents, and where the Lower House usurped the whole legislation and execution, I came over to the governor's opinion, as thinking the old members much likelier to join in establishing a British constitution, which was our object, than those that should succeed them. I was the more confirmed in this by viewing the journals of the first Assembly, in which many of those Carolinians were members, as I found daily motions for such privileges as were enjoy'd in the neighbouring province. It was now determined to meet this Assembly, yet a proclamation for proroguing them to the 12th June only was issued, that the party might have no assurance when they were to assemble or whether they should be continued. The matters to be laid before them, and the filling up the vacancies, were now the topics of consultation. This was then the state of the province. By Reynold's hasty dissolution of the first Assembly, one year, his second, had been unprovided for, and thro' the insufficiency of the tax that year raised, a balance remained of the first year. The present Assembly had laid on a tax of 1*s.* per head before our coming, which Reynolds told them would be sufficient, without mentioning for what year's service, but in general for defraying the expences of the Courts, &c." The consequence was that the Crown was stripped of its prerogative as executor and the Council of their privilege of disbursing the public money, and both made subservient to the Lower House, for as the revenue was not granted until after the year expired the governor and Council had to risk the approbation of the Assembly for whatever they engaged, or else to inform the contractors that they were to take their chance of being paid for their work by the Assembly, thus making all officers and employés dependent on the Assembly. These were terrible circumstances for a new governor. The first step taken was "to publish an advertisement to bring in to the Council all demands against the public to the 25th March." This made us possessed of the debts and of Mr. Little's orders. These accounts amounted to near 1,100*l.*, and when the tax came in, the latter end of May, it produced but about 260*l*. There was also the ¾ interest on 27,000*l*. paper money, amounting to about 130*l*., but there still remained a balance of 630*l*. for which there was no provision, nor any for the service of the current year, "so that before the usual time of laying the tax (in February) we should be three years revenue in debt. We were very much distress'd how to get rid of this embarrassment. The governor was determined against any additional tax lest he should suffer in his popularity; he thought of paying the current expenses out of the tax, leaving it to the Assembly to discharge the debt incurred by Mr. Reynolds, whose friends they were. This I was averse to, as I apprehended it would involve us in a dispute with the Assembly. . . . He was then for postponing the matter till the winter, and then trying what could be done by an additional tax in a series of years. This I could not agree with him in, first because there was the chance of his not being so well with the people then, and second because the debt would then be still more increased, and, above all, the habit of settling accounts would be acquired by a new Speaker, and we should lose the advantage of Little's infamous character debarring them from quoting any precedent. . . . My scheme was to call in all accounts to the 24th June, that there might be no arrears, to apply the tax and interest to the discharge of the whole as far as they would go, to raise the credit of the currency by giving bills for it only, and to issue two thousand more at interest, applying the whole to the discharge of the balance, which should be turned into certificates with interest 'till paid by that fund, which would be done in three years without any tax, and that fund for the future to be allotted for contingencies. When this was passed, then to lay before them an estimate of the one year's expence of government, commencing the 24th June, which must be then provided for by a tax then imposed but not to be levyed till May following. He thought this too complicated a scheme, and did not for a long time thoroughly comprehend it, being unaccustomed to such business, but when he did, he improved it considerably by altering the sum to be issued to the neat ballance and appropriating the present revenue of interest to the sinking of the paper so issued. . . . I drew up the Bill according to my system with his improvement, and so it passed." I undertook to make the laying on the tax for the next twelve months their own act, and the first Bill being passed, and a motion asking the governor to appoint look-outs on the coast carried, the provision for this latter brought on a debate about provision for ordinary occurrences. "The governor was applied to; he declared he would not do anything without an authority; he did not ask a tax this year, but only to be now laid on and appropriated that he might know what and how he was to act. They had no objection to a tax the winter session, but now, they said, was an improper time, and that the people could not be persuaded but it was two taxes the same year. That, we argued, could not be, as the time of levying, not of laying, the tax was only material. . . . The governor was resolute that if they did not do it now he should neither employ look-outs nor stir one step in anything that should incur any expences." An estimate of one year's expence was laid before them, amounting to 530*l*., and, after much wrangling, they agreed to it and added 100*l*. to the contingent for the troops. The tax was then fixed at 2*s*. per head.

"I had had great uneasiness at the approach of this session, as there was not one other real friend to a British constitution in the Council, and I should thence have all the labours and all the odium of abridging the liberties of the people. Mr. C[lifton] had been originally appointed of the Council, but had declined taking his seat hitherto. I got him to consent to do it now, but I was afraid of mentioning it to the governor, lest he, from our intimacy, should be jealous, till I prepared him to wish for him by laying my difficulties before him. When it was settled a Council was called, nothing of the matter being suspected, H[abersham] & H[arris] and myself only present, when Mr. C. presented his memorial to the great astonishment of H[abersham], yet not having any opportunity to consult with W[atson?] or byass H[arris] he gave it for the memorial, and he [C.] was introduced and sworn accordingly. This measure secured the Council in all matters of prerogative, as there were now two, which made a protest practicable." C. and I framed the Asylum Act, the Provision Bill, and the Fortification Bill, and I drew our address, the last paragraph only done by Habersham. I thought it necessary for the Council to establish its right to legislation by the passing of an Act which had its rise there; we tried the Fortification Act, but it being a money Bill we dropped it and took the Provision Bill, which we got passed accordingly. In filling up the vacancies matters were not so well conducted, but they turned out as well, Mr. Y[onge] being elected by a large majority for S[avannah]. The Jury Act was prepared by Mr. C., but we thought it best to let it lie by. O[ttolenghe] was very averse to it, because it would throw power into the Provost Marshal's hands and enable him to humble the justices, while O.'s whole scheme was to make himself of consequence. "He was perpetually magnifying the power of the opposite party, but would not agree to a dissolution, because he said he knew how to manage them. He detested the Council, tho' he still professed that he desired a British constitution, and when he found the majority of the Assembly would do the governor's business without him, he endeavoured to embroil the two houses in order to make himself of importance." He had a strong dislike to me, which at last broke out in a way that exposed him to the laughter of the whole town, and brought upon him a severe check from the governor. I avoided any appearance of triumph, and he saw I was too well acquainted with parliamentary management to be attacked that way. He next became the most violent friend of the governor; this brought us together, and "we understood one another very well, and, indeed, are the only people who know either." Jealousy was the thing I most feared. I never assumed anything on what I had done, or took anything in hand till asked to do so. Mr. L[yttelton] signified his desire to meet the governor at Port Royal, and as the latter wished his management to be known before the meeting he sent me to C[harles] T[own] principally on this account, tho' to embark the troops at the same time.

"This was an opportunity I much wished for, but embraced it without any appearance of pleasure. I set out the day after the adjournment, first taking care not to be named of the Committee appointed to draw up the address that I might not be answerable for anything I had no hand in." The reports of the good opinion the people of Carolina had of me created a prejudice in the governor against me. When (in September) I was seized with a fever, his "little attention to my concernments was very visible, yet still was it more evident when I was ill at Martins, for a whole month he not once sent me any message, nor did he offer me a single penny, altho' he knew my circumstances would not afford me necessarys. When the Indians arrived (the 3rd Nov.), I endeavoured to prepare for being present at the Talk." Mr. C. could not find me a horse anywhere, and mentioned this to the governor, but he only replied that it could not be helped. "He added to my chagrin a good deal by offering my lot in town in exchange to D. V. [De Veaux?] without my knowledge, as he told the Council another lot would do as well for me, who could not build on it." The Council, however, were consenting only provided I was content. Here I determined to make a stand, at once to revenge myself by embarrassing the governor by disabling him from fulfilling his promise, and, at the same time, to shew the Council and others I was not the subservient creature they had been told. . . . A second division of Indians coming to town gave me an opportunity of signing the treaty and meeting the whole body. I now kept a greater distance and only went when I was invited, which was seldom." I shortly took an opportunity of hinting my intention to build, soon after I was sent for and an eclaircissement desired; I spoke very plainly, and "we settled that he should treat me with more delicacy for the future and I to follow my own inclinations." 13¼ folio pp.

Conversation with Mr. Grenville.

1767, Sept. 29.—"This day, at Wootton, Mr. Grenville shewed me copies of the letters which passed relative to the negociation for a change of administration between the Duke of Grafton and Lord Rockingham, from himself and the Duke of Bedford. His account of the conversation between the Duke of Grafton and Lord Rockingham previous to those letters as reported to him by Mr. Rigby led him to suppose the Duke of Grafton made the offer to L[ord] R[ockingham] to join him and support his administration, not to give it into L[ord] R[ockingham]'s hands. L[ord] R[ockingham]'s letter, however, pressed that in direct terms, saying if he proceeded it should be on the footing of considering the present administration as entirely at an end. The Duke's reply is evasive to that in terms, but desiring him from the King to proceed, and saying his idea of a comprehensive plan was adopted by the King was, by implication, acknowledging the present administration to be at an end. On the other hand L[ord] R[ockingham] insisting to continue Mr. Conway Secretary of State, did not look like a total surrender of the present administration, and as L[ord] R[ockingham] made no reserve in his letters to, or conversation with, the Duke of Bedford previous to the conference, but declared for a total change, there is ground for supposing there was some secret bargain between him and Mr. C[onway] which he did not chuse to inform the Duke of Bedford of.

"The charge of duplicity therefore lyes against both, and their separate private purposes seem to have been: The Duke of Grafton meant to disunite Lord R[ockingham] and his friends from the Opposition, and to take them in under himself. L[ord] R[ockingham] meant to draw off the Duke of Bedford and his friends from Mr. Grenville, and bring them in along with and under him; for that reason he had not mentioned Mr. Conway's staying to the Duke of Bedford when he found his Grace determined not to disconnect with Mr. Grenville, lest his doing so might have prevented the Duke list'ning to him at all, and he hoped by drawing him to town, and holding out good things to his friends, with their assistance to have persuaded him.

"Mr. Conway in 1765 was with L[ord] R[ockingham] and by him and the Duke of Newcastle made Secretary of State. In that year he left L[ord] R[ockingham] and connected with Lord Chatham, who came to his house before he went to Lord Temple. In this last business he had agreed to leave Lord Chatham, and did so in the House of Commons upon the East India business, and joined L[ord] R[ockingham], as appears from the negociation. He again quits L[ord] R[ockingham] to oblige whom he had promised to resign, and connects with the Duke of Grafton. Four tergiversations in one year. The K[ing]'s strong dislike of him in 1763 compelled Mr. Grenville to dismiss him, and he was displeased with his tardiness in doing it. The King, when Mr. G[renville] took leave, declared he had never taken offence at him, kept him with him an hour and half; when pressed repeatedly to say why he dismissed him, said it was because he understood a plan was formed to give the law to him, and that he believed Mr. G[renville] chose rather to stay by the Duke of Bedford and [sic] than with him. The Regency Bill no part of the reason for his dismission. The King had that Bill framed in his illness, during which Mr. G[renville] never saw him but once, and then the King sent for him. The proposition of leaving out the Princess of Wales came from the King himself, not one of the ministers ever mentioned it to him. When the doubt was stirred by the Duke of Richmond about her being of the Royal Family, L[ord] Bute spoke to both Lord Halifax and Sandwich to take the King's pleasure upon having her excepted, saying he was sure the King would give them orders so to do. When Mr. G[renville] saw the King the next day, the King told him he had just given a message to L[ord] H[alifax] to carry to the Lords for avoiding the difficulty of determining about his mother's being of the Royal Family, which was confining the Regent to the descendants of the late King, and hoped he approved of it. Mr. G[renville] told him, as the measure was taken, he begged to be excused giving any opinion, and hoped his Majesty would remember that since the beginning of this business he had not once mentioned the Princess to his Majesty one way or other. When afterwards the Princess changed her opinion, and, from jealousy of the Princess Amelia being capable and she not, writ to the King to have her name inserted, the King still acknowledged his orders, but was much distress'd for an expedient to satisfy her, Mr. G[renville] proposed that to him which was followed, and he had the King's thanks for carrying it into execution. He shew'd the King the speech he intended to make on the occasion, and which he afterwards did make, with which the King was much pleased. Mr. G[renville] s letters to his friends upon his first coming to the Treasury, wherein he said L[ord] B[ute] had determined not to interfere, he shewed to the King before he sent them.

"His opinion of the King's not sending to him was owing to its having been represented to the King by people since about him that Mr. G[renville] might have made all things easy to him if he would in respect to money, by putting 2 or 3 hundred thousand upon the Hanover Account.

"The King's dislike of Mr. Conway, so strong in 1763, forced his minister to dismiss him and chid Mr. G[renville] for being tardy in doing it."

"Decrease of Specie. Bank coined a million at 4 : 0 : 8 coin, but 3 : 18 : 10 value." 3½ pp.

George Grenville.

1768, June 9. Wootton.—"When Lord Egremont died, in 1763, and Lord Bute determined to quit, the King offered the administration to Mr. Grenville, upon the most extensive conditions. While Mr. Grenville was making his arrangements, the Duke of Bedford proposed to the King to send for Mr. Pitt, which he did. He told Mr. Grenville of it the next day, and when Mr. Pitt had made his proposals, the King then declared to Mr. Grenville that he would confide in Mr. Grenville for the future. He afterwards threw out his hopes that some of the Bedford people could be joined with the administration, to which Mr. Grenville replyd that if the King wished to shew favour to the Duke of Bedford, he would immediately forget his resentment and make him an offer. He did so, and the Duke of Bedford became President of the Council. During that administration, the Butes and the Bedfords were continually pushing at each other, and Mr. Grenville held the ballance till it was told the King that Mr. Grenville was making himself too powerful, and then a disunion was attempted. The King was determined to nominate the Queen the Regent, and Lord Bute, knowing that, desired to have the Princess Dowager excluded, to prevent the obloquey which her supposed nomination might occasion to him. The King chose to leave her out for the same reason, but the Princess herself thought it disrespectful. The King of all things jealous of the power of women; trait of the King's character.

"When the administration of 1764 were called back upon the failure of the Duke of Cumberland's negotiation with Mr. Pitt, the Duke of Bedford, Lord Northington, Lord Halifax, and Lord Sandwich were not admitted to see the King, and the King desired Mr. Grenville to go to them and know their conditions. Mr. Grenville begged the King to see them himself, but he insisted upon his negociating. He went to them; they proposed the dismission of Lord Holland and McKensie. Lord Northumberland had declared his intention to resign three months before.

"When Mr. Grenville carried this and some other propositions to the King, the King desired him to try to bring them off, and repeated his declarations of confidence in him. As Mr. Grenville came out, he learnt that the Duke of Cumberland was then in the next room waiting for the King to settle his successor, and the office Mr. Grenville then held was that very day offered to Lord Lyttelton. The design of sending him to negociate with the others was to create a disunion and ruin him." 2 pp.

Lord Hillsborough's Resignation.

1772, Aug. 15.—On this date the Earl of Hillsborough resigned. The circumstances were these:—Application had been made to the Lords of the Treasury for a grant of two million of acres in Virginia, and 10,700*l.* offered, being the cost of presents and entertainments given by the Crown to the Indians in 1768, when they ceded that country. The Treasury consented, provided the other Government departments had no objections. Dr. Franklyn, one of the petitioners, said this answer "was good for nought, for that Hillsborough would never let them have it." This was repeated to Lord Hillsborough, and he, wishing to throw the odium off his own shoulders, artfully proposed to the petitioners to ask for 20 million acres instead of two, and went in person to the Board to induce the Lords to entertain the proposal, supposing that the Treasury would increase the sum to be paid in proportion to the grant, and that 100,000*l.* would be more than the petitioners could pay. The Treasury, however, sent up the petition for the 20 millions, with their approbation of the sum first offered to the Lords of Trade.

"Lord Hillsborough now found himself entangled in his own nett, and to avoid the embarrassment of making a report he resolved to delay it, and so let it drop. Some other matters now began to mix in this business. The Earl of Rochford, the Southern Secretary, was needy and dissolute. Wharton, one of the petitioners, made his way to him by pointing out certain islands in the River Delaware, and his Lordship petitioned for them as vacant land. Lord Rochford, to secure Lord Hillsborough's favourable report upon his petition, prevailed with the King to deliver it with his own hands to Lord H., and to recommend it to him to consider it in the most favourable light. The Board of Trade reported agreeable to this recommendation, and to their great dishonour gave their opinion that the King might grant the islands and to none so fitly as to the Earl of Rochford. Mr. Penn, having followed this report to the Council, combatted it so successfully there that Lord Rochford found it necessary to withdraw his petition." Wharton then offered a share in the intended new colony to his lordship, who accepted it readily, and, to prevent any miscarriage in the grant, invited Lord Gower to take a share also. As Lord Hillsborough still delayed his report, Lord Rochford again engaged the King on his side, who, one day at the Levee, asked Mr. Gascoign, Lord Hillsborough's particular friend at the Board of Trade, if the report upon the Ohio petition was ready. This was hint enough to Lord Hillsborough. He called together the whole Board, which consists of the Secretaries of State and other ministers, to have their opinion before it came to them in Council. "But Lord Gower and Lord Rochford had by this time taken up the resolution of overturning Lord North, and looking upon Lord Hillsborough as his chief support in the Cabinet, they determined to push him out. Lord Rochford aimed at destroying the office of American Secretary and re-annexing the patronage to the Southern Department. Two great offices were ready to fall in, on which he had fixed his eye, that of Clerk of the Courts in Jamaica, and Secretary of Virginia. Lord Gower's view was that of being First Lord of the Treasury and first minister. Lord Suffolk joined in the attack from separate motives. Proud and ambitious, he looked up to the chief command, and considered that no way was so likely to obtain it as by frequent changes and disagreements among his colleagues. The jealousy of the King, he knew, would not long suffer any administration to continue in quiet, and if Lord Gower succeeded for the present, the clanship of Bedford would very soon alarm the King, and then he should have a fair opening to the station he aimed at. Rigby was much averse to Lord Gower's purpose; possessed of the intire office of paymaster, he saw no prospect of being bettered by a change, and risqued losing what he had.

"Such was the state of things when Lord Hillsborough proposed the meeting of the Grand Board of Trade. The ministers refused to come, but left it to the ordinary Board to report, and reserved themselves till the matter came before them in Council. Lord Hillsborough now declared himself openly against the grant, and made no scruple of saying he should report in that manner. The cabal endeavoured to embroil him with Lord North upon this; shares in the grant were given to the two secretaries of the Treasury, and Lord H.'s conduct was represented as reflecting upon that Board in making the agreement with the petitioners. To avoid any such appearance, Lord Hillsborough drew his report upon the reasoning of former Boards, and of other servants of the Crown, and entirely omitted remarking upon the consideration money."

When the report came down to the Council, Lord Gower declared he should be open to evidence against it, and Wharton was allowed to have a copy, and to make and print observations on it, before it was considered. Lord Hillsborough, seeing how things were going, now plainly said that if the grant were made, he could not carry it into execution, and should therefore resign. "He endeavoured to alarm Lord North, and to excite him to oppose this attempt, which was ultimately designed to affect him, and with much teazing got him to bustle a little, but when he did, he found it was to no purpose, for his weight was gone. The King, he saw, was on 'tother side and abetted the cabal; he had therefore no choice but to give up Lord Hillsborough or go along with him, and the former he thought most prudent, taking his chance for what might follow. Lord Gower and the two Secretaries in Council declared they were convinced the grant ought to take place, and should advise the King accordingly, upon which Lord Hillsborough acquainted the King and the Cabinet that whenever that order came to him, he should resign his seals. The report of the Council was therefore delayed untill a successor to Lord H. was fixed upon. Lord Weymouth, as the friend and adherent of Lord Gower, was offered the American Department, whether at Lord North's own motion or by the King's desire I have not learned, but I believe the latter was the case, as his lordship's conduct in Parliament since his resignation has been much to the King's mind. He refused the offer, and then Lord North, without taking any notice to the other ministers, offered the seals to Lord Dartmouth, which his lordship accepted, to the great disappointment of Lord Rochford, who had hoped that no Secretary would have been found, and then the office would of necessity have been dissolved." 5 pp.

Anecdotes at Spa.

1773, June.—Notes headed as above. "Mr. Cressener assured me he could have engaged the Electors of Cologne and Palatine for 500,000*l.* to refuse a passage to the French troops into the Empire at the beginning of the late war. The Court at Bon debauched without decency. . .. . Madame Branconi, the Prince of Brunswick's mistress, very handsome. The town of Charleroy taken the war before the last by the workmen who were making the approaches, who entered it, finding the garrison had deserted the works."

When Mr. Cressener was assured of the day on which the Elector of Cologne would come to Spa, he writ to Sir Joseph Yorke to acquaint the Prince of Orange of the Elector's intention, and to invite his Highness to meet him. Sir Joseph replied that "the Prince was much pleased with the invitation, but, as the States were assembled and he just returned from a progress, he could not, without too much noise, come to Spa." Sir Joseph said he seemed so very desirous of meeting the Elector that he might possibly find some pretence for doing so. The Bishop of Liege also meant to come, but the Elector declined the compliment, choosing to be incognito and the guest of Mr. Cressener; he, however, came through Liege, and there dined with the Bishop.

"The third son of the late Princess of Hesse, a good figure, and appears sensible and manly. The Cardinal Fleury, upon finding himself deceived in the man he had chosen to succeed him, told Mr. Walpole he should advise the King never to have a Prime Minister. Lord Mansfield consults Andrew Stone. The same terms of peace offered Mr. Cressener that had been demanded in a former negotiation with Lord Sandwich. The Duke of Cumberland refused them and was enraged with Cressener for sending him the propositions.

"The Duke of Chartres and the Duke de Lyne, his favourite, both debauchees; Marshal Braniki, a weak, vain man. Prince Repnin, a designing man; Count Orlow [Orloff], a plain, domestic, good man. Prince Zartoriski, a polite gambler and excellent dancer; the Princess, admirable." 2 pp.

1775, November. Memoranda.—"The King wished to have Lord George Germain in the American department, and Lord Dartmouth was desirous of the Privy Seal, but Lord Weymouth claimed it, backed by Lord Gower and the Bedfords. This caused great embarrassment. Lord Dartmouth offered to go out intirely, but Lord North insisted he should do the same if Lord Dartmouth did so. Lord Dartmouth would not succeed Lord Weymouth as Groom of the Stole. Lord Rochford, who had frequently desired to retire, now made the offer. His department was offered to Lord Dartmouth, who declined it. It was then agreed to offer it to Lord Weymouth, and, in case he refused it, the offer was to be carried to Lord George Germain.

"Lord Suffolk, who had pressed for Lord George Germain to be a Secretary of State, was content with this, as his object was to have him in the Cabinet, to add to his own weight there, and forward his secret purpose of being one day minister. Lord North was not ignorant of Lord Suffolk's views, but wishing to get clear out himself, he seconded them, that a successor being ready, and an able assistant in the House of Commons, he might find it the easier to quit when a proper time came.

"Lord Weymouth accepting the Southern Department made all easy. Lord Dartmouth then got the Privy Seal, and Lord George Germain became the American Secretary. A difficulty had formerly been made by Lord Weymouth of considering the American Secretary as a Secretary of State. Lord Hillsborough had never been so considered by the other Secretaries; he was only held to be first Lord of Trade with Seals and Cabinet; his commission confined his efficiency to the Colonies. Lord Dartmouth's commission was the same, and Lord Weymouth had refused the Department when Lord Dartmouth got it on that very account. Lord George Germain being a commoner, it became necessary to make some alteration in his commission, for the former commissions made it a new office, and consequently excluded him from the House of Commons. A commission in the terms of those of the other Secretaries obviated this difficulty, for there were precedents of three persons being at the same time Secretaries of State. A difficulty in giving Lord George Germain such a commission, 'twas apprehended, would be made by Lord Weymouth and Lord Suffolk. Lord Suffolk, however, we supposed, would acquiesce for the sake of his own plan, and with him the Solicitor-General would concur. The Attorney-General and Lord Weymouth were supposed to object together.

"The King, by one of those minute strokes for which he is so eminent, removed all difficulty. When the Council was met to swear in the new officers, Lord Gower, being Lord President, moved the King, of course, that Lord Weymouth might be sworn Secretary of State. The King replied, "there are two Secretaries of State to be sworn; let them both be sworn together," which was done accordingly. Lord Weymouth perfectly understood the King, and finding his Majesty would have Lord George considered as a Secretary made the best of it by taking Lord George Germain aside, and telling him he understood there was some difficulty about his commission, but to him there appeared to be none, for if his commission was in the same terms as the others, there could be no objection to his sitting in the House of Commons. The commission has accordingly been prepared at Lord Suffolk's office, and no difficulty has been made by anybody to its passing." 2½ pp.

Proceedings in relation to the American Colonies.

1774, 1775.—"Secret of proceedings respecting America in the new Parliament. The Bill for shutting up the Port of Boston, passed the last session, was the step proposed by Pownall to have been taken. I was for an alteration in the Council; Lord Dartmouth went with me, but neither of us wished to make any further alterations in the Charter. Sir Francis Bernard unluckily came to town, and, with his old papers, infused the opinion into Lord North that the juries should be also regulated. The preventing town meetings came also from him. He had produced these papers to Lord Hillsborough in the year 1770, and when I was appointed Under-Secretary, Lord Hillsborough, Sir Francis, Mr. Pownall and myself had a meeting upon them. I gave my opinion then against any alteration but that of the Council. The others were for all, and for my dissent in this case, I was ever after excluded by Lord Hillsborough from all consultations whilst he staid in office.

"There had been no accounts from General Gage which looked hostile when the resolution was taken to dissolve the Parliament. I was at Spa when it was done, but the motion came from Lord Suffolk. There was good ground to have hoped that if no alteration had been made in the Massachussets charter the tea business might have been settled, but the Regulating Bill secured them the support of Connecticut and Rhode Island, and encouraged them to resist.

"When the hostile accounts arrived it was proposed by P[ownall] to send out Sir Jeffrey Amherst and two Major-Generals. Lord North approved the proposition; I liked it well, and so did Lord Dartmouth, only he had difficulties on account of the harshness to General Gage, who was to be continued in his government and second in command. Lord North shewed it to the King, who stared at it, and asked who could have thought of doing so unjust and cruel a thing to General Gage. The Cabinet had it afterwards under consideration, and rejected it, but ordered the three ships of the line and a detachment of marines. What turned us all so much against Gage was his telling Governor Hutchinson that, in his opinion, the only thing to be done was to suspend the Acts, and, in the mean time, make preparation for enforcing them by hiring Hessians and Hanoverians, for it was absolutely necessary to make an entire conquest of the New England Governments, and not less than twenty thousand men could venture to take the field.

"We were flattered with hopes by the merchants that the General Congress would come to no resolutions respecting trade. The New York, Jersey, some of New Hampshire and Pensylvania were said to be against all violent proceedings. A letter from Dr. Franklyn advising such measures brought over the Pensylvania delegates, so the resolutions were taken. We were astonished at them when they arrived, as we so little expected them, and then determined to say nothing to General Gage, but let all rest till we knew the opinion of the new Parliament. This speech was the only one we were ever consulted upon. Mr. Pownall, with my assistance, drew the American clause. I afterwards made some alterations in what they had adopted, with Mr. Cooper, in the Address, which we had also been consulted upon and amended. The very great majority in the House of Commons for the Address raised our spirit, and gave a firmer tone to our measures, but however determined we all were that the Colonies should obey the sovereign authority of Parliament, we all thought taxation ought to be given up in practise, and that the Colonies should be invited to make some proposition as an equivalent. I went further, and thought there were many unjust as well as impolitic restraints on the foreign commerce of the Colonies, which ought to be taken off, and endeavoured to comprehend Ireland in whatever indulgences might be given to the Colonies. Our conversations on this matter led to Mr. Pownall framing a Bill to be brought into Parliament, appointing commissioners to meet deputies from the Colonies, to discuss and settle all claims, and Parliament to confirm, if approved, what they should agree upon. This proposition was approved of by the Cabinet on condition that they approved what was to be given in charge to the commissioners. Mr. Pownall wanted much to be a commissioner. Sir Jeffry was named as one, and Mr. Jackson another, but no encouragement was given to Pownall. He then changed his plan, and instead of three commissioners, proposed one High commissioner, to whom he intended to be secretary. This ruined the whole, for when he drew up his propositions of the manner of meeting, the authority to be given the high commissioner, and the extent to which they were to carry their discussions, it carried so much the appearance of an American Parliament that the whole Cabinet revolted against it, and would never hear a word of a commission afterwards. I had warned Pownall of this, and entreated him to keep his proposition as much under as possible, and to avoid all appearance of parade or dignity, and to adhere to the three unimportant commissioners, not only to avoid the jealousy of people here, but, lest the Colonies from seeing the good effects and practicability of such a general Assembly, and flattered by the dignity of being delegates, should make the regular convoking of such an Assembly the object of their demands, and thus become form'd into a systematick combination which must lead to Empire. Lord Dartmouth still insisted that something should be held out to the Colonies." 5 pp.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONERS to the AMERICAN COLONIES.

[1776, March].—An account of proceedings previous to sending Lord and Sir William Howe out as commissioners. Objections made to Lord Howe being sole commissioner. He agrees to have his brother joined with him. Eden and Knox suggested as additional commissioners, but refused by Lord Howe. A secret wish that Knox should go as secretary, but the idea rejected by him. Difficulties concerning the Instructions. Lord George Germain desired acknowledgment by the Colonies of "the supreme authority of the Legislature to make laws binding on the Colonies in all cases whatsoever" as a sine qua non. Lord North agreed that such acknowledgment must be insisted on before matters were finally adjusted, but not as a preliminary. Lord Dartmouth against its being required at all. Lord George thought North also meant to give it up at the last, and so stood to its being done "before any Colony should be relieved from the late Act, or restored to peace." Instructions drawn up by Pownall. Cabinet decided that the words "in all cases whatsoever" must stand, as they were in the Act. Debate "whether the declaration should be a preliminary or an ultimatum." Knox proposed a middle way—viz., "that the Assemblies should be called by the Governors and acquainted that they might pass an act appointing delegates to meet the commissioners so soon as all congresses, committees, or conventions in the colony were dissolved, and legal government restored, and all bodies of armed men disbanded, but that they could not be restored to peace or relieved from the late Act until they made the declaration." This was not approved. Lord George insisted that they should not send delegates until they made the declaration; Lord Dartmouth was resolved to "speak out" against Lord George's plan, and to quit his office. "Lord North was to speak his sentiments and his resolution to proceed no further in conducting the public business, if such measures were adopted, than untill his Majesty could make a new arrangement." Lord George thought it would be highly unfit for the King to suffer Lord North to decline acting, and that it was much better that he (Lord George) should go. "The truth was, Lord George having now collected a vast force, and having a fair prospect of subduing the Colonies, he wished to reduce them before he treated at all," and feared that if peace were once restored, neither ministers or Parliament would renew the war for the sake of the declaration.

Knox did not wish hostilities to be suspended against the New England Colonies, who had so despised the power of Great Britain that they ought to be made to feel her strength before terms were made, but he desired that the Southern colonies "might have the door opened to them, as well to divide them from the others as to draw supplies from thence for the troops employed in the North." He therefore drew up a paper proposing a mode of contribution by the colonies, which was much liked, and he believes will be adopted. [Probably the "Project" calendared on p. 289, below.]

A Cabinet was appointed for Monday, March 18, but, on Sunday, Lord North proposed to Lord George to talk to Lord Mansfield on the matter, and the Cabinet was put off. Lord North and Lord George went together to Lord Mansfield, and it was settled to postpone the difference, "and instead of instructing the commissioners to demand of the Colonies, they were now to wait for the Colonies making offers, and in case the colonies did not make the declaration, the commissioners were not to restore them to peace untill they received further instructions, but if they did so offer, they were then to receive them. The Commission was altered from the general powers it gave to such specifications as were conformable to these ideas." 8 pp.

Also :—

Suggestions for a circular letter to be sent to the Governors of Provinces, in accordance with Knox's proposal above. 3 pp.

The KING'S SPEECH to his Cabinet.

1779, June 21.—" This morning all the members of the Cabinet were summoned by a message in the King's own handwriting to meet him at the Queen's House at one o'clock. They assembled accordingly. He desired them to walk into his library. He sat down at the head of his library table, and desired, for the first time since he became King, all the ministers to sit down. He then began by saying Lord North had desired to know why they were summoned, but he had not thought fit to tell him, as he meant to tell it to them all together. (Here Lord George Germain, who gave me the account, said he began to think they were going to be dismissed, and very probably they all thought the same thing.) The King went on to say he had, ever since he came to the crown, made it his study and endeavour to discharge his duty conscientiously to God and his people; and he had the satisfaction to find, upon the strictest examination of his conduct, that there was no one action of his life that he could blame himself for, but his changing his ministers in 1765, and consenting to the repeal of the Stamp Act. The ministers he then brought in did not, he said, intend to repeal the Act untill Lords Chatham and Cambden made their declarations and they adopted that fatal measure. Could he have foreseen the consequences, he certainly would not have passed the Act, but it was to the repeal he imputed all the subsequent misfortunes. He declared to God he had never harboured a thought of injuring the constitution, or abridging his people's liberties in the smallest instance, nor had he suffered himself to be led by prejudice against any man to oppose his coming into office if he approved of the principles he professed to act upon. He called upon Lord North, Lord Weymouth, and the Chancellor [Thurlow] to say if, to their knowledge, he had not given leave to enlarge and strengthen administration in particular instances upon that ground (this Lord George supposed alluded to some late negociations with Lord Shelburne and his party which were a secret to him); that he considered himself as particularly obliged to Lord North for taking up Government when the Duke of Grafton deserted him, and expressed his thanks to Lord Sandwich for the respectable footing he had put the Navy upon, which, he said, had been let down too low after the Peace of 1748, and not sufficiently provided for after the last. That great praise was due to the Treasury for the very abundant manner in which the war in America had been supplied, and that, for his own part, he had sent the officers which were thought the best in his service to command the troops. That when Howe, Clinton and Burgoyne were named, everybody approved. Lord George Germain, who was not then amongst them (meaning the ministers) said in the House of Commons they were the fittest men for the service in the army. From a consciousness of the rectitude of his conduct and intentions, therefore, he had confidence in the favour and protection of Almighty God, and trusted that He would support him against his enemies who so unjustly attacked him. It was his principle, and it was [his] resolution to part with his life rather than suffer his dominions to be dismembered, for he held it to be his duty to God and his people to preserve them intire at whatever hazard or inconvenience to himself.

"He therefore expected firmness and support from his ministers. If they thought they wanted strength, he was willing to enlarge the bottom of his administration, but in all events he expected they would support him.

"This, as well as I could collect, was the substance and the words of this discourse, tho' much longer, for it took up near an hour in delivering, not, as Lord George said, by way of speech or formal harrange, but as a plain narrative, delivered in conversation." 3½ pp.

Lord Hillsborough.

1779, July 27.—"Lord H[illsborough] told me L. N[orth] had writ to the [King] proposing him for S[ecretary] of S[tate]; that the [King] answered in these words: 'L. N[orth] you could not propose any person more agreeable to me for any office in my administration, except, L[ord] L[ieutenant] of I[reland] than L. H[illsborough].' Before L. N[orth] had communicated this to L. H[illsborough] the A[ttorney] G[eneral] was informed of what had passed, and by message by Mr. E[den] told L. N[orth] that if Lord H[illsborough] was appointed, he should resign. The secret is, Mr. E[den] wants to be ambassador to Holland in the room of Sir Joseph York, who for that reason they wish to make S[ecretary] of S[tate]. Their entire plan is to remove L. G. G[ermain] and Lord S[andwich], to make L. W[eymouth] Privy Seal, to make Lord D[artmouth] Sec. of S[tate] for A[merica], Lord Stormont and Sir J. Y[orke] the others, and to bring Lord Sh[annon ?] Lord Howe or Ad[miral] Keppel to the Admiralty, by way of strengthening Lord N[orth], but in fact to fix their own shackles upon him. 1 p.

"Curious Political Anecdotes."

(1) Lord Rockingham.

1779, May 8.—"Lord Rockingham had desired an audience of the King last week, and wa[s] considerable time in the Closet. What pass'd was related to me this day by Lord George Germain, as he had it from the King. His Majesty said he perceived him to be much confused at his entrance, and endeavouring to recollect a set of words prepared for him to speak, and as soon as he began, he saw he was to make a long set speech. The subject, Ireland. He endeavoured to paint the distresses of that country, and to glance at the want of attention in administration to her circumstances. He said he had always made it his practice to inform his Majesty of his intentions before he moved anything in Parliament (which, by the bye, said the King, I thought odd enough, when I had not seen him here (meaning his Closet) since he went out of administration in the year 1766), and that as I (sic) now intended bringing the affairs of that country into discussion, he came to open his purpose to his Majesty. He, however, assured the King he was not impelled by personal considerations, for his estate there was so happily circumstanced that he always received his rents. 'As I found,' said the King, 'I was in to be treated with a long harangue, I thought this was a good opportunity to make him shorten it by diverting him from his subject, and asked him how he managed so well. This made him talk a little about his own affairs, and took him out of his speech; and when he came to resume it again, he could not take it up in form, but huddled the substance together. The points he wished to carry, he said, were a general liberty to import grain from Ireland into England, and a liberty to export coarse woolen cloths from Ireland. The King's remarks upon his propositions were, that he began in the wrong place, for it was the House of Commons that was principally concern'd in these sorts of questions. 'But,' says he, 'I could not help observing how people are affected by their particular interest, for I was talking of what Lord Rockingham proposed to Lord Hartford, and he said the exportation of woolens would do nothing for Ireland; advantages in the linen were the things wanting.' " · 2 pp.

(2) Sir William Howe.

[1779].—" When the Howes' correspondence was moved for, Lord North was in negociation with Lord Howe, and wished him to take the command of the Western Squadron. He insisted that his brother should be exculpated by Parliament, and sent Lord North a resolution to that purpose, which Lord North returned, saying he could not consent to it, and if he did, his friends would not. The Howes never gave out they expected thanks or approbation, but only exculpation. When the papers were brought in and printed they found the public opinion did not run in their favour; they therefore moved for witnesses to be examined. This was agreed to be refused, as there was no accusation, and a negative was put upon the question for calling in Lord Cornwallis in the committee. Sir William Howe had made his speech in justification of his conduct before the papers were read, to which no reply had been made. Lord George intended replying when the debate upon Lord Cornwallis being called in came on, but was prevented by the Attorney General desiring him to let the Advocate speak before him, and the debate taking a different turn. Opposition renewed the subject in the House some days after, and then Lord George spoke, and retorted upon Howe. He still meant no witnesses should be examined, but Rigby and the Attorney General joined in saying, as there was a difference of opinion respecting the causes of the failure of the American War, it was proper the examination should go on; upon which Lord North acquiesced. Witnesses were then agreed to be called on the part of administration, but a doubt arose whether it were not best [rather] to suffer the examination to be only ex parte, and on that ground to combat a vote of approbation, than to call evidence to disprove, and so join issue and trust to the merits.

"General Grey, in his examination, declared so positively that the force sent to America was always inadequate, and the people so generaly indisposed to the Government of this country, that it was judged absolutely necessary for the justification of administration to examine evidences to take off the impression Grey's had made." 2 pp.

(3) Lord Hillsborough.

1779, May 12.—"Lord Hillsborough, in a long conversation with me this day, gave me the history of his own conduct and situation. His object was to fall in with what he knew to be the King's plan, that each of his ministers should hold of him and not of one another or of the first. He was at the head of the Board of Trade in 1775 [sic. 1765]. Upon the breach between the King and the Bedfords which ended in the ruin of Mr. Grenville's administration, Lord Halifax, boasting to the King of the strength of their party, told him that Hillsborough and his whole Board would resign if he did. The next time Lord Hillsborough went to Court, the King passed him by without speaking to him. Lord H. felt shocked and surprised, not knowing the cause, but apprehending there might be some mistake, he went next levée day. The King passed him in the same manner. He then concluded some injury had been done him, and asked an audience. He told the King his great concern at finding himself ungraciously looked on, as his Majesty's gracious acceptance of his services was the great comfort and happiness of his life; that he was unconscious of having in any the smallest instance departed from that line of conduct which he thought would be most pleasing to his Majesty, and could not in any way account for the change in his Majesty's behaviour towards him, and therefore he requested an audience to be informed of his crime. The King told him what Lord Halifax had said, upon which he solemnly protested nothing had ever passed to give Lord Halifax the least ground for what he had said; that, for his own part, he should not resign in compliment to any man so long as he could concur in the measures of any minister his Majesty might appoint, and that, as to his Board following him, he did not know the sentiments of anyone there, nor did he believe one would resign with him, go out when he would. The King then said he suspected Lord Halifax had spoke without authority, and that he had changed his behaviour to Lord Hillsborough with the view to bring about an explanation, as he expected he would ask an audience in consequence of it, as he had done.

"When the Cabinet Ministers went out, Lord Hillsborough did not resign. He went to Bath with Lady Hillsborough, and there he received a letter from Mr. Conway, the new Secretary, informing him the King had no further occasion for his services. The same post brought him a message from the King, thro' Lord Barrington, telling him that nothing had ever given him more concern than being obliged to consent to his removal, but such was the present necessity of his affairs that he could not refuse, but that he might depend upon being brought in the first favourable occasion.

"When Lord Chatham came in, he had a private intimation from the King that he would be appointed First Lord of the Admiralty, but that, for particular reasons, Mr. Pitt thought it necessary to make an offer of it to Sir Edward Hawke, who would certainly decline it. The King was mistaken, for Sir Edw. Hawke did accept it. Lord Hillsborough then went back to the Board of Trade. In 1768 he was appointed Secretary of State for the Colonies, and Lord Clare First Lord of Trade. Lord Weymouth, who was then a Secretary of State, disapproved of the new office, and all the Bedfords, who had some time before been brought in, disliked Lord Hillsborough's coming into the Cabinet, probably from remembering his staying after them in 1765. Lord Hillsborough, in pursuance of his system, gave all his aid to Lord North, he being the King's minister. When the Falkland Island business was agitated, the Cabinet were divided about the measures to be taken. Lord Chatham had then recovered from his long delirium. Wood, who was Lord Weymouth's secretary, wished to bring him in and to make Lord Weymouth the acting minister. A war with Spain he thought the certain means of effecting his purpose. Lord Weymouth's conversation with Prince Massarano was rough and hostile, but that good man did not seek an occasion to involve his country in war, and was not irritated. A squadron of men of war under Harland was going to the East Indies; Wood prepared instructions for him, authorising him to commence hostilities and seize the Philipan Islands. Wood thought himself so sure of war by this stroke that he sold stock to a great amount in expectation of the funds falling when the secret came out, but he was the dupe of his own policy, and lost considerably, for the instructions were rejected by the Cabinet, Lord Hillsborough taking an active part against them. Lord Weymouth upon this resigned, but had a promise from the King of the Blue Ribbond and the first Cabinet office that fell. Things went on till 1772, when the Ohio grant became the cause of dissension in the Cabinet. I have detailed that business in a separate paper, upon my own knowledge.* Lord Hillsborough parted with the King with great regret and marks of affection on both sides. The King made him an English Earl and Lord North promised him the first Cabinet office after Lord Weymouth was gratified. Lord Weymouth had the gold key in 177[5]. Sometime after, Lord North called at Lord Hillsborough's twice in one day, when Lord Hillsborough, who was not at home, imagining he had something particular to say to him, writ to know if he wish'd to see him. Lord North came to him, told him Lord Talbot was dying, and that he intended his place for him. Lord Talbot, however, recovered. When the Lieutenancy of Ireland was to be filled up in 177[9], Lord Hillsborough had heard generaly that he was proposed by Lord North. He read it in the newspaper one morning when Charles Townshend call'd upon him, to whom he jocosely shew'd the article. Mr. Townshend asserted it was true, and that he was Lord Lieutenant. Lord Hillsborough dressed, and went to Court to find Lord North, and taking him aside, asked him if he had any intention of naming him for Lord Lieutenant. Lord North said he had. Then, says Lord Hillsborough, I will go in and ask the King for it. Lord North told him it was not come that length yet, for there were difficulties started about his estate in Ireland, but that he did not doubt they would be got over. Lord Hillsborough desisted, and heard no more of it untill Lord B[uckingham's] appointment. Then he was told the King made the objection, or allowed it to be a good one, of his having his estate in Ireland. Lord Hillsborough, however, thinks the King would not have made or allowed that objection if he had asked it of the King himself, and he thinks he had before hurt himself with the King by a note he had written to Lord North, professing his attachment to his lordship's administration, which note Lord North shew'd to the King. From what I have been told of the matter by Lord George Germain, the proposition was made by Lord North to the King, who made the objection above stated, and persisted in it. Every minister in the Cabinet except Lord North, and particularly Lord George Germain, were against Lord Hillsborough, principally or at least ostensibly because his appointment would open a door to all the Irish nobility to become candidates. The Duke of Leinster [and] Lord Shannon could no longer be objected to on account of their local connexions. The Earl Gower and Lord Weymouth possibly had other reasons, tho' they did not give them; they might wish to pay him off the old score, and I am confident there is not a man but Lord North, and I am not clear with regard to him, that desires to see Lord Hillsborough among them.

* See p. 253 above.

"When Lord Buckingham applied, Lord North told him by letter there were two who he must propose, but if they were not accepted, or did not accept, his lordship should be the man. These two were Lord Hillsborough and Lord Rochford. The latter refused to go, and the former was objected to by the King. Lord North, upon the King's objecting to Lord Hillsborough, delayed to name any other for several weeks, and the King would not name one, as he said it might then be supposed he had objected to Lord Hillsborough to make way for that other. In the meantime Lord Carlisle was mentioned by Lord Gower, and the Duke of Northumberland was sounded to go. Lord Buckingham, hearing of this, claimed Lord North's promise under his hand, which Lord North pleaded against Lord Carlisle, who he did not desire should go, and Lord Buckingham was appointed." 6½ pp.

(4) William Eden.

1779, June 1.—"Mr. William Eden,* having become an object of ministerial jealousy, and already made some figure in the political world, and probably will have considerable influence hereafter, I will set down what I know of him and his movements to the present time, when the commission he was appointed in just expired. He was bred to the law, had been called to the Bar, but being a bad orator had made no figure there. He became known as a man of talents by a treatise upon criminal law, I think it was entitled; and when Mr. Whately died, Wedderburn, Solicitor-General,

* The proper names in this paper were erased by Knox, as he states in a note, "lest it should fall into improper hands," but afterwards restored by him.

recommended him to Lord Suffolk to succeed him as Under-Secretary. He possess'd a most insinuating, gentle manner, which cover'd a deeply intriguing and ambitious spirit. Lord Suffolk, who had great innate pride that only shewed itself in a dignity of conduct which led him to be most generous and friendly to all those he patronised, was fond of Eden, and seemed resolved to make his fortune. He soon brought him into Parliament, obtained a pension for him, and afterwards got him the Auditorship of Greenwich Hospital. But the powers of the Secretary of State were too limited for Eden's views. Lord North was his object. He took a house in Downing Street to be convenient to his Lordship, and when Robinson was ill he undertook the secret business without quitting his situation with Lord Suffolk. He allied himself to the old system of Carleton House, which, since the Princess of Wales' death, have been distinguished by the name of King's friends, or supporters of the Administration for the time being, without regard to those of whom it is composed, by marrying Sir Gilbert Elliott's daughter. Robinson unexpectedly recovering and resuming his office, Eden was appointed a Lord of Trade in consideration of his services and disappointment. He continued, however, to carry on the foreign secret correspondence, and to be the confidential friend and intimate of Lord North, and pander to his amours. When the measure of appointing commissioners to treat with America was adopted in 1778, Eden procured himself to be named one. The Solicitor-General, who prepared the Instructions, was very desirous his friend should succeed in the negociation, and the Instructions were most liberally framed for that purpose, so diametrically against his former conduct. When the resolution of the 20th February was drawing up Eden determined to get possession of the first commissioner, Lord Carlisle, and he soon carried his point. His powerful connexion was a bait too alluring not to be snatched at, and as he, from his former situations, was presumed to possess the confidence of Administration the others paid him great attention. His ignorance, however, of the orders for evacuating Philadelphia was a severe blow to his importance, and he felt the mortification so sensibly that he could not help expressing his spleen in his letters and in a manner that exposed his character to the King, and Lord Suffolk, who had kept the Under-Secretary's [place] vacant, took him at his word and appointed; for he became jealous of his preferring the connexion of Lord Carlisle to him. He came home in disgust, but chose to conceal it, and affected to sink the consequence he had assumed. I had escaped his resentment through mistake, but when he was set right he shew'd his ill-humor by official inattentions. When he found it necessary to transact with me he again became civil, but he was foiled in all his purposes; he aimed at having a seat at the Board of Trade, tho' without emolument, that he still might have the honor of making the Peace should it come about. Lord G[eorge] was determined to get rid of him, and did everything to prevent his continuance there, and succeeded. He detected a scheme, which he immediately imputed to Eden, to get the Board of Trade from him. He stated it to the King, who had conceived strong prejudices against Eden, and, upon this occasion, told Lord G[eorge] that he had found Lord Carlisle was jealous of Eden, so he had a mind to know how the matter stood, and in his conference with Eden he asked about Lord Carlisle; that Eden's answer was an intire panegerick on Lord Carlisle, but he added that he wanted somebody to produce him and conduct him; 'that is,' said the King, 'he meant I should understand Lord Carlisle would do very well under his management.'

"Various intrigues were reported to be on foot at the ending of this session for producing a change. Lord G. Germain and Lord Sandwich were the objects pointed out, but they came to nothing. The Spanish declaration on the 15th occasioned the session to be protracted some days, of which it was supposed the Attorney-General and Eden would avail themselves to make their bargain. On the 21st an event happened which served to clear away all suspicion of private negociation from the King at least, and shows his character is developing, and that his difficulties will make him soon act the part of a great Prince. I transcribe the narrative of the transaction from the paper on which I set it down immediately after I was told it by Lord G. Germain. [See the King's speech to his Cabinet, p. 260 above.]

"The 24th, Lord George had an opportunity of asking the King what he meant by his references to Lord North, Lord Weymouth and the Chancellor. He said he had heard of negociations going forward, and he supposed his Majesty alluded to them. The King said it was no late business; that Lord North was often wishing to go out, and, at the time the Chancellor came in, he pressed very much for leave to quit; that he therefore gave the Chancellor leave to sound Lord Shelburne, but that he found his demands extravagant, and his principles not to be trusted. If anything was now negociating he knew nothing of it, but whoever wished to go out, he thought, had better go, not stay. Lord George said he thought he would be distressed to fill Lord North's place. 'So I should,' answered the King, 'for altho' he is not intirely to my mind, and there are many things about him I wish were changed, I don't know any who wou'd do so well, and I have a great regard for him and very good opinion of him.'" $7\frac{1}{2}$ pp.

(5) Alexander Wedderburn, Lord Loughborough.

"The promotion of Mr. Wedderburn to be Chief Justice of the Common Pleas and a peer was the consequence of a fortunate concurrence of circumstances which rarely happens. He had been bred to the Law in Scotland, and derived no pretensions to preferment from family or fortune. His sister, a very fine woman, was taken to wife by Sir Harry Erskine, and on the credit of that connexion the brother quitted the Scotish bar and came up to England. His knowledge of the Scotch law brought him business in the appeals from that Kingdom, and he laid himself out to be employed in the Colony causes before the Privy Council. When Lord Bute became minister, Sir Harry Erskine assumed to be his chief favourite, or, as he styled himself, sous ministre, and of course Mr. Wedderburn grew into importance. They set up the Briton and Auditor, in defence of Lord Bute, but the conductors complained of being ill-furnished with materials, and both were dropt. I first knew Mr. Wedderburn in Paris, in the year 1763, the summer after the Peace. He attended Andrew Stewart there as his council in the prosecution of the enquiry into the supposititious birth of Mr. Douglas. He was then only distinguished by his assuming and forward manner. He perhaps felt his own superiority, tho', as he had made no extraordinary exhibition of talents, others were unwilling to allow his claim, and hence was that behaviour deemed arrogant then, which would since have been thought sufficiently modest. When Lord Bute went out, he attached himself to Mr. Grenville, and he took a considerable share in the business of the House of Commons, where he was soon allowed to be the least of a lawyer, as a speaker, of any man who had been bred to the Bar, but he did not acquire the character of a great Parliamentary speaker until that Administration was changed, when the acrimony of disappointment gave a zest to his declamation, and he indulged his talent for satyr (sic) and railing at the expence of the new ministers, to the great entertainment of the House, and raising his own reputation. Upon Mr. Grenville's death, he connected with Lord Suffolk, and paid court to Lord George Germain. When Lord Suffolk became Secretary of State, Mr. Wedderburn became Solicitor-General. Thurlow, who was the Attorney, had wished to be Chief Justice of Chester, from dislike of business, and a negociation was actually set on foot with Morton to resign it to him. Mrs. Morton would not, however, consent to her husband quitting Chester, and thus has the caprice of a woman become the occasion of Thurlow obtaining the great Seal, and depriving Wedderburn of it.

"While Bathurst continued Chancellor, Wedderburn was impatient of his office of Solicitor, but upon Thurlow's promotion, and himself being made Attorney-General, he expressed still greater eagerness to quit the House of Commons. He wanted a peerage, tho' he has no child, nor is his wife ever likely to have any. He wished to have been Secretary of State in the room of Lord Suffolk, with a peerage, and he long solicited Sir William de Grey's resignation, in order to succeed him. Lord George Germain offended him deeply by having said he thought his office of Attorney-General ought to content him for some time, and that a peerage was too much for him to expect so early. He, with Eden, schemed Lord George's removal from the Board of Trade, and placing Lord Carlisle there, and meant to have carried his Lordship into the Cabinet, but could not obtain it." 2½ pp.

(6) Thomas Hussey's mission to Spain.

"In the spring of 1780, a Mr. Hussey, who had been one of Massarano's and, afterwards, Almadovar's chaplains, and had lately returned from Spain, became acquainted with Mr. Cumberland, and convey'd thro' him to Lord George Germain his opinion of the pacific disposition of the King of Spain and the Chief Spanish ministers; that they had conceived apprehensions of our purpose to attack them and to make peace with the Colonies by assisting them to conquer some of the Spanish territories, which was the reason of their making war, and that if they were assured of our desire to be at peace with them, he had no doubt but matters might soon be accommodated. Lord George, in several private interviews, endeavoured to convince Mr. Hussey that no such designs as Spain imputed to England had ever been entertained, and Hussey offered to go to Spain to inform the Court of what his Lordship had said, and try the effect, if his expences were borne and he had a letter given him, authorising him to give such assurances. A letter from Lord George to Mr. Hussey was accordingly prepared by his Lordship, and Cumberland and I carried the draft to Lord North for his approbation, who approving it, the letter was signed, and, with 200*l*, given to Mr. Hussey, who set off for Madrid immediately.

"On his return, he shew'd a letter from Mr. Florida Blanca to him, of a similar nature to that he had received from Lord George Germain, and, in his conversation, he declared it to be his opinion that Spain would immediately make a separate peace with us, if we ceded Gibraltar and West Florida, and would give us equivalents in America. Upon further conversation, and finding no negociation could be begun if the cession of Gibraltar was to be a preliminary, he expressed his hope that a treaty might take place without such a preliminary, and that, as Spain was very eager to have West Florida, if she found us disposed to exchange it for Porto Rico, it was not impossible matters might be accommodated upon that footing. I rejoiced in the idea of this exchange, for I had long before proposed purchasing Spain's friendship by giving her West Florida, as the best means of preventing the Americans from settling the interior country, or availing themselves of the navigation of the Missisippy, but Hussey pressed that some person might be sent back with him to Spain, to receive and transmit correspondence, in the quality of an agent, as the Spanish Court had objections to corresponding on the subject thro' our minister at Lisbon, and affected the utmost caution to keep the whole a secret, especially from France; and as Mr. Cumberland was already interested, Mr. Hussey wish'd he might be the person.

"Mr. Cumberland went with him accordingly, but instead of going in a private manner, he carry'd his wife and daughters to Lisbon, and instead of waiting there for a private invitation into Spain, he set off with Hussey and them, and was received on the frontiers and conducted in the King's carriage as a public minister come to sue for peace. France presently got information of the business, and, of course, contravened it." $2\frac{1}{2}$ pp.

(7) Lord Chancellor Thurlow.

"When the tea was sent out by the East India Company to America in 1774, no communication of the project was made to the American Secretary, nor any orders or even notice sent to the Governors respecting it; but when the account of its destruction at Boston arrived, the ministers appeared determined to act with extraordinary vigor; Lord Dartmouth, who was then the American Secretary, taking the lead, to exculpate himself for having formerly moved the repeal of the Stamp Act in the Lords. The Cabinet met at his office, and the Attorney and Solicitor-General, Thurlow and Wedderburn, attended. It was agreed to issue a warrant under the hands of six Privy Counsellors for apprehending Cushen,* Handcock, Warren, Adams; to send Mr. Hay, who was then returned from Quebec, as director of the business on board a frigate which was to bring over the culprits, and the Attorney and Solicitor-General were directed to prepare the proper warrants. They all met the following day, and Mr. Pownall and myself were sitting in the outer room, waiting the result, when the Attorney and Solicitor came out. 'Well,' cried Pownall, 'is it done?' 'No,' answered Thurlow, 'nothing is done. Don't you see,' added he, 'that they want to throw the whole responsibility of the business upon the Solicitor-General and me; and who would be such damned fools as to risk themselves for such—— fellows as these. Now if it was George Grenville, who was so damned obstinate that he would go to hell with you before he would desert you, there would be some sense in it.' He walked off, and the project was dropt.

"When the failure of Burgoyne's expedition was threatened to come under discussion in the House of Commons, Thurlow, who was then Attorney-General, came to me at the office one day and told me he was informed by all the Ministers that I could give him the information he wanted about this expedition. There were three things he wanted to know: the motives and reasons of the expedition, the measures that were concerted for its execution, and the occasion of its failure. I told him I would put into his hands a paper I had drawn up for the Cabinet Ministers according to my annual custom, which was a precis of the whole correspondence of the preceding year, which would give him much of the information he desired, and accordingly brought him one of the copies. He turned over the sheets and examined them, and then said, 'Why, this is the very thing I wanted, and you have done it already; pray, do the Ministers know of this?' 'Yes, Sir, they have all had copies of it.' 'Then, by God, they have never read it, for there is not one of them knows a tittle of the matter.' He took home the paper, and came to me a few days after with a sheet of remarks and desired me to hear him rehearse, that he might know whether he understood the business, and went thro' the whole with wonderful accuracy. He asked me what was Burgoyne's reason for sending Germans to Bennington instead of English, for that, he observed, seem'd the first cause of his capture, and I had said nothing about it. I answer'd that as the General had given no reason for it, I could not set down any, but I believed I could tell him how it happen'd, for I remembered, when Sir William Howe was blamed for placing the Hessians at Trenton, the excuse made for him by military men was that every corps had its situation in the line of march, and when detachments were made, if they were not taken from the wing on the side on which they were made, it would be a breach of rule; and the Brunswick troops happening to be on Burgoyne's left, as the Hessians were upon Howe's, they were, of course, the corps to be detached on that side. 'So,' says he, 'because one damn'd blockhead did a foolish thing the other blockhead must follow his example.' The enquiry, however, was dropt, and Thurlow had no opportunity of shewing his talents for military operations, which, I am sure, would have appeared far superior to any of our commanders. From that time he was very civil to me, and when he became Chancellor I always visited him at his Levées, while he continued to have any, and at length a closer intercourse arose." $3\frac{1}{2}$ pp.

* John Cushing, Speaker of the Massachusetts Assembly.

State of the Dutch Business.

1780, December.—Memorandum headed as above. The Armed Neutrality being projected by Russia "soon after we had declared our treaty of 1674 with Holland void," and fears being entertained that Holland would accede to it, it was judged best "to lay in ground of a separate quarrel with Holland" on that matter, and rather to go to war with her than to suffer her to carry for our enemies. "The discovery of a project of a treaty among Laurens' papers between Amsterdam and the Congress furnished a sufficient pretext for this purpose." Sir Joseph Yorke was, therefore, directed to complain of the town of Amsterdam and demand punishment of the Burgomaster. The States disavowed any knowledge of the matter; a second demand was then made, but, meantime, a majority having declared for the Armed Neutrality, Yorke was at once recalled, "before the notification of their accession to the Neutrality could be signified to him, that so our offence might be imputed to the Treaty only." 2 pp.

Further Memorandum.—

When the account was received from Sir James Harris of the intention of the Empress to offer her mediation a messenger was despatched to Vienna. The death of the Empress Queen happened in the meantime, but Sir Robert Keith wrote that the Emperor seemed not averse to the mediation. Holland having meanwhile resolved to enter into the Armed Neutrality and to ratify the treaty, an immediate decision became necessary. "The Ministers who met were Lord North, the Chancellor, President [Bathurst], three Secretaries, Sandwich and Amherst. The first and third fell asleep as soon as the business was opened—Lord Hillsborough nodded and dropped his hat; Lord Sandwich was overcome at first, but rubbed his eyes and seemed attentive. Lord Amhurst kept awake, but said nothing. Lord Stormont, the reader of these important papers, the Chancellor and Lord George Germain only gave them consideration, but when the others awoke they approved of what was proposed. My opinion went against coming to extremities with the Dutch, because I thought it might impede the return of America and cut our fleet out more work by having the North Sea to guard. The supplies they would carry to the French and Spaniards those nations had always found means to get, and the making them pay more for them was not to be put in comparison with the increase of our expences by adding a Dutch war to our present disbursements. I would, therefore, have temporised until an agreement could have been made with the Emperor to assist us by holding out to him the free navigation of the Scheld and other advantages to be taken from the Dutch." 1½ pp.

Cabinet Council.

1781, Jan. 19.—Despatches having come from Sir James Harris giving an account of a conversation with the Empress on the subject of the Armed Neutrality and her mediation, the King summoned Ministers to the Queen's House on the 19th, "where, being come, he ordered them to be seated round a table, himself at the head opened the business and desired their opinions separately. One asked who his Majesty would chose to speak first. The King said he should not point to anyone. Lord Sandwich, afraid the Chancellor should begin, said the usual way [was] for the youngest to begin, which, being acquiesced in, Lord North, forgetting that he stood above Lord Amherst, began without rising. He was followed by Lord A[mherst] and the others standing. The Council continued from half after eleven till three, and it being Levee day the King then sent to put it off." 1 p. Headed "17 January" by mistake.

Removal of Lord George Germain.

"Account of what passed in consequence of Lord Cornwallis's surrender, brought down to the 17th January, 1782, and 1st February, 1782.

"The loss of that fine army, after General Burgoyne's, impressed the country gentlemen with an idea that the reduction of the colonies was impracticable. It was in vain the misconduct of the Generals and Admirals were urged as the cause, for the answer was ready and not to be gainsay'd: 'Have you better to put in their places; and if with the force you had you have failed, can you expect to succeed with what remains, &c.' Many were for relinquishing the American war altogether, but they soon fell into the opinion of others, that we ought to maintain what we possess'd, and act offensively by sea only. It was, therefore, agreed that the troops now in America should remain there and be kept up by recruits, but no new corps to be sent out. Lord George Germain was called upon by the King to propose his plan for employing those troops and bringing back the Colonies to the sovereignty of this country. He put down his ideas on a paper which I drew up in form and extended. A copy was sent to the King, and another to each of the Cabinet ministers. In the meantime the Bedford party were busy concerting a change in the Administration, and Rigby and the Lord Advocate of Scotland [Dundas] made an attack upon Lord North in the House of Commons for suffering himself to be over-ruled by others, meaning Lord George Germain, who they recommended to Lord North to turn out. The ground they took was Lord George's declaration that he never would consent to any treaty with America by which the sovereignty of it was given up, while Lord North kept aloof about the terms, but declared his wish for peace. Nothing was said upon Lord George's paper for three Cabinets, and by various accounts there was reason to believe a negociation was going on for an alteration in the Ministry, and particularly for the removal of Lord Sandwich and Lord George. The Opposition had moved for an enquiry into Lord Sandwich's conduct, and it was said he was to be supported by Lord North; and lest Lord George should give any handle against the Admiralty, by throwing the blame of miscarriages upon the Navy, it was supposed he would be removed into the House of Peers, and Mr. Jenkinson was intended to succeed him; but he having a petition depending against him was not capable of a re-election, and therefore the American Department was, in the meantime, to be thrown into the Southern Office, and all the foreign business given to the Northern.

"Clinton's friends, finding so strong a run against him, had thought it prudent to desire he might have leave to resign the command, which Lord George had informed the King of, and desired to know who his Majesty would have to succeed him, to which the King answered that the appointment of a Commander in Chief was so connected with other matters that he could not immediately determine. This Lord George took for a hint that a change of Ministry was in contemplation, and soon after, hearing that Sir Guy Carleton had been sent for to the Queen's House, he concluded he was to be employ'd, and that his own removal was decided upon. The next audience he had of the King, his Majesty told him he could not yet tell him who was to be Commander in Chief, 'for,' added his Majesty, 'I really cannot get at the bottom of Lord North's intentions respecting America.' His Lordship then told him what was said of Carleton, and owned that after his former correspondence with him, as the King's Secretary, he could not possibly bring himself to open another in the same office, without something was done by Carleton to take away the former offence, which he considered not so much as a personal insult to him as a disrespect to his station and appointment. The King declared he had thought of him cursorily, but had not taken any step in the business. Lord George then told his Majesty that he thought it a proper time for him to go into the country, and wait till his situation was decided upon; that he had come into office in the hope of being of service, and that, if his Majesty found his going out would be of service, he was ready to take his leave. He requested his Majesty to be sure of his ground before he moved, and whatever he judged necessary to do for the strengthening of his government, not to defer it on personal considerations for his Ministers, for his case and theirs was very different, and affairs were now in such a situation that he must look to himself. After much conversation of this sort, the King agreeing that Lord George might properly go into the country, he took his leave and set off for Drayton. It was while he was there I was informed of the proposed arrangement, which I communicated to him, and in return was desired to deliver a message to Lord North [space left for message]. When I began to read the message, Lord North stopped me by asking who told Lord G. Germain that he [was] thinking of a plan for American affairs, or of making any alteration in Administration. It was an alteration of measures and not of men that was wanted, but perhaps Lord George thought the measures would be such as he should not approve. I made no answer, but pursued the delivery of my message, and when I had done, he said warmly, his own Department gave him full occupation without attending to other matters. Where, could I tell him, was he to find taxes to produce 800,000*l*. He had engaged to the King and told the Cabinet, last year, he could support the war only one year more, and he had fulfill'd his engagement, and now he wish'd he was out. I replied, if matters were at that pass, had he not better make peace now than wait till our distress was notorious. He answered they would not make peace with us. 'Have you tried,' said I. 'Why keep off with Holland by demanding of her to give up liberties which you must allow other nations to take? Why not try to buy off Spain, offer the uti possidetis and a truce to America?' 'Oh, they wont treat with you,' said he 'Try them with the offer. If they refuse, then it will be evident to the people that it is France which prevents them having a peace to their wishes. That will give you good ground to negociate separately and revive your interest. Send a proper person to manage the business.' 'Would Lord George agree to that?' 'I believe he would, but if nothing else will do, take the advantage of the disaster of the French fleet and your own superiority in the West Indies to ask France what she will have. You can do it now with more dignity than you will next year, if you can make no further exertions!' He walked about the room and call'd for his post chaise, which I took for a civil way of bidding me get out of the room, and did so accordingly.

"Lord George came to town on Tuesday, the 15th, when I reported what pass'd. He determined to speak out to the King the next day, but the next day the King was indisposed, and had no levée, nor was there to be any court on Thursday, and Friday was the Queen's birthday. A Council, however, was necessary for the Irish business, and the King agreed to have it on Thursday at three o'clock To this Council Lord George went, and after it was over had an audience, and here follows his report to me of what pass'd.

"The King received him very kindly. Lord North had just gone out from him. He talked of the matters which had been the subject of the Council and of other matters for some time. At last, Lord George, finding an interval, ask'd him plainly, 'am I out?' 'Out,' eplies the King, 'What should make you suppose you were out?' He then assured him no proposition had been made to him for his going out. 'Why then, Sir, am I not told what are to be the measures? Why does not Lord North tell me what he intends?' 'He saw Knox,' said the King. 'Yes, but he gave him no answer. I sent Knox to him as I knew he had a kindness for him and used to talk confidentially with him, and upon the footing he is with me, it was the same as going myself, and I avoided that negligent manner of his which must have given me offence; but instead of sending me an answer. he call'd up his post chaise.' 'Well,' says the King, 'he will send to you.' Lord George then went into a repetition of the motives of his conduct, professing that as he came in with the hopes of being of service, he was ready either to continue at all hazards or retire, as his Majesty thought proper; that his wish was to retire now, rather than be forced to it some time hence, as he was sure must be the case if vigorous measures were not taken. The King answer'd, 'Conduct like yours occasion a removal but to your own satisfaction.' He then asked about Fisher, how he went on, and how Knox liked him, and so ended a conference of a full hour with that easy familiarity which meant to express satisfaction and to convey it.

"The next day, a card came from Lord North, desiring Lord George to come to Downing Street the 19th at eleven o'clock. He went, and came away in a monstrous passion. I had that morning written to Robinson to warn Lord North not to be inattentive in the conference, and to tell him that I had disposed Lord George to treat with America upon the foot of a truce and the uti possidetis, and that the King would come into it (for so Lord George told me), but that Ireland must be called upon to fulfill her promise. Robinson had hastened to Downing Street, but Lord North, when he came down, did not go into his own room but into that of the meeting, which was call'd upon Admiralty business, and to which, and not to a private conference, Lord George had been summoned. When Lord George found what was the business, he waited it out, thinking Lord North would then speak to him, but finding no appearance of such an attention, he came away in disgust. He immediately sat down to write to the King, when I took the opportunity of slipping down to Lord North's in search of Robinson, who I brought up with me to Lord George. He had almost finished his letter to the King, telling him how he had been treated, and that it being evident Lord North meant he should go out, he desired his Majesty would acquaint him with his pleasure when he should bring the Seals, or to whom give them. Robinson entreated him not to send the letter, assuring him there was some mistake, and that Lord North would send to him to appoint a conference before Monday, upon which he consented to keep back the letter till Monday. On Monday morning he received a very civil letter from Lord North * declaring he had no recollection of the King desiring him to converse with Lord George, and appointing Tuesday morning. On Tuesday Lord George went, when Lord North told him he had been right in supposing the King had desired them to have a meeting, for upon his writing to the King to tell him what Lord George had said the King refer'd him to a note in the box he had returned to him on Thursday, where he found one, desiring him to make the appointment, but he considering the box as containing only office papers had not opened it when it came back. The conference lasted an hour, and the report Lord George made to me of it was to this effect. Lord North said it was impossible to continue the war; that America was lost, and it was vain to think of recovering it. Lord George offered to treat upon the uti possidetis, but that, Lord North said, they would not accept; nothing but Independence would do, and that, Lord George said, would never be given by him, and, therefore, if such was his purpose, he must look out for another

* See Report on the Stopford-Sackville MSS. (8vo edition), vol i., p. 76.

Secretary of State. He talked of the office merging in the Southern Department, but that, he said, could not be, for he must have an efficient man in the House of Commons. Jenkinson was named, who, he said, would not accept it, as his object was Cabinet, with the War Office. Lord George pressed to be told before he went to the House to-morrow (the 23) whether he was to continue or not, and his Lordship promised he would inform him. In the conversation, Lord North [said] there was no objection to Lord George's person, but to his declared principle of never consenting to Independence, which made the difficulty, 'and yet,' says he, 'your being out of the way wont mend matters, for the King is of the same opinion.' I think he intends the Lord Advocate to succeed Lord George, and its probable he will find difficulty in obtaining the King's consent, for he told Lord George that he had told Lord North he never should forget the Lord Advocate's behaviour. Nothing further having passed for some days, Lord George Germain spoke to the King upon the disagreeableness of his situation and the injury his service received. The King told him Lord North had spoken of the necessity for his going out, because of his avowed principle of resisting treaty with America upon any footing but preservation of sovereignty. 'If you mean by his going out,' said the King, 'to relinquish that principle you must make other removes.' 'No,' replies Lord North, 'for no one else has declared that principle.' 'Yes,' says the King, 'you must go further; you must remove ME.' Lord North may be supposed to have been struck with this declaration, and for some days nothing was heard from him. The Advocate and Rigby left the House whispering their intention not to go there while Lord George was in office. Lord George now thought it time to write to Lord North* for the answer he promised him ten days ago. No answer came, but the next day, the 31st, as Lord North came out from the King, he said to Lord George Germain: 'My Lord, your desire is the most proper and reasonable that can be, but the worst of it is, Jenkinson wont take your department.' This decided Lord George to consider himself as out, and meeting Lord H[illsborough] he was told by him that he was commissioned to sound Mr. Ellis, and if he did not take it the office was to merge into his. Considering Lord George's removal as the first step to relinquishing the American War, I offer'd to go out Governor of South Carolina and one of the Commissioners to endeavour to save that country for the nation, and preserve my own property in Georgia, but he would not agree to it." 18 pp.

LORD THURLOW.

"My first acquaintance with Mr. Thurlow, then Attorney-General, was upon the occasion of General Burgoyne's calling, in the House of Commons, for an enquiry into the cause of his miscarriage at Saratogo. The friends of the Howes had got about Burgoyne and persuaded him to lay the fault upon Lord Sackville, as neither having supplied him with sufficient force or furnished him with

* See Report on the Stopford-Sackville MSS. (8vo edition), vol. i., p. 77.

Instructions sufficiently discretionary, instead of imputing his failure to the want of Howe's co-operation, which Burgoyne well knew was the true cause, assisted by his own imprudence; but as he was no friend to the Administration he thought it was better to injure them than Howe.

"There certainly was a weak place in Lord Sackville's defence, which was the want of an official communication to Howe of the plan and Burgoyne's Instructions, with orders for his co-operation; of which I was not only innocent, but it was owing to my interference that Howe had any knowledge of the business. Mr. D'Oyly, my then colleague, having been some time Deputy-Secretary at War, and the particular friend of Howe, had the entire conduct of the military business; and Burgoyne and he had settled the force and Instructions, and Burgoyne had gone in to the King and obtained his consent for having the command and everything in his own way; even the specific detachments and corps were all named and not left to Carleton to select.

"When all was prepared, and I had them to compare and make up, Lord Sackville came down to the office to sign the letters on his way to Stoneland, when I observed to him that there was no letter to Howe to acquaint him with the plan or what was expected of him in consequence of it. His Lordship started, and D'Oyly stared, but said he would in a moment write a few lines. 'So,' says Lord Sackville, 'my poor horses must stand in the street all the time, and I shant be to my time anywhere.' D'Oyly then said he had better go, and he would write from himself to Howe and inclose copies of Burgoyne's Instructions, which would tell him all that he would want to know; and with this his Lordship was satisfied, as it enabled him to keep his time, for he could never bear delay or disappointment; and D'Oyly sat down and writ a letter to Howe, but he neither shew'd it to me or gave a copy of it for the office, and if Howe had not acknowledged the receipt of it, with the copy of the Instructions to Burgoyne, we could not have proved that he ever saw them. I applied upon this occasion to D'Oyly for a copy of his letter, but he said he had kept none. I then desired he would get one from Howe, who had the original, but he would not ask for it, and Lord Sackville did not call upon Howe for it. Thurlow would, however, have called for it if the enquiry had gone on, as I had told him all the circumstances. When he came to me he said he was sent to me for information respecting Burgoyne's expedition, for that all he had talked with upon the subject seemed to know nothing, but told him he must come to me. [Here follows the account of the interview already given. See p. 270 above.]

"I had once before met him and Wedderburn, then Solicitor-General, at Lord North's, where Mr. De Gray and myself were carried by Lord Sackville to a consultation upon the Instructions to be given to Lord Carlisle, &c., as commissioners. Those we had prepared for them had been by Lord North refer'd to the Attorney and Solicitor-General, and Wedderburn, being the patron of Eden, wish'd much that he might succeed in making Peace, and therefore was for giving the Commissioners much larger powers than we had intended. When the concessions to be made were spoken of, I said that the Northern Colonies were rather to be considered as the rivals of this country and Ireland than their dependants; that they were much less advantageous than the Southern, and more difficult to be retained, and that, in my opinion, Great Britain would be better without them if they could be annihilated; upon which Thurlow observed that, as I seemed to think the Northern Colonies were not worth keeping, if that were the case he was sure the Southern ones were not worth fighting for. The consultation ended in submitting to Wedderburn to manufacture the Instructions and bring them to Lord North, and he framed them in such a manner as, if the Colonies had accepted the offers the Commissioners were impowered to make, the people then would have had all the advantages of British subjects without any share of the burdens of the Empire, and consequently Britain and Ireland would have been depopulated and reduced.

"After Thurlow became Chancellor, I visited him at his levées and was always well received, and when the Marquis of Buckingham came from Ireland, I writ to the Chancellor upon the state of that country, and had a very handsome answer. I afterwards sent him my several publications, and, in consequence of my conversations with Lord Rawdon, I requested a conference with him upon the views of that body, and my motives for attaching myself to them, which he much approved, but gave me to understand that the King did not feel the manacles Pitt had put upon him, or was not willing to hassard the inconvenience of attempting to break them. He said: 'This man (meaning Pitt), who he gives his confidence to for every thing, is utterly incapable of such a trust: he does not know how to do his own business, much less all the business of the Nation, which he takes upon him nevertheless.' I left him with assuring him that whenever the King thought fit to remove Pitt, he would find no difficulty in forming a respectable administration. It was in pursuance of this idea that I drew up and printed the Considerations on the State of the Nation, a copy of which I sent to Lord Thurlow before publication, and when I afterwards waited upon him in an evening, we had a long conversation upon the former subject. He approved greatly of the pamphlet, but seemed to think the King would not make any change; but wish'd Lord Rawdon and his friends would fairly come forward and avow themselves the supporters of the King. I mentioned this to Lord Rawdon, who, in answer, writ me a long letter declaring his sentiments, and renouncing all office during the present King's reign. I thought it right to communicate that declaration to the Chancellor, as I had given him reason to think differently of Lord Rawdon's purpose, and I also, from that time, gave up the idea of connecting myself with that party, which I foresaw would soon be melted down into the Duke of Portland's, and I gave the Chancellor my reasons for so doing. It was upon this occasion he told me the history of the Regency business, which I will set down in his own words:—

"'I scarcely knew the Prince of Wales, having never seen him but in public, and still less had I seen the Duke of York. When the King was taken ill, they were all frightened, and knew not what to do with him. The Prince thought it not fit to write to me to desire I would come to them, but sent the Duke of York. I went immediately, and upon the Prince asking me what was to be done, I told him that the King, in his present situation, was to be considered as any other man so circumstanced, and treated accordingly. Whatever, therefore, the physicians, who were all there, advised, was to be done without scruple. All the physicians agreed in the hopelessness of his case. After this, the Prince asked me what was fit for him to do. I told him his situation was a delicate but a plain one. Everything must flow to him of itself; he could only interrupt its course by impatience to receive it. He had to think of the King in the double condition of father and sovereign, and in both capacities, his present situation called for his utmost tenderness. The Prince appeared convinced, and expressed great obligation to me, but, after he saw Sheridan, he adopted the contrary course, and I believe he now thinks he would have done as well if he had followed my advice, for when we meet, he tells me, laughing, he is not angry with me for the opposition I gave to his friends' propositions. The Ministers were all in a puzzle what to do; my advice was to go on as they were untill the King's state was found irrecoverable, and to treat his disease as a common severe illness, which rendered him incapable of giving any orders. They, however, chose to declare the King's state to Parliament, and to appoint a Regent. As Keeper of the Great Seal, the whole responsibility of the measure was thrown upon me, and I saw that among all the Councellors that were given the Queen, I should be the object of the malevolence of the Regent's party. I would not have taken the Great Seal under such circumstances, for I am not a brave man, but, having it, I could not reconcile it to myself to quit it.'

"I told him the public did ustice to the motives of his conduct, and look'd up to him as the stay of the Constitution and the firm support of the King's authority. He said what he had done deserved no praise, for there was no meri in no being a rascal, which he must have been if he had acted otherways than he did. 'My first care,' he added, 'was that the King should not be in the hands of the Regent's Ministers, and that no obstacle should be thrown in the way of his recovery, and, as I foresaw the objections they would raise to any symptoms of his recovery, I took the mode of proof out of their power; but still, with a Parliament at their back, what might they not do to prevent his recovery. They might so intimidate the Queen's Council that they would be afraid to declare the King convalescent, and if I stood forth as I should have done, at all hassards, in the King's support, an impeachment would probably have been my reward.'

'I expressed my own happiness and that of the Nation in his having been Chancellor at the time, and hoped I should never see the Great Seal in other hands. All this passed while we were at breakfast, which he made for me, and got up thrice to ring the bell for toast for me, not thinking that which was brought up was to my liking." 13½ pp.

CHARLES TOWNSHEND.

"When the peace of 1763 was made, Huske was busy collecting information respecting the new acquisitions in the City. He dined with Machray, where I was, and the conversation taking that turn, I spoke of the advantages to be derived from the Floridas. Huske soon after asked me to let him introduce me to Charles Townshend, and I became very intimate with him. I writ to him from France, and I have a letter from him in answer. He brought me home with him from the House of Lords after the debate upon the Cyder Bill, against which 40 Lords voted, which he thought a death blow to Lord Bute's administration; and as Lady Dalkeith and I sat at supper, which he never eat, he walked about the room, entertaining us with his observations upon what had passed that day, in his eccentrick manner.

"'The Burial is gone by, Knox (says he); Lord Pomfret and Lord Denby the two black staves men. Whose funeral is that? Lord Bute's. Then comes Lord Hilsborough, tolling the great bell—bum, bum.' Those three were the only lords that had declared themselves attach'd to Lord Bute in the debate, and their manner of speaking, which he took off, made the allusion highly ridiculous. 'Do you know (says he again) the meaning of the other speeches you heard? The Duke of Newcastle said, My Lord Bute, you thought it was an easy thing to govern this country thro' the King's favour. Now, I can tell you that altho' I had as full possession of the late King as you have of the present, I found it necessary to take the great connexions of the country with me, which you are endeavouring to break and oppose; but, take my word for it, you will find your seat at the Treasury an uneasy one if you dont change your plan, of which what passes here this night is only a specimen. Then Lord Mansfield. My Lord Bute, you gave me reason to think I should be of your Cabinet, but you have neglected me, and paid less attention to my recommendations than you ought. I will now shew you that I can punish you if I chuse to do it, but as I don't mean to break with you, but only to teach you to behave better for the future, I will bring you off now.'

"His manner of reading a book was curious. He turned over the leaves at the beginning extremely quick, first glancing at the middle of each page. 'Thats all preface,' says he. He then ran over the facts with more attention, and when he had gone through them, turn'd over the remainder of the leaves as he had done the beginning, saying, 'that's all conclusion, I can do that myself'; and he received oral information in the same manner, always confining the narrator to the fact. I was with him one morning at the time the Master of the Rolls was vacant by the death of Sir Thomas Clark. Mr. Yorke was then out of office, and Sir Fletcher Norton was Attorney-General. Mr. Grenville had offered Mr. Yorke his choice of being Attorney-General or Master of the Rolls, and he had not given his answer, but was to come that morning to Charles Townshend to consult him 'That is (says he to me) he wishes much to take one of them, and to throw the blame of his quitting the Opposition upon me. We are very good friends, but I'll be cursed if he makes me his stalking-horse to get into office. So go into the next room when he comes and stay till he is gone, and then I'll tell you what has pass'd.' When he call'd me in, he began with laughing most heartily. 'My poor friend (says he) came to me under great embarrassment for my advice, and I think I have sent him away ten times more embarrassed than he came. I soon found he meant to take one of the two, but could not decide which was the most certain road to the Great Seal, which his heart, I know, is set upon. So, to puzzle him effectually, I began with telling him that the government of this country must come to him and me. Lord Temple can't live a year, and then George Grenville must go up to the Lords, and there will be no one but me to manage the House of Commons. Lord Hardwick can't hold out long, and then you will be Earl of Hardwick, and must have the Great Seal when Northington dies or becomes incapable, or we may turn him out. Norton is no Chancery man, so if you take the Rolls, you will probably succeed to the Seal even if Northington should die before Lord Hardwick. Indeed, the Attorney-General is the more direct line to the Seal than the Rolls, and Norton is so useful and thoroughgoing [a] fellow in the House of Commons that if he should insist upon the Seal, a Minister dare not put him by, especially as it is the usual course for the Attorney-General to get it. Now, if you took the Attorney-General and sent Norton to the Rolls, you would be in the direct line, but then Norton, by being at the Rolls, would learn the Chancery business, and he is such a damned able fellow that he would presently make himself so useful to Northington that he would devolve most of the business upon him, and he would do it so well that every one would say he ought to be Chancellor in case Northington should die or retire; and, as the Rolls is for life, the Minister would have no power over him, and, if he refused him, he would go into opposition and plague his heart out, so he would probably put you by and give it to him.'

"Mr. Yorke acted as Charles Townshend expected. He could not decide, for he was no able man, and wanted firmness as well as judgment. He hesitated so long that Norton heard of what had been offer'd him, and came to George Grenville to complain that he should be at the disposal of Mr. Yorke, and desired to resign his office of Attorney-General. Mr. Grenville then gave Sewel the Rolls and thought no more of Charles Yorke, but Norton refused to continue Attorney-General unless the King should desire it, as his Ministers had used him so ill. He had an audience of the King accordingly, and upon his Majesty expressing his satisfaction in his services and his regard for him, he took the occasion to ask to have his son appointed Minister to the Swiss Cantons, to keep him abroad some years, and he had it, with 800*l* a year salary." 6½ pp

Lord Hillsborough.

"The account he gave of his resignation or rather dismission from the Board of Trade in 1765." Substantially the same as that on p. 263 above.

Marquis of Lansdown.

"1785, July 6.—My first acquaintance with the Marquis of Lansdown was at the time he was preparing his speech introductory of the motion for an Address of the House of Lords, approving the preliminaries of the Peace of Paris [Dec., 1762]. The acquisition of Florida and Louisiana was treated by Opposition as of no value to this country, and it happened that the Ministers had no information respecting those provinces but what they could derive from Charles Vouges and Mitchell's map of North America. I was lately returned from Georgia. . . . Dr. Francis having found me out, carried me to his then common friends, Lord Holland and Lord Lansdown. I drew up by Lord Lansdown's desire a defence of the preliminaries, and presented [it] for his Lordship's use, and Dr. Francis got a copy of it from me for Lord Holland, who was so well pleased with it (though he said it was numbers and not argument that he depended upon for carrying the Address) that he desired Dr. Francis to ask me if I wished for any office in the new acquisitions, as he meant to consider me; 'for' says Dr. F., 'he is a man that expects nobody to do anything for nothing, and it is his maxim to live and let live. I, however, declined the offer, because I could not endure to be obliged to a man who I heard so ill-spoken of everywhere.

"Lord Lansdown did not put me to the like trial, but he had frequent conversations with me, and I digested into a pretty large paper my remarks upon the defects in the Constitutions and modes of government of the North American provinces, and put it into his hands, he being then first Lord of Trade. A copy of this paper was afterwards given by Lord G[rosvenor] to the Earl of B[ute] who, his Lordship told me, observed upon it some days after that he thought we ought to set about reforming our old Colonies before we settled new ones. Lord L[ansdown] soon after gave me a commission to execute at Paris, where I went with Lord G[rosvenor] in June, 1763, of a pritty hassardous nature, and might have prevented me from ever returning. It was to procure for him, out of the French King's beaureaux, some of the maps and plans of the French islands and fortifications in the West Indies, and for my security, and as a means of introduction to the Comis, gave me a letter to Mr. Nevil, his Majesty's Minister at Paris, requesting him to take me under his protection and to assist me in the business he had charged me with. I proceeded so far in the execution of his Lordship's commission as to find out the person who had purloined a draught for the late Duke of Cumberland some time before, but he told me that, upon that draught being missed, or more probably upon the secret being promulged here, as we are very apt to boast of our achievements of that kind, all the plans and draughts were removed out of the reach of the lower orders of Comis, and nothing could now be obtained.

"I acquainted Lord Lansdown by letter with these circumstances and he wrote to me in return that it was now of no importance to him, for he was no longer at the head of the Board of Trade. I was prepared for the intelligence by what I had perceived before I left England; a strong jealoucy of his intriguing and ambitious spirit was entertained by both Lord Halifax and Lord Egremont, but especially by the latter, who was guided in all Colonial affairs by Governor Ellis, and whose influence Pownall could not endure. He therefore stimulated Lord Lansdown to underwork Lord Egremont, while Ellis incited the latter to thwart Lord Lansdown. I was consulted by both Ellis and Pownall, and saw into the whole intrigue. The Under-Secretary, Wood, stood neutre in this contest. Ellis had purchased his acquiescence in his influence with Lord Egremont by pointing out to him a valuable office in the new island [? Cape Breton], but when Wood discovered that he had taken a better to himself, which he did just before Lord Egremont's death, he broke with him, and I found them bitter enemies when I returned from France.

"My connexion with Mr. Grenville having now commenced, and as I could not think of leaving him, either in or out of office, to return to Lord Lansdown, I had but little intercourse with his Lordship while he held the Seals of the Northern Department, nor untill he brought those of the Southern and American Departments to Whitehall in 1782, where he found me in the twelfth year of my Under-Secretaryship, having served with four successive principals. His Lordship recognised me as an old acquaintance; he told me the American office was to be absorbed, as well as the Board of Trade, into the Southern Department, and that it was his intention to select all the ability and efficiency of the three offices, and form out of the whole one complete establishment; that, therefore, he could not yet say who he should keep or who remove, but that whoever went out should have ample compensation for their loss of office; that he should, in the meantime, depend upon me for the care of everything, and desired I would give him my opinion of the abilities and characters of every one in the office. I told his Lordship I had no wish to remain, having obtained his Majesty's permission to retire, but that my devotion to the King's service would oblige me to continue as long as his Lordship thought I might be useful, and that I should exert my best endeavours to do my duty. He then went away, desiring me to tell Fisher, who was coming to make his bow, not to come in his way—for he could not bear to see anybody that he meant to part with; a fair confession, I thought, of weakness of nerves, notwithstanding all his bustle and high tone. Pollock's terror, and Sir Stanier Porten's exclamation of 'God be thanked I am not to be under you again' made me feel happy in the reflection that I was at liberty to withdraw from him. Indeed, I had no reason to imagine that upon such a change as that which had taken place, I should be suffered, much less desired, to stay, for the zealous part I had always taken against the Americans, the pamphlets I had written, and my activity in office, had made me so obnoxious to the whole party, that none of them were likely ever to place confidence in me; . . . . I had requested Mr. G[renville] to take his Majesty's pleasure whether I should withdraw or continue if I was desired to stay, and he had acquainted me that I might withdraw if I chose to do so. Sir Richard Sutton had long ago told me that of all ministers, Lord Lansdown was the most difficult to please. He was never satisfied with what anyone did, or even with what he did himself, but altered and changed without end. As an instance, he mentioned his having prepared a draught of a despatch for Tuesday's mail. His Lordship directed him to alter and write it over again for his signing in the evening. He did so, and he then took it to consider further of, and altered it and sent it to him to write over again, which he did, and brought it to his Lordship, who told him that as it was then late, he should keep it till the next mail. He accordingly kept it till Friday, when he gave it to Sir Richard with fresh alterations, and he assured me; before the letter was sent off, it had been nine times transcribed, and the Friday night's mails were detained for it till two in the morning. My own experience soon proved to me that it was not without reason those who had served with him in office abhor'd him as a principal. I attended him by his orders, day after day, with a 'pressee' of the unanswered dispatches, without being able to obtain his instructions for preparing the answers, and, perceiving that I was looked upon by those who frequented the house rather as a spy than an Under-Secretary, I beg'd his Lordship to send for me when he chose to see me, and from thence refrained coming. On the following Sunday night, between ten and eleven o'clock, I received a note from his private secretary, desiring me to come immediately to Berkeley Square, and bring all the unanswered dispatches with me; to which I return'd for answer that I had never been requir'd to do any business on Sundays that did not require immediate attention; that I was then going to read Prayers to my family, according to my usual custom, but that I would attend his Lordship very early in the morning. He made me explain to him and Sir Guy Carleton the reason and purpose of every order and movement during the progress of the war in America, and I informed him of everything that was proposed to be done in the next campaign, with which he appeared to be much gratified; but he was so ill-informed of the geography of America that I was obliged to lead him thro' the map, and describe the country as I went along. Sir Guy Carleton, when we were alone, gave me to understand that the mode of conducting the war and the conditions of peace were to be confided to him, and in that belief he embarked. Not many days after Sir Guy had sailed, Lord Lansdown express'd to me his great apprehensions for the safety of Quebec, and his earnest wish that Sir [Guy] could have the command in that province. I told him, smiling, that I should rejoice to hear Washington had crossed the Lakes, for I was very sure Sir Guy would never suffer him to come back again; but his Lordship appearing deeply affected, and assuring me that all the secret intelligence agreed that the most positive directions had been given by France for the expedition, I brought him Mr. De Vergenes' intercepted letter to the Marquis Lucerne, instructing him to use his utmost endeavours to prevent any attack upon Canada. His Lordship was much surprised and embarrassed by that letter, but recovering his looks of apprehension, he went on to ask me about the means of transporting troops from New York and Charles Town to Quebec, and of giving Sir Guy the command there. I now clearly perceived the purpose of his affected apprehension for the safety of Quebec, and proposed to him a means of giving Sir Guy the command without disgracing Haldimand, which made him happier than I ever saw him. The next day I told him that, to prevent his suspecting some of those about him of divulging his secrets, I thought it right to inform him of what passed at Lord Hillsborough's table, where I had dined with a large company. Lord Denby, who was there, call'd to me aloud, 'Knox, what are you going to do with all the troops you are taking away from Charles Town and New York.' I said I knew nothing about taking any away. 'No,' says his Lordship, and then swore he knew they were to be taken away, for that one of the Cabinet told him so. Lord Lansdown appearing to take what I had told him good-humouredly, I added, 'Your Cabinet, my Lord, is too numerous for secrecy, and especially as there are some in it who were never in the habit of keeping secrets, and they cannot resist the pleasure of the display of their importance by communicating what they know, but for my own part, I must request the favour of your Lordship not to talk with me upon any matter with which I am not to be trusted, for I am so well acquainted with every part of America and with everything in it, that you cannot open to me ever so small a part of any plan without enabling me to penetrate the whole, and if it gets wind, as, from the state of your Cabinet, I think it must, I shall probably be fixed upon as the betrayer of your secrets.' He replied, laughing, that he was very much obliged to me for the caution I had given him, but he was very sure whatever I might come to the knowledge of would be very safe with me.

"A very particular conversation respecting the American Office which his Majesty was so gracious as to join me with Lord Lansdown in, at the Drawing Room one Sunday, led me to imagine his Majesty would be pleased with my continuing with his Lordship, and therefore I determined to do so, and upon the following Tuesday, when Mr. P[ownall] was lamenting to his Lordship that I was not to continue, and his Lordship exclaimed that he hoped I had no intention of leaving him, I bowed consent, but the next morning I saw Mr. Dundass carry in Mr. Ord to his Lordship, and on Thursday I found Mr. Ord in my room at the office, not one word having passed between his Lordship and me upon the subject after Tuesday. He could have no other motive for acting with this duplicity towards me but the gratification of his own mind, as I had so early expressed my wish to retire; however, when he came to the office, he was so good as to tell me that Mr. Ord did not come to succeed me, for that I had no successor, my office being suppressed, and assured me pathetically my whole behaviour had been the most proper he ever knew, and particularly the pains I had taken to inform Nepean had made a most lasting impression upon his mind, and that I might depend upon being amply compensated by Parliament for the loss of my office, and that, if I wished for any mark of the King's favour, he would request it for me. I made my acknowledgments for his Lordship's kind expressions, but said that his Majesty's goodness to me had been so great that I could not think of making any request for further pecuniary favours; that were I restored to the possession of my estate, I should have humbly solicited an honorary mark of his Majesty's approbation of my conduct, but that as I could not be certain of having any considerable income to subsist myself and family, except what I derived from his Majesty's bounty, it would ill become me to ask for an honor. His Lordship assured me he would make a faithful representation to his Majesty of what he was pleased to call my very proper sentiments; but I fear he kept that promise as ill as he did the other he made me, of considering me when the Parliamentary allowances should be settled for the secretaries and clerks of the suppressed offices. He was then at the head of the Treasury, and gave to every dismissed clerk his full salary; to Mr. Cumberland, who had been only two years Secretary of the Board of Trade, the whole emoluments of that office, 750*l* per annum, clear of all deductions, and to Mr. Fisher, who had been my colleague only six months as Under-Secretary, 400*l*, but he passed me over without notice, only directing Mr. Rose to tell me that his Majesty had been so generous to me that there was no occasion to ask Parliament for any allowance for me; thus appropriating his Majesty's bounty, extended to me in consideration of the loss of my American offices, as a compensation for my being deprived of that of Under-Secretary, also, after twelve years service in it." 11½ p.

IV. MISCELLANEOUS PAPERS.

Marquis de Montcalm.

1. Extract, in English, of M. de Montcalm's letter of April 4, 1757, to M. Berryer, with note by Knox. "This advice of Montcalm's made the French at the Peace insist on the Isles of St. Pierre and Miquelon."

2. Translation of Montcalm's letter of Oct. 1, 1758, to M. Berryer.

3. Translation of Montcalm's letter of Aug. 24, 1759, to M. de Molé, president of the Parliament of Paris, from the Camp before Quebec. [These letters, which were published in 1777, have been generally considered spurious.]

Commerce.

[1763 ? *].—A paper by Knox, headed "Hints relative to our Commerce." The main points are as follows:—As the Treaty of Peace has left Great Britain in possession of several of the French Colonies, and given security to her former possessions in North America, an increase of her American trade may be expected. By a greater demand on the part of her Colonists, England's manufactures will be increased and more employment given to her people, but "as her Colonies are part of her Empire, any gain which is made by the individuals who carry on the direct trade with them cannot be said to be an addition to the national wealth. The trade between two counties in England may be very profitable to the individuals who transact it, and yet the Nation cannot be the richer for it. Our trade with foreign nations is the only traffic by which the nation, as well as individuals, can be enriched." Foreign trade divides itself into two branches, export and carrying. British exports have been increased by the war, but the carrying trade has been ruined. For although our fleets were everywhere triumphant, the enemy's privateers exposed our merchant ships to such risks that the ships of neutral nations could be hired at a much cheaper rate, and the loss of this trade occasioned a prodigious diminution in the number of our shipping, a consideration of great importance when our very existence as a state depends upon the superiority of our naval power.

* Apparently written shortly after the conclusion of the Peace of Paris. See also letter to Granville, p. 89 above.

As regards the effect of the war upon France, her maritime trade being entirely ruined by it, the State has been deprived of almost all revenues from imports and exports, and has been reduced to borrowing for the expenses of the war. The same cause which obliged her to go deeper into debt having deprived her of security for her creditors, foreigners refused to trust her with their money, and therefore the money in the country was all the State had to avail itself of. If they had been carrying on only a defensive war, this would not have so much mattered, but the offensive war in Germany entailed payments for the subsistence of the armies there, no part of which payments returned to the French people. To make her money last the longer, France stopped payment of foreign bills and of the interest on her old debt, and thus, with what she got from her people, raised money for the carrying on of the war that year. Next year she resorted to the same methods, and with the same success, "for the people generously gave her their all," but it was impossible to continue to support her armies on such a footing, and therefore her ministers judged it best to accept the conditions offered by England. England, on the other hand, seemed to flourish under the pressure of the war, for her conquests increased her trade, and with it her revenue. But her ministers "are not dazzled with the splendour of this false riches" knowing that the money they have been spending was borrowed and that the nation must one day be able to re-imburse it or be utterly undone. By the war with Spain, we have lost an influx of nearly a million per annum in specie, and by the attack on Portugal, are likely to lose a million and a half more.

The distress of France is greater, but temporary; the burdens of England not so pressing but perpetual; therefore France is more likely to re-establish her foreign commerce than England, and will try to indemnify herself for the loss of her colonies by wresting from England her foreign trade. If France can undersell our manufactures in foreign markets and get the carrying trade into her hands, our acquisitions in America will be but poor compensation for our loss. To prevent this, England must reduce her expenses, be "extremely economical in the receipt of her Revenue," and lighten her burdens by distributing them amongst the several members of the Empire. Suggestions for economy in collecting the revenue, and simplifying the assessing of taxes. The writer had meant to urge the taking over of the care of the poor by Government, "but as the great utility of such a regulation is fully pointed out in an excellent pamphlet published this day," he will only declare his opinion "that the collection and disbursement of the Poor rates are subject to so many abuses that a general tax, laid and collected by Government, though no heavier than the rate paid by the lowest rated parish in the Kingdom, would not only maintain every really necessitous person " but leave a considerable surplus ; government officials being so much more controlled by adverse criticism than those appointed by the people.

The paper ends by discussing how far Ireland is able to assist Great Britain in supporting her necessary burdens, and by what methods she may be induced to give her assistance. 22 pp. 2 Copies.

On the Fortifications at Cherbourg.

[After 1763].—Notes for a letter to a newspaper, defending the right of the English Government to protest against the fortifying of Cherbourg, on the ground that—while repair of damages and augmenting defensive works are pacific measures which no nation has a right to take offence at—" the construction of works in time of peace which can have no use but to give an advantage in time of war, is a direct avowal of intended hostility." 7 pp.

Endorsed by Knox, " not published."

Revenue.

1764.—Discussing the various methods for employing a surplus in the National revenue, and advocating the granting of bounties upon exports in time of peace, which, ceasing at the breaking out of hostilities, would leave free an additional war revenue without increased taxation. 12 pp.

Marriage Act.

[1772, April *].—" A speech intended to be spoken upon the Introduction of Mr. Fox's bill to repeal the Marriage Act."—Urging the importance of parental control to prevent premature and unwise marriages, and advocating the age of 21 in men and 18 in women as the period of emancipation from such parental restraint. 13 pp.

American Congress.

1774.—Abstracts, by Knox, of the Resolutions of Congress, 14 Oct., 1774; the petition to the King, 26 Oct.; and a second petition, undated; with marginal notes upon the contents. 8 pp. [See S. P. America and West Indies, vol. 278, f. 471.]

Population of the American Colonies.

[1774 ?].—" Number of [European] inhabitants in North America " :—

Nova Scotia	17,000.	Virginia	300,000.
Connecticutt (1774)	191,392.	Pensylvania	no figures.
Massachusetts	400,000.	Maryland (1762)	114,332.
Rhode Island	35,939.	Georgia	18,000.
New York	148,000.	N. Jersey	77,000.
New Hampshire	100,000.	S. Carolina	60,000.

* Fox brought in his Bill on April 7, 1772.

A rough calculation below brings the total to 1,911,000, but the items do not exactly tally with those above. Also Maryland is omitted and Connecticutt given twice. The population of Pensylvania is put at 300,000. 1 p.

PLAN for Carrying on THE WAR

1774.—Suggestions by Knox for the distribution of troops. Noted by him as "delivered to Lord Dartmouth, 1775." 1 p.

CANADA

[1775, April].—Plan for Canada, in Knox's hand, and noted by him as presented when Burgoyne went out. Suggestions for giving commissions to Canadian officers, their men to be raised by corvees from the Militia for a short term of service, and for forming a Roman Catholic regiment in Canada, in which, it is believed, Irish Roman Catholics would readily enlist. 2 Copies. 2½ pp. each.

PLAN OF THE WAR.

[1776, March *].—Arguments to show that in the American War the British have "begun at the wrong end"; that the Southern provinces, being easier both to acquire and retain, should have been first attacked and reduced, and thus formed a base for attacking the Northern ones. With suggestions for the methods to be employed. 5 pp.

Also

Another paper on the same subject. 7 pp.

INSTRUCTIONS for LORD AND GENERAL HOWE.

1776, May 6.—Orders and Instructions. Copy 10 pp. [Another copy calendared in Report on Dartmouth MSS. ii., p. 417.]

Also

"Additional and separate Instructions for the same. Same date. Copy. 3 pp

PROJECT FOR A SETTLEMENT with the Colonies.

[1776, summer of ?].—After showing that the Colonies, in treating with Great Britain, are at a great disadvantage as compared with Foreign States, seeing that whatever terms are given, when they have once returned to their allegiance, they can have no security for their fulfilment but England's good faith, Knox goes on to propose an Act to the following effect:—

That whereas it is only reasonable that all British subjects who partake of the advantages of the constitution should contribute in due proportion to charges incurred for the general good:

And whereas the annual charge of the army, fleet, &c., and of such civil expenses as concern the whole empire amounts to about 4 millions, exclusive of Ireland:

* Cf. Knox's proposal on page 259 above.

And whereas the population of Great Britain is computed at 8 millions, and that of the British provinces on the coast of the Atlantic in North America to 2½ millions, and that, therefore, the just proportion to be contributed by the latter would be five-sixteenths, or 1,250,000*l.* (this still leaving the whole burden of the Public Debt upon the people of Great Britain): Nevertheless, as it has ever been the desire of Parliament to promote the prosperity of the Provinces, and because "very great advantages are derived to the Inhabitants of Great Britain from their exclusive commerce with the said Provinces, which commerce it is intended shall always remain confined to Great Britain as heretofore, or carried on under such regulations and restraints as Parliament shall impose," it is proposed that "the sum to be contributed by the said provinces shall be no more than 8 per cent. of the rated value of all commodities exported from the same in every year," which, at the highest rated value of the exports in the past, would not exceed 300,000*l.* for several years to come, i.e., not one thirteenth part of the aforesaid charge of four millions. 12 pp. Imperfect

BROOKLYN.

[1776, August].—Minutes of letters from Sir Peter Parker and Sir Henry Clinton, apparently relating to the attack on Brooklyn in August, 1776. They explain how by reason of contrary winds and getting aground, the frigates destined for the service were prevented from assisting in the attack which was made "on the 28th (sic.)." 2 pp.

LORD GEORGE GERMAIN.

[1778, February ?].—Draft by Lord George Germain of part of a letter to Sir William Howe, concerning the surrender of Burgoyne's army, and Sir William's desire to quit the command. With many alterations in Knox's hand, and endorsed by him: "Lord G. G.'s paragraph for a letter. . . altered by me in the letter upon that occasion." 3 pp.

SIR HENRY CLINTON.

1778-9.—Minute of orders sent to Clinton in 1778 and 1779. With note by Knox that it is to be copied in "a large black hand," and to be kept secret. 6½ pp.

PEACE OR WAR.

1779, October 14.—Paper dated and endorsed as above. States that as the French and Spanish fleets will have 36 ships of the line, while Parker and Arbuthnot have only 23, it will be necessary, "to give us equality," to send out 13 ships of the line at once. If this cannot be done, Spain should be detached from France by the offer of West Florida, and even, if necessary, by a surrender of our intercourse with the Musquito Shore. 6½ pp.

Peace Prospects.

1781, January.—Paper endorsed by Knox "Ideas" on above date. Urging that the negotiations for peace should be, not between Congress and the British commanders, but between "the people at large" and persons with plenary powers, who derive nothing from the war, and expect their reward from the making of peace. As regards Europe, the Emperor and Russia can best help against the House of Bourbon. The Emperor, being ambitious and poor might be prevailed on by money, and some advantages at the expense of the Dutch. Russia is desirous of a port in the Mediterranean; Minorca would be highly acceptable to her, and in her hands would be "an everlasting cause of jealousy between her and France and Spain," and consequently would bind her to England. This alliance would draw in Denmark and perhaps Sweden, and the Dutch might also be admitted. So formidable a league would impel France and Spain to treat, "and then would be our time to lay our plan deep for reducing their naval strength and augmenting our own." Spain might be pursuaded to yield her part of St. Domingo in exchange for the restitution of the Floridas, and with the Spanish part of the Island in our hands we might master the French garrisons before they could be strengthened from France. This great point being gained, the exchanges with France might proceed upon the foot of the Treaty of Paris or of the uti possidetis. 6 pp.

Georgia and the Carolinas.

1781, June.—Arguments in support of the view that the people of Georgia and the Carolinas are favourable to England, and that their holding back from joining the King's forces is the effect of intimidation, not of disloyalty. 8½ pp. Endorsed "Defence to be made in the House of Commons."

East India Company.

1784.—Notes on "the occasion of the East India Company desiring to borrow 1,500,000*l*."—i.e., "the failure of the arrivals expected in the course of the last year." 1½ pp.

National Debt.

1785, Oct. 4.—Notes and calculations, endorsed by Knox. "Materials: National Debt, 4 Oct., 1785." Drafts, much corrected. 29 pp.

Proposals [by William Knox?].

1787, Dec. 9.—Paper (stated by Knox to have been sent to Mr. Rose on this date, to be laid before Mr. Pitt), concerning the evils of emigration, and offering to conduct an undertaking for the "Colonizing" of the Hebrides, Orkneys and Shetland islands, and the unimproved tracts in Wales. 3½ pp.

Slave Trade.

1788, May 25.—Notes for introductory remarks on making a motion in relation to the Slave Trade in the House of Commons—defending the trade on the ground that negroes that were slaves in Africa are better off when brought to America, their temporal condition being no worse, and their spiritual state (owing to the opportunity of receiving religious instruction) much better; but praying for information as to what has been done by Government and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel to render their condition more comfortable and " to remove all reproach for retaining them in servitude." 4 pp.

Florida.

[Undated.]—" Hints respecting the Settlement and Culture of East Florida." Describing the soil, vegetation and climate, suggesting the cultivation of cotton as its special product (as being " the material for a great variety of manufactures," and one with which the market cannot easily be overstocked); also of indigo and silk, which would succeed much better than in Georgia, owing to the absence of frost. Florida is said to be not only in nearly the same latitude as Egypt, but to have much the same climate and soil. 19½ pp.

Also: Another paper, partly to the same effect as the above, but proposing an alteration of its boundaries, the importation of Christian Greeks from the Archipelago to populate it, and provisions for government, granting of lands, &c., especially deprecating grants on a large scale.

Ends.—" Pen's and Lord Baltimore's success in colonizing has tempted many people to become American proprietors, not considering that Pensylvania became considerable by being made a sanctuary for the persecuted of all religions, the Roman Catholic excepted, in very zealous times, and that Maryland is the only colony where Roman Catholics are entitled to the rights of men." 11 pp.

Exports.

[Undated.]—Advocating the abolition of the export duties charged on goods, both foreign and of home manufacture, sent from Great Britain to the Colonies and the United States. 2 pp.

Hemp and Flax.

[Undated.]—" Reasons for granting a bounty on the importation of hemp and flax from the British Colonies." At present nearly all the hemp used in England is exported from Russia. The balance of trade with that country is " near five hundred thousand pounds against us," the value of the imports being nine hundred thousand pounds and that of the exports thither only five. Hemp being absolutely necessary for shipping, England is at Russia's mercy, and also at that of Denmark, whose forts command the Sound. When Sweden, in 1703, refused to let us have any naval stores save in her own ships, Parliament granted a bounty on the importation of such stores from the colonies, with the result that tar, pitch and turpentine were presently brought thence in such quantities as almost wholly to supply the demand and were sold at one-third of the price formerly paid to Sweden.

Hemp and flax are now being grown in the colonies, and if a bounty were offered on their import into England, we might soon be independent of Russia, and might also check the colonists from manufacturing, for "there is no other method of preventing a free people from manufacturing their own materials than by purchasing those materials and giving such a price for them as shall afford them a compensation for their labour in raising them, and enable them to purchase your manufactures." Draft. 4 pp.

American Produce.

[Undated.]—Notes on the consumption of sugar and molasses in the northern and southern provinces of North America, and especially upon the danger of allowing corn distilleries to be set up there, whereby the West Indian planters would have to pay in specie instead of in rum (as they mostly do at present) for lumber and provisions and would have nothing for a return freight. 5½ pp.

The Currency.

[Undated.]—Notes on the Proposition of the Board of Trade "to take away the lawful tender from all paper currency in the Colonies." 16 pp.

Also

Another short paper on the same subject. 1⅓ pp.

V. PAPERS RELATING TO PRESENTS TO THE INDIANS.

Precis.

1775–1779.—Precis of orders for sending out Indian presents from England 1775 to 1779 inclusive. Total value (except 500*l.* sent to Nova Scotia in 1779), 87,484*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.* 9 pp.

John Stuart, Superintendant for the Southern district, to William Knox.

1777, March 10.—The competition between himself and the rebel agents for the friendship of the Indians has been very great. Mr. Galphin's weight with them has been added to by the plentiful supply of goods, arms, &c., brought over from the French islands. Besides giving and promising them large presents, Mr. Galphin has assured the Cussita Indians that they "could have no trade from hence," all the London ships being intercepted by the [American] cruisers. The Chehaws have attacked and defeated "a party of the Georgia scouts, and returned home just at the time that the English traders arrived with a plentiful supply of goods, which determined them all to engage in his Majesty's cause. Yet, if they should be hard pressed, they would probably attempt to make their peace with the rebels, and therefore posts should be established in their country, where supplies could be kept and where their wives and children might find protection upon any emergency. Extract. 2½ pp.

William Knox to Gen. Haldimand.

1781, April 7.—Sends invoices and bills of lading of a supply of presents for the Indians according to the demands received, save that a considerable reduction has been made in the total amount. The Indian officers who prepared the demands gave no estimate of the cost, and upon computation the three lists were found to amount to little short of 55,000*l*, without reckoning the charges of freight and delivery. Mr. Guy Johnson's demand was almost half of the whole, although he has not "near so great" a number of Indians to deal with as Mr. De Peister. "It should seem he imagined the importance of his services would be rated by the greatness of the expence he put the public to." Col. Campbell's packages, which will be under his Excellency's immediate direction, Col. Johnson's for Niagara, and Major de Peister's for Detroit, have all been marked, for convenience sake, with distinctive initials, but the Treasury Commissioners leave it to his Excellency to make any alterations in their destination which he may choose.

The supply being very ample, their Lordships hope no expenses will be incurred by purchases in the country. 4½ pp.

Enclosing:

List of presents sent for the Indians at Niagara, including pieces of many sorts of cloth and cotton materials, linens, blankets, sheeting, laces, coloured threads and ribbons, "very gaudy feathers," combs, sponges, needles, looking glasses, cutlery, arms and ammunition, shirts and shifts, hats, vermilion, tobacco, kettles, pipes and handmills.

Also in silver: medals with the King's bust, arm bands and gorgets with the King's arms, wrist bands, shirt buckles and earrings. 3 pp. [The other two lists are wanting.]

General Haldimand to Lord George Germain.

1781, Oct. 23. Quebec.—Believes that the best way to control the expence of the Indian department would be to appoint some person of rank, influence, knowledge, activity and perfect honour to superintend the Northern Confederacy, and to annually visit, examine, and if necessary make reforms at the several posts. Sir John Johnson in every respect fulfils the above requirements, and although he formally declined the office, he is now, "in consideration of the ruinous state of his private affairs," willing to undertake it. If promoted to the rank of Brigadier General, he would have command of the Lieutenant Governors and Superintendants, who are too apt to consider themselves independent with regard to the expenses they incur.

"It is not in nature" that Haldimand himself, far away from these posts, can have personal knowledge of the contingencies which amount to such amazing sums, and when "after writing volumes upon the subject of economy," he is told that such and such expenses are absolutely necessary, he must submit, or stand by the consequences. Copy. 4½ pp.

William Knox to General Haldimand.

1782, April 23. Whitehall.—The goods for presents to the Indians, supplied by direction of the Treasury Commissioners, have been shipped on the Amazon and Maria. The greatest care has been taken in providing them of the best quality, and the estimate for Niagara "was made out with Sir John Johnson's assistance, and chiefly taken from Col. Campbell's demand, Mr. Pollard having declined giving any information upon my rejection of his proposal of laying a profit upon the cost of the goods which he computed would amount to about six thousand pounds and dividing it between us." This shows the danger of employing traders to do business for government, as their own interest "suppresses all feelings for the public service." Draft. 4 pp.

General Haldimand to the Right Hon. Thomas Townshend.

1782, Oct. 28. Quebec.—Sends Sir John Johnson's general estimate of Indian presents for the ensuing year, and praises his zeal in entering upon his office. Encloses a copy of Mr. Knox's letter of April 23. As Mr. Pollard is on the spot they will be able "to hear the parties, and determine upon the merits of the proposal recommended by the Superintendent and Inspector-General of the Indian department." Copy. 1¼ pp.

Evan Nepean to William Knox.

1782, Dec. 17. Whitehall.—Sends a copy of Gen. Haldimand's letter to Mr. Secretary Townshend and of two papers relative to the Indian presents supplied by Knox, and desires him to state fully, for the Secretary's information, such reasons as he may have to offer "for justifying the charges which appear on the face of the account upon several articles to be much above the usual price." 1 p.

Memorial of William Knox to the Treasury Commissioners.

[End of 1782].—In the spring of 1781, having, by order of the then Board of Treasury, purchased a supply of presents for the Indians, he was directed to erase from his invoices the customary charges made at the several offices for fees upon the warrants, as their Lordships wished to regulate these fees before paying them. He has since then sent out two further supplies of presents, and the claims of the several officers are as follows :—

Upon the 4 warrants of June 19, 1781, sum 38743*l.* 7*s.* 5*d.*
Treasury fee, 5*l.* 12*s.* each	22	8	0
Entering Clerk in Pay office	16	16	0
Paymaster, 2 gns. per 1,000	60	7	6
Controller of army accounts for examination and report on the invoices	18	18	0
Total ...	£118	9	6
Upon warrant dated Oct. 28, 1781, sum 7721*l.*
Fees [details given]	28	3	0
Upon 4 warrants dated Aug. 7, 1782, sum 63861*l.* 17*s.* 7*d.*
Fees [details given]	198	8	0

For all these fees the officers hold Knox responsible, and he therefore prays for a warrant for the whole or such part thereof as their Lordships shall think fit. Draft. 4 pp.

WILLIAM MOLLESON to WILLIAM KNOX.

1784, June 13. Upper Brook Street.—Informing him—in case he inclines to be present—that Lieut. Houghton is to be examined by the Comptrollers on the morrow at one o'clock, relative to the Indian presents shipped in the spring of 1782. 1 p.

Memorial of WILLIAM KNOX to the TREASURY COMMISSIONERS.

[No date.]—Explaining the way in which it had been customary to proceed in the provision of money for the Indian presents and the distribution of the "Bills of Parcels" for them. Draft. 3 pp.

THE MANUSCRIPTS

OF

CORNWALLIS WYKEHAM-MARTIN,

OF THE HILL, PURTON, WILTS, ESQUIRE.

LADY CORNWALLIS to her son, the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

[1761], April 18. London.—". . . We had the satisfaction of having Lord Brome arrive safe and in perfect health on Tuesday last. Harry came with them as far as Munster, but was not very well, and they persuaded him to remain there three or four days longer. . . .

"We talk here of peace, however I doubt our military young folks will stay but a very short time with us, for it is supposed all things will be carried on with the same spirit till the peace is actually concluded, indeed appearances confirms that supposition, as our expedition sailed since these strong reports of peace. Nothing with any authority has been heard of them since, which is rather surprising, as it is imagined they have been in Quiberon Bay these ten days.

"I shall be very impatient to know how you like your new command and your new shipmates . . ."

CHARLES, 1ST EARL CORNWALLIS, to his son, the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1761, May 3. London.—"General Parslow going to Gibraltar gives us an opportunity, as we hope, of sending letters to you by a safe hand. I am very sorry that I must relate to you a misfortune that has befallen our family, which has given us all the most distressing affliction; your poor brother Harry, who was on his road, coming home from Germany, was seized with a violent fever, which occasioned his death. We believe it was contracted by the great fatigues he underwent the latter end of the campaign, and lying frequently out in the open air. But misfortunes that it pleases God to send must be submitted to, and I hope time will relieve our present affliction. Your brother Lord Brome is at present here, and seems to be in perfect health, and a great comfort to us all, as he seems to be a very promising young man, and, if he lives, likely to be a great blessing and of great benefit to his family. He is got to be Lieutenant Colonel to an old regiment, which is in Germany, so that he must go again there. But peace is so much talked of, and so much believed, that I hope his stay there will not be long. I don't know whether the word peace is an agreeable word to you seamen. But it is a happy circumstance that you have got the step of being a lieutenant before it takes place, and I hope and believe, you are very likely to do well in your profession, and be a comfort to us all. Your brother Jemmy is at Oxford and seems to do very well there. Molly is very well. We are very glad to hear from you whenever we can."

LORD BROME to the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1761, May 4. Hill Street.—"My father has certainly sent you the melancholy account of poor Harry; you cannot imagine what a shock it has been to me, and to us all; but as these kinds of misfortunes admit of no remedy, we must try to bear up against them as well as we can. Life is so very uncertain, and happiness so seldom to be met with, that I question very much whether the loss of life can be looked upon as a very great misfortune; but the loss of a brother and friend that I loved so sincerely as I did my dear Harry, is a most shocking and irreparable stroke. My only comfort is in you and Jemmy. I am vastly happy to hear so good accounts of you; I dare say you will one day or other make a figure in your profession. All I can say is, that nobody can love you better than I do, that I shall always endeavour to prove myself worthy of your esteem and friendship, that I shall at all times and on all occasions do all in my power to serve and promote you, and that half the contents of my purse will be always at your service. Excuse my writing any more on this melancholy occasion."

EARL CORNWALLIS to his son, the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1761, June 27. Culford.—". . . I am very sensible it must be more expensive to you now you are a lieutenant. I am very willing to allow what is necessary to you, and would by no means have you live worse than your brother officers. I suppose you will not be able to do with less than a hundred a year. . . . We had lately a letter from Lord Brome. He was within two days of joining the army. They had not then begun any operations. At the taking Belle Isle, the marines behaved very well and gained much honour. They talk now of some other expedition going on. We have had a French minister at London for three weeks. It was thought his coming was sure to produce peace, but as far as the public can see, it does not seem to go on very fast. . . ."

The SAME to the SAME.

1761, August. London.—"Your mother has wrote you so long a letter that I shall only add a line to testify my sincere joy at your happy escape in so dangerous an engagement as you have had. I am very glad you have seen such a close engagement, as it may be of use to you, and you will gain reputation by having been an officer in a ship that has behaved so well. I have desired Lord Carysfort, brother to Captain Proby, to recommend you to him, though I dare say the Captain would naturally be kind to you. I desire you to make my compliments to him. I have but one piece of advice to give you at present, which is to endeavour to keep company with the captains of ships and your superior officers as much as you can. It will certainly be of advantage to you. Pray make my compliments to Admiral Saunders, with my thanks for his kindness to you, likewise my compliments to General Parslow, who is a very good sort of man; and if this letter gets to you before my letter to Colonel Edhouse, tell him I am infinitely obliged to him for his kindness in writing us word of your safety."

The Same to the Same.

1761, September 1, London.—"I hope before you receive this, you will have received a letter from your mother and me, congratulating you upon your safety, after the sharp engagement you had been in. It was owing to Colonel Edhouse's kindness in writing the moment the Thunderer came to Gibraltar that we were relieved from our anxiety about you. It is said the Stag is come in, we expect by that ship a letter from you. You can't imagine the pleasure we had in hearing of your safety. I don't know whether this engagement of the Thunderer may occasion her coming home sooner than might have been intended, but, be that as it will, I wish you all happiness. In my letter, joined to your mother's, I recommended much to you to keep, as much as you can, company with the captains of ships, and your superiors. I can't help repeating that recommendation to you, as I am very sure it will be of the greatest advantage to you, in every particular, to your future promotions, to your good character in your profession; and the knowledge the Admiral and Captains have of you is a very essential thing for you, as in all professions the character superior officers give of young men is all in all. Your brother Lord Brome has found the benefit of it; he is known to every General in the army he serves in, and has their universal good word and approbation, which has helped him with ease to be a Lieutenant Colonel very young, and will carry him on with applause. I had a letter from him yesterday, he was very well. Peace is talked of very much, and it is said a week will determine either peace or another year's war.

"Your brother Jemmy has been ill, very oddly, the use of his limbs taken away. It came gradually, he complaining a little for five or six days, growing worse, until he was quite lame, and had no use of his fingers. He is better, and his physician assures us there is no doubt of his being well again before it is long. I came now to town in expectation of paying my duty to our new Queen. But the wind is perverse and contrary, so that we don't know when she may arrive, and Lord Anson will be very cautious, having such a charge. I wish you all happiness, and all I can do to promote it you may be sure of."

James Cornwallis to his brother, the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1762, June 23. Bristol.—Announcing their father's death.

Elizabeth Countess Cornwallis to the Hon. William Cornwallis.

[1762], July 13. Hill Street.—"The heavy affliction that has lately happened to us, has made me uncapable of writing to you of some time. My happiness is for ever gone, but it is in all my children's power to lighten my misery by behaving well in their several stations. I have no doubt of having this comfort. I am left by your father's will guardian to Jemmy and you. Molly told you that I had applied to Lord Halifax for a sloop for you, and yesterday I had a letter to acquaint me you were appointed to command the Wasp sloop. Upon enquiry I find it is at Plymouth, therefore I hope I shall have the satisfaction of seeing you soon at home, as I suppose a notification will immediately be sent to you from the Admiralty. Till that comes I imagine you are to take no notice of the information. . . . . As it is of great consequence to you to get the rank of Captain before a peace, I don't question that you will be so careful in your conduct in this command as it will make it easy for your friends to get you soon to be a Post Captain. You are very young, but I hope have sense and prudence enough to consider your whole future happiness consists in getting an established character of a good officer, and a sober man You will then rise by your own merit, which is ten thousand times more satisfactory than the doing it by the assistance of friends, supposing you should have them, which is not always the case. Not a word of this is said from the least suspicion I have of you, but comes purely from the anxious anxiety of my heart for your doing well."

The Same to the Same.

1763, May 5. [London].—"Your last letter was received with sorrow. I am afraid I ought to call it a foolish sorrow, as my reason tells me the sooner you go the better your chance, both in point of health and preferment. I shall be glad to hear you have reached Portsmouth and hope they will not detain you long there.

"I have sent the letter to Admiral Tyrrel, and shall make all the enquiries in my power who is to be the other Admiral employed in the West Indies. . . .

"Mr. Wilks refused to be bailed, and as the legality of the commitment was a nice point to decide upon, the judges of the Court of Common Pleas ordered him back again to the Tower, and said they would give their opinions on Friday next. People are impatient for their decision; many imagine he will then be discharged. He made an excellent speech, with great respect to the Court before whom he was, and what pleased me most, with great respect of His Majesty, to whom I think he has been very wanting. I believe he is thoroughly convinced nobody approves of anything that looks like disrespect to the King. He treated the Ministry with his usual contempt. Tom Scot dines and sups with him, and says he is the merriest gentleman he ever saw."

The Same to the Same.

[1763, May], Saturday, the 7th.—"Poor Mrs. Harding has lost her son in the East Indies; he died of a fever. I hope you will be so careful of yourself as to do all in your power to make the West Indies more lucky to your mother. . . .

"I saw by an advertisement in our morning paper that the Craftsman of to-day had everything in it relating to Mr. Wilks, upon which I have sent for it, in order to enclose it to you. There are some misrepresentations in the morning paper in excuse for the Secretaries of State, but not very material ones, perhaps the Craftsman may not be more correct. After positively saying there were some misrepresentations, it is very possible the paper may be right and I wrong. I did not remember to have heard that the close confinement which was ordered by the warrant was ever mentioned in the Court of Common Pleas, and then they could be no judges whether the warrants were proper or not, but my attention might be faulty, as you know, when I am not much interested, is often the case. . . . Everybody is going or gone out of town, and we poor souls who inhabit this place all the year round are quiet kind of animals, [so] that all noise and quarrelling will soon subside."

With Postscript by Lady Molly, that the Craftsman is not to be had, so they send the newspaper instead.

The Same to the Same.

[1763], May 10. London.—"I have this moment received your letter and am glad you are arrived at Spithead. How poor I am in joys when I can say I am glad you are at a place that is farther distant than you before were, and that it is with the hopes of your going still farther, and what is worse to a place I dread; but I trust you will for my sake keep your blood cool as you know into what sort of a climate you are going. I have sent a note to Mr. Adair to acquaint him with your being at Spithead, and after having expressed my earnest wishes that you might not be detained there, have desired him to acquaint me as soon as he knew whether you were to be dispatched directly, or to wait for to convoy the transports. You are apt to suspect my saying too much always; I assure you I mentioned nothing from you but only that you were at Spithead, the rest was only my own curiosity, as he knew what strong reasons I had to wish you might be dispatched immediately.

"Your brother has just sent me word he is come to town; I have not yet seen him. I was told this morning that the prosecution was begun in the King's Bench against Mr. Wilks, and that he had been summoned to appear before them to-day; whether he did or what passed there I have not yet heard. They say Lord G. Sackville looks melancholy upon its being determined he is not to be Secretary of War; some other place it is supposed he will have, but he had set his heart upon that particular post. I received a letter from Jemmy at the same time with yours; he is impatient to hear you have begun your voyage. He says the Oxford politicians are angry at Wilks's being discharged, and think he deserves a halter. I wish all my friends would keep their opinions to themselves upon that affair."

Elizabeth Countess Cornwallis to the Hon. William Cornwallis.

[1763, May ?]—Mr. Winkley has not yet brought the lease of the house, and heard yesterday that the old lady has married a Scotch officer of nineteen years of age. "The lady is turned of 69. She had an estate come to her about six months ago of 1,500*l* a year." Mr. Winkley says she cannot refuse to let me her house, "but what dependance can you have upon such a foolish old woman . . . There was to be a meeting last night at Lord North's to consider what was to be done about the Middlesex election. I suppose the result was put in execution in the House of Commons to-day."

Postscript by Lady Molly.—"I am obliged to you for your good wishes in a certain affair. You know my sentiments upon that head; prudence and a horror of dependence are the inducements. How this will end I cannot pretend to guess, he has so far obtained his wish in having had a sight of me; how his inclinations may now stand I know not. . . . You may depend upon my not exposing myself in showing too great eagerness.

"I was at Almack's last night, and such sort of doings which you will say pish, was I to give you account."

The Same to the Same.

1763, August 7. London.—"It was vastly kind and good in you to remember your poor old mother, in catching an opportunity of letting her hear you were safe and well as far as Barbadoes on your voyage. I received your letter dated from off that place the 23rd of June, on the 5th of August, with as much satisfaction as I am capable of receiving, and was highly pleased with the contents. I should vindicate myself a little upon your aspersions, as if I did not pay due honour to the gentlemen of your profession; but as you know I am very vain and love to display my own merits, you will not be surprised that as I have at this time a little to brag of, all other subjects must give way. Now for the history of my great acts.

"As soon as I heard Admiral Burnaby had kissed hands for the command of the West India squadron, which (having no acquaintance in town) information came from the newspapers, I wrote to Miss Ottley, whose aunt he married. This was on a Friday, and the Monday following Mr. Ottley brought Sir William to me, who expressed great civility, and desire of obliging me. You may imagine I did not omit the giving him to understand Post was the favour we wanted. Some few days afterwards, by a letter from Miss Ottley, I was informed that Sir William wished I would get a letter of recommendation to that purpose from either Lord Halifax, or Sandwich, to prevent their recommending some other person to be appointed Post Captain, as in that case, he should be obliged to obey them, although his inclination would be with you. Upon which I dispatched a servant to Frognal for advice. My brother* (who, I desire you would remember, has been very kind in this affair) bid me write immediately to Lord Halifax, and yesterday I sent a servant with my letter to Bushey. I asked the favour only from myself, mentioned no other person's name, and had the following words returned with a letter sealed enclosed to Sir William Burnaby.

"'I have great pleasure in obeying your Ladyship's commands, and in endeavouring to be of further service to your son. I shall therefore enclose a letter to Admiral Burnaby, which I heartily wish may have the desired effect.'

"I think now we have so many strings to our bow we cannot fail of succeeding in this very desirable point, and I hope I have nothing further to wish about you but that you may have your health, and that I may be so fortunate as to have you soon at home again.

"Your brother James is very happy with having succeeded at Merton. Your brother [Lord Cornwallis] is still in Scotland. As soon as I informed him that Admiral Burnaby was appointed to that command, he got you recommended to him by some of the Admiral's friends. I wrote to you this day was sevennight, the letter is probably still at the Admiralty, in which I told you all the news I had heard, except the Duke of Bedford's having asked for the first vacant regiment, and that Mr. Wilks, who is gone to see his daughter in France, had last week an execution taken out by his creditors upon all his goods and effects. This looks as if the generosity of the Opposition was a little tardy towards their champion. I have taken care your bills shall be answered whenever you draw for money."

The Same to the Same.

1763, August 29. London.—" . . . [Sir William] Burnaby in his first visit to me seemed very well inclined, and in his last, after he had received Lord Halifax's letter of recommendation, he gave me an absolute promise that he would make you a Post Captain. I am now writing by a merchant-man, as I hear there are two to sail for Jamaica soon; I shall send duplicates, one by each ship. Take care of your health and do not be out of spirits if things should remain in the same situation. You are very secure of being promoted, and indeed there is at this time so great a probability of a thorough change, that I am at this instant very sorry you went to the West Indies for what it is very likely you would have had as soon at home. There are none of my friends in town, so I can get no secret intelligence how things go on; but this is certain, that Mr. Pit was alone with the King from twelve o'clock till three yesterday noon at Buckingham House, numbers of people waiting at the gate with anxious countenances the whole time to observe him when he came out. What passed between

* Charles, 3rd Viscount Townshend.

His Majesty and him is out of my reach to learn, but I have since heard that Mr. Pit was first sent for by His Majesty on Thursday last, and that he insisted upon some preliminaries that were not agreed to, and that His Majesty sent for him again yesterday. If this should be true it looks as if they came into his proposals. It is a very remarkable proceeding their choosing this conference should be made so public, as such things are usually kept quite private till they are settled. The park at that time was at the fullest; his [sic. ? he] coming through in his gouty chair,* which was left a great part of the time in the court, at last they took it into the hall. Mr. Grenville and some others came during this conference, but were not let in. Steel was at the door of Buckingham House when he came out, who says he looked pleasant. A few days will unfold this affair, but these two letters must go, I'm told, to-morrow morning, and I don't know how I shall be able to send another letter till Admiral Burnaby goes, which will not be these three weeks, as I am afraid of being too troublesome at the Admiralty. I never saw Mr. Stephens, but my impatience to send you a letter gave me courage to write to him and send a letter to you enclosed, which, in his answer, he promised to do in a most civil manner. I think I am a strong instance in many particulars that an insignificant person with great attention may be of some use, although far short of their wishes. . . ."

P.S.—The Duke of York and Hervey would have begun their voyage last week to the Mediterranean, if, as I'm told, Hervey's instructions had been signed before Lord Egremont's death; but now they say they are to wait till a Secretary is appointed to that department."

Elizabeth Countess Cornwallis to the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1763, September 17. London.—"I shall send you enclosed a newspaper which has a list of the great offices lately filled; you see what all the conferences came to. Mr. Pit however has gained great credit by his behaviour upon the occasion, and the minority are not dejected. You perceive Lord Egmont has now the Admiralty; my Lady is our relation, but very nearly so to Lady Ferrers, and a great intimacy from their infancy.† Upon her coming to me yesterday and saying the Admiral would now be more obsequious than ever, for her interest with Lord Egmont, I thought this looked as if she expected I should say something about you, upon which I told her the situation, and then said you went to the West Indies for this step, and that Sir William Burnaby had promised to promote you upon Lord Halifax's recommendation, and I hoped you would be no sufferer by these changes. You had in my opinion paid a pretty good price for your advancement by such a voyage. I should think I could by her means have a recommendation also from Lord Egmont, but I am doubtful after what Sir William Burnaby said to me whether it would be civil to ask for any more; it would have the appearance of mistrusting him. Lord Shelburne resigned just at the time of the negociation with Mr. Pit, which made people think he was leaning towards the other side, and he has no share in the late promotions, as you will see by the newspaper, yet they say he continues in favour. There is some mystery past my finding out. Your brother is at last got to Culford, and James, the Fellow of Merton, by this time with him. He is to make me a visit for ten days or a fortnight the beginning of next month. I have already paid all due upon your account, except part of Regnier's bill, which will be paid in full this Michaelmas. I have long ago taken care that any draft of yours shall be accepted. I know you will not be extravagant, and I hope you know I shall both readily and willingly assist you with what money you want. I am careful for no other purpose but to be able to have it in my power to be useful, and shall take it unkindly if you do not apply to me for any wants you may have. James by this acquisition will soon be off my hands, therefore shall be very well able to help you.

* See "Letters of Horace Walpole" (ed. Toynbee) v. 365.

† Charlotte Baroness Ferrars, in her own right, was only child of James Compton, 5th Earl of Northampton; Catherine Lady Egmont was daughter of Charles Compton, the Earl's brother. Lady Ferrars was the wife of George Viscount Townshend.

"When I wrote so far, I thought it might prevent all disappointment if I wrote to Sir William Burnaby to say I hoped the late change in the Ministry would make no alteration in the promise he had given me of making you Post Captain the first vacancy. To which he answered that he would have me by all means acquaint Lord Egmont with Lord Halifax's recommendation, for, if Lord Egmont should recommend any other person, he should be obliged to prefer him before you. I immediately employed Lady Ferrers, a very near relation, and intimate friend to that family Her Ladyship was very good and kind, but I imagine could not suppose that there could be any favour in doing of nothing, which was all I wanted of his lordship, yet by the answer she brought me I found he had puzzled the affair most extremely, for I could not guess what she had asked. However, by a letter I wrote to Lord Egmont, and the friendly assistance of Admiral Rodney, I have had a very civil letter from Lord Egmont, and I think a full security of his not interfering; therefore if you are not already a Post Captain, I make no doubt you will be so upon the first vacancy after Admiral Burnaby comes to his command."

The Same to the Same.

[1764], January 15. Hill Street.—James and Molly will tell you the news. "I will therefore only mention that Isaack Townshend was reported this week to be dead, and that the King said Rodney should have Greenwich. The report was premature, but it is said he can last but a very short time, when the promise to Rodney will be fulfilled. Our relation,* I suppose, is much mortified, after having [been] so long a strong advocate for every minister in power, to have an Admiral so much younger than himself preferred to the very thing he most wished for; but I hear he bears it silently."

* Admiral George Townshend.

Lady Mary Cornwallis to Captain the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1764, January 17. Hill Street.—". . . I have deferred writing till the last minute that I might have it in my power to give you some account of the Royal Wedding.* The ceremony was performed last night in the Drawing room at St. James. Peers and peeresses, their eldest sons and their daughters, Privy Counsellors and their wives, and all the foreigners were summoned. There was so great a crowd that I could see but little of the ceremony. The Hereditary Prince arrived in England the 13th, three days before his marriage. He has had a levée every day at Somerset House, which you may conceive were much crowded. His very affable, agreeable manner has pleased exceedingly all kinds of people. It is said they will not leave England for ten days or a fortnight. The Princess will take no English with her to stay. It is very sensible in her. It is not to be expressed the joy every body seems to show upon this occasion; the whole town was illuminated. . . . Little else has been thought of. The Parliament did meet yesterday, but I fancy no business was done. It is believed Mr Wilks will return into England this week, much against the opinion of his friends. . . . We have had incessant rains these four or five months, with terrible high winds."

The Same to the Same.

[1764], March 26. Hill Street.—". . . . Lord Townshend died at Rainham ten days ago; he has left everything to his eldest son. The lady he kept was not mentioned in his will; what he gave her in his life-time does not appear, nor is it known whether he has any children by her living. People seem to think it hard he did not leave anything to his son Charles, for the sake of his children. . . . The Parliament, it is said, will be up the 14th of next month. It began to sit so early in the winter that people will be in a hurry to get out of town as soon as they can. Lord Townshend's death occasions a vacancy of a member for the county of Norfolk; it is expected Mr. de Grey will be chosen without any opposition. Madrid Charles† is gone to attend the meeting appointed for that purpose at Norwich to-day. The election for High Steward of Cambridge in the room of Lord Hardwick, deceased, comes on the end of this week. The two candidates are Lord Sandwich and the present Lord Hardwick; the first supported by the court. It is yet very doubtful who will carry it.

Lord Bute is come to town this week; looks much the better for having lived quietly in the country these two or three months; but I believe now has the lead just in the same manner as he used."

---

* The Princess Augusta to William Frederick, hereditary Prince of Brunswick Wolfenbüttel.

† So called to distinguish him from his namesake and cousin. He was secretary to the Madrid Embassy 1751-56, and in 1761 was elected M.P. for Great Yarmouth. Created Baron Bayning in 1797.

ELIZABETH COUNTESS CORNWALLIS to CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS, the Swift, JAMAICA.

1764, April 11. London.—"There never was less news than we have had of late. The heads of the Opposition have for a long time been confined to their rooms by illness; the Parliament therefore has afforded none, which will now be up in about a week. The election for High Steward at Cambridge it is supposed will come over again after this next term. In this dearth of public news the town would have been at a loss for conversation had not Lady Susan Strangways married last Saturday Mr. O'Brien the actor. Lord and Lady Ilchester, her father and mother, are much to be pitied; she was reckoned both pretty and clever. Your brother had some time since a letter from the person who has the care of Cornwallis Island for you and James, in which he says it is very much improved, and desires a letter of attorney to impower him to act for you. Ever since I knew this I have hurried the affair as far as I was able, have signed it myself as your guardian; and it is now to be sent to James for the same purpose, he being of age. As it was let for 50*l.* a year, and nothing has been received for three or four years, I hope there will be something coming to you; however, things at that distance are not much to be depended upon. But you may be very secure of 100*l.* a year from me, if I live; when I die you know I have nothing to leave, and indeed the pleasure of my being able to be of some use to you is a great comfort to a kind of life that has not many pleasing things in it."

Admiral the HON. A. KEPPEL to the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1764, July 11. London.—"I am very sorry to tell you how ill your hopes have succeeded in this country. Sir William Burnaby's having given commissions and not orders, as I understood he meant to do upon what I said to him, has prevented the inclinations of some in power from helping you, as the point in question then lay, whether or no the commissions should be confirmed or not; and, in case of refusal, it was thought impossible to confirm even Sir William's act to his son, so that, in fact, it was the attention the Admiralty had to his son that secured Captain Cotton. Your friends and relations are much hurt at your failing, and think Sir William Burnaby has not used them as they expected. They seem, especially Lady Cornwallis, extremely anxious for your return to London. I am not so much of that way of thinking, at least I would by no means be too hasty in that step, as I am of opinion you have not much to expect from those in power when you get here, and therefore would wish your pressing Sir William to allow of a change with a Post Captain. Such an act would be no expense to the public, and, if the professions of some can be depended upon, I should imagine would succeed. If it does not you are only where you was, and must get home as fast as you can. But you must remember, if you can bring it about, in case of a change, that it will be absolutely necessary that the officer changing with you should proceed directly to England in the sloop; a commander-in-chief can always find reasons for such occasion. I beg my compliments to Sir William. I have no objection to your showing him this letter."

CHARLES, 2ND EARL CORNWALLIS, to his brother, the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1764, October 14.* London.—"We have been in great anxiety about you, as the first report was that your ship was entirely lost; we thought this would vex you exceedingly, especially as I really think at present you are pretty sure of the first vacancy. I hope by this time you are got to Jamaica, and that the Swift is in a fair way of being fit for sea again. If you have lost anything by this accident, or are at all in want of money, I beg you will draw on me. I must again repeat my entreaties, that you will not now or at any other time be at all scrupulous about it, as I can assure you it will always be a very sincere pleasure to me to contribute all in my power to your comfort and happiness.

"Keppel talked to me much about your procuring a change with some Post Captain there; I cannot thoroughly understand him, but if anything of that sort can be done, I believe Lord Egmont will be inclined to serve you. If any sum of money should be necessary for it, for I have heard there are sometimes bargains of that sort, I will answer any draft that you may find it necessary to draw a month after sight. Perhaps I am talking very ignorantly, but I am so very anxious to have you made Post, that I would omit no possible means, and I think you could not lay out a sum of money to greater advantage. A thousand thanks for your mahogany spar; let me know if I can send you anything from hence. Adieu, fortify your mind against all misfortunes and disappointments, and be as happy as you can."

ELIZABETH COUNTESS CORNWALLIS to the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1764, October 19. Hill Street.—"I was so fortunate not to hear of the accident that befell you till I had it from your brother, who had a great deal of company at Culford, and was informed by Admiral Keppel. He instantly came post to London to inquire all particulars. I assure you I was not more affected myself than he was; nobody was ever received with more joy by us both than Mr. Hore, the master of the merchantman. Your brother would have made him a present, besides the freight, for bringing the mahogany, but he would not accept it. He was so civil as to come twice to Hill Street from the farther part of the city, to be questioned by us. I received your letter yesterday, which came by the Mary Ann. I believe we both felt for the situation you had been in, nor were we easy at the description of your present; the sloop broken to pieces, and upon an uninhabited island, not a house to shelter you from that scorching climate. His countenance was all uneasiness while he was reading your letter, it cleared however a little when he came to that part of your sending a boat full of your people on shore; 'very handsome,' he said, 'in William.' He gave me a letter for to send you last night, and is returned to Culford this morning, and has left orders with me to send you some porter.

* Should be Oct. 18. See postscript of Lady Cornwallis' letter below.

"Your brother says he told you in his letter that he was of opinion that Lord Egmont wished to assist you. Lord Townshend, who is now in town, assures me of this, and indeed I think his whole behaviour of late has had that look. I am not apt to be sanguine in things I much wish, but I am told by everybody you certainly will be promoted the next vacancy. I suppose if the sloop is by this misfortune rendered incapable of service, you must come home, and there will be an end of those expectations. Molly wrote from Culford to me, and my brother T[homas] T[ownshend] from Frognall to say they supposed you must have suffered by this accident, and desired they might assist you with money. I told them both that I was able to assist you with whatever money you wanted, and I would give up that pleasure to nobody. I must repeat again, my dear William, that I hope you will draw for what you want. Be assured I shall not only be able to answer your drafts, but shall have great pleasure that it is in my power to be of any service to you.

"I have not heard yet from the island at Halifax. I am told that you might have a thousand pounds for it, that is between you and James, who is now sitting by me, and bids me inquire of you whether you should approve of its being sold, if a purchaser should be found. It cannot be parted with but by your signing; if that should happen, and you approve, I suppose the writing may be sent to you. Most probably nothing may be done about it before you come to England. James is very sorry for your accident, and will write soon. If any annuities should be part of the scheme for raising the money this year, should you like to have part of your fortune laid out that way? You know you will be of age in March, when you will have 4,500*l.*"

P.S.—Your brother mistook in the date of his letter. It should have been the 18th.

Lady Mary Cornwallis to the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1764, October 28. Barton.—"I was exceedingly happy to hear of your safety in the imminent danger you had encountered; and a very great satisfaction it was in my concern for the distress you must have suffered, to hear your behaviour and conduct in this trial met with so much approbation; a great comfort to your friends, as well as to yourself, after the consciousness of doing right oneself, to be approved by others. I hope your loss has not been very great, which I beg may not be the least inconvenience to you, as I shall very readily and gladly contribute whatever you require towards refitting you. I would have lodged some money immediately in Mr. Hoare's hands, to be ready for you whenever you drew upon him, but my mother desired I would defer it till I knew more particularly what supply you might want. I am sure it is needless to assure you you will ever be most heartily welcome to whatever assistance in money you may want, as I shall have the greatest pleasure in being of the least service. Therefore I hope you will be ingenuous in letting me know what sum you should require to reinstate you in your former possessions, that I might supply you with it directly, as I shall be excessively glad to have it in my power to accommodate you in the smallest degree. I think this way would be more useful to you than buying myself things to send you, as I can be no judge what you would like, besides the uncertainty of their ever reaching you.

"I have been in Suffolk these three months with Lady Sarah Bunbury and my old friend Miss Bunbury. I was last week at the meeting at Newmarket, where I saw Admiral Keppel, who talked to me a great deal about you, and joined with me in my sincere wishes for your promotion. He is excessively happy with his sister's marrying Lord Tavistock. The Duke of Cumberland, who has been extremely ill, was well enough to go in his coach upon the course. The Suffolk people are much displeased with the Duke of Grafton for having no hounds; as the Duke of Cleveland has left this part of the world, they have no opportunity of fox-hunting, at all, which you know to sportsmen is a grevious mortification."

Lieut.-General Edward Cornwallis to Captain the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1768, July 23. Gibraltar.—Requesting him to give a passage home to Lieut-Colonel Preston, of the writer's regiment, who has leave from the King to dispose of his commission.

Lady Mary Whitbread* to Captain the Hon. William Cornwallis.

[1769], Dec. 20. Bedwell Park.—On the subject of her marriage, praising her husband, and hoping often to see her brother at the house they have taken in town, in Charles Street, Berkeley Square.

The Same to the Same.

[1770], February 24. Charles Street.—"I wish you would let me know when you would like to have me send the hogsheads of porter, and what direction I should give about the forwarding it to Plymouth. Was you now in town you would be amazed at the excessive eagerness and anxiety of almost every body about the masquerade. Those who have been so fortunate as to have got tickets are entirely engrossed in their thoughts and time, in making the preparations for their dress for this important entertainment, in endeavouring to excel each other in finery, for which purpose they borrow all the jewels and pearls they can of their friends,

* Married on Aug. 18, 1769, to Samuel Whitbread the brewer; died in childbed Dec. 27, 1770.

and those who have not been able to obtain tickets, or whose fathers will not consent to let them go, look so disconsolate that it would raise your compassion. The Bishop of London has endeavoured to prevent this entertainment taking place, in going to the King—to represent the perniciousness of allowing it. His Majesty said he did not approve of it; that this was quite a private thing, therefore he had not forbid it."

The Same to the Same.

[1770, March. Charles Street.]—"I have this instant received your letter. I had some time ago ordered two hogsheads of porter to be sent you by the first vessel in the river for Plymouth, which I take for granted is done; however Mr. Whitbread will when he goes to-morrow morning to the brewhouse enquire of his clerks about it. . . . I regret the not seeing you again in town before you sail. I heartily wish you a most prosperous voyage, and all the health and every possible good to attend you.

"Dr. Madan* brought his son to town ten days ago, to put him to Westminster School, where he is now placed. I had him in the house with me till he was settled in the school. As Dr. Madan was only in a lodging, I apprehended he might be distressed what to do with the boy. He is indeed a very fine boy, has a very remarkable open good countenance, he seems very lively and good humoured, and, as far as I can judge from his appearance, I should flatter myself he will do well. I have taken him quite into my care, as I am to have the educating him. Dr. Madan preferred Westminster, which he was of himself, and I think, considering all things, it is the most eligible for him. As his parents live at so great a distance, I and some other of their friends will have it in their power to give them accounts of him, which they could not do was he at Eton or at any other school distant from London. Charlotte takes the opportunity of Dr. Madan's absence to inoculate her youngest son, as the Doctor has never had the small-pox. Mr. Whitbread is in the House, upon the corn business."

The Same to the Same.

[1770], July 20. Bedwell Park.—"I was much pleased to hear by my mother of your having got well to Jamaica, and that you had a good voyage. My mother tells me she writes constantly, and as she is more in the way of getting intelligence by living always in London I refer you for all news to her. Mr. Whitbread has taken great pains to persuade her to come to Bedwell, and would feign [fain] have brought her with him the last time he was in town, but she was immoveable. I am surprised she will not, as she must know we should be extremely glad to have her company, and I want to have the pleasure of shewing her this place I dote so much upon. Mr. Whitbread visits her constantly when he goes to London, and, he says, he finds her always very cheerful and well. Mr. Whitbread has been in great uneasiness for his eldest daughter, who has been dangerously ill for some time past, and I am afraid is not yet thought safe by the physical people. She is in London, at her grandmother's, to be nearer the assistance and advice of the faculty; as our house in Charles Street is small and inconvenient, and our house in Portman Square not yet habitable, Mr. Whitbread thought it better for her to be with her grandmother, where she can have all proper care taken of her. We have been strongly pressed to come to visit at Culford by my brother and Lady Cornwallis. I have a great mind to shew Mr. Whitbread that place as well as some others in Suffolk. I believe we shall, if Miss Whitbread does not grow worse, accept of their invitation next week for two days. We have managed so as to render it impossible for us to stay more than that time with them.

* Dr. Spencer Madan, afterwards Bishop of Peterborough, had marrie Lady Charlotte Cornwallis.

"I should be glad to hear you have received the two hogsheads of porter we sent to Plymouth after you. If you wish to have more remember that we shall supply you with great readiness and pleasure. Mr. Whitbread wants to get some genuine Madeira, could you put him in a way of getting it? If you could procure him a butt he would be glad, and would pay the person you send it by. I don't mean to put you to any inconvenience or trouble about it; I only mention this, in case it is in your power to procure it us. James is likely to become a domestic family man. When shall you think of settling? General Cornwallis is going to add [to] and improve his house at Birds Place; he visits us often."

J. Blankett to Captain the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1771, December 15. London.—"Now indeed that I am come to peep in London, I can write to you that Stott has been to Falkland Island and taken possession, has left it to take care of itself, and is returned unhurt to Plymouth. Mr. Banks is going on another expedition to the South Seas with two sloops, the Drake and Rawleigh; the first commanded by Cook (who is to be made Post), the other by a Mr. Furnace, who was formerly Lieutenant with Byron.

"Cotton still continues idle in regard to our service and is entered into that of a wife (though he denies it), which probably may be attended with as many storms, hurricanes and tempests as any frigate in the West Indies. It is said the Ministry are angry at Mr. Rodney's making the seizure of the schooner a serious matter, and intend sending him some further instructions in regard to the Spaniards. The Princess Dowager still continues alive, but cannot last long; she has a cancer in her mouth and risings of the viscera, and is quite irrecoverable. As to minority, the extravagance and luxury of the times makes it necessary to be well with a minister, and their opposition will be very feeble; they possibly may try a question or two and dwindle to nothing. City patriotism has changed hands, and who has it now I cannot determine. Johnny [Wilks] is most furiously attacked and badly defended; he loses ground daily, which he is sensible of. The Duke of Cumberland, who has long diverted the town, is just arrived in Pall Mall with his Duchess; they are forbid the Court, but that probably wont last long. As to the Turks and Russians, it is expected they will come to a peace this winter; they are both much exhausted in men and money, and unless the Emperor of Germany interferes, will be glad to make peace on any terms. As to ourselves everything appears truly pacific; the Ministry seem resolved not to quarrel, and the state of France will not yet suffer them to be troublesome.

"Extravagance, luxury and gaming are the fashionable vices of the town, and it will astonish you on your return to see the vast improvements of the age. The Lotorie, Macaroni, White's, Almac's, &c., are in the most flourishing state, and cards in all companies are the only things worth living for. A man of taste must play all the morning, or, at least, four or five games before dinner, which is shortened to give time for the exquisite pleasures of Quinze and Vingt-un. In fact idleness and debauchery are so far taken possession of all ranks in society, that opposition to the King's measures is a piece of barbarity inconsistent with the manners of the present age. All wit is at Court, all knowledge at the gaming table."

HON. JAMES CORNWALLIS to his brother, CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS, the Guadaloupe, Jamaica.

1773, February 11. Clifford Street.—". . . I am going to resign my place in the Tower, which is worth at present 200*l*. per annum, and my brother is to settle 100*l*. per annum upon my wife for her life. Spencer Madan is to have the place, and to pay (so long as he keeps it) 100*l*. per annum to my brother to indemnify him. . . . My brother and I are both of opinion that the place is not worth your acceptance upon these terms, and as the being able to dispose of it depends wholly upon my brother's continuance in office, we think the present opportunity not to be lost. . . . It will be a great thing for young Madan.

"I shall be very happy to introduce my wife to you."

The EARL OF SANDWICH to CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1773, October 26. Hinchingbrook.—"Your conduct with regard to your profession in wishing for constant employment on a foreign station is highly laudable, and you may be assured I will attend to your wish as much as I can, consistently with what is due to other sea officers who have been a long time out of commission, and I am sure you will agree with me that justice requires they should have their share of the little employment there is to give in time of peace. I hope, therefore, you will not object to the remaining a reasonable time on shore, and you may depend upon it that I will make that time as short as I can with any degree of propriety."

J. B[LANKETT] to CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS, Commander of the Guadaloupe, Jamaica.

[1774, October ?].—"The city is the only place left in the world that pretends to support liberty; Wilkes and Townsend are the patriotic candidates, and it is generally believed Wilkes will carry his point and be elected Lord Mayor. This will at least plague the Court, as he will allow as many common halls as they like to have.

"A reduction of 5,000 men is expected to take place amongst us very soon, in which case, if guardships are included, Mr. Barrington, Hughes, and your humble servant will retire. . . .

"Captain Fielding (who is married to Miss Finch) is in the Kent, in the room of Colby; Mr. Hervey is expected here to reduce the Marines of his division; Sir Charles Knowles is coming home; Bethell has quitted the service; Watson has had two strokes of the palsy. . . . Glover, Herbert, and Gower are still idle men. . . . Cotton is married to Miss Aston, whose father is lately dead.

"Promotion is now as distant as at the beginning of the Peace. The hackneyed word Economy is used to stop the mouth of all applications."

The EARL OF SANDWICH to CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1774, October 29. Admiralty.—"There is on board your ship a surgeon's mate, named Thong, whose relations at Huntingdon are my particular friends. I cannot, therefore, at their intercession avoid recommending him to your protection.

"I had a letter some time ago from the Duke of Leinster, who seemed much pleased with my having recommended his brother to you for a berth on board the Pallas, and saying he would set out immediately for Portsmouth, but I have not yet heard of his arrival in England."

CAPTAIN J. LEVESON GOWER to CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1776, February 27. South Street.—"I shall send you enclosed a list of the ships for this summer's American service. It is likely much increased, and is increasing every week. About six weeks ago Lord Howe was applied to and told that it was the King's wish that he should take on him the command of the ships in America; this surprised everybody, as Shuldham had been so lately appointed, and it was certain his arrival there was not known by the Administration here. However Lord George Germaine was now taken into great favour, and was to take the lead in the management of all this American war, for such it surely may now be called. Lord Howe made many requisitions (his own word); the only one he has made public was that he should have his commission as Vice-Admiral ante-dated to that appointing Sir Hugh Palliser Lieutenant General of Marines, which we must suppose was granted, for his Lordship has actually accepted the command, though the Eagle

(the ship he is to hoist his flag on board) is the only ship of the line under his orders; the Boyne and Somerset being come back and reduced to guardships, and the Asia is expected soon. What makes this yet more extraordinary is that Lord Howe both hates and despises Lord Sandwich, and he has not spoke to Lord George Germaine since the expedition to the coast of France in 1758, and these two men preside at the head of the two Offices through which he must transact all business. A friend of ours says his Lordship has much more faith in things than he shall ever be able to persuade himself or any friend of his to have. Lord Sandwich fought hard to support and keep Shuldham Commander in Chief; it would not do, but, by way of douceur, a patent is making out to create him Lord Shuldham of the kingdom of Ireland.

"I should have set out with telling you that upon the death of my very good and valuable friend Sir Charles Saunders (even before he was cold) they appointed Sir Hugh Pallisser Lieutenant General of Marines, and he actually kissed hands the very next day. Sir Hugh should have shewn a more decent attention to his memory, considering the regard Sir Charles had always shewn towards him even in his will. As to Lord Sandwich, he never had any decency, and, shocking as it is, yet it is most true that he concealed the account of his son's death two or three days that it might not stop the amusements and entertainments which he was then making at Hinchinbroke."

Earl Cornwallis to the Dowager Countess Cornwallis.

1776, September 2. Long Island.—On the 27th we gained a great and important victory; we killed and took prisoners about 3,000 of the rebels, the loss on our side does not exceed 250. They have abandoned all their works on this island, and I believe in a short time their army will disperse and the war will be over.

The unhappy people have been kept in utter darkness by the tyranny of their wicked leaders, and are astonished to hear how little is required of them by Great Britain. Judge of my happiness, having had a share in the late glorious action, and now being blessed with the prospect of being soon restored to my family.

P.S.—Brodrick acted as my aid-de-camp on the 27th, and behaved very well.

The Same to the Same.

[1777], November 29. Philadelphia.—"I have the satisfaction of assuring you that William has gained the greatest credit in the attack of Fort Island in the face of the whole army and fleet; Lord Howe extols him to the skies, and will I am convinced represent his good behaviour in the strongest terms. This event will I am sure make you as happy as it has done me. The communication of the river is now open, and our campaign will finish in a few days. I have some hopes that Lord Howe will send the Isis home as she has suffered so much, if not, I am afraid he must go to Rhode Island for the Chatham, which will prevent our coming together; however,

I trust we shall both be with you very soon. Burgoine's disaster has greatly changed the face of affairs in this country God only knows how this business is to end. It makes however no very material alteration as to the conclusion of our campaign."

ELIZABETH COUNTESS CORNWALLIS to CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1777, December 6. Hill Street.—"I wrote you two letters on the 2nd instant. . . I can think of nothing until the next account comes but of that detestable Fort Island, or, as some people call it, Mad Island. Major Cuiler said before the letters were given out he did not think any of the Captains had notice time enough to write. The Archbishop was told by Lord Sandwich that you were well; he spoke also with kindness, his Grace says, of you, and the Gazette names you and your ship often. These were lucky circumstances for me just at that time; but then by the Gazette I see the service you are upon, which both makes me impatient for, and at the same time dread the next account. That it may be a happy one is my most ardent prayer, all the comfort of my life depends upon it. People in general were much pleased with the successes of General Howe's army, it was followed the next day by Burgoin's [Burgoyne's] misfortunes, which gave a great allay to the joy. I suppose it is too late in the season to have any bad consequence with regard to our other forces in America. Lord Onslow tells me his cousin the captain has been all this time at New York, and that at present he has the care of Lee. You will be very angry with me if I confess just now that I wish you in that disagreeable situation rather than where you were. I sent to Captain Cotton's house to inquire whether he was come this morning; they said he was not, that when they heard last from him he was detained at Jamaica in good health. I can give no account of what passes here, all my thoughts are in America. Sure General Howe will send home as soon as this fort is taken; it is said here to be very strong. May it end happily, and I have the great comfort of a joyous letter from you, with a certainty of seeing both you and your brother this winter."

The EARL OF MORNINGTON to the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS, Captain of the Medea, Bristol.

1778, July 8. Duke Street.—"I have just this moment the honour of your letter, and was so sensible of the propriety of William's attending you as soon as possible, that I made all haste to dispatch him to Bristol. I had not indeed the one thing needful to send with him as much as he ought to have; I therefore take the liberty of requesting you, when he is in want of money, to advance him from time to time as far as thirty guineas, for which he will give you drafts upon Messrs. Allen, Marler and Company, Ironmonger Lane, Cheapside, which shall be duly honoured. I cannot take my leave of you without once more returning you my thanks for your great kindness to my son, who, I hope, will never do anything to forfeit your favour."

JEMIMA COUNTESS CORNWALLIS to CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1778, September 3. Esher.—"I do not know how to wish you, out or detained; all I know is that these are really frightful times in all respects. As for both sides, the infatuation is something horrible. Opposition are actually rejoicing at their own miseries (for shall we not all fall together?) because they think they are proved in the right; and Ministry most gloriously resolve to continue to the end in plans which evidently rush to destruction, rather than allow they have been in the least mistaken. By this means I am really so bilious as to think that our army in America, fleets everywhere, possessions in the West Indies, &c., &c., will be frittered away and destroyed in about another twelve months; and not impossible that within that time we have commotions at home also. Don't laugh at my being political. I assure you I do not think a female ought to talk politics, but when it comes to husband, friends, &c., one must feel, and it will out."

EARL CORNWALLIS to CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

[1778], September 5. New York Island.—"When the French fleet first appeared off the Hook, some of Lord Howe's ships were at the Narrows, and had they attempted going in the first tide, I think we were ruined; but they gave Lord Howe time to post all his ships advantageously at the Hook, and remained about ten days looking at him, when they went away to Rhode Island. As soon as they were gone, the Reasonable and Centurion arrived from Halifax, the Renown from the West Indies, and the Cornwall of Byron's fleet. With this reinforcement Lord Howe followed them to Rhode Island; when the French saw him off they came out to attack him; Lord Howe stood out to sea, whether to avoid an action, or to draw the enemy from Rhode Island is not known; however, in a few hours a most violent gale of wind came on which totally dispersed both fleets. The Apollo, with Lord Howe's flag on board, was dismasted. In a few days Lord Howe assembled his fleet at the Hook, and Monsieur D'Estaing did the same off the Capes of Delaware. In the meantime your old friend the Isis fell in with a French 74, and obliged her to sheer off. The French fleet suffered much by the storm; they returned for 24 hours to Rhode Island to take their sick on board, and then went away to Boston. Lord Howe, who was joined by the Monmouth of Byron's squadron, followed the enemy to Boston, in hopes of overtaking some of the disabled ships; the Isis is come in here to refit, being much shattered in her masts and rigging. Last week arrived Admiral Parker with the Royal Oak, Fame, Bedford, Grafton, Conqueror, and Sultan. The Invincible and Guadaloupe are gone dismasted to Halifax, and the Albion back to England; we know nothing of the Princess Royal, Russell or Culloden.

"The six ships that came with Admiral Parker have 1,300 sick. People think Byron kept too much to the northward, never coming south of 47; I submit that to your better judgment. I don't know whether I ought to wish to be at home before you get out, as time 's precious at the beginning of a war; I shall however be glad to see you. The frigates that were burnt at Rhode Island were the Orpheus, Juno, Lark, Flora and Cerberus, and Kingfisher sloop."

JEMIMA COUNTESS CORNWALLIS to her brother-in-law, CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

[1778], September 14. Mansfield Street.—"I hope you are not sailed, that you may have the satisfaction of getting this to tell you I had a letter last night from my Lord, July 30th, a short one, having just heard of the ship sailing. He has wrote by the packet which sailed the same day, August 1st, and those letters of course we expect every instant. My Lord was well, writes from New York, but says he has a country house on Long Island, close to the encampment of the 33rd. I shall not enter into the news because I imagine Lady Cornwallis will, Lord Townsend having just sent it us all collected together. I do not know what to wish about you, except as usual that you were in Orders and Rector of Ingham. I am convinced that though we all fancy we know and expect it, we shall in a few days, upon hearing that Spain has declared against us and their fleet joined the French, be all as much astonished and thunderstruck as if we never had heard there was such a country as Spain in the world. I put not my trust in princes nor in any child of man; but I hope in the mercy and justice of God, that we shall not be utterly destroyed, and that our enemies, who are at least as wicked, will be as much punished by folly, obstinacy, and infatuation in their rulers as we are. Upon this great charitable plan of mine you will perceive what peaceful happy days we have to look forward to. Well, it will end. I am as yellow as an orange, feel very ill, am kept here by Sir John Fielding, who chooses to make my mother appear against some thieves (that stole a trunk of hers) on Friday. Hope to get away to Bath on Saturday."

LORD HOWE to CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1778, Nov. 12. Grafton Street.—Regretting that he has felt himself neglected since his return to England, but trusting that his appointment to the Lion will furnish him with opportunities, by his successes, to compensate for the mortifications he has sustained.

The EARL OF MORNINGTON to CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1778, November 24. London.—"I hope you will excuse the trouble I now give you, but the misery I am daily witness of induces me to take this liberty. In short, Lady Mornington has been in the most violent affliction ever since she heard you were to be stationed in the West Indies; but I have most constantly withstood her entreaties that William should not go there, because I think it would be extremely ridiculous to make objections to a young man of his profession going wherever his duty may call him. The American climate certainly did not agree with him, therefore I confess I think his mother has some foundation for her apprehensions about his going to a place which I take to be rather warmer than America. From the greatest reliance upon your friendship to this boy, and upon your humanity and good nature, I now request a favour of you, which is, that if, upon your arrival at the West Indies, you observe that the climate in the least disagrees with him, you will be so good as to send him home. I also beg that you will not mention to William the having received this letter, because I know his heart to be so much set upon remaining with you, that if he thought leaving you would be the consequence of his being ill, he would conceal any ailment he had till perhaps it might be too late to give him relief. I beg leave to offer my best wishes (which you are entitled to if I was not so nearly concerned as I am at present) for your happiness and success wherever you go."

EARL CORNWALLIS to the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

[1778], December 22. Mansfield Street.—Finds Lady Cornwallis in a very weak state indeed, but she thinks herself better. His mother seems better than when he went to America.

The SAME to the SAME.

1779, May 5. London.—"I have not wrote to you lately, as I knew you would hear everything about me, and my letters could only have given you uneasiness in reading and me pain in writing. I am now returning to America,* not with views of conquest and ambition, nothing brilliant can be expected in that quarter; but I find this country quite unsupportable to me. I must shift the scene; I have many friends in the American army; I love that army, and flatter myself that I am not quite indifferent to them. I hope Sir H. Clinton will stay, my returning to him is likely to induce him to do so. If he insists on coming away, of course I cannot decline taking the command, and must make the best of it; and I trust that good intentions and plain dealing will carry me through. I most heartily wish you all possible success, and that you may have an opportunity of acquiring great honour and some money. I don't think it impossible that we may meet in the West Indies, as I have signified my willingness to go thither, if any occasion should present itself, and there are not amongst our generals many volunteers for that service. My children are, thank God, vastly well; may all happiness attend you."

CAPTAIN J. LEVESON GOWER to ELIZABETH, COUNTESS CORNWALLIS.

1779, October 2. Elden.—"I shall certainly do myself the honour of waiting on your Ladyship as soon as I get to town the latter end of next week, but I must tell you now that I have shown Captain Cornwallis' account of his proceedings to Admiral Keppel, who is clearly of opinion that he has gained great honour to himself,

* After the death of his wife.

and that the most malevolent person cannot have the smallest cause for finding fault with him. I very sincerely and most heartily congratulate you on his safety, and the glory he has acquired."

The Hon. and Rev. James Cornwallis to Captain the Hon. William Cornwallis, Lion Man-o'-War, Jamaica.

1779, October 3. Canterbury.—"We are at last fully relieved from our dreadful suspense about you, and I most heartily congratulate you upon having gained so much credit in the late engagement. Middleton, who was so good as to call upon me at Wrotham on purpose to assure me of your safety, spoke of your conduct in these terms. I have seen Admiral Barrington also, who said you were certainly gone to Jamaica, and in the most honourable way. You have gained one object then, and that certainly the first; but I cannot help now expressing a wish for the secondary one in your profession, that is, a good rich Spanish prize.

"Admiral Barrington is come home in very ill-humour, and represents our situation in the West Indies as truly lamentable, where we thought ourselves strongest. Upon the whole, nothing can look worse than our affairs, although we have not yet had any great loss excepting Grenada, we are every day in apprehension of some bad news. How different from last war! when we were only accustomed to hear of victory. My brother, you must have heard long ago, is gone to America again.

"As to your friend Leveson, Admirals Keppel and Harland, I find it to be the general opinion of all unprejudiced persons that their names ought no longer to remain in the list of Admirals and Captains. Admiral Keppel, who was the idol last January, is now very unpopular. Lord Howe's character is as much respected as ever, but General Howe's has suffered much by the enquiry last winter before the House of Commons, which he was weak enough to wish for. You know I am of no party, I therefore only write what I upon the whole collect. Whether my brother will be Commander-in-Chief is uncertain. But I hope there will be no occasion for such an officer in America, as I heartily wish for peace."

Elizabeth Countess Cornwallis to Captain the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1779, October 7. London.—". . . I have been in great anxiety for you and had no joy in the great commendations you have had here, until I was certain you were safe at Jamaica. Barrington came to me immediately upon his coming home. He said he was sure you were gone to Jamaica; by the situation your ship was in, it was he thought impossible you could reach any of the Leeward Islands, the current and wind would carry you to Jamaica in seven days. I believe he has done your behaviour great justice, for before any other accounts could come, never anybody received more general applause, nobody's conduct was ever more celebrated I have had congratulations from all kinds of people. Lady Mornington had the other day a letter from Lord Longford, in which he said that a person that was at Portsmouth was on board the Lion during the action, described the behaviour of the Captain and the ship, nothing could be more honourable than their conduct. I have heard from other hands that you are talked very highly of by our whole fleet, which has not yet been out again since they were chased up the Channel by the combined fleet. People were diverted with the humour of the sailors belonging to Admiral Ross's ship, which has a bust of George the 2nd upon it. They wrapped their clothes round the head of the bust, and said George the 2nd should not see an English fleet chased up their own Channel. However all thinking people say it was right not to run the risk; they were vastly superior, and had we been beaten, the consequence would have been terrible. They wait now till the French fleet comes out; they were ordered to avoid fighting before; now people think they are to fight. Ours is increased to 42 of the line. The combined fleet is said to be considerably lessened by sickness. Rodney is to command in the West Indies. . . . .

"I had a letter from your brother two days ago dated August the 23rd; they had only heard of your action by a letter from Grant to Sir H. Clinton. He hopes I am, before I received that, made easy about you, and he is sure I must have heard you much commended. The Dean [of Canterbury, James Cornwallis], came to town on purpose to inquire after you."

The Archbishop of Canterbury (Frederick Cornwallis) to his nephew, Captain the Hon. William Cornwallis, Lion, Jamaica.

1779, October 9. Lambeth.—"Though I am pressed in time, having only just now heard that a mail is to be made up this night for Jamaica, I cannot let slip the opportunity of sending you a few lines in return for your very kind letter. After having been long under anxious doubts about your safety, it gave me the utmost satisfaction, I assure you, to hear that you had got safe to Jamaica. It was certainly very unfortunate that your ship should have been so early and so greatly damaged in the engagement. But it is no small comfort to us to hear from every quarter your courage and conduct throughout the transaction so highly extolled, as to establish your character of a brave and able officer among all ranks and degrees of people. I most heartily pray for success to you in all future operations, and that your laudable endeavours may meet with the encouragement and recompense they so richly deserve.

"I saw your mother yesterday, and have the pleasure to acquaint you that she is full as well, if not better, than when you left her. I was glad to hear so good an account of my friend Wesley,* pray give my love to him."

Earl Cornwallis to Captain the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1779, October 21. New York.—"I have wrote to you several times from different places, but whether you have heard of me or from me since you left England is I think uncertain. On recollection, however, you must have heard from Lieutenant Stone of my fatal loss, which has effectually destroyed all my hopes of happiness in this world. I will not dwell on this wretched subject, the thoughts of which harrow up my soul.

* William Wesley or Wellesley, 2nd son of the 1st Earl of Mornington; took the name of Pole on succeeding to his uncle's estates in 1778; afterwards Baron of Maryborough and 3rd Earl of Mornington.

"Although I sincerely lament the miscarriage of Admiral Byron's squadron, the reputation which you have gained has given me the greatest satisfaction. Perhaps you have heard that I was near visiting Jamaica. Where D'Estaing is we know not, he certainly has been on the coast of Georgia, where I fear he has taken our troops. By a packet which we intercepted from Havanna to Old Spain, we find that after he had done his business in Georgia he was bound to Halifax, and then that La Motte Piquet was to return with his squadron to Cape François; we know not where the remainder of D'Estaing's squadron is to winter. Pray let me hear from you by every opportunity. I heard from my mother the 26th June; she was then well, my children vastly well, and really I must say, although I am their father, they are charming children. James's family very well, his boy who was long in a very doubtful state, vastly better. God bless you; may success, honour and riches attend you; mind, I put honour first, which you will approve of."

Captain J. Leveson Gower to Captain the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1779, October 28. [London.]—"I thank you a thousand times for your letter from Jamaica, which you wrote immediately after your arrival there, and gave me very great satisfaction in knowing you had escaped the millions of shots which you had fired at you. We long before had heard of the great share you had in that very severe action of the 6th July, and of the shattered condition of the Lion; but were kept a tedious length of time before we were relieved from our anxious suspense of knowing of you personally, except from Fanshawe, who had not an intercourse with the Lion sufficient to satisfy us so fully as we wished in regard to you. Lady Cornwallis sent me your account of the action, and of what happened to the Lion after it. I was then at Elden in Suffolk, and shewed it to Admiral Keppel, who spoke so handsomely of you upon it as quite quieted all those fears you had raised in her mind of any possibility of your being blamed for bearing up for Jamaica. Since Fanshawe came to England I have had a letter from him in which he says that, after he had lost company with you, he found a most extraordinary windward current, without which he could never have got up to St. Kitts. More pleasant scenes I hope will present themselves to you, but more glorious cannot, for it is not possible for man to acquire more glory at any one period than you have acquired. At home we are in much the same way we long have been, without exertion, and scarce thinking of anything but to save appearances. I thought it was impossible that they could have trusted our fleet to Sir Charles Hardy, and could not doubt what I heard that Lord Howe would be called upon, knowing their hatred of Admiral Keppel was such as was not to be got the better of;

to Lord Howe therefore I went and begged he would give me leave to serve with him as a volunteer or in any other manner he should think proper to employ me. He was indeed most obligingly civil to me, but he has not been called upon, not even in the moment when they were really frightened, I mean at the time the combined fleets were upon our coasts; nor was he the least taken notice of then when he went to shew himself at Court. At this time I thought it right that every living creature should do whatever he could for the salvation of this now poor country, accordingly I wrote to the Secretary of the Admiralty desiring him to acquaint the Lords Commissioners that, if they thought my service could be of any use in the present critical situation of affairs, I was ready to go on any service and in any manner they would employ me. The next day I received a letter from Mr. Secretary saying he had read and communicated my letter, and was my humble servant, and I have heard no more. I wish I could serve under anybody of character, but no such are now employed, and by not being employed I have avoided being an eye-witness to the very disgraceful retreat our fleet made from the combined fleets; and sorry I am to say that many disgraceful circumstances did attend that retreat or more properly flight. . . . Your old shipmate, Mr. Walter Young, has got himself made Post. He is Captain of the Sandwich, in which Rodney is said to be going to command in the West Indies."

Earl Cornwallis to Elizabeth, Countess Cornwallis.

1779, November 11. New York.—"I informed you by the Daphné that I had received your letter of the 7th of August; since that time no event of consequence has happened here, nor have we heard from the West Indies. D'Estaing has certainly been on this coast, but we have had no certain accounts of him lately. I have wrote several times to William, and, though the communication is very uncertain, hope one letter at least will reach him. The accounts of my children give me the greatest satisfaction. For myself I have in this world neither hopes nor fears; I will endeavour to do my duty to my country, and be honest, and then, with perfect resignation to his will, I put my trust in God's mercy."

Elizabeth Lady Cornwallis to Captain the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1780, February 2.—". . . . I am constantly in a fret that I have wrote something I did not design in my letters to Jamaica and the same to those in America. I am too old to write. . . . Governor Johnson (they say to prevent his being in the House of Commons, where, although he means well, from liveliness he sometimes draws them into scrapes) had, when our home fleet was laid up, a command given him of five or six frigates, the Medea I believe was one, upon the coast of Portugal. I have never heard of their getting any prize, and Rodney has taken them with him to Gibraltar."

ELIZABETH LADY CORNWALLIS to CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1780, June 4. London.—Her great sorrow on the loss of her brother [the Hon. Thos. Townshend]. "The hopes of seeing you in the autumn, and the commendations I have heard of you, has done me more good than all Mr. Partridge's drops and julips. I am quite well. It is impossible for anybody of your rank in the navy to stand higher in character than you do. I hear this from all sorts of people. I have kept a letter of Lord Townshend's upon this last affair with La Motte Piquet, to shew you when you come home. This has struck him certainly more than anything you have yet done. as it is the first time he has taken any notice of any of your actions to me. I think in general it has been more talked of, I suppose your having had the command is the reason; and indeed I think you deserve more commendation, as in this affair both courage and conduct was shown in a very high degree. The Dean has been in town ten days; he says he meets with congratulations from everybody. He is the only person I have entrusted with the great hopes you have given me of your coming home. I was afraid if it got about some stop here might be put to it. Mr. Westley [Wesley] mentioned it in his letter, but as I said nothing of it they do not believe it at Lambeth. . . .

"Politics has been in a strange way, and with those friends everything gives place to them. Rodney's character is very high at present, I shall enclose the abstract of his letter as inserted in the Gazette. As some of the Captains under him must have done very well, or we could not have had the advantage, it seems hard their names should not be mentioned. Captain Uvedale, from whom the intelligence should have come, particulars being referred to him, they say by something of great weight falling upon his head during the action has lost his memory. I am glad you were off of that station. The friends of the Captains in that fleet are in a very disagreeable situation, until the Admiral writes a more explicit letter. . . .

"Nothing is yet known of the dissolution of the Parliament; it is rather supposed to be designed. I am told Westley is a Lieutenant on board the Lion, I suppose Cornwallis is preferred. You will be surprised to see how stout I am grown; drinking no wine and eating no meat suits my constitution vastly.

"Lord North's having two questions carried against him made them determine upon dissolving the Parliament. He has now got a majority again, and people now think that design is laid aside. The Dean and his wife, who have been in a lodging in this street for a fortnight, go out of town to-morrow. I suppose you have seen Sir P. Parker's letter upon your action with La Motte Piquet, therefore do not send you that Gazette. I have put it up in my pocket book, and shall keep it with care."

EARL CORNWALLIS to CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1780, July 4. Charlestown.—"I am very doubtful whether this letter will ever reach you; I shall therefore only thank you for your letter of the 24th of May, which gave me the greatest pleasure and satisfaction. I am sure the action will do you the greatest honour. I hope, as soon as you have got upon copper, you will return to Jamaica, unless some more eligible service should offer; at all events let me conjure you to continue serving as long as the war lasts. I gave Admiral Arbuthnot a letter about a month ago, which he promised to forward to you.

"My last letters from England were of the 17th of March, and as I am now stationed out of the regular line of the packets, I expect to hear very seldom. The Province of South Carolina has totally submitted, and American affairs wear a better aspect than they have done for some time. The people of the back country, who are very numerous, seem most sincerely happy at returning to their union with Great Britain, and execrate the tyranny of their late rulers. Don't omit any opportunity of letting me hear from you."

EARL CORNWALLIS to ELIZABETH COUNTESS CORNWALLIS.

1780, July 14. Charlestown.—"I write this at a venture to New York; it is very uncertain when you may get it. I wrote about a fortnight ago the same way. We are here quite out of the world and hear nothing, and never shall, I fear, get our letters. I wished you joy before of William's very handsome action with La Mothe Piquet, and of his being to go home this summer; at the same time expressing my fears that some of his discontented friends would put him out of humour with the Admiralty and try to hinder his serving. As his reputation is now getting very high, and that he appears to be in the road to honour, and perhaps to fortune, I sincerely hope that will not happen."

SIR G. B. RODNEY to CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1780, July 20. Sandwich.—"Nothing can make me more happy than having an opportunity of congratulating you on your gallant behaviour against La Mothe Pique; all the letters I have intercepted acknowledge his great superiority, and allow that he was fairly beat by an inferior number. To have you with me will make [me] very happy, as I should then be certain of being well supported. I hope Sir Peter Parker will let you go home with the next convoy, your ship will then be in time to be coppered and to join me by January. The enemy mean for certain to have all their naval power in these seas; here Britain must rise or fall. I dare say you have read my letter. I wish all had been published. I meant it should, and was it to be wrote again, I would not alter a tittle. Had you been with me you would have been shocked, it was really too bad. Once more I can only say to have you with me will be the greatest favour the Admiralty can shew me."

ELIZABETH COUNTESS CORNWALLIS to CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1780, November 11. London.—"You know the impatience of my temper; the wind is consulted every hour of the day; and my good or ill humour depends entirely upon the going of the smoke.

I have had two letters from you since you met with Ternay, which made me give no credit to the applause given to your behaviour upon that occasion by the newspapers, until Mr. Pollock sent me the Gazette with your letter. I do not know which has been most commended, your conduct as an officer, or your manner of representing the affair. Both most highly I do assure you, and why did you not mention this event in your letters to me. I believe you feared I should grow too vain. Your pocket will not be much the richer for what you have been doing these two last years, but you are a great gainer in reputation, which in my opinion is much more valuable. No unlucky accident in your voyage home and I shall think the two years well spent.

"Your brother, with about 1,500 troops, has completely beat Gates, who had 6,500. It is impossible for anybody to have gained more honour than he has done; nobody talked of anything else for a fortnight. Ross, who came with the news, left London yesterday to return to America in the Packet.

"I hope this northerly wind will not blow you too near the French coast."

ELIZABETH COUNTESS CORNWALLIS to CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

[1780], November 20. Friday.—"The wind has been in all points of the compass to-day, my head and heart is full of you. . . . The more I think of your present employ, the worse I like it. Upon looking in the Red Book, I find a 40 and two 28 gun ships is all you are to have after you have passed the Bay, and the care of above two hundred merchantmen is not a very pleasant thing, when the French must know how small your force is, most likely they will send a much stronger to intercept you. They know exactly how far the large ships are to go with you. Without this alarming circumstance, the season of the year when storms must be expected which will probably separate them, would be full vexation enough. [I was so uncharitable as to think that if any accident happened to the convoy, it would be a great aleviation to the person who appointed it if any blame could be laid upon you.*] I fear all the care in the world may not be able to prevent some misfortunes happening. . . .

"When I got so far the Archbishop came in, wondered I could have any fears. He said the Ministry must know what ships the French had out, and where they were, that it was provided accordingly. He said Lord S[andwich] at dinner the other day, talking of this convoy, said you were the most promising young man in the service. The Archbishop said Lord North was present. Upon hearing of this I have scratched out all my uncharitableness, for so it must certainly be. He could have no view or interest in saying this when there was nobody belonging to you in company. I am quite reconciled to him, he has chosen you for this material convoy from the good opinion he has of you. May all my fears for you prove foolish and unreasonable."

* This sentence is erased.

The Earl of Sandwich to Captain the Hon. William Cornwallis, the Lion, Portsmouth.

1781, June 15. Admiralty.—"Though I am overwhelmed with applications, and involved in innumerable difficulties with regard to the promotion of Lieutenants to the rank of Master and Commander, yet I think your title to every mark of favour in consequence of your great merit as a sea officer is such, that I will endeavour to oblige you in the object you have in view, by taking an early opportunity to give promotion to Mr. Stone."

The Same to the Same.

1781, June 20. Admiralty.—"As the Canada is at present without a Captain, I do not lose a moment in informing you that she is at your service; the enclosed letter will shew you the estimation in which [s]he was held by her last Commander; and as I understand from other quarters that she is the best ship in the navy of her rate, I am sure I cannot do my duty better than by offering her to one of the most distinguished officers in the King's service.

"It is intended that the Canada shall go with Admiral Digby instead of the Valiant, which, upon consideration, is found unfit for the coast of America on account of her very great draught of water. We shall therefore give immediate directions for her being fitted for a foreign voyage."

Sir Sam. Hood to Captain the Hon. William Cornwallis, Canada.

[1781, October].* Tuesday evening. Barfleur.—"Major Cochran got safe to Lord Cornwallis, and the boat in which he went is come back. She left York the 9th, at night. The Charon is burnt by red hot shot, and the enemy throw shells into Lord Cornwallis's works, but cannot move his Lordship, who is in high spirits, has plenty of provisions, and the only man he has lost of any consequence is the head commissary. This is all I yet know, which I thought would be some satisfaction to you. I expect to hear more to-morrow from head quarters. The ships are mostly at Staten Island and will be here to-morrow if the wind permits."

Charles Townshend to Captain the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1782, February 6. Old Burlington Street.—"I am much obliged to you for your kind letter. The disagreeable news which it contained had arrived here before. I have the satisfaction to tell you that very few disapprove Lord Cornwallis's conduct, though Mr. Galloway and some of the refugees are endeavouring to write him down. The Duke of Chandos has moved for an enquiry into the causes of Lord Cornwallis's ill success, not with any ill intention to him. If this enquiry is not premature, it will turn out very much to his Lordship's advantage, because the disapprobation of the few who condemn him is founded on false facts and the grossest misrepresentations, which however can not be confuted without producing authentic documents to disprove them. Lord Cornwallis is very well and in good spirits. He left my nephew H. Brodrick in North America, posted to a battalion of Grenadiers.

* Cochrane reached Cornwallis on Oct. 10. See letter from Cornwallis to Clinton of Oct. 11. Cornwallis Correspondence, i. 124.

"The only public news which I have to send you is that Lord G. Germain is retired, and a peer. His removal does not yet appear to be attended with any change of measures, if we can credit reports. Arnold is to go out with a considerable command, and the American war is to [be] carried on with great vigour. The Commander-in-Chief is not yet appointed in the room of Clinton."

Captain Lord Longford to Captain the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1782, March 3. Alexander, 200 leagues west from Madeira.—"The Agamemnon and Magnificent being to part from us soon for the West ndies, I take that opportunity of sending my best wishes to my friend. I have the pleasure to tell you that I saw your brother Lord Cornwallis well in London the beginning of last month. We sailed to strengthen Sir Richard Bickerton and the India convoy the 7th of last month, and we have been so fortunate as to escape the French and Spanish fleets, both of whom we have reason to think have been out looking for us, the former 19 or 20 sail, and the latter 40 sail of the line and 15 frigates. The providential dispersion of the French fleet in December we are in hopes will save the West Indies, but with the force of French, Spaniards and Dutch, what is to become of Europe. I expect to return in a day or two with the Renown and Assistance under my orders, so I have a chance of picking up something in my way home; indeed, a little privateering seems to be all we have left to do. Pray tell Westly, if he has not heard it already, that his uncle Mr. Pole died in December last, and has left him his name and his estate. Times are so altered, my dear friend, since you and I went first to sea, that I find this is not what I bargained for; and as I see no prospect of things mending this war, I wish most sincerely we were well out of it; so wishing you patience and potatoes, and greens and good health, I remain, &c."

James [Cornwallis] Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry to his brother, Captain the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1782, April 1. Wimpole Street.—"I have received your two letters; and am sorry to find that after all your endeavours St. Kitts is gone. But although the public have sustained a loss by this expedition of the French, you have gained: I mean by a farther increase of reputation.

"The great inattention of the late Ministry to public affairs, and our many consequent disgraces, at last overturned them in a constitutional manner, and I have conceived great hopes that we should now have more vigour and activity. I am certain we cannot have less; and that we must have been totally ruined, had not our drowsy rulers been displaced. Some of them are rewarded, although most of them are bewailing their diminished consequence and receipts.

"My secretary received what was due to you last Christmas; and there is an end of that business. You will be member for Eye in a few days. My brother upon a supposition that Lord Sandwich would make a promotion, before he quitted, of Admirals, wrote to him for the Marines for you; he answered, that there would be no promotion. Skelton is to have or rather has a pension on the list, for it was done by Lord N[orth]. You are at present without any appointment, but entirely at liberty in Parliament and I have no doubt will be honourably taken care of, although some time may be required for it. I know your mind so well that I ventured to encourage my brother in this.

"It was absolutely necessary for him to get rid of Skelton, as he had entangled himself with him, and I have nothing now to regret, but that you should at present be without any appointment. It is, however, much better now that things were not attempted before. My brother stays in, but very few others, as the sweep is very general. I want you either to be in the Admiralty, or to have the Marines, which is most desirable.

"The King spoke very handsomely of you the other day to Tommy Townshend, the present Secretary at War."

Elizabeth Countess Cornwallis to the Hon. William Cornwallis, commanding the Canada.

1782, April 2. London.—"I received your two letters dated the 4th and the 7th of February, and had the great pleasure of seeing your name in the Gazette (in consequence of the accounts that came at the same time with those letters) mentioned in the most honorable manner, but my vanity was flattered before that paper came out. Your brother had a note from Lord Mulgrave in which he said you had distinguished yourself as usual; and he likewise had seen both Admiral Hood's and Affleck's letters to their brothers, who both spoke of you in most honorable terms, which soon circulated all over the town, and I had many congratulations before the Gazette came out. I have received your letter of the 21st of February, which gave me great pleasure to find you continued well. We had hoped Rodney might have been with you before the date of that letter; they say here that he stopped at the Madeira to take in wine, which people are angry at. Our continual losses and heavy taxes has put the people and Parliament so much out of humour that upon a question being moved which meant to address the King for a total change of Ministers, the Court had but nine majority. His Majesty then thought it proper to dismiss the administration and put it into the hands of Lords Rockingham and Shelburne; there is to be a total change in all the offices. Before I finish this letter probably all the new appointments may be made. The Boards are already fixed; Keppel at the head of the Admiralty, Harland, Pigot, T. Townshend, Lord Duncannon, Hopkins, Bret.

This last is reckoned particularly conversant in naval affairs. Leveson has called on me since this was fixed. I was not alone; those that were with me thought he did not express the joy in his countenance they expected. I will endeavour to get a list of all the changes before this letter goes. You mention the receiving but one letter in December. I have written two by every packet. When Minorca was taken from us some years ago it made a great noise; we are now so used to lose islands, we heard of its having capitulated without being the least concerned.

"Since I wrote the above Leveson has been with me again and seems in very good spirits. He is to have the Bombay Castle, which will be ready in six weeks, without some other ship he likes better should become vacant. I asked if Lord Howe was to command the great fleet, he said nothing as yet was settled. In his manner of answering there was nothing that looked like any suspicion of Lord Howe's objecting to it. In the course of the conversation, after having told me Admiral Keppel was very particularly pleased with my card of congratulation to him, he then talked of what it was probable the French would do when Rodney had joined you. He said they would either go to leeward (by which I suppose he meant Jamaica), or to America, or come home, which last he thought more likely; in that case, some of our West India fleet would come home. He then asked me if I wished the Canada to be one of those? I answered 'I shall always be happy to see him.' You have told me often never to meddle with your destinations; I cannot ever give a greater proof of my obedience than I have done in this case. Perhaps he meant nothing by this question; but it was a subject my heart was so interested in, that if my fears of disobliging you had not been very great, I could not have conquered the extreme desire I had of knowing whether it was a thing thrown out by chance, and likewise eagerly expressing the happiness it would give me, but I withstood this great temptation. I suppose you will write by the first opportunity to congratulate perhaps both Admiral Keppel and Mr. Leveson, most certainly to the latter; and then, if you think it proper, you may tell him how much his question (from my fear of offending you) perplexed me. My answer would have come with great alacrity had I only consulted my own inclinations upon it. Leveson talks of you always with the most cordial friendship. Barrington as usual made me a visit upon the accounts we had of your action with the French. He told me if there was a possibility of distinguishing himself Captain Cornwallis would always do it. He was ordered down to Portsmouth the end of last week, by which it is plain he is now to serve. . . .

"Only a very few which were particularly named by the King keep their places. . . . Lord North is well off; he has the Cinque Ports for life made up to him 4,000*l* a year, and this likewise gives him the bringing in four members of Parliament. If our new Administration can give us a peace they will be very well with me.

"Your brother talks of writing, but he has got his children with him in Albemarle Street, and I wish they may give him time. They are always with him when he is at home."

ELIZABETH LADY CORNWALLIS to CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1782, April 3 [London].—"My letters will discover how stupid I grow, indeed much too old to correspond with any one that will pay any further regard to her letters than the inclination she has to show her affection. . . . The first audience Mr. T. T[ownshend] had upon his being appointed Secretary at War, his Majesty was very gracious, and talked a great deal to him. He commended your brother and you, but what surprised me very much, spoke handsomely of me, so I was told. I suppose my merit was producing two such sons. Lord Shelburne and your brother have been upon a very friendly foot ever since he came from America. Lord S. has the Home and Colonies province, C. F[ox] the Foreign. Lord de Ferrars is much pleased with Lord Shelburne. He had never applied to him; his Lordship sent for him, inquired what he wished to have, which was the Band of Pensioners; he had it the next day. The spirits of the people, they tell me, are much raised with the change of Administration; if they can bring about peace, they will be very popular. The money by the last Administration was little attended to; they had not the least thought of preventing everyone squandering what they pleased. The people who felt the weight of the taxes resented this neglect so strongly, it is the opinion of many we were in danger of having commotions at home, had the ministry not been changed. . . . I suppose they are not pleased at Lambeth with this change of the ministry. The Archbishop told me he should support government, which I was glad to hear. The Duke of Portland is to be Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and Lord Carlisle is to have Lord Talbot's place, Steward of the Household. You do not care a farthing about all this."

ELIZABETH COUNTESS CORNWALLIS to CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1782, April 6.—" . . . Lord Howe has not kissed hands, but I believe it is very certain he is to be an English Peer, and it is confidently said he will have the command of the Home fleet. Everything here is so changeable that what is truth to-day may be false to-morrow. Keppel's advertisement was published in the newspapers for his re-election for Surrey, for two or three days; so sudden was the determination to make him a peer. I have been told, upon mentioning Lord Howe's being made an English peer, his Majesty of his own motion proposed making Keppel a peer. Lord Altrop stands in his room for Surrey. Lord Spencer has a large estate in that county. Your election at Eye was upon Wednesday last. They were all in high good humour upon the occasion . . . Duke of Portland is to be Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and General Burgoyne to be Commander in Chief in Ireland."

[1782, April.]—Verses on the fight between Rodney and De Grasse.

On April the twelfth, by the dawn of the day
The French fleet were discovered to have borne away ;
The loss of a foremast to one of their fleet
Gave cause to us Britons our prospect to greet.
We formed our line, boys, in haste to be sure,
For a sudden attack is the dread of Monsieur.
Our tacks they were different, the French on the larboard,
With a full sail to meet them, we stood on the starboard.
Drake commanded the van, whose ships were all good,
The rear (some of whom had suffer'd the ninth) under Hood.
The French suffer'd most in passing the tack
And the Glorieux, a 74, lay a mere wreck ;
The top-sails of the French Admiral* were both of them shot down,
And he seem'd then to lie ready our honour to crown.
Many more of their ships were brought very low
And with their wood bottoms scarce able to go.

It was now only ten, my brave boys, 'twas no more ;
Had e'er England a prospect so glorious before ?
Our Admiral seized the moment a maintopsail to bend,
But for masts, sail and rigging, there seemed no need to mend.
The Formidable look'd all so spruce and so new
A bold leader she wanted and seem'd to call for Sir Hugh.†
This maintopsail when bent, my brave boys, alack,
What use did they put it to ? Why laid it aback!
The French fleet were beaten and put to the run
And the English with copper bottoms look'd on the fun ;
To larboard a sweep did Hood's squadron make
And the Cæsar and Ardent did both of them take.
Our Chief he lay quiet, with good ships around him,
Some willing to move, but, the devil confound him,
He made no signal to chase nor would let others go,
Those who were willing to follow the foe.

Cries Fanshaw, Sir George, pray let me stretch on ;
My men are willing, my ship in condition.
No, no, cries Sir George, I'll be supported i' faith ;
What, leave your own Admiral, a Knight of the Bath,
To follow a Frenchman with the Cross of St. Louis ?
Lay all aback or by —— I'll undo ye.
A ship or two push'd on, whether he would or no,
Intent upon honour and to conquer the foe ;
By which the French Admiral and Hector were taken,
And this perhaps may save our brave Admiral's bacon.
At night he lay to, in the victorious field,
Tho' the poor beaten French were ready to yield.
Had a chief worthy Britain commanded our fleet,
Twenty-five good French ships had been laid at our feet!
In Captain William Cornwallis' handwriting. [Printed in Blockade of Brest, i., xvii.]

* The Ville de Paris. † Sir Hugh Palliser.

The Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry to Captain the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1782, May 1. Wimpole Street.—". . . I shall entirely support the new Ministry; to-day the Contractors' Bill comes on in the House of Lords, which I hope will pass. The last Ministry have brought this country to the last stage of misery and dispair. The present set out well, and I hope will exhibit the rare instance of honesty in power. Nothing but the united efforts of the good and great can save this country. We have done well in naval matters, since the change in the Admiralty. Barrington has been very successful, and a few Captains will get great wealth. Your name stands very high, I assure you, and I hope you will soon be rewarded as you ought. . .

"My brother is in good spirits and has a prospect of being very soon exchanged, perhaps in a fortnight. We are very apprehensive for Jamaica."

Earl Cornwallis to Captain the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1782, May 1. London.—"I wrote to you by the last packet to inform you of your being chose for Eye, and to request in the strongest manner that you would never look to my conduct in the political line, but act entirely for yourself, and consider yourself, as you really are, as independent as any member in the House of Commons. I likewise repeat, in case my former letter should have been miscarried, my warmest congratulations on the distinguished figure which you made in the action off St. Kitts. I have now a prospect of being speedily exchanged, and, if any service offers, of being employed, as there are few of our Generals who wish to quit their easy chairs, unless it is to command an English camp."

Elizabeth Countess Cornwallis to Captain the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1782, May 27. London.—"Your victory has been paid great honour to here, guns firing, lighting up houses, et cetera; if everybody had been as silent as yourself, the great share you had in it would still have been a secret. However, I was early made happy by your brother's being informed by Mr. Stephens very soon after the arrival of the news of your safety, and the having most honourably distinguished yourself; this was his note. Mrs. Leveson, a few hours afterwards, sent me a paragraph out of a letter which she had read, with very glorious particulars of your behaviour. When I shewed it to Mrs. Cornwallis, she said my Lord Lisburn had brought a letter to Lambeth, that still raised your behaviour higher, which I thought impossible. The newspapers have contributed their parts very amply in doing you justice. When your brother brought me Stephens' note, tears of joy came into his eyes. He has appeared to me to feel this happy event full as much as I did. I had, very soon after the news came, a card from Lady Howe, of congratulations for your safety, to which was added the strongest applause for the gallantry of your conduct. The Bishop of Lichfield was at the levée the Friday after the news came. His Majesty made your praise the subject of his conversation to him. The Bishop of Lichfield saw Captain Biron at the levée who spoke of your behaviour in the highest terms, and I am told Rodney in his private letters has been very lavish in your praise. Most certainly no one can stand higher in the opinion of all people in your profession than you do, which is a great happiness to me, but why would you not accept the Admiral's offer of the Ville de Paris? By all the accounts we have had here you had a very considerable share in the taking of her; the coming home in her would have been an éclat, and what is more material to me, I should have had the comfort of seeing you soon, as she will be sent home I imagine in a few months. Perhaps that would have been an objection to you; if so I withdraw my wishes, for they are always governed by what you like. Myself is always out of the question where you are concerned, and I should be more happy with your being in the West Indies than nearer me, did I know that it was your own choice.

"Admiral Pigot had been some time waiting for a wind at Plymouth; as soon as the news of your victory arrived an express was dispatched to stop him, but he sailed the very day that Cranston came to London. I fancy Rodney will be glad it so happened; all his friends here were impatient to hear Pigot was sailed, as nothing could be more fortunate for Rodney at this time. He will find himself very popular again, for he had lost that very much after the taking of St. Eustatia. An English peerage, his circumstances now are I suppose very good, and high in favour with the people, he seems to have nothing further to wish for but to come home and enjoy his good fortune. Hood is to be an Irish peer, and Affick a baronet. Just a week after the arrival of Lord Cranston came the Euridice with the duplicates of the Admiral's letters; she likewise brought in a letter from Sir James Wallace that Hood's squadron had taken two line of battle ships and a frigate. . .

"Lord Howe was sent in hopes of catching a Dutch fleet, but they are still in the Texel. At present he is blocking them up there. . . . Admiral Drake is to be a baronet, as well as Affleck."

Earl Cornwallis to Captain the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1782, May 27. London.—"I most heartily congratulate you on the glorious victory of the 12th of April, and on the very conspicuous share which all the world acknowledges you had in the honour of that memorable day. It has been the greatest victory since Tourville's [defeat] and I hope has saved us from the jaws of a most humiliating and ignominious peace. The loss of poor Lord Robert Manners gave me the most sincere concern; he seemed determined to walk in your steps, and it is in vain that we have ships and seamen when we want officers.

"I have now a thing to mention to you in regard to myself, which is a secret to everybody except my brother James. There is great reason to hope that my exchange may be immediately managed, and if that should be the case, it is however doubtful, I am to be Governor and Commander-in-Chief in India. The military part of the prospect is not brilliant, but what field is now open this war to a soldier. My appointments will be great, and, without deviating from the strictest honour, I must have it in my power to put my children in a better situation. If you was to come home, I think it not impossible but that I might be able to procure the offer of the naval command for you in that part of the world. I have, however, no authority for this opinion, but my general idea that those who would think me proper to be placed in so delicate and responsible a situation, would wish to give me every means of carrying on the service to advantage. If this either should not be the case, or that the service should not be agreeable to you, I think there can be no great objection to your coming home. Your reputation is now so high in your profession that I think with any Admiralty you might choose your ship and station, and with the present you might probably get some command. All this, however, I still submit to your judgment, which in what concerns your profession must be better than mine. There are three points doubtful—1st, whether I go to India, 2nd, whether I can procure for you the offer of the naval command; and 3rdly, whether you would like it, and whether you would not think our both taking a probably last leave of my mother would not be too severe a stroke to inflict on her; and then you are to consider whether the West India station is likely to be more eligible for you than the Home station with Keppel at the head of the Admiralty and Lord Howe commanding the squadron. You will not, of course, mention a word about India. My mother has been wonderfully well this winter; she has now a cold that has attacked everybody, but is recovering. I hardly know a house in town in which two-thirds of the inhabitants are not sick.

" Rodney is to be an English Peer, Hood an Irish one. Drake and Affleck, Baronets, and Jarvis a Knight of the Bath. Pigot's sailing from Plymouth the day that the news came to London was critically unlucky; whatever may be the intrinsic merit of the individuals he certainly assumes the command under every disadvantage, and you may easily conceive how unpopular the measure of recalling Rodney is grown among the populace."

The Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry to Captain the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1782, May 27. London.—" We have again to congratulate you upon the conspicuous share that the Canada had in our last glorious victory. The King on Friday spoke very highly of your conduct, and to-day his first Minister, Lord Rockingham, was as strong in his commendations of you to me. Fame, I know, is your first object, and you have happily obtained as full a portion as you could have wished of it. We have had four hours' conversation upon this subject in the House of Lords to-day. Lord Sandwich wanted to make Rodney an Earl, or at least a Viscount, and to settle 2,000*l*. per annum upon the title. Lord Keppel did very well and supported his arguments exceedingly well. Hood will certainly at least be an Irish peer; all sides were very loud in praises of him."

ELIZABETH COUNTESS CORNWALLIS to CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

[1782, May 28. London.]—"I sent yesterday a very long letter to Mr. Rogers to put up for you, so full of people's general applause of your behaviour in the late action that I doubt your modesty will be offended and perhaps my letter may have a chance of not being read to the end, therefore I shall name but one person upon the same topic in this. Lord Rockingham came up to the B[ishop] of L[ichfield] yesterday in the House of Lords, on purpose to say all the fine things that could be said of your behaviour, and now I will not tire you any more upon that subject; to repeat all I have heard would be endless.

"Bateman came to London three weeks ago, and married Betty. . . . Daniel now is the oldest servant I have. My Ministry is entirely changed as well as His Majesty's. I shall think the latter a happy change indeed if it should occasion a peace; it is strongly their desire. The late Ministry was certainly exceedingly wrong in commencing the war with Holland, when we had so many enemies upon our hands; watching the Dutch alone takes up a great part of our fleet. . . .

"Both your brothers and C[harles] T[ownshend] had your letters. The Archbishop did not mention having had one when he came to congratulate me upon your account. I suppose therefore he had not received one, but I cannot tell; he has been ever since confined with the gout. Last night I had the pleasure of receiving yours that came by the Euridice dated April the 21st. We have heard nothing of Mr. Pole yet. Coming away at the time he did I think has entirely destroyed all that passed between him and Mr. Pole (sic). I cannot now suppose he was so fond of the profession as really to run the risk of losing such an estate, rather than leave it improperly. His mother was sorry, she said, that he came away. I told you in my last that Cornwallis was come home. I must send my letter for fear of not catching Mr. Stephens. How heartily do I wish for peace?"

C[AROLINE] CORNWALLIS, wife of the Archbishop of Canterbury, to CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1782, May 29. Lambeth House.—"Though both your mother and Lord Cornwallis write to you by the present opportunity, yet I can not forbear sending a few lines to return you the Archbishop's thanks as well as my own for both your kind letters, and to congratulate you most heartily upon the glorious victory, in which we have the pleasure of hearing from others, though not from yourself, you had so large a share. I am sure Wesley will be very much mortified that he left you at so critical a time, and lost his share of the glory. He is not yet arrived, and I have not seen Lady Mornington since she knew of his coming, so cannot tell what she thinks about it; but it seems to me to be great pity that he should not have stayed out at least this campaign.

"The Archbishop would have wrote to you himself, but has got a slight touch of the gout, just enough I hope to be wholesome for him, as it is in a very regular way, and he is otherwise perfectly well. He desires his kindest love to you. . . .

"You may easily imagine what general joy your late victory has spread over the whole nation; at least in that we were all united."

EARL CORNWALLIS to CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1782, July 3. London.—"I have written several letters to you, in confidence, relative to my going as Governor-General and Commander-in-Chief to the East Indies; that event seems now more probable than it did, but I fear the naval command is out of the question, as Keppel insists on an Admiral, and has named old Parker. Lord Shelburne will, I am sure, exert himself to procure you a broad pennant as second in command, but, as the new Ministers do not always draw together, I can not answer for the Admiralty. Keppel, however, joins with all the world in doing you justice and speaking of you in the handsomest manner. I have already stated the case fully to you, but for fear of accidents I will repeat that your character is now so high that you cannot be hurt by coming home if you like it, that there is a possibility of your going to India in an agreeable manner, and that otherwise you may choose your ship and station, let who will be at the head of the Admiralty Jarvis spoke of you in the highest terms to Lord Shelburne, and said that it would be a disgrace to the Administration if you did not receive some distinguished mark of favour."

I will not write any more, thinking it probable that the fleet may have left Jamaica before this letter arrives, and that you may possibly be on your way home.

LORD RODNEY to CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1782, July, Saturday morning.——.—"I cannot have greater pleasure than my having in my power to comply [with the req]uest that you honour me with. I think after getting through the gulph, the convoy for the West India trade will be sufficient for their protection, and therefore the Canada, Resolution, and Montagu should make the best of their way for England, where in all probability, they will be much wanted."

LORD LONGFORD to CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1782, October 29. Alexander at sea, off Cape St Vincent.—"I take the opportunity of our friend Onslow going to the West Indies to send you my best wishes and congratulation upon the success of our fleet in the West Indies, and the very conspicuous and honourable share you had in it. Onslow will tell you of our having relieved Gibraltar and of the many fortunate circumstances which enabled us to do it in the face of a superior fleet, with whom we have had a brush of so extraordinary a kind that I will not attempt to describe it lest you should not believe it. It is enough to say that after having chased us, they were afraid to come near, and we had a distant cannonade by moonlight, in which I had three men killed and a few wounded. I hear your ship is bad, and that we may hope soon to see you at home."

VISCOUNT KEPPEL to CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1782, November 6. Admiralty.—"I am favoured with your note, and shall be at your commands to-morrow at twelve o'clock. The intimation in your note relative to your feeling neglected since your return to England, I could not read without a degree of an uneasiness lest what you say is directed to me personally. It is not from every officer I should feel as I must ever do towards you, for, believe me, I have without deviation constantly considered you amongst those I wished most sincerely well to, and whose good opinion I much coveted. Your services and peculiar merits in the full execution of them needs no comment and praise from me; the whole fleet have universally given the strongest testimony to the world of it."

The SAME to the SAME.

1782, December 18. Admiralty.—"I am favoured with your letter of this day, and cannot help in my reply assuring you of my concern at your still conceiving me to have treated you improperly. I stated myself when you called at the Admiralty without reserve, and I hoped so as to have been credited, that I had not intentionally wished to have shewed neglect towards you. The bad condition of the Canada required her being dismantled; and I am ready to own your constant and excellent services gives you, in justice, claim to the attention of every First Lord of the Admiralty less acquainted with you than I have been, at least have considered myself; much more should it be my duty and will be to shew you, when in my power, the value I set upon your merits. Your friendship and good opinion I must ever wish, consistent with my character as a public and private man. My regard to truth, as well as esteem for your merits, will never permit me to mis-state you anywhere, but most especially if questioned by His Majesty at any time upon the subject of your being at present upon half pay.

"I cannot close my letter without venturing a thought, which is that some enemy of mine has used pains with you to create in your mind the opinion of my intentional neglect towards you. It is a matter which will ever be a concern to me."

The SAME to the SAME.

1782, December 26. Admiralty.—"Captain Sir John Jervis is likely to be employed immediately upon a particular service, which will most probably occasion the Foudroyant at Plymouth to become vacant. Sir John will leave her without dismantling of her, in drafting any of her seamen. She will be tolerably perfect in her complement, except marines, which will be taken from her, as is done to almost every ship serving at home at present except the Victory, and one or two ships hurrying upon immediate service. Having stated the particulars of the Foudroyant, I cannot think of offering the command to any officer till I know your inclinations. Whatever they are, I shall wish to show you my readiness in being as useful as my power may permit."

The Same to the Same.

1782, December 30. Admiralty.—Will give directions for the drawing up of his commission as Captain of the Foudroyant.

The Same to the Same.

1783, January 6. Admiralty.—Much fears that poor Charles Fielding cannot live long, in which case the Ganges will be vacant. Prays him to call at the Admiralty to speak with him on the subject.

Viscount Howe to Captain the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1784, March 31. Admiralty.—"I am now enabled to inform you of everything that could be done in conformity to your intimation of the opposition said to be intended against you last night. Lord Hood, I acquainted you before, is engaged by the commencement of his own poll to-morrow. Lord Barrington writes by this post to let you know why he is prevented from being present at yours; and Admiral Rowley is confined to his bed by a feverish complaint. But Major Varlo set out for Portsmouth to-day, and he assures me he shall be able to engage 10 or 12 votes. I shall be glad to know hereafter how far he may be able to succeed in that expectation, as it is desirable to know the extent of the obligations we may be under to our different friends. Mr. Rickman sets out this evening, and lies upon the road to be down in time for you to-morrow morning. Mr. William White called upon me this morning to acquaint me he would begin his journey also, to-day, but expressed indecision on the part he should take at the election, though he by no means expressed himself in hostile terms. I believe he waits to see what part the Messrs. Carter take, to regulate his own conduct by their example if a third candidate should start at the post. I hear Mr. Erskine is in town to-day, but whether in view to go off also this evening, to offer when the poll opens, I have not been able to find out."

Captain Horatio Nelson to Captain the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1784, October 25. Boreas, English harbour, Antigua.—"My dear friend—By the Zebra sloop of war who sails for England to-morrow, I can't help asking how you do, and to shew that I am alive. This place during the hurricane months has been hotter than I ever felt it in this country. Poor Jamaica, what a sad calamity; I wish any vessel was going from this place that I might send something to poor Cuba, for provisions are in great plenty here, and I suppose very dear at Kingston. As to this station I dislike it as much as ever. The Admiral I shall say nothing about; his aptain's name is Kelly, was Gardner's first Lieutenant in the Sultan, an ignorant self-sufficient man; the others are ignoramus's except Collingwood, who is a very good officer and an amiable character, but unfortunately he has been at Grenada during the hurricane months, therefore I can have no wish to remain upon this station, for the Commissioner I hear is to be recalled, and then I shall lose my only female friend in these islands (Mrs. Moutray). You know her, and I think her a very amiable woman; there [their] house has been open to me, with a bedchamber, during my broil at this place. Lady Hughes I detest, but, after all, in my ship I am very comfortable, very good officers are the Lieutenants. Apropos, young Beale, the gunner's son, is on board; he behaves vastly well. I say this as you may wish if he deserves it to do something for him; he is a very attentive, sober young man as can possibly be. I have sent a small cask of haddocks, which I hope you [will] accept from your faithful, affectionate friend, Horatio Nelson.

"Pray remember me to Capt. Gardner, or any other our mutual friends. Compliments to Capt. Leveson. We all sail from this on the 1st of November for Barbadoes. I understand we are all to dance attendance upon the flag-ship."

LORD HOWE to CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1785, November 17.—". . . I am sorry to hear from Mr. Leveson that you are a fellow sufferer with me. . . . I flatter myself I have not frequently trespassed against the rules of temperance, but when you, who are the pattern of self-denial, don't escape this tax upon luxury, I am taught to bear my lot with greater patience."

The SAME to the SAME.

1787, September 24. Admiralty.—Informing him that the King had appointed him Colonel of Marines at Plymouth.

HENRY DUNDAS to CAPTAIN the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1788, September 22. Edinburgh.—"Lord Chatham has communicated to me the intention of sending a squadron to the East Indies under your command. . . .

"There is a young gentleman, Mr. Robert Grant, whom I would ask the favour of you to take as a midshipman under your command. He was educated by Admiral Duncan, at whose suggestion I write to you, as he is a young man in whom both he and I are interested. He has passed as a lieutenant, and from what Admiral Duncan states to me, he is worthy of my protection. If he was not so I would not recommend him to yours."

Postscript.—"If there is anything in my official situation that can enable me to render either your voyage or your residence in India more comfortable to you, I hope you will favour me with your commands. I was already successful in prevailing with the Directors of the East India Company in making allowances to the commanders of His Majesty's ships in India, in addition to what they receive from the King."

Captain Horatio Nelson to Commodore the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1788, October 8. Burnham, Norfolk.—"My dear friend, although I am set down here in a country life, yet (and although happily married) I always shall, as I have ever done, be ready to step forth whenever service requires or my friends may wish me to serve. Fame says you are going out with a command. If in either actual service, or a wish of yours to accept of me under your command who reveres and esteems you, I am ready and willing to go forth, and, by a strict adherence to your orders as my superior and wishes as my friend, prove myself worthy of the friendship you have honoured me with, for indeed I am, with great truth, your sincere and affectionate, Horatio Nelson."

The Same to the Same.

1788, October 13. Burnham.—"I received your kind letter on Saturday, and was sorry to think that you could suppose any situation in life could ever diminish the ardour, I trust it has been always conspicuous, I have to serve my country (although I am as happy in domestic life as any person can be). My wish has been (for I may now say a series of years) to serve under you. However I trust you have selected officers who will do credit to your choice more able ones I am sensible are easily met with, but one more attached or affectionate than myself I will not so readily yield to. Such things has been that officers have not liked to go to India, although I have no doubt but your penetration is too good to have made a choice where such a thing could happen. But should any event take place which should increase the number of ships, or prevent any of your present choice from going, and none presenting themselves who you will wisely prefer to your rural friend, always recollect that I can leave my humble and peaceful cottage, and believe me as ever your faithful and affectionate, Horatio Nelson.

"Pardon my sending the enclosed. If it is of any use, it will give me satisfaction."

The Enclosure :—

"Our master in the Seahorse was a very clever man, and we constantly took the lunar observations; therefore I have no doubt but you will find the Seahorse log book almost (if not the) best of any in the Navy Office. It would be impertinent of me to say much on this subject. We went the outward passage, made the islands of St. Paul and Amsterdam before we haul'd to the northward. The only caution in approaching the peninsula of India is to be assured you are well to the eastward, for in April, May and June the currents often sett so strong to the westward that ships fancying themselves far to the eastward and to the northward of Ceylon haul up westerly and get foul of the Moldivas, or are so far up the Malabar coast that great risk is run in getting round Ceylon again. There is no danger whatever in keeping well to the eastward, and with the S.W. monsoon, which then blows half way up the Island of Ceylon, 100 or 150 leagues is very soon run, with the wind a point free or clean full."

SIR FRANCIS DRAKE to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1788, October 14. Send Grove.—Thanking him for his promise to take young Mr. Christopher Cole under him in the Crown, and recommending the Rev. Christopher Wells (who was with himself in the last war) as chaplain.

THE BISHOP OF LICHFIELD to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

[1789, January.] Wednesday. Eccleshall.—"We are very sorry to think that the time of your departure draws so near,* . . . but there is not the least possibility that the new ministry will make any alteration in the naval command in India. Some public matters which have lately come out tend to confirm my opinion of the duplicity of a great man. . . . I do not care whether I ever receive any future ministerial favour whatever, but nothing shall induce me to join the two generals in a factious opposition to serve the ambitious purposes of any man, after government is maimed and weakened to a great degree. You will be returned for Eye with Phillipson if he chooses it, but last spring he talked of declining. As he is a good deal influenced by Goldsworthy, I conclude he will continue very violent. . . .'

EARL CORNWALLIS to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1789, January 29. Calcutta.—"The Swallow packet arrived on the 22nd instant, and relieved the anxiety I had so long suffered about Brome. I acknowledge with many thanks for your kind attention, your letters dated June 1st, July 12th, 16th and 21st, and August 21st. The accounts you give of politics is by no means pleasing, and from every consideration, both public and private, I feel the most sincere concern at Lord Howe's going out. Bathurst's voting against him has hurt me exceedingly, but it is one of those plagues that a man must make up his mind to.

* Cornwallis sailed on February 13.

"I am very sorry to hear that you have returns of the complaint in your eyes; for God's sake beware of quacks, it is too serious a stake to trifle with the eyesight. I think it is a gouty humour, and wish you would always suggest that idea to the consideration of any medical person whom you may consult. I have enjoyed most perfect health in this country, and hope I shall have no cause to repent of my arduous undertaking. My savings with the utmost propriety of living are vastly beyond my expectations, and by the 1st of January, 1791, will exceed 90,000*l*.

"I hope by this time I am Master of Fernham; I have worried the Bishop pretty well on that score."

The Same to the Same.

1789, March 10. Calcutta.—"I wrote to you some time since about your coming into Parliament. In regard to Portsmouth you must judge for yourself, there is no advising you about it, but I own I should be very sorry that you should decline Parliament altogether. Eye is entirely at your service, and need be no restraint upon you in point of attendance, or any other consideration.

"I have had so much plague with that borough that I should not wish to engage hastily with a stranger. I have therefore wished that Ross should fill one seat, and that either you, or if you should be chosen for Portsmouth, and have difficulties about making your election before I arrive, that Phillipson should lend his name for the other, and then take the Chiltern Hundreds. It would be very unpleasant at my time of life to be closely connected with a man for seven years that would be disagreeable to the borough or plaguing to myself.

"I hope the Bishop has dashed at Fernham, indeed I wish he had bought both Sir Charles Kent's estate and Saxham. It can never be a good plan for a man in my line of life to keep a large sum of money in the funds, and there is no mode of disposing of it more rational or agreeable than securing a considerable property and command near the family mansion.

"James talks of buying little copyhold farms, as he would for a sugar-baker who was retiring from business. I should, however, be very ungrateful to abuse him, for he has taken infinite pains about all my affairs, and particularly about Brome, the dearest concern of all.

"Our affairs here go on as well as I could reasonably expect, and I hope to bring home some remains of constitution in the year 1791."

The Bishop of Lichfield to Commodore the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1789, March 25. Wimpole Street.—". . The King continues well, but has not yet appeared in public. To-morrow the Queen will have the first Drawing-room, which will be crowded to a great degree. Everything goes on quietly; the King and ministry very popular. . . . Lord Lothian is turned out. He might have had an Irish regiment and a pension for his daughters, but refused both. The Duke of Queenborough is also out. Eden is talked of for the Hague and a peerage. . . . Nothing going forward but addresses, rejoicings, &c."

MRS. C. CORNWALLIS to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1789, April 29. Seymour Place.—". . . We have nothing here now but rejoicing, feasting and dancing; you left us in a very different situation. The Thanksgiving day at St. Paul's went off extremely well, and without any accident, which, considering the immense crowds everywhere, was very fortunate. I kept quiet at home; and contented myself with going to my own little chapel at May fair. The illuminations the night after were the most magnificent that ever were exhibited. It is said pretty confidently that the King is to go to Hanover this summer. . . ."

EARL CORNWALLIS to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1789, June 27. Calcutta.—" It gave me great pleasure to learn yesterday by the arrival of the Melville Castle Indiaman that your squadron had actually sailed from Portsmouth on the 13th of February, and my private letters assured me that you was then in perfect health. I sincerely hope that your command may not prove disagreeable to you, and that it is put on such a footing as to enable you to save some money.

" I conclude your first destination will be to Madras, but I trust I shall very soon see you here, for you know I cannot go to you. You will be the best judge of the properest time for coming, and of the disposition of your ships; I can hardly think however that you will bring the Crown hither, and indeed it would require great care and attention to bring in one of the large frigates; by notifying your intentions to me you shall have the best assistance we can give. In spite of Mr. Lacam this can never be a man-of-war's port.

" I, last winter, sent two vessels under an intelligent officer of the Bombay marine, to survey and examine the great Andaman, who discovered two good harbours, one of which on the east side, near the south end of the island, appears capable of containing all the fleets of Europe, and is so circumstanced as to be very easy to repair to or to depart from at any season in the year, and during either of the monsoons, and may be supplied with provisions from hence in a very short time, especially in the north-east monsoon. The inhabitants are Caffres, and although they are by no means inclined to be civil to strangers, are not of so ferocious a disposition as they have been reported; they live entirely on fish, and there are no animals but wild hogs, and no appearance of cultivation. I intend to send the same officer, Captain Blair, in August, to take possession of the island, and in particular of this harbour, and I should hope that in the course of the winter you would either go in person, or send some officers on whom you can depend, to pass a final judgment on this very important business. If it should be found to answer, I should remove the establishment from Prince of Wales's Island thither. I have kept this discovery as secret as I could, and of course you will do the same.

"The King's recovery has made me very happy. I shall continue to write to you as anything occurs to me that I think you would wish to know. Matters here go on prosperously, and you will hear at Madras that the French are going to withdraw their military establishments to Mauritius and leave only a factory at Pondicherry. If it should come in your way to be personally civil to the Comte de Conway, I beg to recommend it to you, as he has uniformly shown me the greatest attention. I cannot express how happy I shall be to see you."

The Same to the Same.

1789, June 29. Calcutta.—"I heard yesterday that the Sulivan Indiaman had arrived at Madras on the 11th instant, and reported that you was going into Madeira Road on the 26th of February, where you meant only to stay a week, and then proceed without touching at any other place to Madras.

"I am afraid I was too discouraging in my letter of the 27th about bringing your large frigates hither; there can be no danger if proper care is taken, as they do not draw so much water as an Indiaman. I recollected that the Venus, a French frigate of 36 guns, struck and suffered considerable damage in the year 1786, but, on particular enquiry, I learned that it was entirely owing to their own carelessness in not observing the directions of the pilot about their cable when they came to an anchor.

"I think you will find Madras very disagreeable, and I am sure on every account you will be glad to come here as soon as possible. Any of your ships will lay very well at Diamond harbour, at which place the seamen of the India ships, who are not taken much care of, have by no means been sickly, and you shall have as much quiet here as your situation will admit of."

Lord Hood to the Hon. William Cornwallis, Commander-in-Chief, East Indies.

[1789], August 18. Plymouth Dock.—"I cannot write to you so fully as my inclinations lead me to do, being in attendance upon their Majesties. I arrived here on Thursday, to see all was right for the royal reception. The King, Queen, and Princesses came to Lord Borringdon's at Saltram Saturday afternoon, and are expected every moment in this dock-yard. To-morrow the King reviews the Evolution squadron of seven sail of the line, wind and weather permitting, and it is understood his Majesty will remain in this neighbourhood until the 24th.

"I flatter myself you will be pleased to see Sir Richard Strachan's orders signed by our mutual friend Sir F. S. Drake, whose seat at the Admiralty Board is highly gratifying to me."

Earl Cornwallis to Commodore the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1789, September 5. Calcutta.—"As the length of your voyage has exceeded my expectation, I will not pretend to calculate the time when you may arrive, but in case you should not have determined how to dispose of your squadron, which must leave the coast of Coromandel by the 14th of next month, I wish to give you every information I can to assist your decision. If you mean when you come hither in a frigate to order the rest of the ships to Bombay, I know of no political objection to it; you will hear much at Madras of Tippoo's intention to attack our ally the Rajah of Travancore, but the same reports have prevailed for these last two years, and I think it highly improbable that he would adopt so rash a measure, at a time when his tributary Rajahs on the coast of Malabar are nearly in a state of rebellion, when he can expect no possible assistance from the French, and when he must be assured that our whole force would be employed against him, and has the greatest reason to apprehend that we are sufficiently connected with the Marattas and the Nizam to induce them to attack his northern frontier. But even in the event of Tippoo's commencing hostilities, I should conceive in the approaching season that the fleet might co-operate as usefully on the Malabar as on the Coromandel coast. If you should wish to keep the ships on the eastern side of the Peninsula, you may either send them to Trincomalè, of the convenience of which place you will get better information at Madras than I can give you, or, what I should think preferable, to Prince of Wales's Island, where the climate is good, and the ships will lay in perfect security; and where I am assured they will find provisions of all sorts in abundance except wheat, of which we can send supplies from hence to any amount.

"I have sent Blair again to the Andaman Island, but shall keep the Viper sloop, which is to follow him, as long as I conveniently can, that you may have an opportunity of conveying any orders or directions that you may think proper to give to Lieutenant Blair.

"My last letter from the Bishop was dated the 27th of March, all well; they foolishly sent on a letter hither from him to you, which came by the same ship, and was directed to Madras."

The Nabob Wallajah Behauder to Commodore the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1789, September 22. Chepauck.—Praying him to represent to the Governor General the inconveniences under which he is suffering and obtain him relief. It is impossible for him to pay the July kist as stipulated, his treaty made with Sir Archibald Campbell having far exceeded his abilities of payment, and he therefore prays either for a reduction of the amount or indulgence in point of time. The late treaty sent out by the Court of Directors administers some relief, but being accompanied with requisitions degrading to his dignity, he cannot accede to it as it now stands.

W. W. Grenville to Commodore the Hon William Cornwallis.

1789, November 2. Whitehall.—"Mons. de Mollinedo, secretary to the embassy from the Court of Spain, having represented that it is his Catholic Majesty's intention to fit out two frigates, under the command of Don Alexander Melaspina and Don Joseph Butamente, for the purpose of making a voyage round the world, . . . I have the King's commands to signify to you his Majesty's pleasure that in case the said ships should arrive within the limits of your command, you are to show them every degree of attention, and to afford to the commanders of them any assistance which they may stand in need of." Signea.

EARL CORNWALLIS to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1790, February 8. Calcutta.—"Everything in the Carnatic and in Travancore by my last advices remained in the same situation as when I last wrote to you.

"It Abercromby should be able to attempt a diversion on the Malabar coast, you will I am sure give him all the assistance in your power. It may likewise be proper, so long as the weather on that coast will permit, that some cruisers should prevent the importation of troops, arms, or military stores into Tippoo's territories. I should hardly think that the Compte de Conway would interfere, or afford assistance to Tippoo of any kind, but if, on the contrary, any French vessels with a considerable number of troops or quantity of stores should come upon that coast under pretence of going to their settlement at Mahie, I think they should be told that they may proceed to Pondicherry, but that as Mahie is only an inconsiderable factory and not a place of arms, and that consequently the troops and stores can only be intended for the use of our enemy Tippoo Sultaun, we cannot permit them to be landed at Mahie, or at any port upon the coast of Malabar."

ADMIRAL J. LEVESON-GOWER to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1790, February 19. Charles Street, Berkeley Square.—"Soon after you left this country I was obliged to resign the Admiralty. I had before Christmas met some things which were very disagreeable to me, but on my return to town after those holidays, I found so much of what might really be called incivility, that as soon as his Majesty was said to be well enough recovered to do business, I gave in my resignation. It was, however, August before a new patent was made out, when Sir Samuel Drake's name appeared. He has been worried out of his life by a wife, and our friend Gardner is now there. I hope he will long remain there, for he is a most worthy and honourable man. He has been chosen for Plymouth without opposition, but Macbride threatens mighty things against him at the general election. . . .

"As soon as I found myself totally at liberty I set out for Staffordshire and visited Trentham, where I had not been since 1753. It is very much improved; more so indeed than any place I have ever seen altered. . . . I forgot to tell you that upon Drake's death the Admiralty was offered to Hotham, who would not accept it. You may depend on this being true, because he told me so himself, and you know he is always very correct in what he says.

. . . My Edward was perfectly well on board the Eurydice at Villa Franca, the 22 of December. He is said to have taken kindly to his profession. Mrs. Leveson and the six others are perfectly well."

EARL CORNWALLIS AND COUNCIL to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1790, February 26. Fort William.—" The unprovoked hostilities which Tippoo Sultaun has commenced against our ally, the Rajah of Travancore, . . . can be considered in no other light by us than an open declaration of war, and we have accordingly sent instructions to the Presidencies of Fort St. George and Bombay to attack the territories of Tippoo, and to use every means in their power to oblige him to desist from his present violent and unjust undertaking, and to obtain reparation to the Rajah. . . . .

" We cannot at present determine how far any of the military operations may stand in need of the assistance of his Majesty's squadron, but we are well assured that if the governments of Fort St. George or Bombay should make application to you for such aid as you may think it in your power to afford, you will be perfectly well disposed to comply with their request.

" We have every reason to believe that the French government in this country will not be disposed to countenance the unwarrantable conduct of Tippoo, but if, contrary to our expectation, your cruizers should fall in with any vessels of that nation with a considerable number of troops on board or with a large quantity of military stores, on the Malabar coast, the commanders of which may pretend that they are going to their small factory at Mahie, we are of opinion that they should be informed that, if they please, they may proceed to Pondicherry, but that they cannot be permitted to land their troops or stores either at Mahie or at any port on the coast of Malabar, as we are convinced that, in that case, they must be intended for the use of our enemy, Tippoo Sultaun.

" The letters which the Governor of Columbo, Mr. Vander Graff, has written to the government of Fort St. George, express not only a friendly disposition towards us but an earnest concern for the protection of the Rajah of Travancore, on which perhaps the safety of the Dutch Settlement at Cochin may in great measure depend. He likewise mentions some intelligence which he has received of the number of troops at the Isles de France, and seems to give more credit than we do to the probability of a French interference.

" We have requested him to keep a watchful eye on the French, and to forward to you any information which he may acquire." Signed—Cornwallis, Chas. Stuart, Peter Spike.

EARL CORNWALLIS to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1790, March 1. Calcutta.—" . . . The Dutch have reinforced Cochin, and seem much afraid of Tippoo; they say he can get by water to Cochin without taking the formidable Travancore lines. If so mad an attempt was to be made by Tippoo, I think we should be fully justified in sinking his boats if we could get at them; but I am told the water is very shallow, and that there is a dangerous bar off Cochin."

CAPTAIN JAMES CORNWALLIS to the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS, Commander in Chief, &c., East Indies.

1790, March 3. Crown. Bombay Harbour.—Resigning his post as Captain of the Crown, on the ground of ill-health.

EARL CORNWALLIS to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1790, March 8. Calcutta.—Private. "The Vestal arrived here on the 4th instant with our Europe letters, and this morning Captain Delgarno brought me yours dated the 30th of January and 1st of February from Noncowrey harbour.

"I shall not at present enter into the merit of the different harbours, although upon the whole I am glad to find that you are disposed to think favourably of Port Cornwallis.

"Sir Richard Strachan's orders leave it to me to send him back to Europe or to China; the latter I by no means think advisable, and I propose to desire him to carry some treasure for us to Masulipatam about the latter end of this month for the use of Cockerell's detachment; and I shall direct him to proceed afterwards to Madras, where he will wait for the receipt of your orders. If you should be of opinion that it will not be necessary to detain him in this country, on account of our breach with Tippoo, we may perhaps find it convenient to send him home in lieu of an August packet.

"I should suppose that as soon as you may think your stay no longer necessary on the Malabar coast you will proceed to Madras, and consult with Medows whether the fleet can give any assistance to his operations, which I should hardly think probable, and you will then take your measures in regard to going to the Andamans or Prince of Wales's Island as you shall judge most proper. I shall of course write to you about the time that I guess you may arrive at Madras. Delgarno may still follow your instructions, except in leaving Madras with your letters until he shall have very good reason to believe that you will not touch at Madras, when you leave the Malabar coast.

"We have the most flattering accounts of the good disposition of the Marattas and the Nizam.

"I have sent you some Europe letters, but I hope you received some at Bombay. Our friends are all well, and the Bishop has set about altering Culford House in good earnest."

CHRISTOPHER WELLS to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS, Bombay.

1790, March 30. Madras.—The Nabob having taken no means to liquidate his debt, "though the late Governor had indulged him with forbearance upon being well paid for it," General Medows has put his territories under a sort of sequestration, and appointed four receivers of the revenues.

Some months ago I gave you some information respecting Cheil Naig, the Polygar, who was committing depredations in the Carnatic, about Vellore and Arnee, to divert our attention from Tippoo's operations to the Southward. "I can now inform you from indubitable authority (from the very camp of the Polygar at the passes) that Tippoo has ordered that Polygar Cheil Naig to be the instrument to execute the most barbarous and cruel commands of that monster in the Carnatic. He has absolutely sent him a reinforcement of 2,000 horse, with positive orders to place emissaries in our camp near Wallajoubad, and the moment the army begins to move, to pour his horse and banditti into the Carnatic, and carry fire and sword in every direction. I trust, however, that this government will in part prevent the evil, as I know there is this moment before them a proposal from a confidential servant of Cheil Naig for securing his person and putting him in our hands, upon the condition of appointing the man who sends this proposal a Polygar . . . but if the reply is not sent this day, the opportunity will be lost. . . ."

Postscript.—"The assumption of the Nabob's territories into the hands of Government will decidedly put a period to those pecuniary speculations at the Durbar which have long disgraced this Presidency. Those who have lately been concerned in transactions of that [kind] will get neither principal nor interest, and even the former creditors of the consolidated debt cannot expect any interest till the war is over."

Postscript, Tuesday evening.—I learn by a letter from Col. Ross that Lord Cornwallis is satisfied with the information I have been able to send him, and wishes me to continue to transmit it. As I see no hopes of joining you immediately, I intend to take the field with the army; the General having been pleased to commend my doing so, "as a clergyman in the field gave a decorum to several necessary and unavoidable occurrences. . . . The person who laid before Government Rhangapati Nauk's proposal concerning Cheil Naig is ordered to attend at the Governor's house this evening. Tippoo is moving to the centre of the Mysore country, and thence towards the passes between that country and the Carnatic."

EARL HOWE to the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS, Commander-in-Chief, &c., East Indies.

1790, April 24. Grafton Street.—"Your favour of the 10th of last November was not received until yesterday. And in acknowledgement of your obliging sentiments, I take the earliest opportunity to assure you I shall be always happy when any of my suggestions and services can be made acceptible to you.

"The plan you have formed for obtaining a pertect knowledge of the navigation and circumstances from whence advantage may be derived by an intelligent naval commander on your extensive station, will supply you with materials which I am inclined to think few of your predecessors have been equally studious to acquire. And I shall have very great pleasure in the communication of any such particulars as you are at liberty and have leisure to transmit.

"Diego Garcia I always understood to be little more than a barren sand, affording anchorage perhaps, but not water to be otherwise collected (and in small quantities) [than] by sinking wells on the beach. The Andamans and eastern coasts contiguous may possibly contain many much more desirable situations for shelter and refreshments. But I have always been of opinion that no more settlements should be made in such posts than we are able to occupy with such force as is competent to resist almost every attack that could be made upon them. Establishments less considerable seem to me of little more effect than to point out to an enemy the extent of our resources, and subject us to disappointments.

"Your efforts, my estimable friend, to abolish corruption, will be an Herculean labour, unless you can find purity in the natives. I did propose a coalition with the India Directors, on the last prospect of a rupture with France, that the India Company should assist us with stores to be furnished here by the Crown; but the conference did not proceed far enough to take any substantial form. But be not discouraged in your most commendable pursuit. The disinterested principles of the commander will most assuredly operate with good effect to check the peculation which cannot be wholly prevented; for you cannot take the direction of all the inferior branches of service upon yourself.

"You say that 'all ideas of common honesty are supposed to be left behind, on passing the Cape.' If they are understood to have been deposited with our good allies in that vicinity, I fear the portion of that good quality we had to boast was not great in quantity. It did not appear so at least by their conduct towards us in the passage of our ships out and home, consequent of the late war.

"The reports you had heard of Lord Sydney and Leveson's removal you will have had confirmed long before this can come to your hands; and, also, that those limited changes have not in any respect lessened the stability of Government here. You will hear, I conclude, from the latter, his motives for quitting his situation.

"The commotions in France, which do not seem likely yet to end in any settled Constitution and established Government, promise to give you opportunity to pass the season of your continuance in India free from foreign disturbances; and as you give me the pleasure of knowing that Lord Cornwallis is in perfect health, I hope for your sake, as well as the public benefit, that it may be agreeable to him to prefer taking his passage to Europe in the Crown, rather than at an earlier period."

LORD HOOD to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1790, April 26. Admiralty.—"I give you a thousand thanks for your very obliging letter of November 6th, and am happy you carried the squadron under your command in such high health to Bengal. The length of the passage was of no consequence compared with the healthy state of every ship.

"I rejoice exceedingly at the good account you give of Lord Cornwallis. I had the honour of seeing the Bishop of Lichfield at St. James's the day I had the pleasure of receiving your letter, and his Lordship was in wonderful spirits upon the delightful contents of Lord Cornwallis's letters, as well as yours. . . .

"I am well aware that you must have much to do to guard against the impositions a Commander-in-Chief is liable to at such a distance from England; but you may rest assured of the most perfect satisfaction of this Board that, upon every occasion, you will act for the true interest and advantage of the public. Naval stores were sent to Bombay in —— last, and I hope and trust you will find them there upon your arrival.

"You will ere this know that our worthy friend Sir F. S. Drake was suddenly taken from us in October last, and that Gardner succeeds him at this Board, and member for Plymouth, Fanshawe being made Commissioner, in the room of Sir John Laforey, gone to the Leeward Island command. Sir Charles Middleton has resigned the Comptrollership of the navy, Mr. Martin succeeds him, and your friend Saxton is Commissioner at Portsmouth. You will likewise hear, before this can reach you, of the Bounty armed ship being run away by a part of her crew, under the direction of a Mr. Christian, one of her Master's mates. Probably you may think it right to send one of your frigates to Otaheité to endeavour to recover her.

"I am sorry to inform you of the loss of the Guardian, commanded by Lieutenant Riou, in Latitude 44 south, Longitude 42 East, going to New South Wales. He had left the Cape about a fortnight when she ran foul of a prodigious island of ice on the 23rd of December; and, on the 25th, the water being up to her gun deck, her boats were hoisted out for such as chose to take that chance for their safety. Some few got into the boats; and one of those boats, after leaving the ship, was taken up very providentially on the 10th day by a French ship from the Mauritius, bound to the Cape with troops. At the moment the poor creatures were so worn out by thirst, hunger, and fatigue, that they could not have lived three days longer; and there appears to me not a shadow of hope that any other in the other boats can be saved. Poor Riou was determined to take the fate of the Guardian, and resisted all persuasion to take to a boat. I send you a letter he wrote at the moment the master left the ship. Lord and Lady Camelford are in the deepest distress upon this melancholy catastrophe; their only son being in the Guardian, and would not quit Riou."

Enclosing :—

E. Riou to Philip Stephens.

[1789]. December 25.—"If ever any part of the officers or crew of the Guardian should survive to get home, I have only to say their conduct, after the fatal stroke against the island of ice, was admirable and wonderful in everything that related to their duties, considered either as private men, or his Majesty's service.

"As there seems to be no possibility of my remaining many hours in this world, I beg leave to recommend to the consideration of the Admiralty a sister, who, if my services and conduct should be found deserving any memory, their favour might be shewn to her, together with a widowed mother." Copy.

On the same sheet. A list of those saved:—
Thomas Clement, master; Rich. Farquarson, purser; John Crowther, chaplain to the settlement; Arthur Wadman, master's mate; Rich. S. Trimlet, midshipman; John Somerville, gunner; William Tidd, quarter-master; and 8 seamen.

LADY M. SINGLETON to her uncle, COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1790, April 26. London.—Rejoices that he has found her "Papa" so well, and is so himself. Great alterations are being made at Culford, which will, she thinks, be a charming house, and which she hopes will be ready to receive her Papa when he comes home. Her brother has gone back to Eton.

MRS. C[AROLINE] CORNWALLIS to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1790, April 28. Seymour Place.—". . . How generous Exchequer Charles has been to give his nephew, John Townshend, 10,000*l.* upon his marriage."

The BISHOP OF LICHFIELD to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS, Madras.

1790, April. 29. Wimpole Street.—"Your friend Saxton is certainly Commissioner at Portsmouth, in the room of Comptroller Martin. Sir Charles Middleton enjoys his release from office very much. . . . Leveson was last Summer at Trentham and is to be chosen for Newcastle in the next Parliament. You and Phillipson are to be chosen at Eye. Erskine will be returned for Portsmouth, government having quite lost it. There is a very strong opposition for Cambridge University. Lord Euston, if he should gain his election, will owe it to Mr. Pitt, who is all powerful everywhere. There is an opposition in Suffolk by Vanneck, but a fruitless one, as all the gentlemen of the county support Bunbury and Rous. A great many Admirals have died this year, and a promotion is talked of. . . . Everything goes on very quietly in Parliament this winter. No opposition. I told you before, I believe, of the two matches in the Townshend family; Lord Townshend's daughter, Lady Elizabeth, to Col. Loftus, and Lord Sydney's eldest son to Miss Southwell, daughter of Lady de Clifford.

W. W. Grenville to Commodore the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1790, May 6. Whitehall.—Secret. Informing him that in consequence of the capture of some British vessels on the north west coast of America by two Spanish ships of war, his Majesty has taken measures for augmenting his forces, although it is hoped that war will be averted. Signed.

Lady C[harlotte] Madan to her brother, Commodore the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1790, May 7. Peterborough.—Thanking him for the good accounts which he sends of her son Charles, who writes that he is very proud of both his uncles. The Dean of Lichfield and Mrs. Proby are full of gratitude for his kindness to their son.

Henry Dundas to Commodore the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1790, May 9. London.—"I will attend to your representations, but, unluckily, Lord Howe has never been very cordial in the business. . . . On the approach of a general election, one must be attentive to the requests of Chief Magistrates. Mr. Glegg, the son of the Chief Magistrate of the burgh of Montrose, is a clerk on board your ship. It does not occur to me how the mention of him to you can be of any service to him, but have been requested to do it."

W. W. Grenville, Secretary of State, to Earl Cornwallis.

1790, May 12. Whitehall.—Most secret. Proposing (in case of a war with Spain) an expedition from the East Indies against the Philippine Islands; suggesting what troops might be spared, and asking Lord Cornwallis to consult with General Medows and Commodore Cornwallis concerning the preliminary steps for facilitating the execution of such a design. Signed.

Lord Brome to his Uncle, Commodore the Hon. William Cornwallis, Madras.

1790, May 16. Eton.—"I received a letter from you the other day, together with one from the Governor, and am glad to hear you got safe to Madras. . . .

"They talk of a dissolution of Parliament soon, and there is a great deal of canvassing going forwards in all parts of the Kingdom. I suppose you intend to stand for Eye this time in conjunction with General Phillipson. If you are not here, he will very well do for two, and I think it will be no easy matter to chair him."

Mrs. C. Cornwallis to Commodore the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1790, June 3. Seymour Place.—"I cannot let Sir Charles Oakley set off for Madras without sending you a few lines. . . . We understand he goes to succeed General Meadows, who is looked upon here as Lord Cornwallis' successor at Bengal. . . . The Bishop will give you a good account of Lord Brome and his own boys, they have had a fine Montem at Eton, and collected above 500*l.* for the Captain of the school. . . ."

W. W. Grenville to Earl Cornwallis.

1790, June 5. Whitehall.—Stating that no formal answer has yet been received from Spain; also that the news of Tippoo Sultan's attack makes them fear whether any considerable detachment can be spared from India for offensive operations, but that, as the Philippines are believed to be unprepared for defence, it is hoped that one or two battalions of Europeans and some native troops might be spared to dispossess the Spaniards at Manilla, without looking to any further operations in the South Seas. Hopes that the European forces actually in India would be sufficient to carry on a war with Tippoo, but, if necessary, measures will be taken for sending out re-inforcements. Has written to Commodore Cornwallis, desiring him to co-operate with his Lordship in any operation against the Spanish possessions (in the event of war); a re-inforcement of the fleet will be sent out without delay; also a sufficient quantity of salt provisions for the use of five thousand men for six months. Copy.

W. W. Grenville to Commodore the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1790, June 5. Whitehall.—Stating that in case of war with Spain, his Majesty has the fullest confidence in the Commodore's zeal and hearty co-operation with the Commander-in-chief of the forces, and desires him, without loss of time, to concert with his Lordship how the fleet may best assist in any expedition that may, in such event, be planned against the Spanish possessions. A ship of the line and one or more frigates are to be sent out at once; and a fifty gun ship and a frigate will be sent to Canton to convoy the China ships through the Indian seas, after which they will join the Indian squadron. Signed.

Lord Hood to Commodore the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1790, June 6. Admiralty.—". . . We have been preparing for war against Spain a month, and I have the pleasure to say we have now all the guardships at Spithead completely manned, with the addition of the Victory; and, in four or five days more, the Princess Royal, Illustrious, Saturn, Courageous, and Valiant will be there also; and I imagine they will all be at sea the end of next week. Admiral Barrington has his flag in the Barfleur, Sir Alexander Hood in the Victory for the present, until the Royal George and London, the ships fitting for them, are ready. Admiral Hotham's and Sir John Jervis's flags are also flying; and, I imagine, all will put to sea together, under the command of Barrington. The Queen Charlotte is fitting for Lord Howe, and will be at Blackstairs on the 10th. Sir Richard King commands in the Downs, and Dalrymple at the Nore. Should we come to blows, which at present is very uncertain, you will have full employment. Lord Chatham proposes sending to you a good seventy-four and two or three stout frigates. The Leopard is commissioned and given to Captain Blankett, who is meant to go to China with the Iris, Captain Trowbridge, for the protection of the Company's ships in January and February, and then to join you. . . ."

The Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry to Commodore the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1790, June 7. London.—". . . A dissolution of Parliament is talked of for next week, and I begin to believe it. Indeed, there is so much canvassing and drinking, and other bad effects of electioneering are so spreading, that a dissolution will be very beneficial to the country. The bailiffs of Eye have expressed to me the greatest satisfaction on having you to represent them. Sir Horace Mann is a candidate for Sandwich in Kent, against Lord Parker. Both say they are sure. Pitt's popularity continues to predominate as much as ever. All your sea friends seem to be very alert upon the possibility of a Spanish war; and there is no disinclination to the service or obstruction from party as heretofore. Lord Townsend is now quite a ministerial supporter. He fell fast asleep the other day during a very composing speech of Lord Stormont, and fell down on the ground, was carried out by the Prince, recovered soon and spoke in favour of Ministry. Lord Leicester's * new place in the Mint turns out, I am told, 4,000*l*. per annum. How fortunate! But he will soon succeed his father, who is evidently declining very fast.

"The King was never better, and upon the whole, we seem to be going on very well.

"I shall go to Culford next week, and hope to find a great progress in the house. Palgrave was here the other day, I shewed him the plan of the house at Culford, of which he expressed much approbation. It will certainly be a most excellent house, and I think the whole expense cannot exceed 5,000*l*.

"Your friend Leveson stands for Newcastle-under-Line upon Lord Stafford's interest, but has unluckily a formidable opposition. You have been very kind indeed to Whitby."

Christopher Wells to Commodore the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1790, June 20. Camp, Carour. ". . . I have (in addition to what I have already had the honour of communicating respecting the abuses in the several departments of the navy in the last war) to inform you that I find the sail-making branch afforded ample scope for peculation, and a very expensive one it was to Government. Mr. de Souza (agent to Mr. Cuthbert) nominally superin-

* George, eldest son of Marquis Townshend, cr. Earl of Leicester, May, 1784.

tended the business, but Mr. Cuthbert was the principal, and a master of a line of battle ship (I believe of the Flagship) personally directed the whole; who, besides a handsome additional daily pay from Government, actually received from Mr. Cuthbert douceurs to a very considerable amount. . . .

22nd. "This morning a body of the enemy's horse (in number about 600) appeared on the left flank of our camp and approached close to our outposts. The cavalry formed, and Col. Floyd, of the 19th regiment of dragoons, with two troops of that corps and five or six troops of native cavalry, marched in pursuit of them. In the meantime, these merciless wretches wantonly cut down all the poor followers of our camp they could see, who were out collecting firewood, straw, &c., and drove off some of our gun bullocks . . . burnt the stacks of straw, villages, &c., through which they passed. The enemy's horse made so precipitate a retreat into the enclosed part of the country that Col. Floyd could not overtake them. . . .

"You have been, Sir, already apprised of the manner in which I was employed at Madras for some time previous to the army's taking the field. . . . I flatter myself that the information I was enabled to transmit, contributed in some small degree to constitute that body of intelligence and facts which so amply authorized the change in the Government of Fort St. George (by the removal of Messrs. Hollond and Maylor from the Council) which at length enabled the General [Medowes] to take the field. In the meantime, the army was to be under the command of an officer inimical and unfavourably disposed towards Lord Cornwallis and Col. Ross. This fact I knew at that time . . . and I determined to join and attend the army as long as it should seem expedient, for it was clear to me that, while Col. Musgrave was at the head of it, Lord C. and Col: R. would not receive regular information. . . . The character of Col. M. seems to be a compound of pride, weakness, meanness, narrow jealousy, and peevishness added to no small share of avarice, which last propensity he was indulging in very freely when the General happily arrived.

"And now, Sir, the end for which I joined the army being fully answered, and my continuance in it no longer necessary (for the General possesses the full confidence of the Governor-General, and is, indeed, a most respectable and upright character), I am ready to obey your commands. . . .

June 24. "Advice is just received that a large body of Tippoo's horse, to the number of three or four thousand, have advanced to within fifteen miles of this camp. Some few of the enemy's horse have this moment been brought into camp, taken by a party of our cavalry. . . . The principal horseman reports that there are 4,000 horse at Avracouchee (20 miles in our front, and in our route) under the command of Seyd Sing Sahib, a confidential general officer of Tippoo's, who made a conspicuous figure in the last war in the Carnatic. Tippoo himself, he says, is at Coimbatore, about 80 miles distant. The orders to-day announce our marching in a few days . . . Heaven grant no accident befals our good and worthy General! If the command devolved on the second I fear all would not be well."

CHRISTOPHER WELLS to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1790, July 2. Camp, Carour.—". . . The army will move on in a day or two . . . If the enemy's forces have quitted Coimbatore and retired into Mysore, the opinion of the military is that we shall go immediately to the southward, into Dindigul."

I wrote to you at Bombay, "acquainting you with the wretched conduct of some of the civil servants of the Company, particularly with respect to some pecuniary transactions at the Court of the Nabob, and frauds upon the public. . . The principal in that business was Mr. Johnstone, paymaster at Tritchinopoly, whose frauds on the public, the Nabob, and individuals, amount to the immense sum of upwards of three lacks of Pagodas, or 120,000*l. sterling*. It will, I am sure, give you pleasure to hear that he is secured, and when secured, was on the point of embarking at Pondicherry. As a public defaulter, that government gave him up, and I suppose by this time he is in durance at Madras. . . . It would really shock you to hear a recital of all the peculations practised—during the late Government particularly—and even previous to that in a smaller degree, but latterly by example and permission." The hospital expences also "had been made (by Mr. Cuthbert) in the last war, the source of great imposition, though the surgeons were well paid by Government, and himself."

Postscript.—"Since writing the foregoing, I have heard something of our intended route and immediate operations. We march in a S. S.W. direction to Auracouchy [? Arava Kurichi], seventeen miles, keeping the river on our right; from thence to Ayaracottah in a S. S.E. direction. There the main body of the army will halt, while a detachment moves on to attack Dindigul Fort. When that is secured, the army moves on to Coimbatore, where, it is said, Tippoo's army still remains and cannot retire, as an epidemical disorder is sweeping away their carriage and draught bullocks and horses in great numbers."

ADMIRALTY COMMISSIONERS to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1790, July 30.—Desiring him to take Captain Blankett and Captain Troubridge under his command, with their ships, the Leopard and the Thames. Signed Chatham, Hood.

CHRISTOPHER WELLS to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1790, August 26. Camp, Coimbatore.—"I have the honour of acquainting you that the strong and well-defended fortress of Dindigul surrendered to the detachment sent against [it] under Lieut-Col. Stuart on the 22nd inst. Our batteries (of four 18-pounders and two 12's) opened on the 20th in the morning, but made no impression that day. On the 21st, in the afternoon, a breach was made, but it did not prove a practicable one. It was, however, deemed advisable to attempt the reduction by storm accordingly Major Skelly, with the two flank companies of the 52nd regiment and one company of the 1st European infantry and two native battalions proceeded to the assault, but finding the wall upon the rubbish still more than breast high, they were obliged, after a very hot and well supported contest to retire, with the loss of one officer of the 20th battalion, twenty-five Europeans killed and wounded, and about the same number of Seapoys.

"The next morning, however, before they could resume the attack, the white flag appeared. The garrison agreed to surrender on being permitted to march out with their private property. . . . In the Fort were found fourteen guns and a great quantity of ammunition and shot of every description and in every shape, and (what is very extraordinary) it appears that most of it was made up at, and must have been sent from Madras! Twenty thousand cullums of Padda were also lodged in the fort. A cullum is about sixty measures.

"Major Skelly had a narrow escape. A musket ball passed through his hat, but did him no injury. I had the honour in my last to inform you of the reduction of Errode, Col. Floyd, with three regiments of cavalry (the 19th, 3rd, and 5th) with a large body of infantry and artillery, have passed the river and are to reduce Sattamungalum and two other forts, and then seek Syed Sahib, who is sent back with his cavalry on this side the pass. It is expected that a force will go in a few days against Palaghautcherry. When that is reduced, it is supposed the whole army will ascend the Mysore country. The fortifications at Dindigul are new, and admirably executed."

The Same to the Same.

1790, Sept. 5. Camp at Coimbatour.—"The strong and important fortress of Dendigul surrendered to the forces under Lieut-Col. Stuart on the 22nd ult. . . . In the meantime, Lieut-Col. Floyd, with three regiments of cavalry, and Lieut.-Col. Oldham with infantry and artillery, crossed the river Bhavani, and on the 27th ult., the fort of Sattamungalum, near the foot of the Guzzelhatty (or Gudgereddy) Pass, surrendered after exchanging a harmless shot or two. And on the 29th, Lieut.-Col. Stuart, with the forces under his command, marched from Dindigul to attack Pallaghautcherry, where it is expected he will arrive on the 8th, and in the meantime, some heavy guns are ordered to march from this camp to re-inforce him. This is the only place to be reduced below the Ghauts. It is a strong and regular fortification, with a wet ditch 60 feet wide and 30 deep. It is therefore capable of making a stout resistance. But when once a breach is effected, the garrisons in this country immediately surrender, from the dread of receiving no quarter.

"In the midst of these important, active, and extensive operations, the General is directing every exertion to be made in forming a grand magazine of provisions, &c., at Erode and Sattamungalum, for the supply of the whole army when it moves on to ascend the heights. There can, I think, be little doubt of our retaining quiet possession of these rich provinces. They will prove the greatest and most valuable acquisition to the East India Company (or the public) which has ever been made in India. I have taken some pains to ascertain their present annual value. The annual amount of the crops at large appears to be eighteen lacks of pagodas, or 720,000*l.* sterling, One moiety, or 360,000*l.* sterling, will be the annual acquired revenue to the public, and, I am sure, it is very improvable under able managers of integrity; and I am convinced, while General Medowes governs, no others will be employed.

"A Vakeel or ambassador from the old King of Travancore is now in our camp. That prince is to send six battalions of his veteran Nagrs or Sepoys to assist in garrisoning the forts we have taken, to prevent our reducing the strengh of our army. I wish the Nizam and the Mahrattoes were more warm and active on their parts. The business would soon be settled. Tis wonderful and pleasing to see the confidence and felicity of the inhabitants, all busy in their usual occupations. In the hands of their conquerors they find themselves in the bosom of their friends! Not persecuted but protected."[23]

EARL CORNWALLIS to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS, at Madras.

1790, September 19. Calcutta.—"Private. . . . I am very sorry to hear that the sickness on board the Phœnix does not abate. We are getting healthier here, but the weather is growing warmer as the rains abate.

"We have sent home bills drawn by Montigny on the French government in the Houghton, so that the money must go to the Isle of France, as we have received value, or what we suppose to be value, for it. Things remain in the same state at Chandernagore, but I do not know the exact situation of affairs at Mauritius, or whether Conway is or is not a free agent.

"The Warren Hastings Indiaman . . . arrived here this morning. . . . Grenville tells me that the King is perfectly well, that he thinks we shall avoid a war, and not abet our friend the King of Prussia in any unreasonable demands, and lastly, that he does not think Pitt has anything to fear from the dissolution of Parliament. Ross had a letter mentioning some ill humour with Spain, about an intended settlement of ours on California, but I suppose it must allude to the business of the two ships of ours which were taken by them."

The SAME to the SAME.

1790, October 2 Calcutta.—"Private. I last night received letters overland from Mr. Dundas and Mr. Grenville, informing me of the great probability of a rupture with Spain, with directions from the latter for offensive operations from our settlements here, which the Mysore war, for the present at least, renders impracticable. As I conclude, from the circumstance I have mentioned, that if the war takes place, your squadron will be immediately re-inforced, it appears to me that you will probably assemble the ships without loss of time at Bombay, and if Sir Richard Strachan should come here, I shall send him to you. . . .

"I can hardly believe that the Spaniards will go to war with us, but their active preparations and the answers they have hitherto given to our claim of satisfaction for the ships which they captured in Nootka Bay are very suspicious.

"I am sanguine enough to have some hopes of demolishing Tippoo by January next." Signed. Fine seal of arms.

The Same to the Same.

1790, October 5. Calcutta.—Private. "I have received a letter from Mr. Grenville, dated the 13th of May, by the way of Suez, informing me that there was great reason to expect an immediate rupture with Spain, and describing a most extensive outline of operations to be undertaken by our forces from this country, which unfortunately the cursed Mysore war renders for the present absolutely impracticable.

"I take it for granted that you will assemble your squadron as soon as possible at Bombay, to which place your orders and re-inforcements will of course be sent.

"We shall probably be able to form some guess by the middle of December, whether it will be possible to spare any troops from India this season, even if we could only undertake a part of Mr. Grenville's plan; and if, which I apprehend will be the case, it should not appear to be possible, you will very likely think it right to send cruisers.

"I shall in a few days transmit a copy of Mr. Grenville's letter for your fuller information in the Company's cipher to Bombay, and I shall desire General Abercromby to give you the key to it, and to direct the secretary to explain it to you. I do not see in the present situation of affairs that I can make any part of the preparation recommended by Mr. Grenville, except by salting some meat here, which may be used by the squadron to save what will be sent from England, as I understand that the meat salted here with the greatest care cannot be depended upon to last more than one year.

"If Sir Richard comes here I shall send him immediately to join you at Bombay, and he shall bring you my private cipher, which you will find much more easy and expeditious than that of Government.

"There are reports of a promotion of Admirals, including you, but as Mr. Grenville in his letter calls you Commodore, it certainly had not at that time actually taken place. Abercromby and Musgrave are Major Generals." Fine seal of arms in garter.

Sir Alexander Hood to Commodore the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1790, October 28. Royal Sovereign, Spithead.—Thanking him for giving a commission to his relative, Mr. Newman, on the recommendation of Lord Chatham, to whom he is also related, and stating that public affairs are "in a great bustle," it being said that a few days will determine the great question of peace or war.

LORD GRENVILLE to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1790, November 9. Whitehall.—Sending him a copy of the convention between his Majesty and the King of Spain, and sincerely congratulating him "upon this fortunate termination of the negotiation . . . which has removed the apprehensions which were entertained of a rupture with that Court, and will enable his Majesty's officers in India to turn their whole attention to the prosecution of the war which has arisen there." Signed.

EARL CORNWALLIS to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1790, November 30. Calcutta.—"Private. I take the opportunity of the departure of His Majesty's schooner the Dispatch to send you a copy of Mr. Grenville's letters.

"Our whole land force in this country must for the present be employed in the Mysore war, which I consider in so serious a light that I am on the point of embarking to take the direction of it into my own hands. During the continuance of this war, which I am now, if possible, more than ever anxious to see the conclusion of, you can have no co-operation from us, and consequently no expedition can be attempted even against Manilla, unless troops should be sent out for that express purpose; as by the letter of the 5th of June, we have reason to think they have thoughts of doing, from conceiving it probable by the accounts carried home by the Goddard Indiaman that we should be at war with Tippoo.

"I had no reason for supposing you would assemble the fleet at Bombay, except the impossibility of your doing it at this season at Madras, and it did not occur to me that the Andamans would suit you from the want of fresh provisions.

"Sir Richard will join you as soon as he has landed me at Madras, and you shall then hear from me again, with duplicates of Mr. Grenville's letters; in the meantime, I have only to propose that you should, as long as the Spanish war is hanging over us, keep a vessel always at Madras, ready to convey the quickest advices from me, if anything important should occur, and that you will station at least one cruiser on the Malabar coast during the season, for carrying on operations there. We shall write you a public letter to desire you to detain any vessels you may meet with belonging to the Beeby of Cananore, who, as I understand, has broke off her treaty with us, and applied to Tippoo for the aid of his troops. . . . I think young Cook much improved by his command; all here desire to be remembered to King and Whitby."

[John, 2nd] EARL OF CHATHAM to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1790, December 19. Admiralty.—"I conclude that before the arrival of the Minerva the intelligence will, in some way or other, have reached you of the happy termination of our dispute with the Court of Spain. In the expectation of some further account from India, it has been left to your discretion, in your instructions from the Secretary of State, to keep or send home any part of the naval force collected in India, as you shall judge from the situation of affairs most advisable; but I imagine that, in any event, you will keep the Minerva, in preference to those frigates that have been longer out. I have detained her sailing for this week past in the hope that I should have been enabled to have sent you some satisfactory intelligence on the subject of some addition to the allowance from the Company to the Commander-in-Chief of his Majesty's naval forces, more suited to his rank and situation, as well as an increase to the Masters and Commanders, and which business I have very earnestly pressed; but any final resolution has been again suspended from the illness of Mr. Lushington, the Chairman. I have, however, great reason to believe that it will, in the end, be satisfactorily settled; and I have strongly urged (what in justice is due) that whatever is done may take place with a retrospect to the time of your arrival with your squadron in India.

"Some promotion has taken place in consequence of our armament, and (as you will be informed by Mr. Stephens) has been extended to your station; and I hope the promotion of Mr. Schomberg, particularly, to be Post will be acceptable to you. It is proposed that the vacancies made by the Lieutenants promoted to be Masters and Commanders should be filled up by you as you please, the midshipmen promoted by the Board being ordered home. I am not so unreasonable as to wish to press any young man upon you, knowing how few occasions you have in peace of providing for your followers; but I have been so urged to mention to you a son of Captain Dickson's, that I cannot forbear naming him to you as a person in whose success I am much interested. He would have been included in the general promotion here, as well as Mr. Manning and Mr. Allen, a son of the Admiral, who I understand are with you, but that they none had passed their examination at the Navy Office.

"I cannot conclude without expressing to you the full sense entertained here of the great zeal and attention with which you have applied yourself to correct, in all transactions in behalf of Government, those abuses which had been, I fear, too prevalent in India; and from which conduct, I am sure, the most beneficial consequences to the public service must be derived."

LORD HOOD to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1790, December 20. Admiralty.—"I have received the several letters you have had the goodness to honour me with, for which I give you ten thousand thanks.

"Early in May we began to arm against Spain, and with such vigour and exertion that in five months we had such a fleet as this country never had before after being at war two years. A most uncommon zeal pervaded all ranks of people, and there was a cheerfulness and spirit in the seamen not to be expressed, which most certainly have produced most happy results. Gardner was in the grand fleet under Lord Howe, consequently my head and hands were full. Spain had been tampering with the Northern powers; a Baltic squadron was therefore to be prepared and to assemble in the Downs. This was to be entrusted to me, and I went to Deal for three days to give a few orders and to put the squadron, consisting of sixteen sail of the line, under the command of Admiral Elliot, to get it in condition for service. Except upon this occasion, I was not out of the Admiralty Court five hours, from the beginning of May until towards the latter end of last month; and, although we have disarmed with respect to Spain, it is thought right to keep up ten ships of the line (four of which of three decks), in addition to the sixteen guardships and six sail which went to the West Indies under Cornish, since recalled; and I hope and trust we shall see a general peace in Europe in the course of a very few months. I know you will hear from Lord Chatham, to whom I communicated what you said to me respecting your leaving India about this time twelvemonth without waiting to be relieved, which he appeared to approve, but probably the present disturbance with Tippoo will prove an obstacle to it. . . ."

The King of Queda to Commodore the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1791, January 26.—Letter in the Malay tongue, endorsed by Cornwallis as received on this date. Also another document in the same characters.

Lord Hood to Commodore the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1791, February 2. Admiralty.—". . . I could not possibly have had a more able or more agreeable colleague in the room of our late worthy friend Sir Francis Drake than Captain Gardner, whose worth and experience I am fully sensible of; and am happy in assuring you that we are actuated by the same sentiments, to as full an extent as you can wish or imagine. Upon Sir Francis's death, I was summoned to town by a messenger, being then in Hampshire, and at once without hesitation named Captain Gardner for his successor, if an Admiral was not judged to be proper, could one be found that would be approved. For some time the vacancy was kept open, upon a supposition that Sir Charles Middleton would like to fill it, and, in that case, Gardner would have been the Comptroller. But Sir Charles acting a part not perfectly consistent, and expressing a wish to retire, he was taken at his word, Gardner made a Lord of the Admiralty, and Mr. Martin Comptroller; and I flatter myself the public service has been well conducted. Your friend Saxton is Commissioner at Portsmouth. I am happy to hear you are so sanguine in your expectations of an honourable and speedy termination of the war with that tyrant Tippoo Sultan.

"I can see no objection to your leaving India in January or February next year should peace be established. I have had several conversations with Lord Chatham upon the subject, who thinks exactly as I do, but do not find he has so expressed himself to you, which I have urged him to do, and in a particular manner, upon receiving your letters of the date before mentioned. He was then going into the country, where his Lordship still is, and will remain a week longer. He then said it was time enough to grant you the permission you requested; besides, as you was under the orders of the Secretary of State, Lord Grenville must be consulted, which I shall press him to speak to the moment he comes to town. But I think I may venture to say, that you will have no successor appointed until you arrive, and have made your report of the situation of things in that great country, and you may rest assured that not only the Board of Admiralty but every other Board you have had to correspond with, are most perfectly satisfied with every part of your conduct, and convinced that you have been unremitting in your pains for bringing the expenses of his Majesty's squadron under your command as low as possible. Should peace be established, I think the Perseverance, Atalanta, and Ariel will be sufficient to leave in the country, but of that you will, I trust, hear more about in due time. I am glad the Andaman Island is spoken so favourably of, and do most perfectly agree with you that it is much to be wished to have a King's port established in India, and, upon this account, it appears highly necessary, in so very important a business to the public, that you should be consulted, who must be capable of throwing so much light upon the subject. I am apprehensive some supplies have been sent from France by stealth to Tippoo, but I hope they will fall into your hands. . . .

"Notwithstanding matters are made up with Spain, we have still thirty-two sail of the line in commission, with a dozen extra frigates, in order to bring the Empress of Russia to a reasonable peace with the Turks; but I am apprehensive she will be obstinate, and persevere in the war. In that case, we shall probably arm to a greater extent. I continue the Commander-in-Chief of a nominal Baltic squadron, and it is possible I shall visit that sea, but very sincerely hope it will not be necessary; which I think cannot be finally known for some weeks, as that time must elapse before the messenger can return which was sent off with the determination of this Government in conjunction with Prussia and Holland.

"When the convention with Spain took place, it was necessary to reduce our seamen from fifty thousand to twenty-four thousand. The Admiralty thought it, therefore, a proper attention to the commercial interest of this country to give out the order I herewith send, which certainly could not mean to include any volunteer, or indeed any one who had not an advantageous prospect before him at the time he was impressed. But, to the astonishment of the Board, a few Captains indiscriminately discharged every man who would give in his name; the consequence of which was, that some ships were left so weak as not to have a sufficient number of men to take care of them at Spithead. And as seamen follow one another, as a flock follows a bell-sheep, the infection spread, and almost every man became anxious to be his own master. Orders were then given that the whole of the ships commissioned upon the armament should be paid off, one after another, as the public service and convenience of the ports would admit; but such as wished to be discharged might be so, but could not have the gratuity or their wages until the ship was paid off. Notwithstanding this, pains were taken to excite a general wish amongst the seamen for their discharge; which has occasioned a rendezvous to be opened in town for volunteers, which come in fast, and I have no doubt but all the ships will be re-man'd before they can be wanted for real service."

Enclosing:

Order of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty.

That, whereas many second and third mates of the East India Company's and other ships, as well as other men, who had advantageous prospects before them, have been impressed, and cheerfully submitted to the necessity of the State, the Commanders-in-Chief at the several ports are to direct the captains under their command to discharge such men of the above discription as may be desirous of returning to the situations from which they were taken, and to cause pay lists to be sent to the Navy board, that the men may be paid what is due to them.

COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS to CAPTAIN CHARLES CUNNINGHAM, of H. M. Sloop Ariel.

1791, March 15. Crown, off Prince of Wales Island.—Sealed instructions, to be opened at sea. "You will proceed with all the expedition possible to the Mauritius, where you will ask permission to water, &c., but you must act with the utmost caution, at the same time making such observations as you are able of the force and state of the place, and whether any men of war or forces of any kind are expected from old France, or have lately arrived from thence. You will endeavour to inform yourself of this in the best manner you can, even if you should not think it prudent to anchor; and having so done, you will, without a moment's loss of time, join me at Tellicherry, or if you should learn that I am not upon the Malabar Coast, proceed immediately to Madras, where you may expect to find me."

LORD CORNWALLIS, General Order.

1791, March 22. Camp at Bangalore.—"Lord Cornwallis feels the most sensible gratification in congratulating the officers and soldiers of the army on the honourable issue of the fatigues and dangers which they underwent during the late arduous siege.* Their alacrity and firmness during the execution of their various duties has perhaps never been exceeded, and he shall not only think it incumbent upon him to represent their meritorious conduct in the strongest colours, but he shall ever remember it with the sincerest sentiment of esteem and admiration.

* Of Bangalore, stormed on March 21.

"The judicious arrangements which were made by Col. Duff in the artillery department, and his executions and those of the officers and soldiers of that corps in general in the service of the batteries, are entitled to his Lordship's highest approbation, to which he desires to add that he thinks himself much obliged to Lieut.-Col. Geils for the able manner in which he directed the fire during the day of the 21st.

"Lord Cornwallis is so well acquainted with the order that prevails in the whole army that he could have been happy if it would have been practicable to have allowed every corps to have participated in the glory of the enterprise of last night; but it must be obvious to all that in forming a disposition for the assault, a portion of the troops could only be employed.

"The conduct of all the regiments which in the tour were for duty that evening did credit in every respect to their spirit and discipline; but his Lordship desires to offer the tribute of his particular and warmest praise to the European Grenadiers and Light Infantry of the army, and to the 36th, 72nd, and 76th regiments, who led the attack and carried the fortress, and who, by their behaviour on that occasion, furnished a conspicuous proof that discipline and valour in soldiers, when directed by zeal and capacity in officers, are irresistible.

"The activity and good conduct of Lieut.-Col. Maxwell in command of the Pettah for several days previous to the assault of the Fort, was in every respect highly commendable, but his Lordship desires he will accept of his particular thanks for the judicious arrangements which he made for the assault, which was committed to his directions, and for the gallantry which he displayed in the execution of them.

"He likewise returns his warmest acknowledgments to Major Skelly, who undertook the command of the corps that commenced the attack of the breach, and who, by animating them by his own example, contributed essentially to our important success.

"Lieut.-Col. Stewart may be assured that Lord Cornwallis will ever retain the most grateful remembrance of the valuable and steady support which that officer affords him by his military experience and constant exertions to promote the public service.

"And although his Lordship is unwilling to offend Gen. Medows's delicacy by attempting to express his full sense of the able and friendly assistance which he uniformly experiences from him, he cannot avoid declaring that it has made an impression on his mind that cannot be effaced." Copy, by Chr. Welles.

The Storm of Bangalore.

1791, March 24. Camp at Bangalore.—"Extract. The army arrived before Bangalore on the 5th inst., and were cannonaded on the march by Tippoo; not a shot was returned, but he was treated with sovereign contempt. On the 6th, the engineers re-connoitred the Fort and Pettah, both found much stronger than expected. On the ensuing morning the latter was carried by storm; Col. Moorhouse and Capt. Delaney were killed, some officers wounded, but none mortally. In the evening of the same day (at two o'clock), Tippoo's army appeared in sight, and whilst he endeavoured to divert the attention of our line by cannonading it, he sent a very large force to storm and retake the Pettah, but was beat off by the 36th regiment and some Sepoy corps, with considerable loss. Lord Cornwallis, suspecting he would make a second attempt, sent a re-inforcement to the Pettah, who had scarcely got there ere the enemy stormed it again. As before, they were repulsed, but with a much greater loss on their side. Finding himself foiled in both attempts, he drew off his guns and retreated about sunset, and we saw no more of him till St. Patrick's day, when he paid us an unexpected visit between eight and nine in the morning, and threw long shot at us till near three, when he retired, not having been able to draw us out or divert our attention from the siege. In the whole of the cannonading we lost very few men, not above sixty altogether. Five batteries, having irregular approaches, having been made, but their effect not being equal to what was expected, and our provisions beginning to run short, it was determined by the Earl to storm the fort. This was done on the 21st, at night, and in two hours from the commencement of the attack the British colours were flying in it. The storming party consisted of the 36th, 72nd, and 76th regiments, supported by the European flank companies of the army and 2nd battalion of Sepoys. They descended and ascended the ditch by scaling ladders, which were of infinite service afterwards, as the breach was nearly impracticable; upwards of 1,500 of the enemy were put to the bayonet; Captain Markham and Lieut. Dark of the Artillery wounded. The force of the garrison was about 3,000.

"The Killidar, a very old man and nearly related to Tippoo, was killed (Bahawder Cawn). Upwards of one hundred pieces of cannon were mounted in the rampart, which is a double one; the Fort is remarkably strong, very extensive, and has a very deep, broad, dry ditch and glacis to it. The fort could never have been taken but by an European army; it is the strongest I ever saw in India except Madras.

"The palace is in the centre of the Fort, and one of the most superb grand buildings you can conceive; it reminds you of the castles mentioned in the fairy tales. Had the storm been delayed twenty-four hours the whole of our batteries would have been enfiladed by works he was constructing. Lord Cornwallis has shown himself a most able general, and Medows is an admirable second. They are both adored, and justly so, by every man in the army.

"Officers killed at the siege:—Lieut.-Col. Moorhouse, artillery; Capt. Delany, 36th regiment; Capt. Slipper, artillery; Capt. Tenot, 52nd regiment.

"Wounded:—Lieut. Cowan, artillery; Lieuts. Purefoy and Eyre, 36th regiment; Capt. Markham, 76th regiment; Lieut. Dark, artillery." In Chr. Well's handwriting.

HORATIO NELSON to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1791, April 4. Burnham, Norfolk.—"My dear friend, I thank you much for your kind letter of August last, which I received when a few days ago in London. We are again preparing for war, some think we shall succeed in making the Empress yield to such terms of peace as we think proper without hostilities, but I own myself of a different opinion. She has been compared, and not I think unaptly, to our Elizabeth; a high-spirited, victorious woman will not easily brook to us, and how we are to get at her fleet I don't see. If inferior to us, she will lock them up in Cronstad, where our ships cannot get, and if, as is believed, Sweden joins her in the Baltic, we may, although assisted by the Dutch (in whom I don't find we ever much benefited) not be able to cope with her. Narrow seas and no friendly ports are bad things. Lord Hood is to command, that you have heard; 29 sail of the line to be joined [by] 12 sail of the line Dutch, a very respectable fleet; Sir Hyde Parker Captain of the fleet. A press has just begun, all our seamen here (except the West India fleet) paid off, and none hardly entered again; Gardner told me he had not 40 men in his ship; Victory 240, London none, and so of the rest. Admiral Leveson, Formidable; Sir Richard King, St. George; Duke, Kingsmill; Illustrious, Charles Pole, are all the ships commissioned. Upwards of 12,000 men are wanted, therefore it is probable no more ships will be commissioned till these are nearly completed. Admiral Jonathan Faulkener has his flag in Barfleur; Elliot, report says, is somehow disgusted; Hotham Princess Royal.

"I hope we are not to have Spain against us, which is feared. If so we have plenty of work cut out. The Duke of Clarence expects if a fleet goes up the Mediterranean to command a division of it; I can assure you he always mentions you with the highest respect. I was not successful enough in the late armament to get a ship, I hope not to be again so unfortunate. Lord Howe has been seriously ill, and Admiral Barrington very much shook; age will creep on, and active service soon gives a shake when above 60; comfortable and strong in our elbow chairs, but feeble when tossed in the Bay of Biscay. You have heard of the opinion relative to Sir Roger Curtis when Captain of the Fleet sitting on Court Martial as a Rear-Admiral: that a Court Martial being formed by Act of Parliament it is not in the King's power by any local rank to alter its constitution, and that therefore the one Court held where Sir Roger sat is illegal. An Act of indemnity is I hear to be passed, brought forward by Sir John Jarvis, who, by-the-bye, is said not to be employed, as having very much reprobated the Spanish Convention; and his friend the Marquis of Lansdown is so strong an anti-ministerial man. Mr. Pitt, it is thought, will lose his interest with the monied men for taking the unclaimed dividends, and a great opposition is made against going to war with Russia, but as yet he holds a great majority. I assure you it would have given me infinite pleasure to have served under you, and to have zealously supported the good plans you have formed. During the little time I was senior officer at Antigua, 11 per cent. was had for bills more than before or since I understand. A merchant came and had the impudence to offer me 5 per cent. if I would let him have the bills when money was wanted. How can stations otherwise give fortunes? I, amongst your numerous friends, will be truly rejoiced to see you in England, for believe I am, with most sincere attachment, your faithful and affectionate, Horatio Nelson."

[John] Earl of Chatham to Commodore the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1791, May 5. Admiralty.—"I had hoped that, previous to the sailing of the last ships, some more decisive intelligence as to the situation of things in India than was brought by the Princess Amelia Indiaman would have been received here. I trust, however, at all events, that the issue of our present contest with Tippoo will be such as to allow of your returning to Europe, and bringing Lord Cornwallis, at the period you mentioned in your letter to me as the most favourable to leave India, either in December or January next. In this view, discretional orders are sent to you on the subject, and I have only to add that, as it is peculiarly desirable after the late expensive armaments which have occurred here, to reduce our peace establishment as low as prudence will permit, it is to be hoped that you will not find it necessary (if your war is over) to leave any considerable part of your force in India; but that must entirely depend on your judgment according to the actual state of things there.

"France still continuing in the same unhappy and distracted state, nothing seems at present to be apprehended from that quarter, and it is not therefore as yet in contemplation to name any successor to you. How far hereafter it may be right to have a Commander-in-Chief in India must depend, in part, on the view of things in Europe, and also, very much, on the consideration how far (whenever a new settlement for India takes place at the expiration of the Charter) any considerable naval establishment may be made in the East Indies. But, before any resolution is come to on this head, we shall be desirous to avail ourselves of all the important information you will have collected as to the propriety or utility of such a measure, as well as to concert with you what instructions in the several departments would best tend to continue that system of economy, which, till your command in India, I fear has been but little attended to. I have no doubt of your leaving such officer, when you come away, as will be most likely to adhere to this material object. What, too, may be the best place for a refitting port must eventually be decided according to your report of the several situations that have been at different times suggested for that purpose. . . .

"We have a large fleet at Spithead, in consequence of the continuance of the war between Russia and the Porte, but I trust there is reason to hope that everything will be accommodated by negotiation.

"We are all here very anxious for further news from India; and have great confidence in the resolution taken by Lord Cornwallis to command the army in person."

The Same to the Same.

1791, May 10. Admiralty.—Regretting that, in consequence of what Mr. Dundas had said, he held out hopes of increased allowances to the Commander-in-Chief and other Naval officers in India which have not been realized. He is, however, so much impressed with the propriety of such addition that an official representation has been made by the Board of Admiralty on the subject, but as yet the new Direction has not had time to bring the business forward.

Lord Hood to Commodore the Hon. W. Cornwallis.

1791, May 11. Admiralty.—". . . A messenger which arrived yesterday from Prussia, announcing Mr. Ewart's arrival, brought very favourable accounts of the disposition of that monarch to act most fully up to the wishes of this Court in every respect."

The Same to the Same.

1791, May 13. Admiralty.—". . . You will receive orders by the Bridgewater (which I wanted you to have some months ago . . . although I was pretty sure you would prevent the stores going to Tippoo if you could) with respect to supplies sent from France to Tippoo Sultan's army.

"We have had extraordinary proceedings in the House of Commons, which have produced a total separation of Burke from Opposition."

[John] Earl of Chatham to Commodore the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1791, May 15. Admiralty.—Sending a copy of the Report of the Committee, this moment received from the Chairman of the East India Company, and which has this day been confirmed by the Court of Direction. Is sorry they have made no addition to the allowance to the Masters and Commanders, but they have obtained their promotion, which will make amends.

James McHorath to the Postmaster-General at Madras.

1791, May 16. Camp near Seringapatam.—Giving an account of Lord Cornwallis's attack upon Tippoo, on the previous day. In the end, he concludes, "the enemy gave way in every quarter, excepting a pagoda on a hill, which they seem resolved to maintain. We, however, have a post within 250 yards of it, and I suppose we will possess ourselves of it when we find it necessary. I have not exactly heard our loss, but suppose it considerable, about two hundred and fifty Europeans and natives killed and wounded. . . .

"This has been a smart business. The enemy were strongly posted, and their infantry stood to be bayonetted. But our troops, with his Lordship at the head, are irresistible. The enemy are now on the island. The river is high, which will render General Aberrombie's junction precarious. We see the island and fort very distinct from the hill which commands the enemy's post at the pagoda. It seems very strong, and the island is a delightful plain (sic) beautiful gardens and fine buildings with works all over it." Apparently a copy sent to Commodore Cornwallis, to whom the covering sheet is addressed.

LORD HOOD to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1791, May 20. Admiralty.—"The Bridgewater being still at Spithead, I send you a newspaper or two. . . . I fancy matters will be settled with Russia by negotiation and that the fleet will in a few months be paid off."

EARL HOWE to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1791, June 20. Grafton Street.—"You will have heard, I make no doubt, long before the receipt of this letter, that your conjectures upon the event of the armament last year have been verified. And at this time that I am favoured with your letter of the 10th of January from Prince of Wales's Island, it is the belief of such ignorant politicians as myself, that the present armament, pending our differences with Russia, will have a similar issue.

"You do me much honour in the satisfaction you express on the knowledge of my late appointment to command the home fleet, on the prospect at that time of a rupture with Spain. Though conscious of my many incapacities, yet as the King condescended to think them not a sufficient objection to my acceptance of that important charge, it remained with me only to consider how I could best endeavour to execute His Majesty's commands. If our existing disputes terminate in the same manner, the next selection of naval commanders will probably be directed to some amongst you gentlemen of more active abilities; for I am of opinion that a gouty chair, in which Sir George Rooke is said to have been confined at the battle of Malaga, is not a well adapted situation for the director of a considerable fleet in these days.

"The particulars you have had the goodness to communicate to me concerning Prince of Wales's Island confirm the doubts I conceived on the expediency of adding to our establishments in India; or of taking posts in any part not capable of being defended, exclusive of immediate assistance from the fleet. I rather think it preferable to content ourselves with the knowledge of places where our ships of war may find anchorage and supplies of water occasionally, than by settling in such stations to point out to an enterprising enemy the resources from whence we can obtain necessary supplies; and prematurely direct their attention to the means of frustrating our dependence on those aids.

"I did not mean to insinuate that your hopes of restraining abuses appeared chimerical by anything I suggested in my preceding letter on the subject of your desire to correct all the abuses which have long prevailed in the maritime service of India. My allusion was (as far as I can now recollect the particulars) to the difficulty of combating with united peculation. To moderate the excesses to which it is extended in the various branches having reference to the naval line of service, seemed a great and beneficial undertaking. To abolish such abuse partakes of too much hazard, I should think, by early exertions, antecedent to an assured means of finding competent substitutes to replace the offenders and preventing disappointment of the object to be attained.

"Everything that upright sentiments and steady zeal to promote the public service can accomplish, your superintendence of the maritime concerns in India will not have overlooked."

EARL CORNWALLIS to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1791, July 5. Camp, 13 miles west of Bangalore.—"I have just received your letter of the 27th ultimo, and am much obliged to you for the good accounts you send me of my family, which are the first that have reached me. I cannot proceed against Seringapatam until the rains are over on the Malabar coast, and the Cavery river falls, and I hope by that time to make such arrangements as will provide for the subsistence of our army and our numerous allies; but it is no easy task to feed between two and three hundred thousand men, one hundred thousand horses, and twice that number of bullocks, besides elephants and camels, in a country which nature intended for a desert, and which Tippoo has, with the assistance of our friends the Marattas, rendered a complete one.

"I know of no public reason for keeping you on the coast of Coromandel, and I am sure you have no private wish to stay there, but I think you should keep two frigates at Madras till the change of the monsoon. I should however wish you to go to Tellicherry as soon as the season will admit of it. Your appearance there will be of service, and it is not improbable that Abercromby will attack Mangalore before the country will be sufficiently dry to enable him to ascend the Ghauts with his guns and provisions.

"I have desired the Madras government to offer you as much of the provisions brought out by the victuallers as you may choose to take; I know of no use that we can make of any part of them, unless Abercromby should want some on the coast of Malabar. I am very glad that you will allow the Leopard to carry home part of the Hanoverian troops. I shall send the Swallow packet to England in the very beginning of September. Colonel Nesbitt writes me word from Bangalore that you are an Admiral, but as you do not mention it, I shall direct as formerly."

CHRISTOPHER WELLS to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS, Madras.

1791, July 9. Camp near Bangalore.—". . . The army will move on in two or three days to attack the Fort of Ossore. It is conveniently situated to form a strong post to facilitate the communication with the Carnatic while we are drawing our supplies from thence." Lord Cornwallis has just appointed me "to conduct the business of Post Office despatches, &c. . . . I am to enter upon it to-morrow, and I trust the business will be executed more to his Lordship's satisfaction than heretofore."

EARL CORNWALLIS to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1791, August 4. Camp, 7 miles south of Oussore.—"I enclose to you a copy of a letter from Lord Grenville to General Abercromby, from which you will see the propriety of sending some frigates to the Malabar coast as soon as it can possibly be done with safety, and indeed I am of opinion that your own early appearance there would be very advisable.

"You will, I make no doubt, order all vessels on that coast laden with military stores to be seized, whatever port they may be bound to, except they should be Dutch or Portuguese actually destined to Cochin or Goa.

"I have a thorough dependence upon the good disposition of the Governor of Cochin, and I do not believe that Tippoo is well with the Portuguese; his money may perhaps prevail with some of the merchants of those nations to afford him assistance, but even in that case the seizure of vessels belonging to either of them with ostensible papers might be attended with troublesome consequences.

"We have met with no disturbance of late from the enemy, and are very conveniently situated for receiving the various supplies of which this army is in great want, from the Carnatic; but the extraordinary dryness of the season distresses us very much in the very important article of forage.

"I have not received any Europe letters of later date than the end of November, but have the satisfaction to know that they are on their way, and within six or seven days of reaching me.

"Our weather has been for more than two months cool and very windy, and the nights and mornings are disagreeably cold. The change at first affected the health of our men, but I have the satisfaction to say that we are now growing more healthy

"I have made Dr. Wells field-postmaster, and he has been of great use in quickening the conveyance of our letters." Signed.

The SAME to the SAME.

1791, September 10. Camp near Bangalore.—". . . Your public letter, which as far as you are concerned, is very satisfactory, I have transmitted to the supreme Government, and have given my opinion that upon the present face of the business, Mr. Taylor appears to me to be the person that should be held responsible, if the seizure and confiscation of the vessel was not authorised by the orders under which Captain Byron acted; for Mr. Taylor either condemned the vessel, or sold her without condemnation. . . .

"My letters, dated the 27th of April, from home, are very satisfactory. Brome has with the most perfect good humour consented to the Bishop's plan of staying at Eton till next Easter, and then going to an academy abroad. The Bishop (who by-the-bye seems to be a better friend than formerly to Administration) has now no grievance but Eye, and that, I am afraid, must be incurable till I come home. He tells me that of all my Opposition friends he liked Lord Carlisle's speech the best, as far as it regarded me. I have been unlucky about Lord Carlisle's recommendations in this country; if Mr. Gregg is not a bad subject, and an opportunity should offer that would not interfere with anybody that you are interested about, I should be very glad if, before you quit this command, you could give him a step.

"I am busily preparing to look again towards Seringapatam, but I hope that Tippoo will be sufficiently sensible of the desperate state of his affairs, to offer such terms as we may with safety and honour accept, before the time arrives for our commencing our march.

"I am glad you approve of Sir Richard Strachan; from what I saw of him I thought you would do so."

The SAME to the SAME.

1791, November 27. Camp, 8 miles from Bangalore.—". . . . Nothing can exceed my anxiety to put an end to this detestable war, but it is no easy task to provide for the subsistence of numerous armies when they are to penetrate far into a desert country, and when the communication with the distant quarter from which their supplies must be brought, is liable to constant interruption of an active, vigilant, and capable enemy. I have already with great labour and exertion reduced some strong hill forts with a view to the security of our convoys, and I must attempt some more of this work, before I can in prudence advance to the enemy's capital.

"The violence of the Carnatic monsoon, which I find, contrary to all the information I had received, prevails entirely in this country, has considerably retarded the progress of my heavy guns, but the last division is now near Bangalore, and everything is getting right again. . . .

"I am sorry that Fortified Island is not likely to answer the expectations of the captors. I cannot help, however, being pleased with the zeal and spirit which were manifested by Captains Troubridge and Sutton in endeavouring to distress the enemy." Signed.

The SAME to the SAME.

1791, December 31. Camp at Magri near Sewendroog.—"It was with great concern that I heard of the affair between the Phœnix and the Resolve, for although the behaviour of the French Captain appears to have been so violent and unjustifiable that it is hardly possible he should meet with support anywhere, yet, by misrepresentation and falsehood, it may make a great noise in Europe, and occasion much trouble.

"As every one of our Governments in this country may for its own security think itself interested by the commission of an act of hostility on the part of France, it might be proper that you should transmit a statement of the facts in a circular letter to the Presidencies of Bengal, Madras and Bombay.

"It will give me great satisfaction on every account to learn that you have found the French Commodore more reasonable and righter-headed than the Captain.

"We have been so fortunate as to take in a very few days, and with hardly any loss, the important and hitherto reputed impregnable fortress of Sewendroog. This place and some neighbouring forts, which though strong, made but little resistance after the fall of Sewendroog, will tend in a very great degree to insure our communication with Bangalore whilst we are engaged in the attack of Seringapatam.

"The last of our stores from the Carnatic with the detachment of the Royal Artillery, whose progress has been long delayed by the extraordinary rains that have fallen this year, are now in the neighbourhood of Bangalore, and I hope very soon to advance towards the enemy's capital. I received a letter from Abercromby, dated the 16th of this month, at the top of the pass.

"I am sorry to tell you that we have lost poor Dr. Wells, who was much esteemed in this army, and is universally regretted. No man could have been more resigned to his fate; I saw a letter from him to Ross after the doctors had given him over, in which you would have supposed he was describing the situation of some other person.

"You have been very kind indeed about Gregg. I hope you have not suffered him to interfere with any arrangement in which your inclinations were much interested."

EARL CORNWALLIS to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1792, February 10. Camp near Seringapatam.—"On the night of the 6th I attacked Tippoo's camp, which was so strong that it would have cost a great many lives if the attempt had been made by day, and as it had the additional defence of the cannon of fort and island, the event might even have been doubtful.

"Two of my columns succeeded most completely; some untoward circumstances impeded that which Meadows commanded, which saved a part of his army, and of his field artillery. I have however possession of the north side of the river and of the greatest part of the island, and I have ruined at least half his infantry, and taken above sixty pieces of cannon.

"We are now preparing vigorously for the siege of the fort, and I trust there can be little doubt of our success, unless Tippoo should consent to such concessions as the Allies think they have a right to require."

MRS. C. CORNWALLIS to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1792, February 13. Seymour Place.—". . . Lord Brome is, I assure you, everything you can wish. He has left Eton, and is just now in town to prepare for his journey to Yverdun, where by all accounts he is likely to pass some time to great advantage, in learning French, &c. He grows both stout and tall, and is the picture of health. . . . Lord Townshend is wonderfully recovered in his health within these six months. He is very much flattered at being appointed Lord Lieutenant for the county of Norfolk in the room of Lord Orford."

"I was at Court last Thursday, when the Address from the Commons was presented to the King, in which, as an echo to the speech, there was such honourable mention made of Lord Cornwallis as affected me very much.

"The Bishop found his house at Windsor better than he expected, and his first residence there went off very well. I went with them to Court the day Miss Cornwallis was presented, but they are now so well acquainted with their Royal neighbours that a Drawing-room appears no longer formidable to them."

MARQUIS TOWNSHEND to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1792, February 14. Weymouth Street.—"I feel myself greatly obliged to you for your favourable account of the situation and conduct of my son William, and for your patronage. Those from Sir Richard Strahan and others have likewise given Lady Townshend and myself great satisfaction. We very early thought his temper and disposition well suited for the navy, as well as his constitution. We are likewise happy that he remains in his present situation, improving in his profession, instead of incurring by his return the risk of a ballot into some societies here of fashionable dissipation.

"Your last accounts from our able and disinterested relation have afforded every good friend to the welfare of this country the warmest hopes of a most honourable conclusion to this expensive and, in my opinion, unavoidable war. Party may refine upon the political situation of Lord Cornwallis, but the honour and confidence which ought to attend the British Government and nation, which must depend upon our good faith and protection of our allies, must fully justify his Lordship's perseverance. Had a Roman General persevered in the reduction of an Asiatic tyrant, the applause would have been universal, even if unsuccessful, and such will attend our relation when the political calculations and attractions of the day subside."

EARL CORNWALLIS to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1792, February 25. Camp near Seringapatam.—"I send you a copy of the preliminary articles of peace with Tippoo which were signed yesterday, and which I flatter myself you will think advantageous for us.

"There is no forming a judgment at present of the time that will be required before the principal points can be sufficiently settled to admit of my going into the Carnatic, but I hardly think it possible that I should be at Madras before the middle or latter end of April.

"It is my intention to send Madan home with an account of the late operations and of the peace, and I now heartily wish that I had detained the Vestal for that purpose. If there should be any sloop in the roads, I may perhaps take the liberty of despatching her. Madan will otherwise go in the first Indiaman.

"I shall write in the strongest terms to beg to be released by having my successor sent out so as to arrive in Bengal early in the next year, and, as my family will then be reduced to Ross and Haldane, if you should be at liberty to go home about that time in one of the large frigates, I shall be very glad to get a passage with you; but we can talk of this at Madras, where I hope to have the pleasure of seeing you as soon as I can bid adieu to the dreary wastes of Mysore." Triplicate, Signed.

Enclosing the articles alluded to.

EARL CORNWALLIS to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1792, March 19. Camp before Seringapatam.—Notifying to him, officially, that he has this day received "the definitive treaty of peace between the confederate powers and Tippoo Sultaun, signed and duly executed by the latter." Signed.

The SAME to the SAME.

1792, March 21. Camp, &c.—"Private. I received only two days ago your letter of the 16th of February, which was a long time on its journey. All is now concluded, the definitive treaty signed (of which I send you official information), and I hope to march on the 26th or 27th from this dreary desert.

"The Swan sloop of war arrived a few days ago from England, which she left on the 27th of September, recommending to us to make peace on reasonable terms, notwithstanding our success at Bangalore. All peace in Europe and the 3 per cents. above 89. We have anticipated their wishes about peace.

"I was informed that I might send the Swan immediately back with despatches, but as she was near six months coming out, and the Northumberland Indiaman, which has made very good passages, was perfectly ready for sea, I thought it better to send Madan and my letters in her, and detain the Swan till all the Indiamen of this season have sailed, and till I have an opportunity of consulting you about her.

"I have not answered a letter from Mr. Taylor and some other person, who applied to me as agents in the name of the captors of Fortified Island, to request that I would purchase the Island of them for the Company at the price of 40,000 rupees. Indeed I did not know how to make a serious answer to such a proposal. If there were any military stores there of any value, Abercromby will allow the captors one half of the estimated value according to the regulation, but the Island must be immediately restored to Tippoo.

"I hope to be at Madras by the latter end of next month, and shall expect to have the pleasure of meeting you there as soon as it may be convenient to you." Signed.

SIR HORACE MANN to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1792, March 24.—Recommending Mr. Thomas Baker to his countenance and protection.

EARL CORNWALLIS to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1792, April 6. Camp, forty miles west of Bangalore.—"I had last night the pleasure to receive your letter of the 1st, and was very glad to hear from Apsley that you and all our friends on board the Minerva were well. It will be a tedious business to get our guns and stores, and particularly our sick, who I am sorry to say are very numerous, down the Ghauts, and I do not choose to leave the army till it is fairly out of Tippoo's country; I can therefore hardly hope to reach Madras before the tenth of next month at soonest.

"As there will be no Commander-in-Chief on the coast I shall have a good deal of military business to arrange, besides conversations with the Nabob, Tippoo's Vakeels, &c., &c., which must probably detain me at Madras three weeks or a month. I give you this information that you may be more at liberty as to your own measures.

"I have excused myself from accepting an apartment in Sir Charles Oakeley's house, and have requested that he will order a garden house to be taken for me. I long much to see you. Ross and Haldane present their best respects and join with me in desiring to be kindly remembered to King and Whitby."

SIR R. KING to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1792, April 9. Dover Street.—"This will be the shortest letter I ever troubled you with, for our hearts are too much swelled with gratitude for your kindness to our son to find words to express it. . . . It is now certain I am to have the Newfoundland station. My ship is to be the Assistance. The Admiralty allow me only my Captain and one lieutenant, not the first; the remainder of patronage they retain to themselves. . . .

"Information is just now arrived that the King of Sweden had the contents of a pistol fired into him at a masquerade by a discontented officer. It is said a ball has been extracted, but it is understood the pistol was loaded with nails and slugs besides, and the King's life is in great danger; indeed the general opinion is, that he is not alive now. Report says he was quite collected, and would not suffer the wound to be much attended to until he had settled the Regency on his brother. I do not like these attacks upon Monarchy, being convinced that such as ours is the best government. . . .

"All those whose opinion is worth regarding, disapprove of the conduct of the French Captain in the affair with Sir Richard Strachan, and perhaps a check to the constant insolence of that nation could not have happened at a better period."

LORD HOOD to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1792, April 28. Admiralty.—You was expected by some in the Crown, but not by me, as I took it for granted you would not leave India before Lord Cornwallis." The daily prints "will convey to you the strange things that have happened and are happening every day. The condition of France is deplorable in the extreme, and it appears to me that the nation is at the eve of its troubles only. God grant that this country may not be involved. . . ."

The Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry to Commodore the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1792, May 1. Wimpole Street.—"Your business with the French ship went off very well indeed. Mr. Hippesley began to observe upon it, but the Easter recess came on, and the behaviour of France stopped all mouths, and put an end to the whole affair.

"You will be surprised to hear that Dr. Madan is a bishop. Some years ago, he told me he had given over all thoughts of advancement himself, and only wished for a provision for his sons. Conceive therefore my astonishment at hearing from him the other day that he was Bishop of Bristol. How it was done, I know not; the Doctor says, through Pretyman, and his own application repeatedly for a deanery. The appointment does not seem to meet with much approbation, as Dr. Madan is to give up a sinecure of 500*l. per annum*, and a living of 300*l. per annum*, for Bristol, which is a certain 320*l. per annum*, and about as much uncertain. As he is 64 years of age, the measure of acceptance does not seem to have been a very prudent one; however, I have provided nobly for Spencer.

"I have made great purchases in Eye, which will not only render Lord Cornwallis's estate much more compact and extensive, but must strengthen his interest considerably. Had Hutchinson not refused Mr. Thurston's estate, his property there would have been very compact indeed; and his interest irresistible. Hutchinson meant well, but took inadvertently every step to hurt his interest, and prevent its enlargement. Now I think it best either to give the borough up, or endeavour to render it quite secure, and as Lord Cornwallis wishes to keep it, I have fortunately been able to add greatly to his influence. However there is a society established (in which are considerable names and persons of great property, and many members of the House of Commons) for reforming Parliament. The plan is to get petitions, as has been done in the slave business, from all quarters against next year. If the French Constitution stands its ground, it will make wonderful changes all over Europe. We shall not, I hope, be drawn into the war which has commenced with the King of Hungary.

"Lord Brome is at Yverdun in Switzerland, and I hope goes on very well. Mr. Hayes is with him, as I should not have been satisfied with his being there without some attendant from hence in case of sickness.

"Lord Townshend is now quite well.

"Dr. Madan has just been here, out of his wits for joy; as he is so happy, one cannot help feeling satisfied, although the measure seems rash."

JOHN GORE to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1792, August 18. Bill Hill.—". . . I wrote by the first ship that sailed after my arrival in England (the Earl Talbot), and hope you have received it and approve of my conduct since I had the misfortune to be obliged to quit the situation, so truly enviable in every respect, under your command. Since that time I have been constantly employed endeavouring to get the better of the complaint which has so long plagued me. . . . I have been here now three weeks, and have found great benefit from the good air and kindness of Admiral and Mrs. Leveson, but an accident has happened within these few days that will, I am sure, affect you equally with myself and all who had the honour of experiencing the Admiral's friendly goodness. . . . The Admiral was in the highest health and spirits imaginable till Tuesday morning last when, in the act of shaving himself [he] was seized with a most violent apoplectic fit, . . . and after an illness of only thirty-one hours, he expired. . . . Your friendship for each other I know, Sir, was great; it will therefore be a comfort to you to know . . . that the state of his affairs are such as will enable the younger children to be extremely well provided for. John Levison has been at home about three weeks, and is a very fine well-disposed young man. . . .

"You will be much concerned at hearing of the death of General Phillipson. This makes eight seats in Parliament vacant within these three weeks. Mr. Pitt is appointed Warden and Admiral of the Cinque Ports, with a salary of 4,000*l.* a year, in the room of Lord Guilford, who died ten days ago, and the Dukes of Portland and Beaufort are contesting for the Chancellorship of Oxford. The former, it is supposed, will carry it, being supported by the Ministry; and it is likewise much talked of that a coalition will shortly take place and a very strong one. If so, the great people in newspapers say a war is certainly to follow, but none mention with whom. An armament, I have heard in this house, is certainly to be ordered in the spring to bring the old Empress to her senses, who is at present persecuting the poor unfortunate Poles in an inhuman manner.

"Lord Hood is at present at sea. . . . [His ships] are to be reviewed by his Majesty off Weymouth on the 23rd, after which they are to come into port. The Centurian is fitting at Chatham for the Jamaica station, and Admiral Levison told me a few days ago that Lord Hood is going there as Governor and Commander-in-Chief. He now has the command at Portsmouth, and Capt. Inglefield is at Jamaica. The Collosus, built exactly after the Canada, is the crack ship of Lord Hood's fleet, and sails round them all. We have had a fine camp in this neighbourhood lately, which I much fear assisted the untimely end of Admiral Levison, for on the day of review, he went there on horseback at 6 a.m., and did not return home till half-past three, all which time he did not once dismount. . . . The camp was certainly a very fine sight, and amused his Majesty much. . . . Give me leave to congratulate you on the promotion and success of your nephew, Major Charles Madan, who, besides the rank of Major, has been presented with 2,000*l.* one from Government and one from the East India Company. They have likewise given Captain Osborne 300*l.*

"The state of France is dreadful beyond conception. On Saturday last the decree passed the National Assembly for deposing the King. The mob instantly rose, attacked and demolished the Tuilleries, and all the Swiss Guards who defended the Palais Royal except a hundred were murdered, and other people in Paris who were supposed to be of the King's party, to the number, it is said, of 10,000. The King, Queen, and Royal family escaped to the Assembly and were there protected. They have been removed to another house under a strong guard, where they are to remain till a decree is passed for their execution, which from all accounts seems inevitable. A degree of infatuation has seized upon France, and the people seem hurrying themselves headlong to destruction. Those who have escaped the disorder are come over here, and it is incredible the vast numbers of them there are in this island. The Prussian and Austrian armies have crossed the Rhine, and will be at Paris in about a week; what is then to be done I know not. They are immensely strong, and it is supposed will carry all before them. The French armies consist of rabble and boys, and are altogether unable to stand against veteran and disciplined troops. This I have from a friend who is in France purposely to look on and see the fun."

Marquis Cornwallis to Commodore the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1792, Nov. 10. Calcutta.—". . . Mr. Baldwyn [the Company's agent at Alexandria] talks of England's arming, but I can see no grounds for such a report in the Courier de l'Europe, except that Lord Hood was going out with five guardships and a few frigates to practice some new signals. . . . Abercromby cannot, I think, avoid proceeding to extremities against the Malwan Rajah, so that the sooner you send a ship to Bombay, if there should be none already there, the better. . . . We have had a fine rain, and have now the prospect of as good a crop as was ever known in Bengal."

The Same to the Same.

1793, March 18. Fort William.—Requesting him, if possible, to return to Bengal before August 20, and to permit the writer to take a passage to England in the Minerva about the end of that month.

"Extracts of the News."

[1793] March.—Chiefly foreign affairs and naval intelligence.—". . . 25 Feb. Paris. Not a bit of bread in the city; great riots. Bankruptcies in London have happened to the amount of five millions. Hull Bank has stopped payment. . . .

Feb. 28.—Paris in an uproar through want of bread. The mob broke open all the tradesmen's houses, set their own prices upon the goods, and plundered everything. . . .

"March 25.—Policies were opened in the city with a great balance that there would be an end of the war, and that a regal government would be established in France in twelve months from Lady Day, 1793. The bankers refused to discount any paper for the present; the alarm in the Royal Exchange is beyond conception. A bankruptcy has taken place in Edinburgh to the amount of 200,000*l*. . . . Insurgencies and riots are breaking out every day [in France], and several thousands are determined to effect a counter-revolution. A captain of a King's ship said he saw ten sail of French men of war in the Channel. A captain of a French privateer that is taken also says he left Brest harbour in company with ten sail of French men of war and a frigate. The number of prizes taken by each nation, since 1st Feb. to 28 March (for I have counted them all in the papers) are 25 vessels taken by the French, and 52 by the English. . . . I forgot to tell you that no governor was appointed in the place of Sir Charles, and likewise that there were dissensions and riots in several parts of America, as a great many wished for a convention, and it was generally supposed that if General Washington was to die, there would be a civil war."

OCCURRENCES.

[1793, March ?].—Lord Howe to command the Channel Fleet, six vice and rear Admirals to serve with him, his flag in the Queen Charlotte, Sir Roger Curtis captain of the fleet. Lord Hood to command in the Mediterranean in the Victory; four vice and rear Admirals to serve with him; Sir Hyde Parker as captain of the fleet. Rear Admiral Gardner in the Queen was before Brest with a detached squadron of six sail of the line and several frigates, part of the grand fleet. Rear Admiral Gell in the St. George was cruizing between Cape Finisterre and Maderia, with four sail of the line and one frigate, part of the grand fleet.

"The Channel and North Sea full of frigates. Rear Admiral McBride commands in the Downs, and has the management of the cruising frigates. French Privateers are fitted out, but generally captured before they get half across the Channel. . . . The fleet fitting out with the greatest exertion; every town in England granting bounty to seamen and vieing with each other who can obtain the greatest number.

"No alteration in the Administration. The Opposition reduced to a mere fraction; the people of England firmly attached to the constitution . . . and declaring their sentiments in the most public manner. The Duke of Portland with the leading men of that party also supporting Administration against the levelling faction, which had nearly broke out into rebellion. The Duke of York with the Guards, 2,000 volunteers, and several regiments of cavalry and infantry, serving in Holland. The army, consisting of the Militia and regiments in England, mostly stationed on the coasts of Sussex, Kent and Norfolk, with an amazing train of light artillery, part of them on a new construction being used on horseback, and travel eight miles an hour. [Foreign Intelligence].

"Dumourier menaces the National Convention, used every epithet that could be made use of to the worst of people, said no force then in France could prevent the united armies to be at Paris in three weeks; that he would march with his army in advance, to establish the Dauphin on the throne." Signed. Tho. Ley.

MARQUIS CORNWALLIS to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1793, April 4. Calcutta.—"I yesterday received your letter dated the 1st, on quitting the Pilot, and am sorry to find that your plan seems to be a little deranged by my requesting that you would leave the Ranger here and take one of the vessels now at the Andamans in her stead. I really did not think that it could make the smallest difference to you, and after the repeated complaints of the Master Attendant and remonstrances of the merchants, and my own representation to the Court of Directors that twelve pilot vessels were absolutely necessary for the safety of the trade at this port, I did not see, in the event of any serious accident, how I could have been justified in leaving it, probably for above a month, with only five, for, of our present number here, three are too bad to venture into the Roads at this boisterous season. . . .

"I agree with you in thinking that Mr. Blair would have been better employed in surveying than in ship-building; but although I wish many of the abuses of the Bombay Marine to be corrected, I am of opinion that the situation of the officers of that establishment ought to be liberally considered, as unless they have the means of saving a little money, they can only look forward to death for a termination of an inglorious and wretched exile.

"There is so much difficulty in sending stock down to the mouth of the river, that I believe it will be much the best plan for you to come up to Diamond harbour, and I will accordingly order one of the moorings to be left for you. It will be better that I should embark there, and I will take care to have everything in such readiness that if you come between the 15th and 20th of August to Diamond harbour you shall not be detained long enough there to run the hazard of any material sickness amongst the ship's company."

INTELLIGENCE.

1793, April 10. Alexandria.—A summary, by George Baldwin, of news received from Europe, concerning affairs in Brabant, Germany and Savoy; the attempt of Lords Portland and Loughborough to "conciliate things" in England, Mr. Fox's resistance, and the dwindling of his followers "to almost nothing;" the execution of the King of France, and the horror and indignation roused in England; the proceedings of the National Convention; the movements of Lord Hood's fleet, and the massacre of French in Italy. Two copies.

MARQUIS CORNWALLIS to COMMODORE the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1793, June 8. Calcutta.—"I have been exceedingly uneasy at having no accounts of you since you quitted the Pilot, but if no accident has happened (which I trust is the case) I think this letter must find you at Madras.

"If we have a war, I conclude that some frigates at least will come out with the notification; and I have recommended to Sir Charles Oakeley, if we are superior at sea, to proceed immediately to the attack of Pondicherry, in which event, I am sure you will readily give all possible assistance by blocking up, &c., &c.

"Unless we have the superiority at sea, I should not wish to engage in the siege, at least till I can come myself to the coast; and, in the event of a war, whether they commence the siege without me or not, I should be glad to get to the coast as soon as I possibly can, and to embark for England the day after Pondicherry is taken. . . ."

The SAME to the SAME.

1793, July 3. Calcutta.—"I was most exceedingly concerned to learn by a letter from Sir C. Oakeley, dated the 23rd of last month, that you had not then arrived at Madras, and that although he had sent an express to Trincomalé, he did not know with any certainty that you was there. With the powers which the Minerva possesses both of sailing and fighting, I have no doubt, if you were put on your guard, you would be able to take care of yourself; but, if you should fall in with your two Malabar acquaintances (both of which I understand to be hourly expected from Mauritius) and you should be unprepared and ignorant of the war, the consequences might be fatal.

"As it is of the utmost importance to take Pondicherry before the setting in of the Carnatic monsoon, I have directed that they should commence the siege as soon as they are ready, without waiting for me, but as in the meantime I am all impatience to get to the coast, I must entreat that you will do all you can to promote my wishes in a point which interests me so sensibly.

"We have taken an English built ship in this river that carries eighteen six pounders, and was in the last war fitted out as a sloop of war. I intend that she should carry part of my family and baggage, but I dare not venture myself in any less secure conveyance than a frigate or twenty gun ship, if any such should come out. If nothing should come, you may perhaps fetch me yourself, as I think few objects can be more important for the public service than my speedy arrival on the coast. Blair at present commands my armed vessel, but she shall be heartily at your service if you wish to take her."

The SAME to the SAME.

1793, July 11. Calcutta.—"I have this moment received your letter of the 27th ult.; and though I greatly rejoice at your arrival at Madras, I am put under considerable difficulties about my passage thither.

"I should be very sorry to fall into the hands of such an enemy, but unless a frigate should arrive before the 7th of August, I shall embark in a prize that we have armed, and take my chance, and I trust that, if you hear of enemy's frigates, you will keep the best look out for me that you can. I think we need not fear a privateer. If you should be able to send a vessel in time for me, I am sure you will do it."

MARQUIS CORNWALLIS to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1793, July 13. Calcutta.—"When I wrote to you on the 11th I was in great haste, having barely time to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 27th of June; and I must likewise confess that I felt a considerable degree of mortification and disappointment at seeing so little prospect of my arriving upon the coast in any reasonable time.

"Having however reflected seriously on the impression which my capture would probably make on the native Powers, and the dangerous consequences with which it might be attended to the British interests in India, I do not think that I should be justifiable in embarking in a vessel which, by herself, would barely be a match for a stout privateer and would be an easy prey to two of no great force

"I know that I may depend upon your accommodating me with a frigate, if the circumstances of the service can possibly admit of it; but if that should be impracticable, I have requested Sir C. Oakeley (unless he should hear from you that the French frigates are come in force into the Bay) to send the Triton or some Indiaman of that size for me, as I think that our armed sloop, in company with an Indiaman well manned with artillery men, would not only be a match for any privateer force, but for one of the smaller frigates. If, on the contrary, you should have good reason to believe that the ships you heard of at Mauritius have arrived in the Bay, there would be no safety for me but in a frigate, and you will not forget me."

The SAME to the SAME.

1793, August 3. Calcutta.—"I yesterday received your very kind letter by Manning, and notwithstanding my own anxiety, I am well convinced that you could not have acted otherwise, and I am very glad that you decided to take the part you have done. and I most earnestly hope you will succeed

"By the great exertions of Captain Lewis of the Woodcote, and of Mr. Gillet the builder, that vessel will drop down from Chanfaul Ghaut on the 11th, and will I trust be at Kedjezee by the 18th, although she must stop to take in some rice at Diamond harbour to bring her down in the water. She carries 26 nine-pounders and 6 fours, and will carry seventy-five European artillery men, and as many gun Lascars. Blair in the Bien Aimée carries 25 artillery men and as many Lascars, and eighteen six-pounders.,

"I give out that I shall go in the Woodcote, and shall proceed in her to Kedjezee, where I mean with two of my family to remove privately to the Bien Aimée, and as the latter is supposed to be the fastest sailer, and as the two ships are to keep company, if we should, contrary to all probability, meet with a superior force, I must be very unfortunate if I cannot escape.

"I think that, without being too sanguine, I may hope to reach Madras in eighteen days from Kedjezee, as the current at the end of August sets near shore pretty strong to the southward, and the wind is variable. If I can proceed by sea to Pondicherry without landing at Madras, it will save both time and trouble, but I shall not attempt it without hearing from you. Three armed transports with Artillery men, Lascars, and stores, will sail about the same time that I do; but I intend only that the Woodcote and Bien Aimée should keep company.

"The Drake, Bombay cruiser, will join you about this time, and will, I trust, prove very acceptable to you as a tender. From what Manning tells me of the Concord, I think I shall order her to be sold; and as I cannot remove Blair so near the time of our sailing without putting things into some confusion, and running the risk of losing men, I propose that Manning and the Lieutenant shall return in the Woodcote, and the men be divided according to convenience between the two ships; and, as soon as we arrive, I will send the Bien Aimée to you, to be taken into the service if you like her, or put Manning into her at Madras if we land there, as you may direct. You will easily conceive that I am anxious for Manning's promotion. Be so good as to send letters and instructions for me to Madras."

The Same to the Same.

1793, September 15. Madras.—"As you have generally been in the practice of coming on shore early in the morning, it is probable that you do not intend to visit us to-day; and as we dine to-morrow with Sir Charles Oakeley, I shall not expect to see you before Tuesday. My only wish is, with temper and good humour (although I cannot with cheerfulness) to touch briefly on the subjects you have mentioned; and I feel so perfectly guiltless on every article, that I can hardly doubt my success in placing my conduct before you in a very different light from that in which you have hitherto seen it.

"No consideration should induce me to be the cause of your doing what does not appear to be right in your own mind, and I have therefore determined to take my passage in the Swallow, unless you should be relieved or ordered home before the period of our leaving this place; in which case I should with great pleasure go with you. But as that is very unlikely, I shall probably only have to request you will see us safe off the land.

The Same to the Same.

1793, December 17. St. Helena.—"We arrived here on the 15th, without having seen a single sail from the time you parted from us till we made this island.

"I have met with newspapers here as late as the beginning of July, but do not find that any material event had happened in Europe, or that any ships of war had sailed for India.

"Your stay on the evening that you came on board the Swallow was so short that I omitted speaking to you about Williamson's desire of visiting England. There can in my opinion be no professional objection to it; but as it is probable that the new military regulations for the Indian army will not only give a greater facility to the officers of the Company's service to visit their native country, but enable them also to do it without resigning the service or forfeiting their pay, it may be as well that he should wait to see how that business is finally arranged.

"We have met with some delay in watering here, on account of the very extraordinary violence of the surf, but hope to get away to-morrow or next day.

"You may depend on my writing to you as soon as I arrive in England. I enclose a letter for you which I found here from the Bishop, which I suppose is of a very old date."

Lord Hood to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1794, May 21. Victory, off Bastia.—"Accept my most sincere congratulations on your return to England, and I hope and trust in the most perfect health. I confess myself greatly your debtor for the several letters you have had the goodness to write me, which I have had no opportunity of answering, and feel myself particularly obliged for your attention to my young friend Gosselin. From a sense of your kindness to me in many instances, previous to my knowledge of your having made Gosselin a Captain, I took the very earliest opportunity I had of giving post to Captain Cunningham, whom your good brother the Bishop recommended to me for employment before the war.

"I have been engaged in very busy scenes, and have had difficulties innumerable to struggle with, but, thank God, have very happily surmounted them all.

"May 22. Bastia has surrendered."

Capt. Horatio Nelson to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis, London.

1794, May 23. Bastia.—"My dear friend, I congratulate you most sincerely on your return to England, and shall rejoice to see you there. Our friend Lord Hood, you will know, has been thwarted in this country in his endeavours to take Bastia, but to his honor with the troops embark'd to serve as marines, 40 artillery men and marines, 1,000 effective men, join'd to a close blockade, he has accomplish'd his object. We, who know his judgment, which no affected fears can warp, will not be surprised that success is the consequence. Our loss you will see has been most trifling. Believe me with sincerest friendship, your most faithful Horatio Nelson."

The Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis, at Plymouth.

1795, June 27.—"As the papers give us an account of your having had some occupation in your cruise, probably you may soon return to refit. What I have heard of this matter at present was highly satisfactory, but it did not go to the conclusion, which I have no doubt was gratifying to you. . . .

"After having written so far, the post came in with your letter, the copy of one from Lady Spencer, and of one from a Captain of your fleet. You may, I hope, conceive what sensations the high approbation which your conduct has met with gives me; and how truly happy it has made me. Next week I am to confirm at several places in this neighbourhood, and, the week following, I shall set out on my Derbyshire visitation."

Admiral J. Forbes to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1795, June 27. London.—"I should be wanting to myself if I did not attempt to express my sincere rejoicing on the success of your late transactions, and congratulating you on your recent accession of glory and fame.

"Though the public are used to expect much from you, they could not possibly expect what is not in the nature of things, that with all your acknowledged firmness and abilities, you should repulse an enemy near three times stronger than yourself, and sailing better, and thereby make a retreat deserving of a triumph.

"The happy incident had almost turned the head of your very sincere and affectionate friend, Mr. Pole. He came to me, and ran about the whole day to communicate it to your friends, and having copied an account of it from a letter from Captain Stopford, he could not proceed in reading it to me without frequent interruptions from tears of joy."

Earl Howe to Vice-Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1795, June 28. London.—Acknowledging his letter, containing the information that he had met with the French fleet, from which the ships under his command had escaped with great difficulty, and that he had put into Cawsand Bay.

Sir Charles Saxton to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1795, June 28. Portsmouth Yard.—"We have had such various accounts of your rencontre with the enemy that we hardly know which to believe, but you will readily believe that we cleave to that which flatters our wishes most, and for the detail and particulars we will wait till your squadron arrives here. In the meantime we cannot help offering our earnest congratulations that you are so very honourably out of the scrape, of which nobody seems to have the smallest inclination to dispute, and are perfectly quiet and confident that in this instance our naval character has suffered no diminution, nor [is] in the least degree impaired, but has experienced every addition of glory and honour that could be derived from the event under all its circumstances.

"We expect to see you every hour, and are big with expectation that Lord Bridport will be fortunate enough to finish a work you so nobly began. Since writing the above the news, imperfectly also detailed to us, of my Lord Bridport's success following (and in consequence), so close upon the heels of your own, has just now reached Portsmouth, and set us all agog."

MARQUIS CORNWALLIS to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1795, June 28. Warley Camp.—"I most sincerely wish you joy and assure you that your conduct in your late rencontre with the French fleet will do you more honour, in the mind of every reflecting man in this kingdom, than ten ordinary victories with equal or superior force.

"When Mr. Windham expressed his apprehensions lest you should fall in with the enemy, when we first received an account of their force and of their steering towards the line where you were supposed to be cruising, I ventured to say to him, 'you need not be much afraid, it will not be easy to get him into a scrape.' As I understand that you are going to sea very soon, and may perhaps not receive this letter, I shall only add my most earnest wishes for your welfare and success."

W. W. POLE [afterwards Earl of Mornington] to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1795, June 29. Hanover Square.—"I cannot resist writing you a few lines to congratulate you from my heart upon your late glorious proceedings with the French fleet. You will easily believe that there was no man in England made more, or, I should rather say, so happy by the accounts of your success as I was; though I flatter myself no person alive had a better right not to be surprised at it. Indeed it so happened that when I heard the French fleet was at sea, and apprehensions were entertained for your safety, I predicted the consequences in case you met them pretty much as they fell out. Your letter, which I read with delight in Saturday's Gazette, reminded me of old times, and it is no small gratification to me to hear all the world applaud the clearness and modesty of your accounts, at the same time that they do justice to the forcible and handsome manner in which you write of the conduct of the ships under your command. I can scarce bring myself to feel that I am not still under your protection, but, though circumstances have long withdrawn me from it, I shall ever consider your fame and fortune as things nearest my heart. For be assured, dear Sir, that if my own father had distinguished himself as you have done, I could not have felt more happy than I do.

"I know you hate flattery, but when a man feels as I do he cannot refrain from expressing some of his convictions, and I rely upon that goodness which in former days has excused many of my errors, to forgive my troubling you with my praises, which, however, I won't allow to be flattery, for they are sincere."

The Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1795, June 29. Eccleshall.—"I cannot help repeating the satisfaction which I feel at the very favourable manner in which your conduct is generally received, and the thanks, which I saw yesterday in the paper, do you the greatest credit. At the birthday, the Queen enquired much after you, and was very civil about you. . . .

"This place is so improved I hardly knew it, and in another two years will be quite comfortable. I observe that Mr. Whitby has a vast number of young beeches and other trees to spare, which, as they are so near, would be very useful. He offered me, when he lived at Cresswell, any number of them, but I did not want them. Now they would be very desirable, and I cannot ask for them. The son has now been in action and, I hope, has satisfied you; indeed I do not doubt it. I shall have great pleasure in shewing this place to you, when I have finished it."

Earl Howe to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1795, June 30. Porters Lodge.—"Private. Not informed of any other circumstances besides those contained in your letter to which my official answer was sent two days since, I was ignorant until I went to town yesterday of the just subject of congratulation which the conduct of your little squadron, when in the most perilous situation, establishes your title to, in public acknowledgment.

"That you will be apprised of it from higher and more acceptable authorities I have no doubt, but I could not, on such an occasion, omit the tender of my mite of applause."

Sir Charles Middleton to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1795, July 4. Hertfort Street.—"Private. I should have congratulated you much sooner on your very judicious and honourable retreat from so superior a force of the enemy, but have been confined with the gout.

"I have read your journal with the utmost satisfaction, and it is proposed to bind it up separate, to be kept at the Admiralty as a model of professional conduct."

Henry Addington to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1795, November 11. Palace Yard.—"I have the honour of transmitting to you the enclosed resolutions, which express the high and unanimous sense entertained by the House of Commons of your judicious and gallant conduct on the 16th and 17th days of June last, when in the presence of a superior fleet of the enemy; and likewise of the spirited exertions of the officers, seamen, marines and soldiers, who served under your command on those days. Allow me to assure you, that I have great satisfaction in obeying the commands of the House, by conveying to you this distinguished testimony of the approbation and gratitude of your country."

[Sir] C. S[axton] to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis, Wimpole Street.

1796, September 18. Portsmouth.—I will send what is due to you for your servants and retinue to Mr. Kingdom. "He is one of the principal clerks, and in the place of Nelson, the now Secretary at the Navy Office. . . .

"The Juste sailed yesterday, but without her proper Commander, our friend Tom*, who was, like one or two others lately, most unluckily taken ill within twelve hours after he received his orders for the West Indies,. . . . I hope he will soon do well again, as it is said his Shelala friends was not easily prevailed upon to go to sea without their old and much esteemed commander. . . .

"Since I wrote the above, I have seen St. P., who would make believe that Tom is exceedingly angry with Lord Hu[gh Seymour] for ordering his ship to sea so hastily, and that he says they might have stayed four and twenty hours, to see whether a man got better or not. But quere? Is he really angry, and is not it all grimace on all sides. 5 p.m.—I sent this moment to inquire how he did, and received for answer, a great deal better. If so, perhaps he may follow her to Plymouth, where she stops.

Lord Nelson to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1799, January 31. Palermo.—"Nothing could give me more pleasure than receiving a wish from my very old acquaintance, who has more than once saved my life by his friendship and taught me by his example to beat the French. My honors, my riches, the gift of a gracious sovereign and my country, are beyond my deserts, yet believe me, my dear friend, I see but little real happiness for me on this side the grave, and when it shall please God to call me I shall go with pleasure. Ever, ever believe me your oblig'd, faithful, and affectionate friend, Nelson.

You may rely on my attention to Mr. Richⁿ.."

Elizabeth Cornwallis to her Uncle, Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis, Aldwick, near Chichester.

1799, June 6, Hill Street.—"I shall feel really anxious to hear of the safe arrival of Lady Louisa Brome and her child in Ireland. I think the expedition somewhat dangerous for them both. . . . Lady M. and Mr. Singleton are still in town. She was very angry at not being asked to the Queen's ball. . . . My ears have hardly recovered the royal review on the birthday. James saw it; he says it was as fine a sight as John Bull could wish for, and that many emigrants were there and seemed struck with it. . . . All the world is mad about the new play, called Pizarro. James went to the door last night, but found it impossible to squeeze his little person in. I like your fancying the sailors would have forgot you. The lower orders are not always quite so forgetful as the higher in my opinion. Do not call me a democrat for saying this."

* The Hon. Thomas Pakenham.

The Same to the Same.

1799, June 19. Hill Street.—"Captain Whitby dined here on Sunday. He seems very much occupied with his ship; I imagine he is at this moment otherwise engaged, in preparing for a great masquerade which the Duchess of Marlborough is to give to-night. Lady M. and Mr. Singleton are come up from Cavenham on purpose to be there. . . . Lord and Lady Carnarvon were robbed a few days ago in coming from the Bishop of Winchester's at Chelsea, where they had dined. My father was of the party, but fortunately escaped the salute upon his return. I should fear this will rather thin the galas at Winchester House."

Marquis Cornwallis to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1800, June 13. Phœnix Park.—"Our Union business is now happily over, and I have the satisfaction to say that there is no appearance of ill-humour or disturbance in any part of the island, or even in Dublin where it was most unpopular. Several of the most respectable, although by no means the least violent of the opposition, have declared that, since the measure has received the sanction of the Legislature, they would support it with as much zeal as they would maintain any other law of the land.

"This important event has totally changed the relative situation of this country, and if the English Government act wisely, those evils which have brought not only Ireland but the whole British Empire to the brink of destruction, may, in the course of a few years be entirely removed.

"I cannot venture to look forward to any precise time for my own deliverance, and am much afraid that it cannot come as soon as I wish. But I feel that I grow old, and it is natural for me, after having been employed so long in situations of labour and anxiety, to look with impatience for the hour of quiet and retirement."

The Same to the Same.

1800, December 16. Phœnix Park.—"The report of my having the gout was occasioned by the sort of attack to which I have been subject for near thirty years, of swelling in one of my feet or ankles for three or four days, unaccompanied with the inflammation and painful symptoms which attend the gout. You may remember my being lame for a day or two on board of the Isis. Whenever people see a man walk lame, they immediately cry out that it is the gout. For my part, I am pretty indifferent about these matters. If a man of 62 can go quietly off the stage without pain, he has no right to be dissatisfied.

"I have had no concern about the peerages given to the Admirals; those matters are done in England, but I assisted your old acquaintance Lord Charles Fitzgerald, who was abandoned by his brother on account of difference in politics, and would I believe have been put to some inconvenience if he had been reduced to the state of an *un*privileged man.

"Letters of civility have passed between Gardner and myself, but it is not likely that we should meet unless I go to Cork.

"Your landlord, Sir John D'Oyley, dined with me the other day, and seemed to think that he was fortunate in having so good a tenant.

"Matters look as ill as possible in the north, and in Germany; God only knows how we shall weather our present difficulties. I confess that for a long time I have been given to despond. Whoever tells you of my being in good spirits, knows very little what passes in my breast. It is the duty of persons who have so odious a part as mine assigned to them, to keep up appearances."

E. Cornwallis to her uncle, Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

[1801, beginning of], Sunday. Bath.—I have been very near dying of a fever. "You know it is unfashionable to be ill and quite obsolete to die. I suppose the fear of my being detected in such disgraceful proceedings operated in Hill Street, as the whole family went to the Drawing Room just when Sir Horace and the physician expected that their letters would have brought them here. . . .

"Sir Horace [Mann]* is laid up with the gout. He always has it about this time of the year, but he bears it with his usual good temper and cheerfulness, and seems pleased with our efforts to nurse and amuse him.

"Irish affairs prosper, I fancy; but when we receive the members from thence, we shall want a new House of Lords, as ours overflows already with Mr. Pitt's peers."

Earl St. Vincent to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1801, February 22. Mortimer Street.—Recommending Vice-Admiral Gambier, who desires to serve under Cornwallis's command. The Board are obliged to take the Russell and Magnificent away to make up Sir Hyde Parker's squadron, but will send others instead very soon.

The Same to the Same, at Torbay.

1801, March 28. Admiralty.—"I never did give credit to the intention of the combined fleet to measure with ours, until within these few days; but, on combining the intelligence from every quarter, I do in my conscience believe you will have the honour and happiness of finishing the war, by a glorious achievement."

The Same to the Same.

1801, April 20. Admiralty.—"Upon a review of Captain D'Auvergne's intelligence, and coupling it with the observations made by Captain Cunningham of the Clyde, than whom I do not know a more correct officer, I incline to your opinion that your squadron should not be separated in the manner recommended by the Board, and I have the happiness to know that every individual member reposes the same confidence in your judgment, zeal, and ability that I do, and agrees with me in a full approbation of the disposition you have made of your frigates and advanced squadron under the orders of Sir James Saumarez, to keep up a communication between Brest and the body of your squadron.

* Cousin of the writer. Succeeded his uncle as baronet in 1786.

"I am glad you were able to detach Sir Edward Pellew so immediately; the Majestic and Orion will supply the places of your crippled ships, and I trust we shall soon be able to send you two more.'

Postscript.—"Since writing my letter Lieutenant Colonel Stewart is arrived with accounts of an armistice having been concluded on the 9th instant with the Court of Denmark, suspending hostilities on the coast of Finland and Jutland only for fourteen weeks, and fourteen days' notice, at the expiration of the aforementioned term, before hostilities are committed by any party; the Court of Denmark agreeing to suspend during that period her co-operation under the treaty of armed neutrality."

The Same to the Same.

1801, June 20. Admiralty.—"I hope you will do me the honour to accept of a medal which I have caused to be struck to commemorate the exemplary conduct of the officers, seamen and marines of the Ville de Paris, in the late trying times."

Viscount Hood to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1801, August 31. Royal College, Greenwich.—"Private . . . My friend Nelson, at his last attack at Boulogne, appears to have taken the bull by the horns, and to have sacrificed a great number of lives without an adequate object, for the bringing off a few gunboats could not be one, for they could be replaced within a fortnight. This, I am told, is generally said in town, where I go very seldom. His Lordship since that has made no other attempt, which I suppose may be recommended to him, so as not to irritate, at the moment a favourable dispatch was expected from Bonaparte respecting peace, which is not yet come; but I think a few days must determine whether the sword is to be sheathed, or war continued. My fears are we shall have no peace but such a one as I shall view as a very serious misfortune instead of a blessing, until you have beaten the combined fleet at Brest. Therefore cease blocking the port, and tempt it out. I have ever held that opinion, and am persuaded the war has been prolonged by the blockade. A temporary one, under particular circumstances, may not only be prudent but perfectly wise; but a perpetual one must bear us down, which the French know as well as we, and that I conceive will make against a good peace.

"I feel very sensibly your very flattering expressions respecting my relation Sam Hood. I had a letter from him off Cape Spartel two days after his conflict with l'Indomptable. He, his officers, and ship's company were exceedingly jaded by their exertions in getting the Venerable to rights after the affair off Alguzaries [Algeziras], and in the action off Cadiz, he had not 500 men able to come to quarters. I therefore long for another letter from him after he gets to Gibralter and has been a few days quiet, for as long as the mind has full employment the fatigues of the body are not felt; this I know from experience."

EARL ST. VINCENT to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1801, September 2. Admiralty.—"I feel a considerable degree of delicacy in communicating to you my apprehension that the change my relation Captain Whitby has thought fit to make in the economy of the Ville de Paris may occasion dissatisfaction on board her. Without entering into the merits of the case, which probably are in favour of the new system, we found so much advantage from the quiet disposition of the people, their good manners, and apparent detestation of the licentious and mutinous conduct of many of the ships of the Channel fleet, that it was thought advisable not to brace them up too tight; and it is much to be feared that any material alteration in the modes they have been so long accustomed to, will occasion ill-humour and consequent evils. I am sure you will do me the justice to believe that nothing short of my anxious desire that the utmost harmony should prevail in the fleet you so ably command, more particularly in the ship bearing your flag, would have prompted me to make this communication, which is intended for your private ear, and to be acted upon, or not, as you shall judge expedient."

The SAME to the SAME.

1801, September 7. Admiralty.—". . . Every officer and person you wish to be removed from the Ville de Paris shall be otherwise disposed of and succeeded by those of your choice. I am extremely concerned to learn that there has been any impropriety in the conduct of Captain Sutton towards you, the more so as I had described him, as I really thought, propriety itself. . ."

The SAME to the SAME.

1801, October 2. Admiralty.—"The preliminaries of peace were signed last night, and I have infinite satisfaction in acquainting you that your brother, the Marquis, will negotiate the definitive treaty. The moment the preliminaries are exchanged, you will receive directions for the disposal of the fleet. Torbay, a port in Ireland, and Cawsand Bay will probably be the principal points until the definitive treaty is signed, which I will thank you to keep to yourself."

The SAME to the SAME.

1801, November 3. Admiralty.—"I have derived the highest degree of satisfaction from your obliging letter of the 1st, and shall always consider your having been placed at the head of the Channel fleet as an event of the greatest importance to the country at large, and of the most solid comfort to me."

The Same to the Same.

1801, November 9. Admiralty.—Complaining of the slovenly conduct of the port officers touching cartels, and observing that Admiral Villaret "is in luck not to have been discovered, as his treatment must have been that of a spy."

Marquis Cornwallis to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1801, November 10. Paris.—"I this morning received your letter dated the 1st from Torbay, and am happy to find that you had got into port before the dreadful gales of the 2nd and 4th. I have long considered peace to be necessary for the preservation of our country, and I did not therefore feel myself at liberty to refuse the mission when it was pressed upon me, although nothing could be more disagreeable to me.

"Admiral de Bruix, with whom I dined at Talleyrand's, spoke of your conduct off Belleisle in the highest terms, and added that, although he felt mortified at being deprived of a victory which he considered as certain, he had some satisfaction in seeing you obtain the success which your conduct so truly deserved.

"Should a dissolution take place, of which I know nothing but report, I hope you will again represent the borough of Eye."

James Cornwallis to his Uncle, Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1802, February 16. Hill Street.—Concerning his sister's approaching marriage to Mr. Warde Jackson.

Earl St. Vincent to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1802, April 1. Admiralty.—"The French have seen, felt, and understood so much of your character, that their's must be changed materially if they face you in preference to your very sincere and obedient servant."

The Same to the Same.

1802, April 10. Rochetts.—"I am sorry to have kept you so long in Torbay, which has been occasioned entirely by the apprehension of some disorders among the seamen, arising out of their impatience to be liberated, a disgrace I have felt confident we should not experience while your flag was flying. . . ."

Marquis Cornwallis to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1802, December 21. Culford.—"You mentioned some time ago that you thought you should be in town about Christmas, and gave us some reason to hope that you would visit Culford about that time. We propose to remain here till February (except that I may go up to attend the birthday) and shall be glad to see you whenever it may be agreeable and convenient to you to come.

"Mrs. Young, the widow of the Bishop of Clonfert, whom I made a bishop entirely on account of his great talents and exemplary character, and for no political reason whatever, has expressed a wish that I should get her son employed as midshipman. If it should fall in your way, without putting yourself to the least inconvenience, to recommend him to any friend of yours who happens to be in commission, I shall be obliged to you. I enclose an account of his services."

ADMIRALTY COMMISSIONERS to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS, Admiral of the Blue.

1803, May 16.—Desiring him to take the Victory (Captain Sutton) under his command.

THE BLOCKADE OF BREST.

1803, May–December.—A series of letters from the Naval Commanders engaged in the blockade, almost all of which, of any importance, have been printed by the Navy Records Society, in Despatches and Letters relating to the Blockade of Brest, Vol. I. There are 26 letters from Rear Admiral Collingwood, 5 from Sir Edward Pellew, 2 severally from Admiral Montague, Rear Admiral Campbell and Captain Lord Æmilius Beauclerk, and single letters from Captains Elphinstone, W. H. Jervis, and T. R. Ricketts.

WILLIAM MARSDEN to VICE-ADMIRAL LORD VISCOUNT NELSON.

1803, May 18. Admiralty.—Informing him that in case Admiral Cornwallis does not need the Victory, the Commissioners have desired the Admiral to put it under his Lordship's command; who may either shift his flag into it or proceed in the Amphion, directing the Victory to accompany him, as he thinks proper. Signed.

WILLIAM MARSDEN to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1803, May 18. Admiralty.—The letter alluded to above. "Printed in The Blockade of Brest," i. 12.

WILLIAM MARSDEN to VICE-ADMIRAL LORD VISCOUNT NELSON.

1803, May 19. Admiralty Office.—Acknowledging his letter (informing them that he has hoisted his flag on board the Victory) and desiring him on no account to pass Admiral Cornwallis, so as to run any chance of depriving him of the service of the Victory, if he wishes for her. "Printed in The Blockade of Brest," i. 13.

VISCOUNT NELSON to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1803, May 23. Victory, at sea.—"I have the honour to transmit you the directions of the Admiralty for my joining you off Brest, but as I have not been so fortunate as to meet you, and the whole business of the Mediterranean waiting my arrival, I have judged it proper to shift my flag to the Amphion and to proceed in her If you have no commands for the Victory, I trust you will order her to join me without a moment's loss of time." Signed, but signature cut out.

ADMIRALTY COMMISSIONERS to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1803, May 30.—Desiring him to take Rear Admiral Collingwood—who is to shift his flag to the Venerable—under his command. Signed by Lord St. Vincent, Sir Philip Stephens and Sir Thomas Troubridge.

VISCOUNT NELSON to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS, Commander-in-Chief, Channel Fleet.

1803, July 31. Victory, off Toulon.—"The Victory joined me last night, having been, via Malta, seven weeks from Gibraltar. I can only say to you thanks for not taking the Victory from me; it was like yourself and very unlike many others which you and I know. She has been tolerably successful, and indeed except the Amphion the only ship under my command who have taken any thing of any consideration.

"The Admiralty not allowing me to come out in the Victory direct from Portsmouth has lost the capture of two 74's, and probably two frigates, and perhaps by this time of much more.

"The fleet here upon paper are very formidable, but in fact the Victory, Bellisle, and Donegal are the only ships fit to keep the sea; the rest are unfit for service until docked, although amongst the finest and certainly best-manned ships in our service.

"I have at this moment only four sail to watch the French fleet; the rest are in port refitting. The squadron in Toulon is 7 of the line, 5 or 6 frigates, and 6 or 7 corvettes, perfectly ready for sea, and whenever they come out, which they will do whenever they have an object worth fighting for (I do not mean to say that they will merely think us an object worth coming out to fight, I never saw a Frenchman yet fight for fighting's sake, and I do not believe they will now begin). I have with me an élève of yours who I esteem most highly, not only as an active officer, but as a gentleman; his ship is always perfectly ready for any service, and he executes it in the best style, and I am sure that Captain Whitby will give me support in the true Cornwallis style should the French come out.

"With, my dear friend, my most ardent wishes for your meeting the French fleet, and for your health, believe me ever, with the sincerest regard, your most obliged and faithful friend, Nelson and Bronté."

REAR-ADMIRAL CUTHBERT COLLINGWOOD to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1803, August 9. Venerable.—"I am feeling very much obliged to you for your kindness in allowing me a choice of the ship to hoist my flag in the absence of the Venerable. Any ship has good accommodation for me; and as the Royal Sovereign is better kept further off shore than the rest of the squadron generally are, I intend to go on board the Minotaur. Besides, their Lordships might think I was pointing out a great ship for myself which they have allotted for some other officer, and I would not wish them to think so; but what determined me is, I can do the business better in the Minotaur.

"I shall take an early opportunity of going on board the Boadicea and making the enquiry; but, the Sirius not being present, I shall hear but one side of the question. Captain Prowse, in his letter to me, says the Boadicea attempted to wear clear of him, but did not go off sufficiently to clear him.

"Captain de Courcy has been a good deal in this service formerly, and is a very vigilant officer; if Hammond is not able to return to his command, she cannot be in better hands.

"I was much concerned to receive your information of the state of Dublin; in consequence I ordered a return of the different nations of which the ships' companies were composed. We have in the Venerable far the largest proportion of Irish, having 187 seamen, and 11 marines. In completing the complements this circumstance should be a consideration, as the times are."

Rear-Admiral Sir Robert Calder to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1803, November 1. Prince of Wales. Cawsand Bay.—Regretting that although he got the dock-yard men to work on Sunday, he fears his ship will not be ready to sail before Sunday or Monday. Is short of 118 men, and can get none where he is, but some are expected from Liverpool. The Northumberland is also very short of men, though in other respects ready.

Rear-Admiral Collingwood to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1803, December 21. Venerable. Cawsand Bay.—In answer to his letter of the 17th inst., the Admiralty have ordered his ship to be docked and re-fitted. This is a great disappointment to him, for he fears it will be long before he can join the fleet, unless their Lordships will appoint him another ship. The Colossus and Neptune are ready, and only wait for a fair wind.

Elizabeth Cornwallis to her Uncle, Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

[1803 ?], Monday. Hill Street.—Announcing the breaking off of her engagement to Mr. Jackson, "the young man having in plain, cool terms" informed her "that it would no longer conduce to his happiness." She feels it a fine lesson in humility that the faithful affection of six years should have so ended.

Marquis Cornwallis to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1804, January 9. Culford.—"I have felt much for you during the difficult and trying situations in which you have been lately placed.

"My first wish when you sailed from Torbay was that you would find the French fleet on the outside of the harbour, and have sufficient strength and opportunity to render, at least as far as those ships were concerned, all further blockading unnecessary. In failure of this, my next was gratified, by your having been able again to turn the key upon them.

"Ships however, and men too, must give way at last, and God only knows how all this business is to end.

"In the meantime you are the most popular man in England, and although some men may actually despise the voice of the public, or others may affect to do so, yet, after all, it is no very unpleasing sensation for a man to know that his conduct is universally approved and admired."

Evan Nepean to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1804, January 20. Admiralty Office.—Sending him a copy of a letter received by Lord Hawkesbury from Mr. Frere, his Majesty's minister at Madrid. Letter and enclosure both printed in "The Blockade of Brest," i., 252.

Vice-Admiral Sir Charles Cotton to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1804, January 30. San Josef. Cawsand Bay.—Stating that the weather has been a great hindrance to them. The Culloden, however, is ready for sea except her water, and will join the squadron as soon as completed.

Rear-Admiral Collingwood to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1804, February 14. Culloden.—"I shifted my flag to this ship on Sunday the 5th . . . This cold weather is a very agreeable change to me, for the constant wet and scanty clothing of this ship's company was increasing our sick list. If the French were waiting for a wind to come out, they cannot have one more favourable than this; but I think we are rather stronger than they would wish."

Viscount Nelson to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis, Commander-in-Chief, &c.

1804, February 14. Victory.—"Where your kind letter of September 27th has been travelling to I cannot guess; it only reached me a few days ago, with the Admiralty order to allow Whitby to go to England, he being appointed to the Ville de Paris, and another Captain appointed to the Bellisle. However, as Captain Hargood is not arrived I have recommended Whitby to remain a short time longer in order to reap the harvest of all his toils in the Bellisle; he has had an uphill work in her, and I should wish him to reap the fruit of his labours alongside a Frenchman. I expect them every hour to put to sea; they have ten sail ready or nearly so. What a dreadful winter you have had, my dear friend; we must not compare our Mediterranean weather with that of the Channel. That you may very soon see the French outside of Brest is the fervent wish of your most obliged and sincere friend."

Postscript.—"I can assure [you] I am not singular in regretting the loss of Whitby from our little squadron; it is universal." Printed in Clarke and M'Arthur's "Life of Nelson."

VISCOUNT NELSON to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS

1804, March 19. Victory.—"Nothing but the desire to get Whitby to you could have induced me to send a ship to Gibraltar, for my distress for small ships is greater than can be conceived; but I assure you there is nothing I would not readily do to meet your wishes. I sincerely hope that the French will soon give us both a meeting; the result ought not to be doubted; and then from my heart I hope that villain Buonaparte will be upset, and that we may have a permanent peace. It is really shocking that one animal should disturb the repose of Europe, who I believe wish for peace.

"In parting with Captain Whitby I part with an indefatigable officer who has had a hard task in the Bellisle, which he has left in good order.

"With every sincere good wish for your health and complete success, Believe me, my dear friend, your much obliged and affectionate, Nelson and Bronté."

REAR-ADMIRAL COLLINGWOOD to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1804, April 6. Culloden.—Regrets to report that his ship is very short of fuel, Capt. Reynolds informing him that there are only 12 bushels left, which is about four days' firing. The purser states that 45 quarters were sent on board by him at Plymouth (which should be sufficient for 180 days), and since he [Collingwood] came into the ship they have been regularly issued, therefore the great consumption must have been before he arrived.

SIR JOHN PERRING, LORD MAYOR, to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1804, April 9. Mansion House.—Enclosing a resolution of the Corporation of London, offering their thanks to Admiral Cornwallis and the rest of the Fleet. Printed in the "Blockade of Brest," i., 301.

CAPTAIN W. H. JERVIS to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1804, April 10. Bath.—Announcing the happy result of his court martial*, and thanking the Admiral for writing so kindly of him to his uncle [Lord St. Vincent].

---

* Upon the loss of his ship, the Magnificent.

The Same to the Same.

1804, May 1. Plymouth Sound.—Expressing his pleasure at being appointed to the Niobe, which he owes to the kind way in which the Admiral represented his conduct to the Admiralty.

Admiralty Commissioners to the Hon. William Cornwallis, Admiral of the White.

1804, May 8.—Informing him that they have ordered the Earl of Southesk, rear-Admiral of the White, to repair "off Brest," hoist his flag on board the Britannia, and put himself under Cornwallis's command. Signed.

Rear-Admiral Alexander Cochrane to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1804, May 13. Northumberland. Off Ferrol.—Acknowledging a copy of the vote of thanks from the Corporation of London to the squadron, with other papers, and stating that they are getting very short of provisions.

The Same to the Same.

1804, May 26. Northumberland. Off Ferrol.—Has had a hard battle to fight with the dishonest practices of the people there, but if he could be supplied with bread and coals, would feel perfectly independent. Printed in "Blockade of Brest," i., 334.

[Henry Dundas] Viscount Melville to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1804, June 4. Admiralty.—"I have last night the honour of your obliging letter. I shall probably soon have occasion to write to you on an important subject connected with the service in which you are now engaged; but I would not delay a moment in answer to yours to assure you that, on every ground, public and private, it will give me much satisfaction to render the arduous service on which you are placed as agreeable and comfortable to you as circumstances admit of; and, besides your official letters, I will be happy to receive from you such private communications as you may be disposed to lay before me.

"I thank you for your congratulations on my appointment to my present situation. Having obeyed the King's commands in accepting it, I will not allow myself to look back; but when I contemplate all the difficulties which surround the extensive and complicated task I have undertaken, you will not suppose me insensible to the obstacles I have to surmount, and the exertions which the country has a right to expect from me. Under those circumstances I cannot pretend to be perfectly at ease"

Marquis Cornwallis to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis

1804, June 7. Burlington Street.—". . . Things have been long in a very unpleasant state here, but within the last three or four days the King is very materially better, and we begin to hope that all will go on in the natural course.

"I have neither seen the Ministers nor the ex-Ministers since I wrote last. A number of changes in the Household and in other departments have taken place, for which I am totally at a loss to account. We propose to remove to Culford in ten days, where I shall remain all the summer. Brome will join his regiment of militia at Ipswich at the end of this month, and take Lady Louisa and his children with him, and I shall dose quietly upon the shelf at home."

VISCOUNT MELVILLE to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1804, July 10. Admiralty.—"Confidential. On Captain Puget's plan for destroying the French Fleet by means of fire-ships. Printed in "Blockade of Brest," ii., 8." Duplicate, signed.

The SAME to the SAME.

1804, July 14. Admiralty.—Suggesting the possible objectives of the ships which appear to be about to come out of Brest. Printed in "Blockade of Brest," i., 366.

The SAME to the SAME.

1804, July 29. Wimbledon.—"Private. You will of course feel that, in common with the other members of the Board of Admiralty, I participated in the satisfaction of receiving your letter of the 26th expressive of your readiness to return (at any moment, and on board any ship they might direct) to your command. I cannot help troubling you with a few private words on the subject. I should be indeed of all men the most unreasonable if I was even to entertain, far less express, a wish for your return one moment sooner that suits your own convenience. All therefore I can permit myself to say upon the subject is, that as you must have a daily correspondence with your fleet, and are best acquainted with the character and efficiency of those you have left behind you, so, by these considerations, I am certain your conduct will be regulated. As I have the highest respect for the professional talents of those on whom the command has devolved, I must be at ease on that score; but, on the other hand, you must be aware that, without depreciating the merits of any other officer, you possess the confidence of the country in the important trust which is now placed in your hands, and I am perfectly certain you will not be absent from the discharge of that trust at any moment you think it essential to the public service that you should be there. You have given too many eminent proofs of that feeling to leave a doubt of it in the mind of any person. . . .

"I have a great desire to hold a conversation with you before you return to your command, and it will be no inconvenience to me to run down to you at any time you let me know it would most suit your convenience.

"I am not unmindful of your wishes respecting Captain Gosselin I have reserved in my own mind the Latona for him, and the moment she comes forward, which will be soon, he shall be appointed to her."

MARQUIS CORNWALLIS to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1804, August 12. Culford.—"If afforded me great satisfaction to learn that you had so pleasant an interview with Lord Melville. I acted several years under the direction of the Board at which he presided, and I can truly say that I never met with a more fair and honourable man.

"It was very handsome on your part to offer to go out in the manner you did, notwithstanding you had so extraordinary a claim to a little respite; but if your health is equal to it, I think you judged very wisely, and I am very glad that you have now got Whitby for your Captain.

"Gosselin has, I find, the command of the Latona, in which ship Skelton is appointed a lieutenant. I took the liberty from our former acquaintance to give the latter a line of introduction to his captain.

"Brome and Lady Louisa are at Hull, and I am left with the care of the children, which is, I think, a very proper occupation for an old general that is laid by. It is not however quite without its anxieties, as we have continual alarms of hooping-cough, et cetera.

"Nothing could be more unpopular with the generality of your brethren in the service than the example you set by staying out so long, and I truly believe it will not be much followed."

ORDER OF BATTLE.

1804, November 17. Off Ushant. Ville de Paris. Signed by Admiral Cornwallis, and addressed to the Earl of Southesk.

REAR-ADMIRAL COCHRANE to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1804, November 25. Northumberland. Off Ferrol.—Concerning his fleet, the garrisons of Ferrol and Corunna, &c., &c. Printed in "Blockade of Brest," ii., 130.

LORD MELVILLE to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1804, December 1. Wimbledon.—Thanking him for his spontaneous kindness in forwarding his son-in-law, the Lord Chief Baron of Scotland [Robert Saunders Dundas], on his voyage to Madeira.

R. DUNDAS to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1804, December 5. Illustrious. Near Ferroll.—Stating that Sir Charles Hamilton had stood for Brest, in order to put him on board the Naiad, but the wind being directly against them, he had persuaded Sir Charles to give up the attempt. The Egyptian being to sail in a few days, Admiral Cochrane has kindly offered to desire Capt. Fleming to put him ashore at Madeira.

ELIZABETH CORNWALLIS to her Uncle, ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

[1804 ?], December 12.—"Your letter of Saturday last has just reached me. I do not like the naval part at all. . . . I cannot help fearing by this intended arrangement, that though you may come when you please, it will not be so easy to resume the command at a better season. It is very extraordinary that the Chief should not know the constitutional character, I may call it, of officers so high in professional rank. I have no idea of a hypochondriac Admiral's keeping such a fleet to work through a long winter, and then, if anything goes wrong it will be said that you should have stayed. I almost wish you could brave it. . . .

"James says that Addington vows he will never speak to Pitt again; the lie of the day, very likely, as its news often proves. I am going to the ball to-night for the first time, with Lady Fielding and a pleasant party."

The SAME to the SAME.

1804, December 26. Bath. ". . . I went yesterday to call upon a good lady, a Lichfield clergyman's wife, and what should there be upon her sofa but Lady Nelson, with a lameness like a sprain, by her manner of walking, which she immediately did out of the room, poor creature! I felt ashamed of my red eyes for tiny sorrows in comparison with hers, and longed to support her down the stairs, had I not been a stranger to her. . . ."

MARQUIS CORNWALLIS to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1805, January 3. Culford.—"You will be surprised to hear that I am once more going to Bengal. This task is undertaken by me at the earnest request of the Ministers and the leading men in the Court of Directors; and when I am told that I may essentially serve my country, and know that by the same means I am likely to assist my family, you will agree with me, I think, that there are few enjoyments or comforts in this world for a man of sixty-six, that can be put in competition with these objects."

ADMIRAL COCHRANE to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1805, January 5. Northumberland, at sea.—"The Lucy lugger joined me yesterday, having two days before captured the Spanish brig Santander, from La Vera Cruz, bound to Santander with a valuable cargo, besides 112,457 dollars and some plate. I enclose such information as I have been enabled to obtain from that vessel, and I have stationed the squadron in such a situation, both for their mutual support and to intercept the enemy's ships, as I trust will be attended with success.

"Yesterday morning the Repulse boarded an American brig four days from Lisbon, the master of which informed Capt. Legge that, ten days before, he saw at Lisbon the Declaration of war by Spain against Great Britain. This, joined to the former intelligence which I sent by the Pickle, and the Lucy lugger having been fired at by a Spanish fort and nearly struck by the shot, although her colours were hoisted, leaves me no doubt that war now exists."

The SAME to the SAME.

1805, January 10. Northumberland.—In my letter by his Majesty's schooner Pickle,* I informed you I had received intelligence from Corunna that war existed between this country and Great Britain, since which I wrote you by the Santander, a vessel detained by this squadron. I have now to state the accounts yesterday received from Ferrol, accompanied by a translation of part of the Madrid Government Gazette of the 28th ult., being a proclamation from the Prince of Peace in his new capacity of generalissimo and director of the present war between Spain and Great Britain. I have further to add that my informant stated that he had not seen any declaration of war, although orders had been given for some time past to begin hostilities. He also says that accounts had arrived at Ferrol of one English merchant ship from Gibraltar having been carried into Cadiz, where a very rich ship from Lima had also arrived in safety.

"What relates to Ferrol is as follows:—General Francis Antonio Filangieri, natural brother of the King of Spain, has arrived there to take command of the troops, where ten thousand men are already assembled. Ten thousand French troops are on their march from France to add to the garrison. It is expected that the combined army is to be under the command of a French General, and a French Admiral of high rank is said to be intended for the command of the two squadrons.

"The registered seamen are ordered in from the out ports to man the Spanish squadron. Three of the French ships are ready, but the Fougeuex and Redoubtable is in the Arsenal and cannot be completed just now for want of timber. There is great want of all species of stores and provisions, with which they are expected to be supplied by neutrals. Six hundred French soldiers and seamen now garrison the Castle of San Philipe; the French seem to have taken the superintendence of almost every department. A French engineer is fortifying St. Pedro Bay, where the squadron used to anchor and procure water; two bomb batteries are erecting there, and one at point Coitelada.

"The Dutch ship Olden Barnevelt has been given up to the French, who mean to repair her in the Arsenal. Her crew go by land to Holland by the way of France, at least they leave Ferrol by land. I however suspect that they will afterwards be sent home by neutral vessels.

"An officer I sent in with a flag of truce yesterday to Ferrol reports to me that a movement has taken place in the Arsenal, for instead of five Spanish line of battle ships, he could observe only three. It is very probable that the two that are missing are now at anchor in the harbour, as they are complete in everything for sea except men and provisions.

* Dated January 1. Printed in The Blockade of Brest, ii., 145.

12 January, at sea.—Since writing the above, I have spoke to a Ragusean polacre, which vessel left Ferrol yesterday. He confirms the suspicions entertained by the officer I sent with the flag of truce and says that two of the line of battle ships had come out of the Arsenal into the Road, to be completed for sea.

14 January, at sea.—The weather has been so very bad for some days past as to prevent me from having any communication with the rest of the squadron. I now take the first opening to send off the Minotaur, not having either frigate or small vessel with me, the Lucy lugger having been sent to warn the frigates off Vigo of the war, from which service she is not yet returned. Should you order the Minotaur back, I beg to propose that as much bread should be put on board of her as she can stow, and an additional quantity of spirits.

Enclosing :

1. A long proclamation by the " Prince of Peace " accusing England of having broken amity by taking three of the King's frigates and making prisoners a regiment of infantry on board, which " robberies and treacheries " were committed at a time when the Spanish King had given permission of trade to English vessels, and every possible succour to their ships of war. He calls upon the seamen and soldiers to avenge their brethren, slain or made prisoners on a desert island, and upon the whole nation of " generous Spaniards " to take that vengeance which their King commands, and honour and justice call for. They have not forgotten, though the English may have done, that the blood which flows in their veins is the same that has overcome Carthaginians, Romans, Vandals and Moors, and the world will yet see augmented the great number of Castilian heroes. The nobleness and magnanimity of the Spanish character cannot survive without taking vengeance for the great affronts of England, yet without following them in actions " not allowed by cultivated nations, who have not lost their honour and good conduct." Nations with smaller forces than theirs have happily overthrown a greater force ; the whole people must be encouraged by their governors, prelates and chiefs politic to do their duty and to inflict every possible damage upon the enemy. Age and important affairs do not permit their Sovereign to take an active part in this arduous enterprise, but he will always be willing to help them by his treasure and his good counsel, and it is hoped that the elements themselves will be ready for the execution of their ideas.

2. Admiral Cochrane to the Governor of Ferrol.—Stating that as—from information received from the Captain General of Galacia and others, and also from " the conduct displayed from the fort in Dominos Bay of the 28th, by firing several shots at his Britannic Majesty's lugger Lucy, although her colours were flying—he can have no doubt but that the Spanish Government has declared war against Great Britain, he has felt it his duty to give orders to his squadron to detain all Spanish vessels and send them to England, in pursuance whereof three vessels have been met with and sent to Plymouth. But desiring to alleviate unpleasantness to individuals, he sends into Ferrol five Spanish subjects to be at his Excellency's disposal, for whom he begs a receipt. Jan. 10, 1805. Copy.

3. The Governor of Ferrol to Admiral Cochrane.—Thanking him for sending the Spanish prisoners, but begging him in future to send the cartels to Corunna, as the Captain General of the province is there. Jan. 10, 1805. Translation.

MARQUIS CORNWALLIS to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1805, March 25. Burlington Street.—"I have received your letter, and am glad to find that you intend coming to town so soon. You named, however, rather an early day, I believe even for your own preparations; and what with ministers, despatches, and various other circumstances, I should think it would be probably nearer to the 14th than the seventh, before we reach Portsmouth. I wish, however, very much to be off, for, as it is, I am plagued to death from morning till night, and, to add to my misfortunes, poor Robinson, my secretary, is not well, and can afford me no assistance. All here are well; Brome and Lady Louisa desire to be kindly remembered. My compliments and best wishes to Captain and Mrs. Whitby. What a comfort it must be to her that he came home just at this time. I have sincerely pitied her during his long absence.

"I have got a Bengal writership for a son of Mrs. Warde's, and he will go out with me in the Medusa."

SIR J. DUCKWORTH to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1805, July 5. Manchester Street.—"Finding you have again hoisted your flag, I hope you will not deem me presumptive in expressing a wish, if consistent with your feelings, you will gratify Captain King and myself by getting L'Achille to serve under your command. As he was brought up in your school, it would be arrogance in me to attempt to point out his merits as an officer; but, as a tribute due, I can assure you that his ship, when I visited her in Cawsand [Bay, exceeded m]y most sanguine expectations for one recently [commissioned]. Should the Acasta or Endymion, Captains Dunn and E. Durnford King, be under your command, as they have both been my captains, and the former will serve with me if ever I am indulged to hoist my flag again, which the present Admiralty don't seem disposed to admit, I ever must be interested in their success, and I beg to introduce them to you as officers of judgment and decision to execute your orders.

"The French having lately been in the habit of risking squadrons at sea, I hope ere long they will afford you an opportunity of convincing them of their temerity. Happy should I be had it been my lot to be made a participator under you in whatever service might occur."

SIR ROBERT CALDER to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1805, July 23. Prince of Wales, off Ferrol.—Giving an account of his success against the combined fleets of France and Spain on the previous day. Printed in "The Blockade of Brest," ii., 311.

VISCOUNT NELSON to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS, Commander-in-Chief, &c.

1805, July 27. Victory, off Cape St. Mary's.—"My dear friend, The enemy's fleet from the West Indies being certainly gone to some port in the Bay, I am proceeding to the northward with eleven sail of the line. I shall either call off Cape Clear, or proceed direct off Ushant to form a junction with you, as circumstances may in my judgment (from intelligence) require. I shall only hope, after all my long pursuit of my enemy, that I may arrive at the moment they are meeting you, for my very wretched state of health will force me to get on shore for a little while. I am ever, my dear friend, your most faithful and attached, Nelson and Bronté."

Holograph. Printed in Nelson's Despatches and Letters (vi., 500) from a copy.

LORD BARHAM to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1805, August 1. Admiralty.—"To guard against any misfortune that may arise from the want of line of battleships during the absence of Lord Nelson, we have ordered every one that can be got ready to be manned from the frigates and small craft, to join you without a moment's delay; and such as may not be in such a state of forwardness will be completed as soon as possible. . . ."

The SAME to the SAME.

[1805, August, early in. Admiralty].—"We are hurrying out to you as fast as possible every ship in port where men can be had. Ferrol is the great object till our East India and West India fleets are arrived, and which may be in the course of a fortnight. The heavy frigates, as far as you can spare them, cannot be employed better than meeting them towards the coast of Ireland.

"We have this moment received yours, and you have entered completely into my views.

"We shall make you up 20 for your own force as soon as we are able, but the Downs must be kept strong during the height of the spring as the Dutch are in great force at the Texel and the flotilla too numerous to be dealt [with] without some heavy ships. We have no doubt of the Rochfort ships being at Ferrol."

The SAME to the SAME.

1805, August 10. Admiralty.—"Private. I just write one line to apprize you that the Ministers look to an invasion soon, and have given directions to prepare all the military corps. I have done the same privately to the Admirals at all the ports, that they may be prepared to give every kind of assistance to our naval force in the Channel.

"I take it for granted you will take a near station during the spring tides, in order to reinforce the eastern force, if necessary.

"The Dutch can only get to sea at the height of the spring, and which is the time to guard against.

"At present we are very strong in that quarter, and your ships in port are getting ready as fast as possible."

The SAME to the SAME.

1805, August 15. Admiralty.—"I had wrote you a private instruction, when we first heard of the Rochfort squadron being at sea, to send four ships of the line to intercept them, but the alarm from the eastward obliged us to send those ships to Lord Keith which would otherwise have come to you.

"It is truly mortifying not to be able to seize such opportunities when they offer, and it will be my study to keep your fleet as strong in numbers as possible, so as to allow you to detach squadrons for annoying the enemy, as often as you hear of their being in your neighbourhood, without waiting for orders from hence.

"I have put the supply of stores, provisions, and water under Admiral Patton's direction, and, as our preparations at Falmouth are in great forwardness, I hope no complaints will be made on that score.

"I need not inform you that, in order to detach speedily, at least eight or ten sail should be kept constantly complete, and the stores drawn as low as possible from the ships sent in to refit.

"As the western squadron is the main spring from which all offensive operations must proceed, it shall be my care to keep it as strong and effective as possible, but till more men can be procured we cannot look to much success.

"I observe by the weekly accounts of your squadron that some ships are very short in their numbers, while others are full. I submit therefore to you, whether it may not be advisable to take a few from those who are best manned, and give them to such as are most in want.

"The enemy to the eastward are active in appearance, but as many things must concur to bring such an armament to sea, they cannot attack us unobserved.

"I hope you have an opportunity of communicating frequently with Sir John Sumerus [? Sir James Saumarez], so that your information of an attack to the eastward may be as early as possible, in case your assistance should become necessary."

Postscript.—"We know nothing of Lord Nelson. You will of course send in the ships that have been in action as frequently as we can send you fresh ones, so that the whole may be kept in as active a condition as possible. It is my wish that every ship's copper should be looked at in a dock once in two years if possible; and as soon as my arrangements are completed, I hope to effect it."

LORD VISCOUNT NELSON.

1805, August 15.—Report of the state of the ships under his command, the state of their provisions, &c., and health of their companies. The Victory requires looking at, and the Canopus, Belleisle and Donegal require docking, before winter. The Superb is greatly in want of docking and a new foremast, the Spartiale has been on shore and requires looking at; the Spencer, Conqueror, Tigre, Leviathan and Swiftsure are fit for service. There is much scurvy on the Belleisle, but little on any other of the vessels. Signature cut out.

LORD BARHAM to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1805, August 16. Admiralty.—"If Admiral Nugent will represent his situation to the Board, I will prevent, as far as I am able, any other appointment till you can please yourself without its being pressed upon you.

"We are hastening the ships out as fast as possible, and I conclude your object will be to keep near Ushant and prevent a junction till Lord Nelson arrives. The combined fleet cannot put to sea immediately, but you do wise in collecting our force from that Port and Rochford."

The SAME to the SAME.

Same date.—Having just received the enclosed from the Chairman of the East India Company, I send it for your information, and as you will naturally have frigates watching the Ferrol ships, you may probably have it in your power to detach a force equal to theirs in case they should have heard of the expected arrival of this fleet and send anything out to intercept them. They will have two 64s and a frigate with them.

ADMIRAL COLLINGWOOD to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1805, Oct. 26. Euryalus, off Cadiz.—"I have the very great pleasure to inform you that the combined fleet was engaged by the British squadron on Monday 21st, off Trafalgar, and totally defeated, 19 sail of the line taken and burnt. Admiral Villeneuve, the Commander-in-Chief, is now on board the Euryalus, where I have hoisted my flag, the better to direct the operations of the squadron, my own ship Sovereign being dismasted and a complete wreck.

"The 22nd a gale began which has increased untill to-day, and the prizes being all heavy hulks, with their sides much battered, I really believe they have all sunk—or will.

"Sorry I am to tell you that the noble Commander-in-Chief fell in the action; but he will live in the memories of all who knew him as long as they have being. This gale has ruined me, and I am under the greatest apprehensions now for my own ships—whether they would be able to keep off the land. In short my strength is exhausted.

Postscript.—"Four flag officers I understand are captured. Villeneuve is with me, Vice-Admiral D'Aliva [Alava] is dead;

Rear-Admiral Cisneros, in the Prince; Rear-Admiral Magon, I am told, is amongst the captives, but I do not know where.* Cantermine, commissaire of troops, is also in the Prince. Gravina and Dumanoir went off with 10 sail to Cadiz. Four Frenchmen went off to the southward. I will do the best I can."

SIR RICHARD J. STRACHAN to the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS, Admiral and Commander-in-Chief.

1805, November [7 ?] Cæsar, off Ushant, 10 leagues W. N.W.— "I hasten off the Phœnix to inform you of our victory over four unlucky French ships of the line which fell in our way. On the 2nd instant we saw six sail, and cannot conceive which way the two others went. The French disown their being their companions. I think it necessary to give you this intelligence as speedy as possible that you may have the power to take steps to intercept any more of the enemy's ships from Cadiz which may be coming this way, and I should have sent a ship sooner if I had not thought it necessary to keep all the strength we had, having missed the Bellona, and still hoping to intercept the Rochfort or any other squadron we might fall in with, expecting, if the Rochfort squadron fought as well as these have done, that the three-decker might make it a fatiguing amusement. I am quite pleased with all the frigates, and Gardner is really a hero himself, but in confidence, I am vexed at Captain Lee's letting the young men to leeward take possession of the Scipion, a ship which I believe kept her colours up longer than she otherwise would, on purpose to strike to him. [Margin. The Revolutionnaire and Phœnix contended who should first get on board.] I have, however, settled all jealousies by giving out a memorandum of thanks in which all have an equal share of praise. She had been in the first part of the action engaged by bearer [Capt. Baker, of the Phœnix], and has suffered greatly, and indeed so have they all. From beginning to end the line was close, and each ship fell in her station except the Scipion, which dropped to leeward, having lost her main top-mast. The French Admiral, a clever man, is wounded, and one captain killed. We have lost no person of note, and, except the first lieutenant of the Courageux, I know of none wounded. As yet I have not been able to get regular returns. We have only four killed and twenty-three wounded. I am by no means certain this will reach you, Sir, or I should send you my journal and account of my proceedings which, as I have not a copy of, it will be inconvenient not to have with me in case you should not be off Brest. We have frequently heard of the Rochfort squadron, but have never been able to get a sight of them. They are not in Vigo, and the weather has prevented our looking lately at Ferrol. When last reconnoitred, a French frigate was at Corunna, and a large ship just seen and then lost sight of at Ferrol. I have been so miserable at my ill fortune that rather than return empty handed we had intended to attack the enemy in Vigo, had winds suited and weather been favourable to go in and out without being obliged to tack in the narrows. Captain Maitland of the Loire had volunteered his assistance. He is a fine fellow; he would not leave us, and parted by accident a few days before Phœnix brought the French squadron to us. The Pomona hung about us (and also parted by accident), all of them thinking that some good luck would at last attend us; and if we had not had so many ships with us this action might have been thought a good thing, for we had just as much fighting as if we had been without frigates. They have all suffered some how or other, and have been extremely active in assisting in securing the prizes. The Cæsar was so much disabled that we could not get a boat out till yesterday. Few of the prisoners are taken out, and these are mostly in the frigates; the others being left to pump. The Mont Blanc makes so much water that it is with great labour we keep her free. The Courageux was ordered to take her in tow, having suffered much less in comparison than the other large ships; and as they are all damaged in their masts, yards, and rigging, it is necessary they should go into port. The Santa Margarita is leaky from shot. I am therefore proceeding with them all to Plymouth, and will, upon my arrival, urge the Port Admiral to hasten them to join you, and you will, I dare say, Sir, do me the justice to believe I shall not be happy until I am again near you, and ready, in the event of an action, to shew my gratitude by supporting the Ville de Paris, as her second ought to do. I do not know any event would give me more pleasure. I shall also beg the Admiral to hasten the re-equipment of the ships of the line. The Hero and Cæsar are the only ships that will require re-masting; ours, except mizen mast, we have had some difficulty in keeping up.

* Magon was killed; Alava dangerously wounded, but got away to Cadiz.

"I had forgot to mention that the French have troops on board, and I understand most of the other ships had which sailed from Cadiz; and we have no account of their killed and wounded, but it is considerable. They fired high, which accounts for our little loss; and as we were all mingled together at one time, we picked up each other's shot. We were at one time between the Mont Blanc and Duquay Trouin, and the Hero on the other side, so that her musketry came on board us.

"Lord William Fitzroy is just come on board, and says the Mont Blanc has 63 killed and 96 wounded. I dare say the others are as bad. They are all handsome ships, painted in stripes, well manned, and were extremely well managed. You will, I know, Sir, forgive this unconnected and badly written letter, but I wish to hasten off the Phœnix that you may receive this intelligence without delay, and I wish, at the same time, to give you every information. I was in hopes, and am not a little disappointed, at not falling in with the fleet; you would be pleased to see our addition to the squadron.

"I cannot conceive how the Bellona came to lose company; the rendezvous was made last by signal, off Cape Finisterre (52). So I conclude he will cruise there for us until further orders. I will not take up more of your time, but beg to assure you that you have been the means of restoring me to life, for my heart was breaking. Good God, while I live I shall ever revere you with the most heartfelt gratitude."

ADMIRAL SIR RICHARD J. STRACHAN to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1805, November 23. Cæsar.—"I cannot let my official letters go to you without again assuring you how much you have obliged me by your kind letters, and I feel it more because I have received nothing like it. It is in vain for me to express what I feel; I will not attempt it. The most pleasing event since my arrival is the receiving orders to serve in the fleet under your auspices. I am sorry to find Lord William Fitzroy has got himself removed from under your command. If it has rested with himself, I shall set him down in my list of weak men; after the late affair, it was his duty to endeavour to remain for ever where he had been so fortunately placed. He was more in the way of gaining honour, and not less in the way of riches. I think I have already said it was never my intention he should have gone to London, but was sent by Admiral Young, he having earnestly requested it of him.

"The copy of my official letter to you was sent open to Admiral Young, and he was desired to seal and forward it with its accompanying letter to the Secretary of the Admiralty; for it did not strike me that the service we had performed was of sufficient consequence to send any particular person with the account of it. It was my intention to have left such person, if necessary, to your choice, and for that reason, I wished to join the fleet. The necessity of apprizing Admiral Young of our approach, that pilots might be out ready, was my reason for sending in the Œolus, and I trust you will see the propriety of it. I am also sorry Captain Baker has left the Phœnix; he has got into the voxtex of a great circle, but how it may answer, he is himself the best judge; it will not make him a better sea-officer.

"I have a letter from Lord Garlies hinting that no promotion of any officer will take place till after the Cadiz arrangements are made. I am sorry for this; the making the first lieutenant is a compliment to the ship's crew as well as the Captain, and it is not near so grateful to their feelings by being delayed. A sailor likes his punishment or his reward at the moment he thinks he deserves it. I do not believe that Lord Garlies is much in the secret of what the Board may intend to do, and it would be a vain endeavour to attempt to extract anything from Lord Barham or Admiral Gambier this cold weather.

"The Admiralty have favoured me by the appointment, at his and my request, of Captain Shortland to the Cæsar. He has the reputation of being a good officer, and fitted out the Donegal for me; he joined to-day.

"It has been hinted to me by Admiral Young that I may hoist my flag in the Foudroyant. I should not dislike the change if it was not for leaving our people, and I hope we shall not be long before we get out; therefore remaining where I am will not make much difference, and as it has not been offered to me, it is hardly worth while to ask little favours which, when granted, may be considered great ones by the Board.

"I send this by the Princess Royal or Prince George, whichever sails first, and I hope, Sir, you will not disapprove of my sending the logged narrative of my proceedings by the same conveyance, it being uncertain when I shall join; and you will, of course, wish to know what we have been doing while so long absent from you. I wish we had been more successful by falling in with the Rochfort squadron."

SIR RICHARD J. STRACHAN to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1805, November 27. Cæsar.—"I have again to express my gratitude to you for the kind letter you have just sent me; it is in vain for me to attempt to express my feelings, my respect, and how much I am obliged. The Admiralty have given me a week's leave of absence, and I am just going to avail myself of it. The ships are fitting out with all the dispatch in the power of their respective captains, and I hope soon to be down and to join you. The Cæsar will be ready as soon as any; they are beginning to rigg as fast as they fit it; by the next week all the ships will be in great forwardness, but there are so many ships fitting out, and the yard has so much to do, that we meet with unavoidable delays. I do not think with you that there will be nothing more to do. On the contrary, I think Bonaparte will be tempted to force his fleet out, or send them in detachments to annoy our trade or distant possessions. I have great hopes the Brest fleet may come out, that you may have the pleasure of giving an account of them; and I think it likely they may endeavour to send it to the Mediterranean to form a junction with the Spanish and French at Toulon, where they are now too weak to effect anything, but, being joined by the Brest fleet or large detachment from it, may, if they get to that country, give us some trouble. The hope of this may induce the French to run some risk.

"I dread the thought of our navy having nothing to do. Idleness will gain a greater victory over us than all our enemies combined; and, if the fleet is once allowed to lay in port any time, we shall lose all that excellent order which is now so well established.

"I hope always to be under your command, and that you never will leave us while the war continues. I am sure we shall have something to do; it generally happens when least expected."

WILLIAM THOMAS FITZGERALD to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1805, December 28. 19 Upper Seymour Street, Portman Square.—"Though I have not the pleasure of your acquaintance, I will make no apology for requesting your acceptance of my poem, as it is upon a subject which interests all, from the Prince to the peasant! And I am confident that every tribute of the heart to the immortal Nelson must be peculiarly acceptable to the distinguished gallant veteran whom England with gratitude and admiration has long beheld in the midst of wintry storms, more awful than the cannon's thunder, blocking up the fleets of France in her own harbour, and bidding them defiance under the batteries of her shores. Such is the answer Cornwallis gives to the vainglorious Corsican's threats of invasion."

EARL ST. VINCENT to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

[1806 ?].—Will with pleasure take young Symonds under his protection and get him a commission, if he passes his examination before the peace arrives; the more especially as the young man's father and himself were shipmates fifty-four years ago. Imperfect.

JOHN GORE to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1806, January 23. Medusa, at sea.—"When a man has a painful duty imposed on him to afflict the feelings of a friend by communicating intelligence of the most distressing nature, the state of his mind may offer some excuse for his style.

"The sudden transition from cold to excessive heat, and from systematic exercise to a sedentary life, affected the health of the great, good, and revered Marquis Cornwallis, during the first stage of our voyage to India; and the very anxious and arduous duties his Lordship had to engage in upon his arrival at Calcutta, afforded little leisure to attend to his health.

"In pursuit of the grand object of his Lordship's voyage to India (where his wisdom, moderation, and justice were as well known and relied on as to afford the most confidential hope that his Lordship would be able to restore the affairs of the East India Company to the state of prosperity in which he left them in 1793) his Lordship left Calcutta soon after his arrival, in order to post himself at the head of the army and effect a peace with the chiefs of the Mahratta Powers; and, although extremely ill, his Lordship persevered in hopes that by reaching a cooler climate his disorder (an irritation of the stomach and bowels) would cease.

"At Ghazepore his Lordship became so ill that his family found it necessary to stop, and after lingering four days, though without pain, this truly illustrious, exalted, and excellent nobleman breathed his last on the 5th October, 1805.

"Great Britain will long mourn the loss of her most brilliant ornament, and the world at large one of its best men."

MRS. CHARLOTTE NUGENT to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS, Commander-in-Chief of Channel Fleet, Torbay.

1806, January 23. London.—"I suppose you know the present history of this town; most extraordinary it is. Before I close this letter I shall have to add the death of Mr. Pitt. He has been manly and resigned in his illness. Yesterday morning he asked his physicians how long they thought he had to live? and being told that it was uncertain, and recovery out of the question, he received the sacrament and prayed very fervently with the Bishop of Lincoln; then doing the necessary business previous to this last journey. I feel glad that he should have paid necessary attention to religion, for, as a man of his superior talents is supposed to investigate all subjects, so these last acts will affect the minds of the public and give good impressions. The eyes of all sides are fixed on Charles Fox, and I hear no other person named in the slightest degree.

The present Admiralty, I hear, are making their arrangements of congé; and Lord St. Vincent, who is in perfect health, I conceive will return to that Board as first Lord of the Admiralty. In no case do I believe they would have remained in, for the cry is violent among the navy against them, and they really have treated Baker, Sir Richard Strachan and others like delinquents; Lord Barham, as I hear, holding the language 'that it was his duty to make people do theirs, because it was their duty.' This sounds very fine, magnificent, and let us add nonsensical; for if it was possible that mortals should or could be taught to be so virtuous as to look to no rewards, and if such duties were to be taught, 83 was too advanced an age to enforce new maxims, and that is Lord Barham's age.

"I begun by telling you that before I closed my letter I should inform you of Mr. Pitt's death. I had a note this minute to say that this event took place at Putney, at half an hour after four o'clock this morning. He was in perfect possession of his senses, and shewed the same strong mind to the last. The confusion of the town, the consternation at the present situation of affairs, is not to be told. I conceive Mr. Fox and the present Opposition must come in. Mr. Addington's state of health puts his return to office out of the question. The Opposition differ highly among themselves. The Grenvilles are for the continuation of the war; Mr. Fox for peace. I trust some rising men will rise up to inspire us with hope. At present, Mr. Fox alone seems to arrest the public voice, and I understand his health is bad likewise, and that he shews no inclination to return to office."

Postscript.—"Dr. Bailey has been right in his opinion of Mr. Pitt's illness being an atrophy. Lord James Townshend passed with eclât for a Lieutenant. Lord Townshend wrote to Lord Barham to ask him to make him a Lieutenant; what would you say if I assert that this was refused? When you consider Lord Townshend's services, his respectability, is it not incredible? Lady Townshend is very indignant, but likewise hurt to death about it."

CHARLES, 2nd MARQUIS CORNWALLIS, to his uncle, ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

[1806], February 3. Culford.—"I sincerely thank you for your kind letter, which you may well imagine found us here in real affliction. Time can alone alleviate the sorrow felt for one so well and so justly beloved, but no time will obliterate his memory from the hearts of his friends, nor, I think indeed, from the minds of the country at large. Your situation will not, I hope, be rendered unpleasant by the change in the Admiralty. The times are truly alarming, and any mismanagement of that department would be nearly fatal."

EARL ST. VINCENT to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1806, February 5. Mortimer Street.—"Secret and confidential. Some months after Mr. Pitt came into office the last time, a request was made to me by his Cabinet, through Lord Sidmouth, to take the command of the fleet, which I spurned at, unless Mr. Pitt unsaid all he had said in the House of Commons against me; and, lest any unfavourable impression should have been made upon the mind of the King on this refusal, I asked an audience at Windsor, and humbly submitted that, although my life was at the disposal of his Majesty and of my country, I was the guardian of my own honour, and could not trust it in the hands of Mr. Pitt, after the treatment I had received from him. I am now called upon to serve, and, in the state the empire is reduced to, I feel it an imperious duty to obey the call, with only one repugnance which arises out of the high respect and esteem I have for you; and I beg you will rest assured that every possible delicacy and attention will be paid to your zealous services, for no man regards you more sincerely than I."

The Same to the Same.

1806, February 10. Mortimer Street.—"Private and confidential. Your obliging letter has set my heart quite at ease. Mr. Grey lamented that he could not, with propriety, write to you until the patent was read at the Board, and he had taken his seat, which, I hope, he will do to-day; but it may be a month or six weeks before I receive any appointment, and what is to be I know not. Every possible accommodation will be given to you, and the most favourable and honourable statement of your meritorious services made to his Majesty."

Viscount Hood to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1806, February 10. Greenwich.—"Most sincerely do I sympathise and condole with you on the death of your noble brother. It has pleased the Almighty to deprive the nation of the greatest statesman and the greatest general any country could ever boast. But to his decrees it is our bounden duty to submit.

"Before this can reach your hands, you will have heard of the very wonderful changes that have taken place in his Majesty's Government. God grant it may be for the best, and that we shall be preserved from the fangs of the Corsican monster.

"It is reported that a total sweep is to be made at the Admiralty and Navy Boards, and that Capt. Nicholls is to succeed Sir A. Hammond, and Grey, the Deputy Comptroller, Markham, and Sir Charles Pole go [to] the Admiralty, and Sir H. Neale if he chooses it, as the Premier told me he had made him the offer, but being at sea, had not received his answer. He was in hopes that Sir S. Hood would have accepted, to which I replied that he had often declared to me he would never take a civil office, but stick to his own element. I thought he was perfectly right. Lord St. Vincent, it is said, is to be Lord High Admiral at sea, and to command from Cape Finisterre to Johnny Grotes House in Scotland. How Lord Keith will like this I will not pretend to say; probably you know for certain what I only do from report, which is often erroneous."

HON. C[HARLES] GREY to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1806, February 12. Admiralty.—Private. I understand from Lord St. Vincent that he has already communicated to you the wish of his Majesty's present ministers to avail themselves of his services, which his health will now allow him to resume. This intention I had the honour of submitting to his Majesty this morning, when it received his approbation, and Lord St. Vincent, with the union at the main, will be appointed to the command of the Channel fleet.

"In making this communication I must beg you not to consider it as proceeding from any opinion that your services have not been highly honourable to yourself, and eminently advantageous to the country; an acknowledgment which I shall be most happy to confirm by every attention in my power to your convenience as to the time and manner of quitting your command.

'Orders will be given, in compliance with the wish expressed in your letter to Lord St. Vincent, for the Ville de Paris to come to Spithead, and you will receive, with as little delay as possible, instructions from the Board as to the manner in which you are to proceed in leaving the fleet under Sir Charles Cotton."

The SAME to the SAME.

1806, February 21. Admiralty.—"Private. I have been favoured with your letter of the 21st, but delayed answering it till I heard of your arrival at Spithead. I am very sorry that you should have found either in the conduct of the late Board or in the appointment of Lord St. Vincent to the command of the Channel fleet any cause of complaint. I can only say that I intended fully to acknowledge the merit of your past services, and, in carrying into effect an arrangement which it appeared to His Majesty's Ministers expedient to adopt, to shew you every personal attention in my power.

"As an additional proof of the sincerity of this disposition, I shall be very happy to promote whichever of your Lieutenants you may think most deserving to the rank of Master and Commander, and to recommend the other two whom you mention for promotion to Admiralty vacancies abroad. For this purpose I must trouble you to send me their names.

"Orders will be sent down to-night from the Board for you to strike your flag, as I understand it to be your own wish, under all the present circumstances, that this should be done with as little delay as possible."

The SAME to the SAME.

1806, February 25. Admiralty.—"I have given directions for the promotion of Lieut. Smith to the rank of Master and Commander. . . . . I cannot conclude without assuring you that any recommendation of yours will always have the greatest weight with me; and that I shall be happy, as far as I can do so consistently with the justice due to other claims upon me, and with the regular course of the service, to assist any officers in favour of whom you may interest yourself."

LORD RADSTOCK to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1806, March 4. Portland Place.—I have restrained my colleagues from laying before you the enclosed plan until I could with certainty make known to you the opinions of our brother officers upon the subject. Their signatures will now sufficiently do this. . . . I beg to offer one single argument which, in my opinion, is sufficient in itself to induce every sea officer to lend his aid to bring the work forward. It is this. The captains' names in Lord Howe's action, June 1, 1794, and those in the battle of Trafalgar, have never yet been gazetted. The consequence of this is, the first are already forgotten, and the latter have not yet been made known.

"I send you a copy of Gardner's letter, which plainly shows how much he approves the plan, and I trust that it will equally so do yours (sic) . . . as your name will be of the utmost consequence."

HON. C. GREY to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1806, March 26. Admiralty.—I have to acknowledge the receipt of both your letters of the 21st and 24th instant. Feeling every disposition to meet your wishes, I made immediate enquiry as to the appointment you ask for Mr. Evans; but it appears to be so unusual a thing to appoint a purser to a ship just laid down, that I am sorry to say I could not do so without opening a door to much inconvenience.

"I took the Lieutenants who served with you in the Ville de Paris according to their standing in that ship; and Lieutenant Watts being the senior was the first sent out to fill a real vacancy in the West Indies—I hope to have an early opportunity of serving Lieutenant Gordon in the same way.

"I am sorry Captain Whitby's health will not allow him to go to sea. As I have been obliged to make a rule not to appoint acting captains another captain has been appointed to the Gibraltar; and I can only say that when Captain Whitby's health shall again allow of his going to sea, I shall be happy, whenever I can do so consistently with the other claims of the service, to give him another ship."

ELIZABETH CORNWALLIS to her Uncle, ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS, Newlands.

[1806 March 26.] Wednesday.—"I have heard so much these few days last past about 'the Admiral is displeased,' 'the Admiral is sulky, retires, &c.,' that I should of myself have ventured to say come in answer to what you write, but Lord Hood was here a good while this morning . . . and desired me to say most strongly from him that you ought to come, . . . that he may see you without delay. I do believe him your true friend." Date given on post-mark.

C[HARLOTTE] NUGENT to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1806, May 4. [London].—"All the town are engaged with Lord Melville's trial. I have attended every day, and I think it proceeds much better for him than the 10th Report gave me room to hope. The Lords have rejected much evidence, such as the private accounts kept by Mr. Douglass his paymaster, and found in the possession of his widow. But, nevertheless, it is an ugly business, and I think they have established that he has employed sums of money to his own use, and that he went upon a system in large payments of taking sums, such as one thousand, two thousand, &c. The ten thousand pounds, that is one of the ten thousand, they first proved deficient in one large payment. Then they bring various bankers' books and prove his settling with one, paying what he has overdrawn at another's, putting money in the hands of a third, and these sums agree precisely with the calculation of the sum taken or supposed to be taken, the date of the deficiency and date of the bankers' books corresponding; and I certainly doubt the possibility of any defence overthrowing the above facts. Nevertheless, I doubt the Lords acting upon these grounds, which is circumstantial evidence and not positive evidence. But if they do or not, he will never recover the disgrace of such circumstantial evidence. Lord Melville's conduct is highly dignified; no man's in such a predicament can be more so. He is steady and respectful to the House, actively employed with his counsel, and betraying no marks of anger or want of patience to the most severe language. His own devilish letter to the Commissioners, and his own speech at the Bar of the House of Commons they ring the changes upon in all shapes, and would that he had done neither. His situation puts me in mind of Cardinal Wolsey. He is undone by his ambition, for had he on his first examination been civil to the Commissioners instead of treating them loftily, they would not have meddled with him, as I understand that he being first Lord of the Admiralty, with greater power than ever any individual possessed in this country, they did not want to have to do with him. I conceive that the prosecution will last 8 or 10 days more, and his defence as long, so the trial will last altogether one month. His expenses are 400*l.* per day. He may be found guilty; certainly I fear not blameless; but when one recollects that he stands in his present situation from envy and party motives it freezes one's blood. I am told that Mr. Fox countenances this prosecution as little as he can, and he attends seldom. By the way he looks to me as if he was dying; very ill indeed.

"I heard it reported that you offered to serve under Lord St. Vincent? I think every thing that is handsome and public spirited is like you; but do not be angry with me if I say that I am very glad you do not serve with him, because I think him selfish and dangerous except where he is paramount, and your character as a professional man would annoy him. I am rejoiced that Mrs. Whitby is better. Time alone cures our misfortunes, but the greatness of misfortunes generally cure themselves by removing all hope except as to the future. General Nugent is arrived, and it is said that he is to go Commander-in-Chief to Ireland directly. Edmund is well, and has just desired me to remember him particularly to you.

"Lady Townshend arrives in town on Tuesday. She was near being summoned before the House of Lords to produce Barry's [Barré's] papers during the time he was paymaster, and I fear this will still be the case; though she wrote to me that she had no papers to produce, Barry having burnt them nearly all. But, poor soul, she is in a fright at the idea of being called."

LORD HOOD to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1806, May 28. Greenwich.—"It has pleased the Almighty to release my dearly beloved Lady Hood from her very long and severe sufferings, at which I ought not to repine, but to be thankful. . . . A better woman, a better mother, or better wife never lived. It is no little consolation to us in being satisfied that the dear departed has quitted this world of trouble for bliss eternal, and that our separation cannot be long."

SIR JOHN ORDE to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS, Newlands, Lymington.

1806, June 4. London.—"Most confidential. I shall send you the papers I alluded to, as soon as possible, for though the Admiralty, in their letter of the 12th of January, most fully approve the measures they so severely condemned in their despatch of the day before, both of which you have seen, yet no one can form an idea how unmerited the censure was until they see at least my reply to the Board and to Lord Melville. . . . When I sailed for my station off Cadiz, I was led to expect that both you and Lord Nelson were apprised of my appointment, and that I should find no other ship of war on the ground allotted me but the Medusa, which I was instructed to take under my command. On my arrival I found the ships of three commanders in chief, each acting under orders contradictory of the others; yours authorised to detain Spanish vessels with treasure and naval and military stores; Lord Nelson's most positively instructed both by the Admiral and his Lordship only to stop vessels with treasure, except in the case o' receiving certain information that the Spaniards had commenced hostilities; and mine with orders only to detain ships with treasure and ships of war leaving the port of Cadiz, and refusing to eturn when called upon to do so.

"I found that Sir R. Strachan, notwithstanding these orders had, not long before my arrival, forcibly detained a Spanish frigate bound to America, after firing into her from the Donegal and Medusa, by which some men were killed. . . . I found that some others of Lord Nelson's cruisers had detained vessels laden with grain for the relief of the province of Andalusia, then in a state of famine, and that the greatest ferment had been occasioned in Cadiz by these last-mentioned acts. Something surely was needful for me to do on the station exclusively allotted for my management, in this extraordinary state of things. . . . I thought it my first object to clear my ground from all cruisers but my own, and to let them act upon the least hostile orders, which were those I was charged with. I say the least hostile, because, although Lord Nelson's were less so, his cruisers were not all limited by them, as I have already pointed out. In taking this step, I thought I could not do wrong or offend on any side, as commanders who did not know of my appointment would be glad to have their ships returned from ground where, from my arrival, they were no longer useful; and that those who did know of it would also be pleased that that was done for them which they could not so speedily do for themselves. Your cruiser, Captain Baker, left the station before I could communicate with him. Sir R. Strachan I ordered to Toulon, and with all possible despatch, as he represented his ship to be almost destitute of water and provisions, as he told me Lord Nelson was much in want of the ships on my ground, and as I wished him to convey despatches from me to his Lordship. . . . A fortnight after Sir Richard left me between Cadiz and Cape Trafalgar, with a fair wind to pass the Straits, I was made acquainted by letter from Capt. Hope, of the Defence, then cruising off Cape St. Maries, that Sir Richard Strachan was in sight, but carrying such a press of sail to windward—the wind then blowing strong from the westward—that he despaired of speaking him. I thought it my duty to lay this before the Admiralty. In doing this, I declare before God, if it was my last word, that I had no interested views, but that I was actuated by a sense of duty. . . . With respect to my return to England, that also I am aware is a measure on which officers might differ. I might have done otherwise. I might have paraded about and made demonstrations, &c., &c. I did what I judged more proper, and did it from a sense of duty, well knowing the prejudices that might be stirred against it, and that in any case it was the measure least favourable to myself. The application for my recall I know may equally be objected to. I thought it incumbent upon me after the injurious imputations, neglects, &c., I experienced. . . . . I confess, at the same time, I did not expect my application could have met with the fate it did. . . . The greatest hardship of my situation has been that, aware of these calumnies, I have thought myself prohibited from taking any steps for my justification, even with the late Board of Admiralty, circumstanced as Lord M[elville] was with the country and with individuals."

EARL ST. VINCENT to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1806, July 4. Hibernia. St. Helens.—Enclosing an "opinion" that if the vessel was condemned as prize to the Malta, then under the orders of Admiral Cornwallis, he appears to be entitled to the eighth, "but if the tender had a letter of marque, neither he nor Admiral Montagu is entitled, and it may be a question whether the prize is not a droit of Admiralty if the tender captured her without having a letter of marque, or being registered and commissioned."

ADMIRAL GEORGE MONTAGU to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1806, November 6. Portsmouth.—"I fear our friend, Lord St. Vincent, has forgot our case. As it is desirable to me that it should be decided, in order that a man with eight children may not speculate beyond his means, I will thank you to jog his Lordship's memory. . . ."

EARL ST. VINCENT to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1806, Nov. 14. Rame House.—Apologising for his delay in studying the case between Cornwallis and Admiral Montagu, occasioned by his being suddenly ordered to the Tagus upon a very critical embassy. Is astonished at Montagu's claim, assuming that when any vessel is fitting or refitting in a port (although under the orders of a flag officer) the Admiral of that port has the command of her to all intents and purposes, "for in point of fact, the Port Admiral is only the organ through which the Admiralty or the Admiral under whose command the ships in question are, convey their orders and instructions."

JAMES CORNWALLIS to his Uncle, ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1807, February 2. Upper Seymour Street.—"If we had had a son, we meant to have requested you to have stood godfather with Sir Horace, but in the event of a daughter, the Bishop, with my sister and Mrs. Dickens the godmothers. My mother, however, choosing herself to stand, we are left in the lurch for a godfather. I make you therefore the offer, with the hope of a refusal if you dislike a compliance with my request. A sponsor is all we either accept or want, or I would not have troubled you. . . . The gout you name, but I trust it will not remain with you, as I know your dislike to it. Not so Sir Horace Mann; he regards it as a receipt in full for everything else."

The BISHOP OF LICHFIELD AND COVENTRY to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1810, June 23. Hill Street.—"People were much afraid of a riot on Thursday, but everything passed off with perfect quietness. I saw Lord Melville the other day. He looks older, and, I thought, like all un-placed statesmen, feeling the want of former consequence. . . . I have the heaviest part of my visitation this summer and another visit to Birmingham, but I hope to get through it with tolerable ease. I shall now enter into the thirtieth year of my bishopric. Few have been in it so long. None, I believe, since the Reformation. . . ."

The Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1811, February 10. Eccleshall Castle.—". . . I am to be dragged out to preach in Westminster Abbey before the House of Lords (which I did twenty-nine years ago) next month [on the Fast day].

"I conceive that the Rev. Mr. Bingham must be the same person against whom a caution was issued some years ago, and he was described as having been chaplain to a man-of-war. I have had two chaplains of men-of-war turn out most exemplarily. The King says a red coat never takes a good black dye. I never heard his opinion of blue coats, but I have a lieutenant of the Navy preferred in my diocese who conducts himself well. . . .

"I hope you have got a good stock of port wine, as I am not very sanguine as to the deliverance of Portugal. I have never before heard of great, decisive victories attended with rapid retrograde motions. Alexander and Cæsar did not conquer in this way."

The Same to the Same

1811, March 7. Hill Street.—". . . This winter has agreed peculiarly well with me. I have not even had a cold yet; but in London I never escape. However, I hope it may not arrive till after the 20th, when I am to be exhibited in Westminster Abbey. . . . Ross called here the other morning; he is fatter, but looks older than he did. My old friend, poor Lord Romney, is gone. He somehow involved his circumstances very much in the latter part of his life; and retired greatly from public. It was a pity, as in parts of his time he acquired, with great justice, a considerable degree of good reputation. The effect of the war on West India property, and perhaps some, though no great losses at play, but, above all, building a very large house occasioned his distresses. His old house with some addition would have fully answered his purpose. . . .

"The Duchess of Gordon is giving balls and dinners without end. I am doubtful whether his Majesty has gained much ground lately; his recovery seems to require more time than usual, perhaps on account of his age.

"I met the Bishop of Chichester yesterday walking in the street and very stout. He must be nearer 80 than 70.

"We were sorry to leave our country haunts. I dislike London very much, and shall go back for the month of May as usual, and return for the month of June, when London suits me best, as I can walk about without getting cold.

"Sir Charles and Lady Oakeley inhabit my palace at Lichfield, which has cost me a good deal in repair. Sir Charles too has done something, and seems to like the habitation. Having lived many years in a country town, he is accustomed to it. Of all places, I dislike a country town; and have been fortunate to avoid it in my different church situations, for Durham is so circumstanced as to bring scarcely any of the inconveniences of a country town upon us.

"The Bayning family are not yet in town. Lord Romney is said to have died very poor. Rich I did not think him, but how he contrived to be poor I cannot conceive; as he had 30,000*l.*, I believe rom the Archbishop, his sister's fortune 12,000*l.*, and 16,000*l.* rom Lord Bradford, besides the original estate of 1,200*l.* per annum, with some thousands from Du Quesne, and, I think he told me, some little part of Mrs. Allen's fortune; he also seemed to live with economy."

The SAME to the SAME.

1811, April 8. Hill Street.—"My cold did not arrive before the preaching, and when I reflected that I preached in the Abbey 40 years ago, as Prebendary of Westminster, I thought myself peculiarly fortunate to find so little abatement of faculties necessarily to be tried on such occasions. . . . I am glad to hear you ride so often. Your farm, if not profitable in other respects, must be greatly so to your health. . . .

"You know that there was a very particular intimacy, at one time, between the great Charles Townshend and Mrs. Edward Cornwallis of St. James's Place, and Bird's Place (which was sold again last year). I believe the intimacy was succeeded by a coolness, if not a quarrel. Upon which I suppose the shadow was sent to my mother. He was a strange man with wonderful parts. The Marquis was much inferior in parts, but superior in principle. Lord Townshend had many good points. Lady Elizabeth Loftus was a little girl scarcely able to walk alone when I was in Ireland in 1767 with Lord and Lady Townshend. How my mother would have been grieved to have seen the present humbled state of the Townshend family! There was a very good picture of the great Charles Townshend by Reynolds. Lord Romney had been breaking for some time; but he died of an apoplexy. His affairs were, for some years previous to his death, in a very deranged state, and he was forced to retire altogether from public life with a very insufficient income for his rank; partly play, partly the failure of West India estates, but, I believe most of all, building distressed him. His old house with additions and repair would, in my opinion, after all, have been preferable to the ruinous one which he erected. Lord Bacon, I think, recommends a house as well as an establishment to be rather below what the income might seem to bear. If this was so in his days, what would he have said in our days? We are to have, it is thought, a loan of 20 millions, besides war taxes, property taxes and others. However, here in London there is no appearance of want, more luxury and prodigality than ever, but not a guinea and scarcely a shilling to be seen. This is said to be of no consequence; I wish it may prove so. In the trading part of the country, there is distress to a great degree. On Saturday we had guns firing, bells ringing, and flags displayed on most of the churches on account of our success in Portugal, which does not appear to be as yet decisive as to the French army.

"As Theresa* was so good as to be pleased with my mentioning her before, I shall not omit her now, nor her French song; and observe that as Lord Hotham cannot dance as well as sing, I think her quite in the right to have a younger partner."

The Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1811, August 7. Eccleshall Castle.—". . . I perceive that there has been a great naval promotion; but the paper says the Honble. C. Grey retains his present situation. I hope it is choice. But I have a notion, that if you once are passed by in the promotion of Admirals, you can never become afterwards an Admiral; and upon consulting the red book, I see the names of Fanshaw, Hammond, still as Captains. Commissioner Grey knows best what he likes; but with his connexions I should have thought he might probably have been more advantageously placed and with distinction as an Admiral. However, this is not my business, and I only mention it at all out of regard to Mary, for whom I must ever feel deeply interested on account of her mother.

"The last post brought me an account of the failure of a ship-builder and owner of collieries to the amount of 300,000*l.* in the north. I shall probably lose 200*l.* or 300*l.* only by his failure. Some of our Durham friends, and particularly the Bishop, had a high opinion of him. But I never had any dependence upon him. Besides a certain loss, I am afraid that we shall be involved in law difficulties. The man was originally a ship carpenter, and worked his way up to magnificence and final ruin; though bankrupts contrive now to be upon their legs again very soon. From being a working ship's carpenter he became possessed of a great castle, not a place formerly a castle like this, but an existing one; and lived most extravagantly. He gave one entertainment, which cost, it is said, some thousands. I am surprised that persons should continue to be taken in by such adventurers."

The Same to the Same.

1811, August 12. Eccleshall Castle.—". . . Lord Townshend is dead, but no one has described to me the manner of his death. He was not very well pleased with me some years ago for not ordaining a person against my rules at his recommendation, and also for not being a member of the Antiquarian Society, of which he was President. He had a great deal of real misfortune; and I never knew any fault but his being captious in respect of his friends and relations. We were always upon civil terms. What a sad figure the Townshend family makes at present! How different from that which it made in our grandfather's time. But this is the case with many other families. . . .

* Only daughter of Captain John Whitby and Mrs. Whitby, to whom Admiral Cornwallis left Newlands. Theresa married, in 1827, Frederick Richard West, Esq., of Ruthin Castle.

"I see that Commissioner Grey has got into a dispute with a clergyman. Mrs. Gordon told me something about it above a year ago. I had hopes that it had been all settled. I suppose his friends will come into place soon. Whether they will go on with this war in Peninsula I know not, I have never liked it; and now I think it promises worse than the American war."

The SAME to the SAME.

1811, October 19. Worthing.—". . . Your old friend Admiral Nugent is here or was so a day or two ago. I saw him driving his daughter in a donkey carriage, much in fashion here. However, the animal was not very toward, and he did not steer very well; as often on the pavement as in the road. He seems to be a very good hearted man, and is always affectionate in his enquiries concerning you.

"This place is getting thinner of company, but as I do not go much out, it is not of consequence to me.

"General and Mrs. Ross are at present in this place, but about to leave us with our fashionable company for Brighton till Christmas. Worthing seems to be a most excellent place for sea bathing; but the seaweed thrown up by the tides is so offensive, that I shall never willingly frequent it. At Brighton, where I used to be between forty and fifty years ago, the wind (?) was so high, or I was not so nice, that I did not perceive the inconvenience. I brought two new publications with me, Thinks I to myself, and Trotter's Memoirs of Fox, in his last half of his period. The first I have dispatched; in my opinion, a vulgar kind of novel. I am beginning Fox; but I am sure I shall not altogether agree with Mr. Trotter. Upon the whole, I esteemed Mr. Fox more than Mr. Pitt, excepting vices, which did not exist in the latter part of life; but I did not greatly esteem either; and if they had not been orators, I have known many wiser, abler, and much better men than either."

The SAME to the SAME.

1811, December 3. Worthing.—". . . You mentioned Mr. Singleton and Lady Mary. They are not here now; but I saw him often last spring, as a trustee for Lady Mary. When my brother gave him his place, I advised the changing it for one for life, though of less value. My brother said he did not mean to keep him in Parliament, and then he would be safe. I told him perhaps not so when another Ministry came in; and so it happened. For the present Ministers insisted upon his coming into Parliament or a resignation of the place. He is forced to attend every night, and if he goes away, a note soon follows. Nothing can be more degrading. The whipper-in is the other member for Eye; but he does not spare his colleague, as I have been told; and, if I mistake not, by Singleton himself.

"This place is now almost entirely deserted. The gay folks are gone to Brighton till March, as it is extremely vulgar to be in London in a settled way before March. . . .

"Mr. Trotter's performance has not answered expectations. I suppose it was written in consequence of disappointment upon being neglected at the death of Mr. Fox. There are memoirs of Fox by Fell . . . There are many things related in these (Fell's Memoirs) worth your reading. Not the panegyrick on Mr. Fox, for I was no admirer of him; but incidental matters. There is an excuse for his support of Lord North till 1774 on account of his father's wishes. I do not believe that was the motive."

The Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1812, January 17. Hill Street.—". . . I saw a letter from Portugal giving not a very favourable account of the health of our army. Agues and bilious disorders are very prevalent among some parts of it. Others are keeping hounds and very jolly. I suppose they occupy so large a country, that there is a variety of climate experienced by them, some of it very unhealthy, other parts quite otherwise.

"We have in our neighbourhood, as well as in different parts of the town, been under some alarm about nightly depredators; and only a few nights ago the ale-house (now kept by two of our late servants) at the corner of this street was broken into, and we were waked with the cry of thieves and robbers in the middle of the night. I cannot account for all these enormities so suddenly. They used to say that the army took away all the robbers in time of war. It does not appear to be so now; so one advantage of war is gone. Lord Sidmouth, who does not give up politics, though politics seem to have given him up, is come to town, and has taken Lady Bayning's house till Easter, the fashionable time of settling in London in these days. . . . What a shocking loss of ships in the North, and crews. I hope none of your friends were in those ships.

The Same to the Same.

1812, July 19. Eccleshall.—"The season has been delightful, and there is with us the greatest prospect of plenty in all articles of sustenance. When I came down every thing looked ill in this trading region, and I have in conjunction with others done all we could to assist the discarded workmen, and to quiet their minds. The repeal of the Orders in Council has produced for the present a more than usual employment for the artisans, and we [are] all alive again and grateful. The Orders in Council certainly very considerably added to the distress; but I can not help thinking that our war with the Continent was the principal cause. I wish it may not turn out so, after this spirit is over. However, it has always appeared to me to have been unwise to have added to our difficulties, when there was not an absolute necessity for it. When I first came down, it was scarcely safe to reside in the country.

"I spent two days with some old friends of yours, namely, Sir Charles and Lady Oakeley, who inhabit my palace at Lichfield, with which they are delighted. They have laid out some money, and I a good deal, in making the house very comfortable, which it certainly is. He is not, I think, very rich for an East Indian Governor. He is a very regular, good man, and as frequent an attendant of the Cathedral as the Prebendaries."

The SAME to the SAME.

1812, November 23. Hill Street.—". . . There is a great want of trade in Staffordshire, which, added to the dearness of provisions, rather occasions discontent, but to no great degree; and as an Irish regiment of militia is quartered there, I hope, with due attention from the rich, we may get through the winter quietly.

"The Pottery is in a sad way, and I have nine stacks of crate wood of two years old now in my woods unsold. This want of trade, however, facilitates the enlisting very much. I met on my road a beautiful but delicate East Indian cow, a present from the Prince Regent to Lord Hertford. I conceive that it must be kept in the hot house this winter. Three persons attended the cow, one of them leading it. . . ."

The SAME to the SAME.

1813, July 31. [The Deanery], Durham.—"My diocese engagements [are] pressed this year, in order that I might arrive here so early. It is nineteen years since I have been here at our July chapters. . . . This house is spacious and cool, and well suited to such weather. There is one room nearly sixty feet long, cool in summer and useful for walking in winter.

"The Bishop of Durham [Barrington] was lamenting the loss of his companion in Park riding, Lord Hotham, about his age. The Bishop has just entered his eightieth year. He is wonderfully stout, but not to be compared to Sir James Mansfield, who goes through all the business of a judge and is older. These are very extraordinary instances of senile strength. Sir James Mansfield never looked healthy (I remember him at Eton, but he had left it before you went there) and the Bishop of Durham, a stronger man, was cut for the stone at five years of age. He was also with me at Eton."

CHARLOTTE WARDE to her uncle, ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

[1813], November 10. Wednesday. Peterborough Palace.—"It is with the deepest sorrow I set down to inform you of the death of my dearest Father [the Bishop], which took place last Monday evening at nine o'clock. He had the comfort of being surrounded by all his children, and his very excellent wife, who has, for the last eighteen years, so much promoted the happiness of his life. . . . It is most gratifying to our feelings to hear of the universal grief expressed by all this town and neighbourhood at this sad event. I believe there never was a Bishop so adored by his clergy, to whom he was always the truest friend, and his manners were so condescending that they always felt themselves perfectly at ease in his presence."

CHARLOTTE WARDE to her uncle, ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1814, January 2. Ravenhill, Lichfield.—Family news. Her brother Charles, formerly aide-de-camp to Lord Cornwallis in India, has married a most charming woman, but has no children. Her eldest brother, however, Dr. Madan, now in residence at Lichfield, has ten. His eldest has just taken a most distinguished degree at Oxford, and two very fine boys are gone to sea ; one in the E. I. C. service and the other with Capt. Paget, in the Superb. The Captain writes that he is doing so well that at the end of his first cruise he has been made signal midshipman. Their own son Charles has rejoined Admiral Young, off Walcheren. He is quite out of heart about his promotion.

Postscript by General Warde.—"It is said 'no promotion for anything born south of Tweed.' Charles' juniors in numbers and of no family are gone over his head, they tell him they know not how. G. W."

The SAME to the SAME.

1814, June 28. Woodland Castle. Thanking him for his kind application to Lord Melville on behalf of her son Charles, which has unfortunately been unsuccessful, although everybody believed that one line from him must prove effectual. Thinks that "it is now rather a disadvantage to be of a good family, for the lowest born people are on all occasions preferred." General Warde has been much tempted to write to Lord Melville to strike Charles' name out of the navy list, but as "his Lordship is not a fixture," and their son is extremely devoted to his profession, she has persuaded him to have a little patience.

The BISHOP OF LICHFIELD AND COVENTRY to ADMIRAL the HON. WILLIAM CORNWALLIS.

1814, October 3. Durham.—". . . In July, I took a trip to this place for a day, as some matters seemed to require my presence here at a grand chapter. I then returned to the diocese, and was for the most part employed in confirming, . . and after ordaining I came here a fortnight ago, where I am in residence at present. In the course of my peregrinations, I dined in company with Lord Hill, whom I much liked. He seemed sensible, prudent, and good-tempered. He was then going in a very short time to America; but the plan of the war appears to be altered, and possibly his services may not be wanted. Predatory landings in different parts, it is said, are most likely to bring the Americans to terms. All that I have to say is, that I sincerely hope we shall be more successful than we were in the last American war, of the conduct of which you are a much better judge than I am. We do not seem as yet to have gained much either by the war or peace in comparison with the expense. But the Ministers are, I think, honest and not deficient in ability; consequently, I conclude that they have done and are doing their best.

"At the confirmation at Derby I saw Lady Borlase Warren, who brought, as I understood her, a daughter to be confirmed. Sir Ralph Milbancke called here on Saturday; had I been at home, he would, I suppose, have announced his daughter's marriage with Lord Byron. She is an only child, and ought to have a large fortune.

"Mr. Russell, old and infirm, resides at Bath in the Winter, and meets your old friend Lord Hood daily in his airing on the Bristol road, above 90 years of age."

The Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry to Admiral the Hon. William Cornwallis.

1815, March 6. Hill Street.—"The poor Bishop of Winchester, whom I visited the other day, is blind, deaf, and with too evident failure of memory, besides bilious attacks; but he does not seem much affected by his infirmities, having the best temper I ever knew, and the most patient mind.

"A person told me the other day she asked General Ross after Lord Cornwallis's family; he said he was not going abroad, and that the state of his circumstances was found to be good; the house in town is not to be sold, but inhabited again soon. He says Lord Cornwallis had got some very bad servants, who had cheated him; but that he, General Ross, had soon set it all to rights by dismissing the servants, and pointing out the evil. I thought it was impossible any material failure could have taken place, where there are no expensive habits. It would have been quite as well to have found out this, before the failure was announced to the world. My son has had a great deal of trouble in consequence of succeeding a person really ruined. The sums Sir Horace [Mann] expended are beyond all belief, or rather squandered. Fortunately his rents are so low, that there is no occasion to lower them. However, I find in my own property that farmers are as desirous of procuring farms as ever, notwithstanding all this outcry. For my part, I know not what to think of the present question, as to corn. I do not pretend to be a judge. I have nearly left off all farming, and follow the example of most of my great neighbours in having a ley for cattls in summer and sheep in winter.

"I am rather distressed to know how to direct to you. As you have not kissed hands, I shall this time direct as usual. Your rank by birth is higher than even Knights of the Garter. Having once belonged to the Knights of the Garter [as Chaplain], I had occasion to think more about them than I should have otherwise done."

WILLOUGHBY COTTON to ADMIRAL SIR WILLIAM CORNWALLIS, K.G.C.B.

1817, November 3. Coventry House.—". . . My mother is quite well. . . . I want very much to get her rooms in the Palace [Hampton Court], but the thing is very difficult. Pray advise Mrs. Whitby not to think of going down in the diving-bell. The sensation about the head and ears is particularly unpleasant. Lady Augusta begs to thank you for your kind remembrance. . . . The Princess Charlotte still continues about. Mrs. Henry Cavendish's death is much regretted. The India war is thought to be much exaggerated."

The BISHOP OF LICHFIELD AND COVENTRY to ADMIRAL SIR WILLIAM CORNWALLIS, K.G.C.B.

1818, November 7. Hill Street.—"It was as well that you did not go to Hastings. I went there for a week in the beginning of the summer. The nastiest and most odious place I ever saw. Brighton I was much disposed to like when I passed a part of two summers there after I came back from Ireland in 1768, with several friends, all of whom are no more excepting Lord Glastonbury and his brother.

"It was delightful; but I went three years ago from Worthing to see it, and found it so altered, that if I had not known that I was at Brighton again, I should not from appearances have discovered it. I wanted to see the Prince's Palace; but upon my getting near it, I was accosted by a decent looking man, 'so you are come here to get a better Bishopric.' This did not look auspicious, and I sounded a retreat; and went to poor Metcalfe's, who is just dead; I should rather have said, rich Metcalfe's, for he got by his vinegar concern a great fortune without any trouble, and hardly any inspection.

"The Queen is now, I believe, worse than ever; but she has so out-lived calculation, and (horrid to say), I believe bets, that her death must not be reckoned upon."

MANUSCRIPTS

BELONGING TO

K. B. TIGHE, Esq.,

OF

WOODSTOCK, IN THE COUNTY OF KILKENNY.

1649 ? Draft of orders concerning the billeting of cavalry in Munster, and the provisions made for supplying them and their horses with food and necessaries when their pay is in arrears. Regulations as to the holding of Markets for such commodities, and the protection of the Irish against exactions. 3 pp.

1649, Oct. 27. Rosse —" By the Lord Lieut^t^-Generall of Ireland. Whereas there are divers complaints daily made by the inhabitants in and neare the towne of Rosse, that the souldiers under my command doe daily take away their garrons and plough horses and their seed corne and and (sic) doe hinder them from threshinge their seed corne, and from followinge their business of husbandrye, whereby the land is unmanured and unsowen, which doth manifestly tend to the prejudice of the publique, and maie prove to be of verie ill consequence if not tymely prevented: Theise are strictly to charge and command all officers and souldiers under my command that they doe not presume to take away anie plough horses or garrons or any seed corne from any persons whatsoever residinge and inhabitinge within our quarters, nor in anie wise to hinder them from threshinge out their corne, ploughinge their lands or followinge theire businesse of husbandry, upon paine of the severest punishment that may bee inflicted on them. And I doe hereby require all officers under my commaund in their severall places to endeavour the preventinge of the said outrages and offences, and to bringe all offenders of that kind to condigne punishment. And I doe hereby require the Provost Marshall of the army to cause this my Proclamation to bee published in the towne of Rosse and alsoe to the severall and respective Regiments of the army. Given under my hand at Rosse this 27th of October, 1649."— Signed, O. Cromwell.

[1649], Nov. 25. Carrick(on-Suir.)—Letter from Col. Reynolds to Major-General Ireton.—" On the previous day Lord Inchiquin sent a summons by a trumpeter, who was killed by his own side without the gates while returning. The eagerness of the Irish foot brought on an attack on the town. I drew all the horse out to the green, and supposing that it would be convenient they should see whom they were to assault, there stood, which the horse quietly suffered: but the foote came on in such a violent manner, that it was not unlike they would have entred with us. They continued very hasty in all their approches, and stopped not untill they came to push of pike, which obstinate manner of assaulting they continued neere 4 hours, bringing on fresh supplyes untill their whole army of foote was engaged (and baffled) in the worke. Their losse was about 500 foote, divers officers, and 1,000 armes spoiled and taken: their number 6,000 (reported 7 or 8 thousand) effective foote, and about 2,000 horse, which they divided unto both sides of the water, but with none of them had we anything to do: notwithstanding their 7 drakes, or their unprofitable mine, or the advantage of a greate ruinous breach in the wall, which was most pressed upon by them." The men are still in want, although the enemy have withdrawn. "For you know what neede we have of that, by the proportion you gave Major Nelson at the water-side, although our Irish manner of warfare is different from other plans which are now practised."

(Cf. Cromwell's account of this—Carlyle's Cromwell, ed. Lomas, i., 510; Gilbert, ii., 325.)

1649–50, Feb. 27. Kiltenan.—"Articles of agreement between Col. John Reynolds and Col. Thomas Shelborne, Commissioners of the Lord Lieut^{t}. of Ireland on the one part, and Cap^{t}. Victor White and Lieut^{t}. John Butler on the other part, for the delivery of the Castle of Kiltenan.—(1) The Castle to be delivered to the Lord Lieut^{t}. or his deputies by 4 p.m. (2) The Governour, Major Theobald Butler, with the garrison to march with horses, arms, bag and baggage, with colours flying and matches lighted, and to have safe convoy to Limerick. (3) All persons now in Kiltenan who wish to go to their several homes to have liberty to do so, and to be protected as are the rest of the inhabitants. Signed, Jhon Butler, J. Reynolds, Tho. Shelborne. [See mention of this in Denis Murphy's "Cromwell in Ireland," p. 271.]

1649–50, March 16. Grenan Castle.—Letter from Robert Burnell to the Lord Lieut^{t}.—Did not expect to be offered no better conditions than to surrender at mercy, and is resolved to force better terms, having regard to the impregnable nature of the place. However, he will wait upon his Excellency, or any other commander appointed by him to agree upon good terms or none at all.

1649–50, March 21. Goran Castle.—Letter.—"Sir, I am intrusted with this place to be kept for his Majestie's use, and cannot deliver it upp, in honor, uppon such easy termes without apparent breach of loyallty. I rest, your servant, Ed. Hammond."

"For Generall Cromwell, these."

(See Carlyle's "Cromwell," vol. ii., p. 46.)

1649–50, March 23. Before Kilkenny.—Letter from Cromwell to the Governor and Mayor and Aldermen of the City of Kilkenny. Copy. [Printed in Carlyle, vol. ii., p. 33 ; Gilbert, ii., 375.]

1649–50, March 23. Kilkenny.—Reply to last, from Walter Butler. Copy. [Printed in Carlyle, vol. ii., p. 34 ; Gilbert, ii., 376.]

1650, March 27. Kilkenny.—Articles for the surrender of Kilkenny to Cromwell. Copy. [Printed by Gilbert, ii., 382, and Murphy, p. 307.]

1650, June 7. Co. Kilkenny.—Articles of agreement between Col. Daniel Axtell, Governour of Kilkenny, and Thomas Butler, of Lowgrainge, Co. Kilkenny. The latter to pay a fine of 100*l.*, and an annual composition of 40*l.* for the enjoyment of the estate of Piers Butler, of Barrowmonte, to hold it in trust for Margaret Butler, alias Netterville, pending a general settlement of Ireland. This agreement to be no further binding if the said Piers, or his heirs or assigns, shall make such further composition for his estate as he or they shall think fit.

1650, June 7.—Receipt for the above-mentioned fine of 100*l.*, with a promise of redelivery to Thomas Butler, if Governour Axtell have not carried out his share of the agreement by the last day of the present month. Copy.

MANUSCRIPTS

OF

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWN.

Copy of a letter in the possession of Lord Oranmore and Brown, of Castle MacGarret, Claremorris, Ireland, taken from an ancient copy of the same letter, with the annotations found on the last-mentioned copy, which is also in the possession of Lord Oranmore.

General George Monck to Roger Lord Broghill.

"My Lord,—Your letters of the 11th and 16th instant, met me thus far on my march to London, and I perceive in these your Lordship's letters how much the Parliament and that poor nation have been engaged to your Lordship's council and conduct in the late transactions here, of which none is more satisfactory to me, and of advantage to the commonwealth's peace and safety than your putting the army into honest and sober hands, where I doubt not but they will be continued, and when I come to London I shall endeavour as effectually as I can, that it may be so.

"The Parliament have appointed Sir Hardress Waller, Sir Charles Coote, Mr. Weaver, Sir Robert Goodwin, and your friend Colonel Markham, to be the commissioners for Government of Civil Affairs in Ireland, who are all honest men, and such as I know your Lordship will be well satisfied in, for I am confidant they are persons of ability and conscience, and such as will act conscientiously in reference to the Ordinances of Magistracy and Ministry, and that love and favour such as are for order and discipline in the Church of God. I recommended your Lordship to be one of their number, but I know not how you came to be left out, and when I come to London, I shall endeavour to clear all objections (if any be) that shall be made against your Lordship's inclinations and faithfulness to the service of the Parliament.

"As for the six troops which your Lordship mentions to be regimented by Sir Theophilus Jones, I cannot think it adviseable to do it, because it will alter the establishment of Ireland which is settled by Act of Parliament, and must either break the regiments those were drawn out of, or necessitate the making the Dragoons Horse, which will increase too much the public charge, and your Lordship knows I am always averse to such things, but I shall in anything else serve Sir Theophilus Jones, and do heartily wish I might be instructed by your Lordship how to do it, for I think him a very worthy deserving person. I have written to the Parliament (at your Lordship's desire) to recommend to them Colonel Temple for Abbott's Regiment of Dragoons, and I hope he will succeed in it. I am glad the officers have reserved Colonel Redmond's regiment for him, for else he had gone without command, his employment with the Irish Brigade being but temporary, for your Lordship knows they are a commanded party out of several regiments. The Parliament is in a good way of settlement, and I like to bring things to a good issue. I hear the secluded members in 1648 have some eager abettors in Ireland who are framing petitions in their behalf, which your Lordship may do well to discountenance, for the House has given judgment against their readmission, and writs will be issued out for filling up their places and all other vacancies, as soon as qualifications can be made. There is one Mr. Roger Livesay that I employ in my affairs in Wexford, that is a discreet stout person, and if your Lordship can give him a cornet of Horse, I shall take it as a favour. I have not acquainted him that I have written to your Lordship in his behalf, but if your Lordship can oblige me with this favour, and give intimation of it to my cousin Monck, he will send for him to you. I have nothing more at this time but to assure your Lordship that in all your concernments none shall more willingly serve you than, my Lord, "Your Lordship's most humble servant,

"GEORGE MONCK.

"Dunstable, 27 January, 1659."

"Colonel Whetham is now with me, and is much your Lordship's servant."

A true copy from an original in the possession of John Prestwich, Esq., given to him by Sir George Booth, Bart., taken by me.

GEO. PAUL MONCK.

Bath, August 26, 1784.

The letter was sealed with the Monck Arms, and directed to Roger Boyle, Lord Broghill, then in Ireland.

When the General wrote the above he was on his road to London and meditating the Restoration, Oliver having died at Whitehall, September the 3rd, 1658. Richard, his son, proclaimed Protector September 4th, and deposed April 22nd, 1659, he died at Cheshunt, in Hertfordshire, July 12th, 1712, aged 89.

The General was arbiter of England's fate the year he wrote this letter, created Duke of Albemarle July 13th, 1660, died January the 4th, 1669–70.—G. P. M.

The original letter was afterwards given to Mr. Monck by Mr. Prestwick.

It is now possessed by me, a great great grandson of Mr. G. P. Monck.

GEOFFREY HENRY BROWNE-GUTHRIE.

Trinity College, Cambridge,
March 6th, 1881.

On the original letter there is the following annotation :—"This letter is the gift of Sir George Booth, Bart., to John Prestwich, Esq., and in a different handwriting, 'now Sir John Prestwich, Bart.'), who, out of friendship, gifts it to George Monck, Esq., of Bath, as belonging to his family."

ADDITIONAL MANUSCRIPTS

OF

CAPTAIN H. V. KNOX.

Letters from Dr. Philip Skelton to William Knox.

1765, Oct. 25. Enniskillen.—"My dear Will, this, I hope, will find you and your beloved girl safe and well at your own house. I enjoy your happiness, and do perceive from your idea of it that you know very well what matrimony is, or at least should be. . . . Although you are yet in love, a time will come when you will only love, and that upon an higher and nobler basis than passion. . . . I heartily wish all the stability and beauty to your architecture which taste and judgment can give it. God, who hath brought you together, is the best guarantee of your alliance." From this he must descend to business. Has got Father Paul's History of the Council of Trent, but wants Gale's Court of the Gentiles, and all the Annual Registers already published by Dodsley.

1766, May 27. Enniskillen.—My removal to a parish which our Bishop hath given me [Fintona], worth 400*l.* a year, will give you more pleasure than it does me, for I am too old and puny to enjoy it long. . . . I am excessively obliged to you for the pains you have been at on my account. . . . As to the old books, they would have been easily had when I was in London in 1747. Their being now missing is a sad proof of the swift decadence of learning. We shall be all Hottentots and Vandals ere this time next century. I depend on your care and charity for the orphan boy, and shall be obliged still further to you if you can tell me that the Repeal of the Stamp Act hath been of service to you as an American proprietor or agent."

1766, July 4. Fintona, near Omagh.—"You tell me that an accession to my income may do good in my hands to the world, and speak finely of poor mortals, and of me as not to be classed with them. But I am a poor mortal too, though not now capable of being much tempted by wealth from my old habits of life. Yet what good can I do to a world wherein you was burnt in effigy?" But if the people of Georgia "burn you at one time, they will bless you at another, provided you still continue to give them wholesome advice, and to patronise their interests, not their mistakes. North America, all America, but the Isles, is lost to England.

"Now we talk of doing good, perhaps some good may still be done to the poor orphan." His uncle, Serjeant Robert Armstrong, may be found at the Blew Anchor, in the Broad Way, Westminster. "If any good is to be looked for in a broad way, perhaps he may remit me something for the poor boy. . . ."

"I long for the books, having now more need of them in this solitary place than when I lived in the great city of Enniskillen."

1766, Sept. 14. Fintona.—Has got the books, which are all "good cheap," but the "Atterbury's Sermons" are not those of the Bishop, as he desired, but of his elder brother, Lewis. Desires more of Waterland's pamphlets, also Ricaut's Turkish History. Has got Franklin on Electricity in Dublin.

1766, Oct. 11. Fintona.—Has not been much afraid for Knox in regard to money matters, knowing his prudence, but is rejoiced to hear his own good account of them. Has been staying with his brother, James Knox, at Portglenane, and was much pleased with the children, especially the eldest son (Tom), "a very pretty sensible youth." Dr. Hastings cannot do much for him, as his interest lies wholly in the church (for which the boy is not sufficiently educated). Thinks that Knox or his brother Bob might find in London some vacant spot in which the youth might take root.

1769, June 5. Fintona.—Urges Knox to take his nephew, "that very good young man," Tom Knox, into his protection.

"The State of the Nation had my highest approbation, . . but it increased my apprehensions of the popish knife, which I began to feel at my throat in every line, as you set our poverty and weakness more strongly before my eyes, and seemed to show me the Frenchman at the door. Ah, said I, so I thought, but still hoped I was a fool, and, till now, had some comfortable probabilities that my ignorance and melancholy imagination might have imposed on me; and perhaps that England might hold out as long as a man of sixty-two was my only consolation. Your State took this away from me, and left me in a state of despondency, like that of my country. . . . To help me still further down hill, I meet with two pamphlets, one of them said to be written by Mr. Burke, wrote, in some measure, in answer to yours, wherein our poverty and distress are, in the mean, acknowledged, you genteelly complimented, and here and there answered. We are really in a fine condition, said I to myself, when men who differ widely enough in other things agree in declaring we are at the last gasp.

"From this I was raised a little by a third answer to your performance; long, lively, and seemingly founded on superior information, which follows you step by step, and avers we are in a very good condition; at least avers that France is in a worse, and that we have not much to fear from that quarter. . . . Bravo, I shouted. It may be after all I shall live all the days of my life, and not see my country perish with me. Will you be so cruel as to undeceive me?"

1769, July 26.—"If my esteem for you as a writer, a brother and a friend can give you pleasure, take it in a full tide. . . . Your last letter, which, as you hint, woud make a pamphlet, I say woud make one of the best pamphlets ever published. . . . I long extremely to see your other performances."

I esteem the American colonies as worse than lost to England. "We are undone. Atheism, faction, luxury, gaming, debts, dutchesses, the Devil, all are employed to ruin us, and Wilks is at the head of them."

1769, Oct. 16.—I like your manner of writing extremely; . . . you ought, however, to draw no fewel for vanity from my opinion. There's no body more often, nor more grossly mistaken than I am; witness what I have published myself, and what the infallible monthly Reviewers have said of my publications."

Is intending to issue a new edition of his works (if he can get up a subscription), devoting the profits to the Foundling and Magdalen hospitals. Has had nothing to do with the filling of either, but those who have will do nothing. If he gets no encouragement, he thinks of printing one copy, "to be placed in our library, with a preface of two lines:—'The author of these works could find nobody who would buy a single copy of them, and therefore he printed but this one.'"

1769, Oct. 25.—This goes by his "dear, worthy young creature, Tom Knox." He is good, and, in spite of all temptations, will continue to be good.

1769, Dec. 5. Dublin.—Praising Knox's last book and Grenville's speech. A jeremiad on the sins and follies of the times. "Thus fell Athens, Sparta, Rome. Thus must England fall, and soon." Is busy about his new edition. He and Mr. Watson are going together to send out 5 vols., large 8vo, well bound and printed, "for 3 crowns English the first subscription, and as many more for the last. . . . We proceed if 175 subscriptions are obtained, which will defray the expense of 500, our whole edition; which, if all sold, will bring into the charity about 500*l*. . . . I wish to be able to give a correct collection of all my things to the world, and to help the best species of charity in it. With this attempt I mean to take my leave of writing, and indeed of the world."

1770, July 4.—Concerning Knox's brother James and nephew, Tom Knox. Has been much pleased with Knox's papers, in which he sometimes finds a grave irony of which Swift himself would not be ashamed. In regard to Knox's proposal that they should start a Miscellany together, he would have delighted to draw in one cart with the man he loves, but (in his 64th year) has no strength left of body or mind to draw at all, and feels that it is time to take the jaded horse out of the harness.

1772, Jan. 30. Drogheda.—On the state of the country. "The patriots, odious appellation, say all the ministerial men are robbers and oppressors of the country; the ministerial men say all the patriots are rebells and only want to be ministers." Beliefs both, and considers the nation to be on the brink of ruin.

1772, July 30. Fintona.—A very long letter, in answer to one from Knox, on religious subjects. Chiefly in defence of the Athanasian creed.

Is extremely pleased to be confirmed in his opinion of Lord North. "If France and our patriots will suffer him, he will greatly sink the national debt, and save England from its patriots." Yet, indeed, nothing can save a nation so lost to all religion and honesty. Urges Knox, if he goes into Parliament, to "stand fast in the faith," quit him like a man, and be strong.

1772, Aug. 27. Fintona.—Recommending Major Maxwel as an officer of great merit, and praying Knox's good offices for him; also for Dr. Sims, who is going to London "to publish a small physical tract," and wishes, if encouraged, to end his days there. If Knox is ill, Dr. Sims will help him "better than three of the top physicians."

1772, Nov. 6. Drogheda.—Rejoices in Knox's continuance in his place; and praises the piety and goodness of his chief, Lord Hillsborough. On religious matters.

1773, March 4. Drogheda.—Concerning an offer from Mrs. Knox to send a sum of money for the suffering poor of his parish. There are about forty or fifty weavers, all in more or less distress. "Of about 800 females, there are not ten, from the age of eight to that of eighty, who are not from year's end to year's end employed at the wheel, and [they] cannot make, on an average, quite twopence a day." Asks for Mrs. Knox's Christian name, that he and his people may pray for their benefactress, which is the way, or whim (as the people about St. James' would call it) of a man "who thinks such prayers do really go upwards." She reminds him of a Mrs. Fitzgerald, who sold a cap for ten guineas and sent him the money for his poor when they were starving in 1757. On the lamentable state of England.

1773, May 6. Fintona.—On Sunday last he and his congregation gave thanks to the "feeder of the poor" for the relief lately sent them by his servant Letitia Knox, and prayed for a blessing upon her and her family. The next day, with the help of a committee of his best parishioners, her ten guineas was distributed, after a month's search to single out the most indigent—i.e., those who had subsisted, "before this fall of linnen and yarns, chiefly on those two branches of manufacture. A woman of the best fingers (so high is the flax and so low the yarn) cannot earn quite a penny in the day," and the weavers are almost wholly idle.

Praises the Presbyterians' petition to Parliament, and states that he is building a meeting-house in his parish, "in requital for the Presbyterians, who are the majority here, having cheerfully repaired" his church. Doubts much whether the constitution of Church or State will hold out his time, although he is very old and very infirm.

1773, Nov. 22. Drogheda.—The world is gone, or going mad, and people wrangle about religion, though they have not the smallest knowledge or sense of it. On religion, as he finds it "in the Word of God."

1774, April 27. Fintona.—Concerning a nephew who has gone out to Georgia. As to Knox's desire to send some money (as a thank-offering for God's goodness to him) for the relief of the distressed, he suggests that it would be well to use it to assist Dr. Hastings and his brother to equip one of James Knox's sons, in case a pair of colours can be found for him. Dr. Hastings is not in such opulent circumstances as has been imagined, and is a "great giver" to his relations, the poor of his parish, and others.

1774, May 23. Fintona.—Concerning the nephew in Georgia, whose name is Thomas Wolfenden.

"Our missionaries to America are certainly the sorriest of all mortals. . . . I know of no warm people but infidels and rebels. Your Moravians and Methodists are unknown, unknowable.

"Why is the death of a French King to undo us? Must we have a war with the next? Or is the next to stop all remittances of French gold? The Bostonians are gone mad, and England is certainly undone. It is well there is a better world."

1774, July 25. Fintona.—Nothing should be forced in matters of religion. The French Canadians gave up their swords on that very condition. They are now become, by their own solicitation, subject to Parliament, "and much better subjects to our King than any of his other American and Continental colonists; so much better, that he is likely to use them and their Indians as a bridle to keep in the Bostonians, &c. . . .

"Thank you for the Moravian missions. They look extremely like those of the Jesuits. This resemblance perhaps was made necessary by the nature of things, but I, in no sense a novellist, am not apt to be carried away by novelties in religion. These odd enthusiastic heats are a kind of comets, which rise and set, come and go, without doing much good. Much harm they certainly do, and the Moravians, in particular, are charged with many very ugly excentricities, which their adversaries extract verbatim from the writings of Zinzendorf and others of the sect. . . . However, if the Moravians can but block out Christians in America it is well, at any rate, and time, not our lukewarm clergy, I confess, may perfect their figure."

1774, Oct. 26. Drogheda.—"Dean Tucker, I see, is for giving up the Northern Colonies totally. Do you think with him in this? For my own part, I think these Americans are downright rebels, and yet, if they are to be taxed by the Parliament of England, they may bid adieu to the thing called property. How wisdom shall make its way between the horns of this dilemma, with justice in tow, I am too far off to see."

1775, Jan. 9. Dublin.—On Knox's kindness to his brother James' children, and to Skelton's parish. "Never was a sum more wanted among my poor, and yet I deliberate whether I should put it immediately into their mouths, or lay it out on the roof of a church which is falling on our heads, and cannot be repaired but out of their pockets. I lean to the former as more pressing." Spent above 20*l.* of his own last summer in repairing one-half of the roof. Will give orders about the stone to be placed over two persons whose memory he venerates and loves; as he will endeavour to show by a little inscription "neither unfit for their remains to carry nor for you to read."

1775, June 18. Fintona.—This being a plentiful year with his poor, and the prospect of next year not so good, he has distributed Knox's bounty of ten guineas amongst "as many poor spinning families as the guineas extended to," to be laid out in flax-seed, that they may have something to do the next year.

Recommending one George Lawe to Knox's assistance in obtaining a post, either civil or military 1775, Sept. 17. Dublin.—Thanks him for his aid to young Law. Would be glad to know if his nephew Wolfenden (in Georgia) and Mr. Buchanan are still alive. Supposes they are both rebels now, and have proclaimed war against George III.

1776, March 28. Dublin.—Asking Knox to send "the body of regulations" by which the Asylum for destitute girls in London is managed, as a good old gentleman in Dublin intends to settle fourteen or fifteen hundred pounds per annum on some charitable scheme, and having consulted with himself, they both like this Asylum the best.

1776, June 28. Fintona.—On behalf his "dear old friend" Mr. Hawkshaw's youngest son, George.

1776, Aug. 23. Dublin. Mr. Gresson's, Little Green.—Dr. Hastings has been very ill, and though now doing well, is going to make his will. "He means to leave 400*l.* to your and his niece, Mrs. J. Knox, and is ready to pay it over to her husband immediately if a tolerable match is proposed." Desires by this letter to introduce the doctor to Knox, "as there are few men of equal understanding with him, and not one of superior worth"; they have been joint benefactors; why should not they be friends?

1776, Dec. 30. Mr. Gresson's, Little Green.—Begs to know what Knox's indisposition has been. Studies and practises physic, and has "more than once performed a cure after medical men of high repute had given up the patient"; why then should he not point out a remedy for his friend? Sends a sermon which he was "almost forced to write in two days, to preach and even print." It is only distinguished by its utter contempt of party and politics, and "its saying what nobody else dare say, and yet every body ought to say. I have offended the patriots here, and should offend the courtiers there, were I or my discourse large enough to be seen. . . . I have lying by me about fifty guineas to carry me out of this miserable island when the French and Spaniards come in, if the patriots suffer me to live till then. We are undone, but what signifies complaining?"

1777, Nov. 22. Dublin.—Hears that Knox is well, but fears he cannot be really so, when all the disorders of the new world are perpetually passing through his very brain, nay and through his heart also. "Here are none but rebels. All our newspapers abound with intelligence favourable to rebels. . . . The King is reviled, the ministry cursed, religion trampled under foot, a loud crie set up for patriotism and liberty by people who mean nothing but to sell their country." Knows that Knox can give no comfort to one who loves his King, country, and religion, "but sees them all embarqued in a crasy bottom, and tossed in a tempest. He hath little left but the miserable consolation of old age, which takes off one-half of the terrour of being drowned."

1777, Dec. 30. Dublin.—Has been told that Knox loses near 4,000*l.* a year by the American rebellion. No wonder he wishes for conquest or accommodation. But the Americans will never come to terms advantageous to their mother country, or if they do, will adhere to them no longer than the commencement of a French war. "All colonies have a right to aim at independence when they can. . . . Our American Colonies, however, have set up for it too soon; at an improper time for themselves, ungratefully, dishonestly, impolitickly. They suffer for it, and England is undone. . . . How feebly does England push with a weapon 4,000 miles long! and how easily will that weapon be parried at the point. People here cast their eyes on Lord Chatham, that best of men in, and that worst of men out of power, as the only mortal capable of retrieving his country, and redressing the mischiefs he himself hath brought upon her. For my part, I believe him utterly unequal to the task. . . . Such debts, who can pay? Such infidelity, who can remove? Such sins, who can wash out? Such political sins, perjury, prostitution, venality, corruption, who can cure or wash away but God? Or how, but by blood and ruin? . . Could you look on life as I do, from this its utmost period, you woud fly from the whirlpool of deception, madness and disappointment . . . to peace and the God of peace, wherever He is to be found.

"The exertion of your little power for those who lived near your good old father and mother and yourself is the best you can at present do, . . . though that is a strange motly body you are going to make up of Presbyterians, to be commanded by men they hate."

1779, Sept. 7. Dublin.—In relation to money sent to Mrs. J. Knox from her brother Tom in India.

Has been reading the results of the enquiry into the conduct of the two H[owe]s, and other papers on the subject, and is convinced that the refusal of the witnesses to speak their opinions is a strong evidence of their belief that things were ill-conducted; especially as they everywhere made strong compliments to the gentlemen under enquiry. Was, indeed, previously sure "that an understanding hath been all along kept up by the principals on both sides, in America, C[linto]n and B[urgoy]ne excepted, and is still kept up. . . . I knew, a year ago, that our army, from the generals down, were able to have quashed the rebellion and fully willing. I know, they still are able and willing, but were and are withheld, to the ruin of England, and of the American colonies too."

1779, Oct. 30. Dublin.—"The malcontents of this kingdom, who make almost the whole, are not to be wrought upon by any reasonings. How[e] is an hero with us . . . and had the Congress acted still a more villainous part than they have done, were that possible, they woud have been still more loudly and universally applauded here. Under a pretence of preparing to repell an invasion on this island, all sorts of Protestants, but the dissenters most warmly, have taken up arms, which they now threaten to employ against England. They will not so much as drink success to his Majesty's fleet against the fleets of France and Spain, on which two powers they depend for aid against England; and hardly at all disguise their intention to play off the American hand of cards, up from duces to aces. It is in vain to remonstrate that independency here must be impossible without the total reduction of England; that this cannot be effected without the aid of French and Spanish forces, or that France and Spain, in case England is once ruined, must be paid by a subjection of Ireland to those arbitrary powers; without, in short, the fate of Corsica. Hated [sic, ? heated] by useless places, an enormous list of pensions, an encreasing debt, and a trade greatly cramped, and now indeed almost annihilated, they will listen to no sober counsels. They give out that they have 30,000 men well armed and disciplined, and begin already to insult the army and our chief governor. They never saw a greater force than their own, and know not, because yet untried, that they woud turn their backs on sight of [a] quarter their number of regulars. Our Lord Lieutenant [Lord Buckinghamshire] whether carried away by dread of an invasion, or what other motives I cannot pretend to guess, hath given them great encouragement, as to arming. He early sent a general to review them, and hath supplied them with arms as long as there was anything in the Treasury. He is, however, not popular, but with the wiser and better sort of people. You sit near the helm, and can much better tell than I can what our good King and his ministry will do, between the trading people of England and Ireland. Without concessions, we are not to be quieted, and some must be made; yet America hath been lost, and England almost ruined, by concessions. Humanly speaking, a few concessions and some additional forces, all English, might possibly keep matters in statu quo for awhile. With no one to exert himself for the Establishment, and with statesmen, generals, admirals, all ready to skuttle our political ship, and eager to sink themselves rather than suffer others to float, I can form no hopes but in God, and how dare I, how dare we, look up to Him for help? we who have renounced Him, His religion, all virtue, and all true patriotism?

"I am old, and every thing relating to me becomes daily more and more insignificant. . . . My parish is up in arms and my tythe farmer and his bailsmen hope to pay me with a revolution, perhaps with a pistol. If you cannot help me where I am, I must soon die, or flie for help where you are. Call me, therefore, to a little living near you. I may, even yet, write as good nonsense for my King as others write against him."

Postscript.—"Just now I am told the trumpet of rebellion is loudly blown by the dissenting ministers of Ulster, and that, instead of 30,000, they boast of 50,000 fighting men."

1779, Dec. 13. Dublin.—"I am in some pain about a long letter I wrote to you . . wherein I spoke to you about my throwing myself upon you, in case of my ruin here. If this letter should have fallen into the hands of our malcontents of Ireland, it will be deemed high treason against them. I anxiously wish to have it under your own hand that it came safe. As to the part concerning myself, I give it wholly up. I am too old and too infirm to be worth caring for." The rest of the letter is on behalf of Mr. Samuel Murray, "a very worthy clergyman, who with infinite pains hath, for fourteen years, served the cure of St. Michael's in this city." Prays for Knox's influence with Lord G. Germain, one word from whom to the Archbishop of Dublin would certainly procure him something of a permanent kind for his declining years.

1780, Jan. 31. Dublin.—". . . I read over your papers, addressed to your very good Lords the Bishops, with that approbation which always results from a similarity of thinking. Eighteen pence a counter at quadril in a Bishop's house is shocking. To your remarks on psalmody might perhaps have been added (for so it is here), that the organist hath the charge of teaching the poor boys and girls to sing the psalms, which he shamefully neglects to do, and so is obliged to conceal his own neglect and their deficiency by blowing his organ as loud as the air in his bellows can supply him with sounds. For my part, I would rather hear the poorest organ of God's making than the best ever made by man. . . . I exceedingly like the organ in a church, but my devotion is raised a thousand times higher by those better organs, which know and feel somewhat of that which they utter. It is no small comfort to me that my dear friend, in the midst of all his worldly avocations, is still so sensibly exercised in matters of religion. What signifies every thing else?"

Postscript.—"We have here got over our fears of an immediate rebellion and revolution, though the evil spirit is still at work. The short money bill, and then a free trade, were the pretexts for taking up arms. Now you cannot imagine how the enemies of establishment are disappointed by the success in both respects. They cannot decently avow the designs they concealed, under the general crie about oppression and tyranny, tho' not a few among them spoke out and railed furious[ly] at King, ministry, England, &c. For my own part, I still have bread, blessed be God, though the payments to me are very indifferent. The country is yet far from opulence, and its lack of cash is represented and plaided as much greater than it is. . . ."

1780, March 31. Dublin.—"What are they going to do with your office? The crown is to be circumcised, it seems, to save money, which, in the midst of almost general infidelity, hath no chance to go into better hands than those already in the management of it. Our Irish Burke, whose speech I have read, is not only pushing you placemen and the Court, but, in my opinion, the whole nation headlong down a precipice. . . . Burke's speech seems a push for Prime-ministry, and considering the ground he hath gained, I do not see how the King can do without him. Perhaps it would be the wisest way to take him in, that the nation may see him undo all he hath already done; for without money and placemen he will be able to do nothing, either for himself, which he means, or for England, which he does not mean."

1780, Oct. 5. Dublin.—Agreeing with Knox in regard to the conduct of some of the Bishops, but declaring that the church and religion are not to be held accountable for their shortcomings. Reproaches his friend for having neglected his appeal on behalf of "a man of real activity in his calling, a painstaking labourer in the vineyard. . . . I ask nothing of any man for myself, or for any relation of mine; and you perfectly well know that standing so high on principles of true religion, I am incapable of applying for the unworthy. . . . I expect no answer to this letter. For your past friendships, God greatly bless you. As to any future friendships, you are hereby fully discharged by your still real and cordial friend."

CORRIGENDA.

P. 125, line 3 from bottom, and p. 149, line 21, for Marquis read Viscount.

P. 183, last line but one, for Ohio laws read Ohio lands.

P. 286, footnote, for Granville read Grenville.

P. 329, last line, for T. Townshend read J. Townshend.

P. 403, line 8, and p. 405, line 28, for Southesk read Northesk.

INDEX.

A

Abbott's regiment of dragoons in Ireland, 438.
Abercromby, Robert, afterwards Sir Robert, governor and commander-in-chief in Bombay, 347, 361, 371, 373, 374, 378, 382.
made a major-general, 361.
letter from, alluded to, 376.
Acheson:
Sir Arthur, letters from, 64, 66, 67.
Nathaniel, his book, 229.
Adair, Mr., 301.
Adams, Samuel, 270.
Addington, Henry, Chancellor of the Exchequer, 218.
letter from, 391.
reported difference of, with Pitt, 406.
ill-health of, 418.
as Lord Sidmouth, 418, 430.
Addington, proposed name for new town in Prince Edward Island, 218.
Addisbury, letter dated at, 93.
Addison, Joseph, 6.
his poem on Marlborough, alluded to, 10.
Administration. See Ministry.
Admirals, death of, alluded to, 353.
promotion of, reported, 361.
Admiralty, or Board of Admiralty, the, 134, 145, 169, 273, 300, 304, 307, 325 (2), 338, 339, 352, 403, 409, 425.
First Lord of. See Anson, Lord; Dundas, Lord Melville; Hawke, Lord; Jervis, Earl St. Vincent; Keppel, Admiral; Percival, Earl of Egmont; Pitt, John, Earl of Chatham.
——, candidates for the office of, discussed, 37-40.
——, "capacity" absolutely necessary for, 38, 39.
——, discussion about appointment of, 263.
——, office of, 338.
Lords or Commissioners of. See Brett, Charles; Drake, Sir F. S.; Frankland, Sir Thos.; Gardner, Alan; Grey, Charles; Harland Sir R.; Hood, Lord; Hopkins, Richard; Leveson-Gower, Admiral John; Pigot, Hugh; Pole, Sir Charles; Ponsonby, Lord Duncannon; Townshend, J.; Troutbridge, Sir Thomas.
——, ridicule of, 201.
——, approbation of Captain Cornwallis, by, 365.
——, expected resignation of, in 1806, 418.
——, "a total sweep" to be made of, 419.
——, as the late Board, 420, 424.
business of, 275, 365.
changes in, 329, 330, 331, 337, 418, 419, 420.
"droit" of, 425.
can be expeditious if the King is inquisitive, 130.
journal (by Cornwallis), to be kept at, 391.
the King's orders to, alluded to, 182.
leave of absence granted by, 416.
letters from, 358, 398, 399, 403.
letter to, alluded to, 179, 422.
letters dated from, 182, 314, 327, 338-340, 351, 355, 362-364, 370-372, 379, 394-398, 401, 403, 404, 410-413, 420-422.
matters to be laid before, 125 (2), 128, 138, 155, 163, 168, 353, 424. orders or instructions from, 366.
——, desired, 131, 143.
——, alluded to, 365, 398, 400, 420, 423.
——, complained of, by Nelson, 399.
papers to be sent to, 132, 181.
patronage held by, 379.
posts in, 329, 347, 420. representation made by, 371.
—— to be made to, 412.
request granted by, 415.
secretary to, 37, 415. And see Stephens, Philip.
ships sent out by, 162, 394.
Affleck, Philip, letters from, alluded to, 329.
to be made a baronet, 334, 335.
Africa, slaves in, 292.
trade with, 155, 233.
African trade, the. See Slave trade.
Aget, Captain, 29.
Ailesbury, Earl of, See Bruce.

Aix, in Provence, Parliament of, first president of, 169.
Aix-la-Chapelle, treaty of, alluded to, 43.
Alari, Monsieur, secretary of La Courière, prisoner on parole, 169.
Alava (Aliva), Vice-Admiral d', supposed death of, 412.
Albany, 133, 140.
  troops marching from, 35.
Albemarle, Earl of. See Keppel.
Aldwick, near Chichester, letter sent to, 392.
Ale House Clubs, 213.
Alexander the Great, allusion to, 426.
Alexandria, East India Company's agent at. See Baldwyn, Mr. intelligence from, 384.
Algerians, the, 122.
Algerias, ships ordered to, 160.
Algeziras (Alguzaries), affair of, 395.
Algiers, coast of, 120.
Allan, Allen :
  Commissioner, 192.
  Ethan, 171.
  Mr., 363.
  Mrs., 427.
  Robert, 65.
Allen, Marler & Company, drafts upon, 316.
Almacks, "doings" at, 302.
Almadovar, chaplain of, 268.
Almon, Mr., publisher, 104 (2).
Althorpe, Lord. See Spencer.
Amelia, Princess, 251. position taken by, at Court, 23.
America :
  casual allusions to, passim. And see under names of provinces and towns.
America, North, or the American Colonies :
  army of (the rebel army), numbers or condition of, 121.
  ——, said to be in the utmost confusion, 123.
  ——, attack of, upon Canada, feared, 160.
  ——, defeat of, 315.
  ——, victory of (over Burgoyne), 316.
  assemblies in, 101, 102, 103, 258, 259.
  British fleet sent to, 120. And, during the war, passim.
  ——, command of, offered to Lord Howe, 314.
  British forces in, 177, 272, 291, 316, 317, 319, 322, 328.
  ——, captured, 149.
  ——, declared inadequate, 263.
  ——, defeat of, 316.
  ——, distribution of, suggestions for, 289.
  ——, hospitals for, 136.
  ——, recruits for, 166.
  ——, regiments of, short of men, 162.
America, North—contd.
  British forces in, skirmish of, 118.
  ——, stores for, 125, 131.
  ——, successes of, 315, 316, 326.
  ——, supplies for, contract for, alluded to, 240.
  British possessions or acquisitions in, 287.
  ——, need of defending, 46.
  ——, security given to, by the Treaty of Paris (1763), 286.
  climate of, 318, 319.
  coast of, ships of great draught unfitted for, 327.
  commissioners to, in 1776, account of proceedings previous to sending, 258.
  ——, general pardon to be offered by, 128.
  commissioners to, in 1778, appointment of, 266.
  ——, not well thought of abroad, 143.
  ——, letters of, criticised, 144, 163.
  ——, Congress will not treat with, unless they acknowledge Independence, 144.
  ——, letters or instructions to, alluded to, 143-149, 152, 153, 277, 278.
  ——, proclamation of, alluded to, 146.
  ——, have exceeded their instructions, ibid.
  ——, are humble suitors to Congress, 147.
  ——, return of, 154.
  Congress of, 149, 184, 291.
  ——, action of, applauded in Ireland, 447.
  ——, committee appointed by, 215.
  ——, demand of, for independence, 144.
  ——, Presidents of. See Washington. See Laurens.
  ——, removal of, from Philadelphia, expected, 168.
  ——, resolutions of, abstracts of, by Knox, 288.
  ——, ——, issue and recall of it, 441.
  ——, ships of, 229.
  ——, all eyes fixed on (1774), 115.
  ——, in relation to the commissioners in 1778, 144, 147, 148.
  ——, Dr. Franklin's assurances to, 152.
  ——, will not make independence the basis of a treaty, 186.
  ——, said to be in the pay of France, 187.
  ——, treaty of, with Amsterdam, 271.
  ——, Declaration of Independence by, alluded to, 196.
  ——, delegates or deputies from, proposed, 258, 259.

America, North—contd.
Customs in, inspector-general of. See Williams, Mr.
Established Church in, no legal provision ever made for, 225.
European dominions in, 152.
exports and imports of, 292 (2). governors in, 259.
Indians in. See Indians, North American.
lakes of, 284.
materials from, to be preferred, 95, 96.
manufactures in, cannot be entirely prevented, 95.
map of, 282.
migrations into, 113.
missionaries in, 444.
negroes in, 203.
opinions concerning. See Germain, Lord G.; Grenville, George; Knox, William. packet correspondence with, 200. people of, supposed inability of, to make any effectual resistance, 111, 112, 123.
——, Lord Shelburne's eloquence in favour of, 116.
——, belief that the better sort of, will join the English, 117.
——, partiality for, 178.
——, emigration of, "towards the Missisippi," 200.
——, if taxed by England, may bid adieu to prosperity, 444.
——, have a right to independence, but have set up for it too soon, 446.
population of, 288, 290.
prisoners in, exchange of, 124, 126.
privateers of, 140, 141.
proclamation for a fast in, 122.
produce of, notes concerning, 293.
project for a settlement with, 289.
provinces or colonies of, differences in their government, 89.
"rebel states of," oath taken to, 156.
Secretaries of State for. See Secretaries of State.
ships going to, 29. And see fleet sent to, above.
slave trade in, 203 (2). And see Slave trade.
Southern provinces of, fighting in, 139.
——, hope of dividing from the North, 259.
——, value of, 278.
Spanish governor in, 135.
—— possessions in, 200.
—— views in relation to, 268, 269.
States of, "wild and absurd leaders of," 192.
sympathy with, in Ireland, 447.
taxation of, by the British Parliament, 89, 98.
——, resistance to, 92, 94. And see Boston.

America, North—contd.
taxation of, right of, discussed, 95-102, 118.
——, views concerning, 258. And see Grenville, George; Knox, William.
——, the Stamp Act. See Stamp Act.
tea sent to, 269.
trade of, 220, 258, 286.
——, almost all illicit, 101.
hostilities between English and French in, 30, 35, 42, 44, 46.
no reason to fear mischief from (1756), 35.
men and money sacrificed by England to preserve her rights in, 44.
possessions in, benefits from, 46.
measures of the British Parliament in relation to, 89, 93, 112, 114, 122. troubles in, discussed or alluded to, 89, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 101, 104, 105, 106 (2), 111, 112, 118, 119, 126, 129, 142, 150, 151, 154, 172 (3). government of, difficulties in, 93.
English ignorance of the state of things in, 94.
disturbances in, concerning the Stamp Act. See Boston. See Stamp Act.
discontent or disorders in, 95, 97, 98, 106, 111, 115, 116.
demands of, are increasing, 105.
Lord Shelburne speaks in favour of, 116.
proceedings in relation to (1774-5), 257. war of independence in, 118-190, passim.
——, "an affair" between the King's troops and the provincials in [i.e., the first fight, at Lexington], 118.
——, French sympathy and aid for. See France.
——, Lord George Germain to take the management of, 314.
——, end of the campaign of 1776, 315.
——, affairs wear a better aspect, 325.
——, both sides have far to go to be within sound of each other's voice, 120.
——, a speedy end to, still hoped for, 120, 121, 123, 315.
——, operations of, 121, 123-126, 128, 131-141, 148, 153, 158, 315-328, passim.
——, ——, criticised, 131, 133, 142, 146, 147, 150, 151, 153, 154, 172, 173, 174.
——, ——, alluded to, later, 228, 270.
——, an attack from Canada the only method of crushing, 142.

America, North—contd.
war in, issues of, despondency concerning, 174, 275, 276, 328, 440, 442, 444, 446.
——, failure of, alluded to, 262, 429, 433, 447.
——, suggestions for negotiations to put an end to, 274-276, 291.
——, to be carried on with renewed vigour (1782), 328.
——, independence to be granted, 185.
——, disgraceful and afflicting end of, 188.
——, losses in consequence of. See Knox, Wm.
treaty made with (1783), 191.
——, criticised, 190.
——, delay in the signing of, 192.
——, articles of, alluded to, 208, 220.
——, ratification of, has arrived, 214.
America, United States of, settling of a government in, 192. fear that the British West India Islands will secede to, 192.
navigation of, 199.
in connexion with Spain, 201.
in relation to the fishing trade, 208.
local magistracy in, 211.
ministers of, offers of, to the British Colonies, 215. examination of boundary of, 215.
inhabitants of, 216.
emigration to and from, 218, 222, 224, 226.
trade of, 220, 227, 229 (2).
——, with the West Indies. See West India Islands.
imports and exports of, 220.
riots in (1793), 383.
ships going to, 423.
danger of war with (1807), 227, 229.
negotiations with, suspended, 229.
war with (1809), 230.
war with (1814), 433.
North West Coast of, capture of British ships on, 354.
America, South, Spanish possessions in, 164. war in, 115, 130.
American :
Colonies. See America, North.
Commissioners at Paris, 200. And see Franklin. factors in England, 97.
fishermen, 229.
loyalists, 179, 189, 216, 224.
——, commissioners for examining the claims of, 197.
——, different classes of, 193, 197.
——, lands granted to, 214, 215, 218.
——, ——, additional Instruction concerning, 215.
American—contd.
loyalists, list of, needs revision, 168.
——, money granted for, 194.
——, petition of, 189.
——, suggestions for providing for, 146.
merchants, 232.
packet boats, 241.
ships :
—— at Bordeaux, 125.
——, carrying trade of, 219, 220.
——, cruisers, English ships intercepted by, 293.
Amherst, Sir Jeffrey, General, dismissal of, from his government [of Virginia], 99.
letter from, 193.
letters from, alluded to, 125, 163.
suggested as Commissioner to America, 257, 258.
as Lord Amherst, 155, 157, 166, 173-175.
at meetings of the Council, 271, 272.
Amsterdam, in Holland, Burgomaster of, 271.
——, treaty with America projected by, 173, 271.
island of, 342.
Andalusia, famine in, 423.
vessels at, 384.
Andamans, the, islands of, 344, 346, 349, 351, 362, 365.
Andes, the, villages round, 160.
Andrews, Captain, of the Defiance, killed, 34.
Anne, Queen, time and court of, alluded to, 54, 55, 63.
ministers of, 55.
Anne (daughter of George II.), Princess Royal, wedding of, alluded to, 60.
Ansbach or Anspach, Margrave of, 136, 165.
troops of, in English Hospital, 136.
Anson, George, Lord, Vice-Admiral and First Lord of Admiralty, 23, 38. is bringing over the young Queen, 299.
Antiquaries, Society of, 428.
President of [Lord Townshend], 429.
Antigua, island of, 149, 369.
Admiral at, 340.
Commissioner in, 340.
English harbour, letter dated from, 339.
import tax in, 220.
Apsley, —, 379.
Arbuthnot, Admiral Marriot, with the fleet in America, 151, 166, 167, 325.
letters of, alluded to, 164.
has blocked up Ternay, 171.
said to be unequal to his command, 175.

Arbuthnot, Admiral Marriot—contd.
his intended voyage, alluded to, 157.
ships with, 290.
Archipelago, the, 292.
Arcot, Wallajah Bahauder, nabob of (the Nabob), 379.
letter from, 346.
Lord Pigot's behaviour to, 129.
territories of, sequestered, 349, 350.
frauds on, 358.
Argyll and Greenwich, Duke of. See Campbell, John.
Aristides, allusion to, 240.
Armagh, Archbishop of. See Boulter; see Stone.
Armed neutrality, the, 271 (2).
discussion on, 272.
Armstrong, Serjeant Robert, 441. nephew of, ibid.
Arnee in the Carnatic, 350.
Arnold, Benedict, 124.
Forster's agreement with, 154.
his zeal and activity, 175.
eruption of, into Canada, alluded to, 228.
(in England) to be sent to America, 328.
Astle, Mr. and Mrs., 113.
Aston, Miss, marriage of, 314.
father of, ibid.
Asylum Act, the, 249.
Athanasian Creed, discussed, 69, 443.
Athens, allusion to, 240.
Atkin, —, superintendent of Indian affairs, 85.
Atkinson:
Mr., 130, 199.
R., letter from, 163.
Atlantic, the, 171, 220.
Atterbury:
Dr. Francis, Bishop of Rochester his sermons in print, 441.
Lewis, elder brother of the Bishop, his sermons, ibid.
Attorney-General. See Talbot, Charles; Yorke, Sir Philip; Willes, Sir John; Pratt, Sir Charles; Norton, Sir Fletcher; Thurlow, Edward; Wedderburn, Alexander. for Ireland. See Ireland.
Augusta, Princess-Dowager (widow of Frederick, Prince of Wales), 23, 47.
excluded from the Regency, 251, 252.
fatal illness of, 312.
death of, alluded to, 266.
Augusta, Princess, daughter of Frederick, Prince of Wales, proposed marriage of, to William Frederick, Hereditary Prince of Brunswick Wolfenbüttel, 30.
marriage of, 306.
Augustine, march towards, 126.
Austria, army of, 117, 129, 382.
Austrian dominions of the Emperor, 19.
Auvergne, Captain d', 394.
Avrachouchee or Auracouchy [?Arava Kurachi], cavalry at, 357.
march to, 358.
Axbridge, letter dated from, 17.
Axtell, Col. Daniel, governor of Kilkenny, articles of agreement by 437.
Ayaracottah, British army at, 358.

B

Bacon, Francis, Lord, 427.
Bagshaw, Colonel, 80.
Bailey, Baily, Bayly:
Dr., 418.
John, desires a post in the Irish Pells Office, 55.
Mr., 70, 73, 74.
Mr., and his family, 11.
Baker:
Captain, 413, 415, 418, 424.
Mr., 17.
Thomas, 378.
Baldwyn, or Baldwin, George, the East India Company's agent at Alexandria, 382. summary of news by, 384.
Balfour, —, 130.
Baltic, the, 369.
Baltic squadron, the, 364, 365.
Baltimore, landing of troops at, 139.
Baltimore, Lord. See Calvert.
Balize, the fort at, 159.
Bampfylde, Mr., 17 (2).
Bangalore, 373, 375, 376, 378.
camp at, 366, 367.
——, letters dated from, 373 (2), 374, 375, 379.
fort and pettah at, 367, 368.
Killidar (governor) of, killed, 368.
palace at, 368.
siege of, alluded to, 366.
storm of, narrative of, 367.
Bank of England, coinage by, 252.
Banks, Joseph, said to be going again to the South Seas (1771), 312.
as Sir Joseph, at a Committee of the Privy Council, 215.
Barbados, 166, 174, 302, 340.
assembly of, 172, 180, 181.
council of, 174, 181.
governor of. See Cunninghame.
import tax in, 220.
letter dated from, 180.
Barcelona, 33.
Barham, Lord. See Middleton, Sir Charles.
Barlow, Member for Pembroke. See Owen.
Barnard:
Lord: See Vane, Gilbert.
Francis. See Bernard.
—, 13.

Barré (Barri, Barry), Col. Isaac, 154. made paymaster of the forces, 186.
papers burnt by, 423.
Barrington :
Samuel, Captain, afterwards Admiral, 314, 320 (2), 330, 333, 355, 369.
——, has quitted his post, 162.
Shute, Bishop of Durham, 431.
William Wildman, Viscount Barrington, 19, 20, 263, 339.
——, suggested as Secretary at War (1755), 32.
——, (when Secretary at War), 109, 125.
Barton, letter dated at, 309.
Bassiley, Lieutenant, French prisoner on parole, 169.
Bastia, letters dated at and off, 388.
surrender of, ibid.
Bateman, a servant of Lady Cornwallis, 336.
Bath :
the Bristol Road at, 433.
doctors at, 8, 117.
letters dated from, 86, 87, 95, 102, 107, 109, 110 (2), 128, 151, 153, 210, 237, 244, 394, 402, 406.
residents at, 433.
South Parade, 87.
travellers to or from, 151, 164, 263, 318.
Bath and Wells, Bishop of. See Willes, Edward.
Bath, knight of the, 335.
Bathurst, Henry, Lord, Lord Chancellor, 268.
letter from, 144.
resignation of, 144.
as President of the Council, 179, 271.
votes against Lord Howe, 342.
Bavaria, princes of, 117.
Bayard :
Mr., 147.
Samuel, 193.
Baylie. See Bailey.
Baylies, Dr., physician and Privy Counsellor to the King of Prussia, 117.
Bayning :
Lady, 430. the family of, 427.
Beale, young, 340.
Beauclerk, Captain Œmilius, letters from, alluded to, 398.
Beaufort, Duke of. See Somerset.
Beaghar, Mr., commission of, 80.
Beckford, Alderman William, 116.
Bedford :
Duke of. See Russell, John.
family of, 256.
house of, motto of, 2.
party, 252, 272.
Bedfords, the, breach of, with George III., alluded to, 263.
their dislike of Lord Hillsborough 264.
Bedwell Park, 311.
letters dated from, 310, 311.
Bellamont, Lord. See Coote.
Bellhaven, Lord. See Hamilton.
Belleisle, 397.
Belvidere, house of Lord Chancellor Bowes, 74.
Benezett [Anthony], philanthropist, 203.
Bengal, 352, 375, 378, 382 (2), 406.
Council of, 129. And see Stuart, Charles; Spike, Peter.
Governor of. See Cornwallis, Lord.
writership in, 409.
Bennet, Charles, Earl of Tankerville, letter from, 6.
Bennington, "affair" at, 140.
German troops sent to, 270.
Bentinck :
Henry, Duke of Portland, his government of Jamaica, 4.
William Henry Cavendish, Duke of Portland, to be Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, 331.
——, is expected to leave Ireland, 186.
——, in relation to Lord Rawdon and his friends, 204, 205, 278.
——, is contesting the Chancellorship of Oxford University, 381.
——, supports Administration, 383.
——, attempt of, to "conciliate things," 384.
——, at Committee of the Privy Council, 215.
Berg and Juliers, officers in, 16.
Berlin, Court of, 114, 129.
Bernard or Barnard, Francis, afterwards Sir Francis, Governor of Massachusetts Bay, 100, 101.
in England, 257.
Berkeley, co. Gloucester, 17.
letter dated at, ibid.
Berwick, ships of, 233.
Berryer, Monsieur, letter to, 286.
Bethell, Captain, 314.
Bettsworth, R., lawyer, 56, 57.
Bhavani, river, 359.
Bible, the, attacks upon, alluded to, 23.
Bickerton, Sir Richard, 328.
Bill Hill, letter dated from, 381.
Bing. See Byng.
Bingham :
Henry, 66.
Sir John, 60.
Rev. Mr., 426.
Binney [? Binning], Lord, 11.
Bird's Place, General Cornwallis' house at, 312, 427.
Birmingham, 426. influenza at, 216.
Hagley Park, near. See Hagley.
Biron. See Byron.
Biscay, Bay of, 326, 369.

Bishoprics, Deaneries and Canonries, vacancy of, 50.
Bishops, the, in relation to the African (slave) trade, 202.
reflections upon, 448, 449.
Blackburn, Mr., letter to, 118.
Blackheath, letter dated at, 113.
Blackstairs, ship at, 355.
Blair:
Captain, 344, 384, 385, 386.
Dr. John, prebendary of Westminster, 50.
Lieutenant, 346.
Bland, Sir John, death of, 30.
Blankett, Captain John, 356, 358.
letters from, 312, 314.
Blaquiere, Sir John, Chief Secretary in Ireland, 231, 233.
letters from, 126, 232, 243.
Board of Trade, Secretary of, "suppressed," 197.
Bohemia, discontent in, 129.
Boileau, his "Satires and Epistles," 33.
Bolingbroke. See St. John.
Bombay, 348, 349, 352, 358, 361 (2), 362, 375.
harbour, letter dated from, 349.
letter to be sent to, 361.
Marine, abuses of, alluded to, 384.
——, officer of the, 344.
ships at, 346, 382.
Bonn, court at, 255.
letters dated from, 113, 116 (2), 117, 121, 123 (2), 128.
Books and pamphlets:
Annual Registers, 440.
Atterbury's Sermons, 441.
Court of the Gentiles, by Gale, 440.
Fell's Memoirs, 430.
Franklin on Electricity, 441.
Histoire Ancienne, by Rollin, 33.
Histoire de l'Angleterre, by Rapin Thoyras, 33.
History of the Council of Trent, by Father Paul, 440.
Letters on the Subject of the Concert of Princes, 213.
Memoirs of Fox, by Trotter, 429.
Minerva Britannica, 24.
Pamphlets, by Waterland, 441.
Satires and Epistles of Boileau, 33.
Thinks I to Myself, 429.
Turkish History, by Paul Ricaut, 441.
Voltaire's Works, 33. old, difficulty in procuring, 440.
on history, recommended, 33.
by William Knox. See Knox.
by Skelton. See Skelton, Dr. Philip.
Boone, Mr. (2), 93.
Booth, Sir George, bart., 439.
Bordeaux, American ships at, 125.
Boringdon, Lord. See Parker, John.
Boscawen, Admiral Edward, fleet under, 35.
Boston, in Massachusetts, 135.
castle of, 100.
charter of, 257.
council of, 257.
——, member of, 171.
liberty tree at, 100.
port of, Bill for closing, 257.
town house at, 100.
people of, disturbances by, in connexion with the Stamp Act, 92, 98, 100, 112, 115, 117, 444.
——, association proposed by, 113.
——, measures taken by, ibid.
——, are gone mad, 444.
invested by the "rebels," 118, 121.
destruction of, suggested or hoped for, 122, 138, 153.
the French fleet expected at or going to, 144, 148, 317.
William Knox hanged in effigy at, 196. destruction of tea at, 269.
Botsford, Mr., Judge of New Brunswick Vice-Admiralty Court, 229.
Boulogne, Nelson's attack on, 395.
Boulter, Dr. Hugh, Archbishop of Armagh, Lord Primate of Ireland, 62.
Bourbon:
the Duchess of, at Spa, 159.
House of, 46.
——, Russia and the Emperor the best helps against, 291.
Bowes, John, as Solicitor-General for Ireland, letter from, 63 (2). plot to put him into the Exchequer, 59.
as Lord Chief Baron of Exchequer, Ireland, letters from, 68-70, 72-75, 77.
behaviour of, during a riot in Dublin, 71, 72.
as Lord Chancellor of Ireland, 51.
——, letters from, 70, 73, 74 (2), 75, 77, 79 (3).
——, letters to, 44, 72.
Bowyer, Fanny, letter from, 20.
Boyd, —, 165.
Boyle:
Henry, Chancellor of the Exchequer for Ireland, 57.
——, as Lord Justice of Ireland, 62.
——, ——, letter of, 61.
——, as Speaker of the Irish House of Commons, 64.
Richard, Earl of Shannon, 261, 265.
Roger, Lord Broghill, letter to, 438.
——, good offices of, to the Parliament, ibid.
Brabant, 384.
Bradford, Lord. See Bridgeman.
Bradshaw [Ellerker], M.P., in Yorkshire, 15.
Branconi, Madame, mistress of Prince of Brunswick, 255.
Brandenburg, House of, 46.

Braniki, Marshal, 255.
Brazils, the, success of the Spaniards in, 130.
Brecknockshire, militia of, 47.
Bremen, shipping of troops from, 123.
Brereton, Captain, dismissal of, 150.
Brest, 144, 166, 383 (2), 403, 405, 413. fleet or squadron of, 35, 68, 145, 151, 152, 166, 168, 404, 416.
embarkation going on at, 179.
combined fleet at, 395.
"Blockade of" (Navy Records Society), papers printed in, 398, 401-405, 410.
Brett, Charles, made a Lord of the Admiralty, 329.
Breton, Mr., 33.
Breton, Cape, 221.
Bridgeman, Sir Henry, Lord Bradford, money bequeathed by, 427.
Bridgwater, meeting at, alluded to, 17.
Bridport, Lord. See Hood, Alexander.
Brighton (Breghthelmstone), 160, 429, "the gay folks" gone to, 430.
praise of, in the old days, 434.
alteration in, ibid.
Prince's palace at, ibid.
Bristol, 211, 316.
Bishop of. See Madan, Dr.
African trade from, 233.
Dr. Tucker at, 236.
election of members for, 96.
letter dated at, 299.
member for. See Nugent, Lord Clare.
petition of, alluded to, 175.
British :
Colonies &c., orders in Council concerning, 190.
nation, respect of foreigners for, 176.
Brodrick, H., nephew of Charles Townshend, 328.
as aide-de-camp to Lord Cornwallis, 315.
Brome, Lord. See Cornwallis.
Brooklyn, attack on (1776), 290.
Brown, Browne :
Montfort, Governor [of the Bahamas], supercession of, 162, 163.
——, wife of, a relative of Lord Dartmouth, 162 (2).
Mr., agent of Governor Lyttelton, 94, 104.
Thomas, 160.
Browne-Guthrie, Geoffrey Henry, 439.
Bruce :
Dr. Lewis, letter from, 69.
[Thomas Brudenell], Earl of Ailesbury, 242.
Brunswick :
Prince Ferdinand of, Commander in Germany, 46.
——, his successes, 44.
——, his displeasure with Lord G. Sackville, 45.
Brunswick—contd.
Prince of, his mistress, 255.
troops of, 123 (2), 270.
Brunswick-Wolfenbüttel :
Hereditary Prince of, 46.
——, proposed marriage of, to Princess Augusta, 30.
——, his wedding, 306.
Princess of, suggested as a wife for George, Prince of Wales, 30.
Bruix, Admiral de, 397.
Brussels, 193.
letters dated at, 158, 169, 171.
Bryan, Mr., 246.
Brydges, James, Duke of Chandos, 327.
Bubb, George, letter to, 1.
envoy at Madrid, ibid.
And see Dodington.
Buchanan, Mr., 445.
Buckingham, county of, manor in, 16.
Buckingham, Marquis of. See Grenville.
Buckinghamshire, Earl of. See Hobart.
Buckner, John, Bishop of Chichester, 426.
Buenos Ayres, 160, 161.
Bull, Mr., 246.
Bunbury :
[Sir Thomas], member for Suffolk, 353.
Lady Sarah and Miss, 310.
Buonaparte, Napoleon (the Corsican), peace with, anticipated, 395.
Nelson writes concerning, 402.
his threats against England, 416.
prayer for preservation from the fangs of, 419.
Burgh, Walter Hussey, Prime Serjeant, Ireland, 234.
Burgoyne, General John, 128, 132, 133, 137-141, 143, 447.
letter of, alluded to, 136.
his appointment and "going out" (in 1775) alluded to, 260, 289.
is returning to America (1777), 129.
proceedings of, in America, 132, 135.
conduct of, approved, 137, 139, his campaign totally ruined, 140.
his capitulation or "misfortune" [at Saratoga], alluded to, 153, 270, 272, 276, 277, 316 (2).
his demand for an enquiry, 276.
expected return of, to England, 186.
to be Commander-in-Chief in Ireland, 331.
army under, 126, 290.
Burke, Edmund, as late paymaster of the forces, 186.
opposition of, to Orders in Council, 199.
separated from the Opposition, 371.
pamphlet by, alluded to, 441.
conduct of, criticism upon, 449.

Burnaby, Sir William, Admiral, 302-305, 307.
son of, 307.
Burnell, Robert, in command of Grenan Castle, letter from, 436.
Burnham, Norfolk, letters from Nelson dated at, 341 (2), 369.
Burt, —, 149.
Burton, Dr., 18.
Burton's Bank, Dublin, Bill for the relief of the creditors of, 57-61.
trustees for, 62.
Bushy, or Bushey Park, Lord North's house at, 181, 189.
letters dated from, 36, 38, 42, 139, 145, 146, 150.
letter sent to, 303.
Butamente, Don Joseph, commander of Spanish frigate, 347
Bute :
Earl of. See Stuart, John.
Lady, Dodington's thanks to, 49.
Butler :
Edmund, Viscount Mountgarret, 70.
Lieut. John, articles of agreement signed by (1650), 436.
Lieut-Col. John (in America), his dashing campaign, 148.
Margaret, alias Netterville, estate in trust for, 437.
Piers, of Barrowmonte, estate of, 437.
Somerset-Hamilton, Earl of Carrick, 70.
Major Theobald, surrenders Kiltenan, 436.
Thomas, of Lowgrainge, co. Kilkenny, articles of agreement by, 437.
Byland, Comte, 178.
Byng, Bing :
Admiral Sir George, letters from, 2 (2).
——, son of, 2. And see Byng, John, below.
John, Admiral, his engagement with the French fleet, 33, 34.
——, courtmartial on, Bill concerning, 36.
——, ——, alluded to, 182.
——, execution of, alluded to, 36.
——, squadron of, 35.
Byron :
George, Lord, marriage of, to Miss Milbancke, 433.
Admiral John, 144, 312.
——, squadron of, 145, 150, 153, 317.
——, ——, miscarriage of, 322.
——, proceedings of, criticised, 317.
(Biron), Captain, 166, 334, 374.

C

Cabinet, the, or Cabinet Ministers, 189, 191, 254, 255, 257, 258, 259, 263, 264, 265, 270, 272, 274, 276, 280, 285.
Lord Bathurst leaves, 144. matters to be submitted to, 181, 237.
Lord George Germain proposed as member of, 256.
the King's speech to, 260.
Cadiz, 145, 150, 160, 167, 171, 412, 418, 423, 424.
action off, 396.
Spanish squadron sails from, 168.
ships to or from, 407, 413, 414.
Caen, 28.
Caffres, inhabitants of the Great Andaman, 344.
Calais, 159.
Calcutta, 417.
letters dated from, 342-349, 360-362, 382, 384-386.
Calder, Sir Robert, Rear-Admiral, letters from, 400, 410.
California, intended British settlement in, 360.
Calvert, George, Lord Baltimore, success of, in colonising, 292.
Cambridge, High Steward of, election for, 306, 307.
University, member for, 353.
Cambridge, Massachusetts, burning of, 122.
Camden (Cambden), Lord. See Pratt.
Camelford, Lord. See Pitt.
Campbell, Archibald, Earl of Ilay [afterwards 3rd Duke of Argyle], 15.
Sir Archibald, Governor of Jamaica, letters from, 184, 188.
——, when Governor of Madras, the Nabob's treaty with, 346.
Lord Frederick, appointment of, as Secretary for Ireland, alluded to, 231.
Rear-Admiral [Sir George], letters from, alluded to, 398.
[John], Duke of Argyll and Greenwich, letter from, 4.
——, as uncle of Lord Bute, 50.
——, daughter of, proposed match for, 18.
Colonel, 136, 294, 295.
General, 196.
Mr. P., 132.
Mr., of Stackpoole Court, 212.
—, 163.
Campo Bello, 229.

Canada, 137, 142, 147, 160, 163, 191.
army or regiments of, 120, 134, 139, 140.
attack on, anticipated, 284.
Indians in, 444.
measures of George III. concerning, 132, 133.
officers of, 289.
people of, or Canadians, 122, 138.
——, French, loyalty of, to England, 444. plan for, by Knox, 289.
refugees from, 215.
trade of, 229.
Lower, protection of, 228.
——, trade of, 220.
Upper, anticipated loss of, 228.
——, productions and trade of, 220, 222.
Cananore, the Beebee of, 362.
Canterbury:
Archbishop of [Charles Manners Sutton], 226. And see Cornwallis, Frederick. prebend or canonry at, desired, 50, 51.
letter dated at, 320.
Cantermine, 413.
Canton, ships to be sent to, 355.
Cape Breton? ("the new Island"), 283.
Carden, Lieutenant, memorial of, 210.
Cardigan, member for, alluded to, 212.
Cardinals and Prelature, against the Pope, 117.
Carew:
[Thomas], M.P., 17.
Sir William, 17 (2), 18.
Carey, a surgeon, influence of, on Prince of Wales, 16.
And see Cary.
Carleton:
General Sir Guy, Commander-in-Chief in Canada, 123, 126, 131.
——, ——, allusions to, afterwards, 228, 277.
——, letter to, 132.
——, letters or despatches of, alluded to, 123, 124, 132, 138, 139, 140.
——, in England, 150.
——, as Commander-in-Chief in America, 186, 189, 284.
——, ——, his appointment, mentioned, 273.
——, is "prevented from going out" to Canada (in 1807), 228.
——, evidence of, in committee, 229.
Hugh, Solicitor-General for Ireland, 239.
Major, 175.
Carlisle, Earl of. See Howard, Frederick.
Carmichael, Mr., 149.
Carnarvon, Earl of. See Herbert.
Carnatic, the, 373, 374, 376, 377.
condition of, 347.
monsoon in, 375, 385.
Tippoo's forces in, 350.
war in, alluded to, 357.
Carnegie, Earl of Northesk, Rear-Admiral of the White, 403. order of battle addressed to, 405.
Carolina, 153, 171, 180. people of (Carolinians), 86, 250.
——, in assembly, 247.
——, feeling of, towards England, 291.
plantations in, 118.
ships of, 87, 140.
North, Governor of. See Martin, Josiah.
——, inhabitants of, 177.
South, agent for. See Martin, Mr.
——, Attorney-General of, 169.
——, difficulty of governing, alluded to, 91.
——, English successes in, 119.
——, Governor of. See Lyttelton, William Henry.
——, legislators of, 82, 169.
——, people of, 86, 94, 288.
——, plans concerning, 126.
——, submission of, 325.
——, troops in, 145.
Carrick, Lord. See Butler.
Carrick-on-Suir, letter dated at, 435.
siege and capture of, 435, 436.
Carter:
Thomas, Master of the Rolls, Ireland, 59, 60, 64.
the Misses, 339.
Carteret, John, Earl of Granville, Lord President of the Council, 23, 124.
Carthaginians, the, 408.
Cary:
Lucius, Viscount Falkland, his "sigh" [for peace] alluded to, 179.
W., 64, 66.
——, letters from, 58 (2), 60.
Cashel, election of, 60.
archbishop of, 60.
Castilian heroes, 408.
Castle Martin, 57.
Castlereagh, Viscount. See Stewart, Robert.
Catholic Emancipation, paper on. See Knox, William.
Caulfield, St. George, 59.
letter from, 64.
as Lord Chief Justice, in a riot, 72, 73.
Cavendish:
Mrs. Henry, death of, 434.
William, Marquis of Hartington, 23.
——, as Duke of Devonshire and Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, 37, 68 (2).
Cavenham, 393.
Cavery river, 373.

Cawsand Bay, 389, 396, 409.
letters dated at, 400 (2), 401.
Cedres, [Cedars], the, party at, 123.
Ceylon, 342.
Chaigneau, David, request of, 63.
letter from, 63.
Chalmers, Sir Robert, 216.
Champion [Anthony,], friend of Lord Lyttelton, 223.
Champlain, Lake, 228.
Chancery, Court of, 5.
ward of, allowance for, 26.
Chandernagore, 360.
Chandos, Duke of. See Brydges, James.
Chanfaul Ghaut, 386.
Channel, the English, 402.
English fleet chased up, by the combined fleet, 321.
French privateers in, 383.
naval force in, 411.
successes in, 119.
Channel fleet, the, 383, 396 (2), 420 (2).
Commander-in-Chief of. See Cornwallis, William; Howe, Lord.
Charibs, the, expedition against, 108, 109.
Charleroy, 255.
Charles, Sir, no governor appointed in place of, 383.
Charles I., and his sons, misfortunes under, alluded to, 22.
time of, alluded to, 99.
Charles II., Navigation Act of, alluded to, 233.
time of, alluded to, 22, 99.
Charlestown, South Carolina, 169, 181, 241.
letters dated from, 81 (2), 83, 324, 325.
taking of, 172, 173.
General Leslie near, 183.
proposed evacuation of, 187, 188.
trade of, not interrupted, 131.
troops to be transported from, 284, 285.
visits of Knox to, 245, 249.
Charleton, letter dated at, 106.
Charlotte, Queen, wife of George III., 279.
her arrival in England, 299.
the King wishes her to be nominated regent, 252.
her birthday, 274.
drawingroom of, 343.
visit of, to Plymouth, 345.
enquires after Admiral Cornwallis, 391.
her ball, 392.
has outlived calculations and bets, 434.
Charlotte, Princess, "still continues about," 434.
Charlotte Town, Prince Edward Island, church at, 226.
letters dated at, 218, 219.
public buildings proposed for, 217.
Chartres, Duc de, 255.
Chatham:
Earl of. See Pitt.
Hester, Lady, death of, 217.
Chatham, 381.
recruits from, 157.
Chauffaud, Monsieur de, 167.
Cheil Naig, the Polygar, 350.
Chelsea:
Bishop of Winchester at, 393.
Sir Robert Walpole's house at, 5.
Cheltenham, 188.
Chepauck, letter dated at, 346.
Cherbourg, fortifications at, 288.
Chesapeak:
Bay, 134, 138, 139, 147. river, the, 175, 179, 180, 181, 182.
——, proposed port in, 174, 175.
Cheshire, Lord Lieutenant for. See Cholmondeley, Lord.
Cheshunt, Herts., Richard Cromwell's death at, 439.
Chester, 99, 100.
Chief Justice of. See Morton.
Chester, Peter, Governor of West Florida, 135.
Chesterfield, Earl of. See Stanhope.
Chichester, Bishop of. See Buckner.
Chili, rising in, 172.
Chiltern Hundreds, the, taking of, alluded to, 343.
China, 349.
Ambassador to. See Macartney, George, Lord.
ships of, 355.
ships to be sent to, 356.
trade with, 212.
Chinnery:
Captain, 164.
Dr., 156.
Choiseul, Duc de, is expected to become minister, 115, 116.
Maria Teresa acts in favour of, 116.
his faction, 127.
Cholmondeley, George James, Lord, Lord Lieutenant of Cheshire, 165.
Christian:
Captain, 181.
[Fletcher], master's mate, heads the mutiny on the Bounty, 352.
Church of England, the, Knox's plans concerning, 200.
belief of, concerning the Real Presence, 245.
ministers of, no legal provision for, in Colonies, 225, 226.
Churchill:
Charles, Duke of Marlborough, Lord Steward, 23.
John, Duke of Marlborough, monument of, 10.
——, Addison's poem on, quoted, 10.
——, successes of, alluded to, 46.
Cinque Ports, the 330.
Warden and Admiral of. See Pitt; see North.
Cisneros, Rear-Admiral, 413.

Clare, Viscount, afterwards Earl. See Nugent, Robert.
Claremont, letters dated at, 31, 32.
Clarence, William Henry, Duke of, wishes to command a division of the fleet, 369.
Clarke :
General, 173.
Sir Thomas, Master of the Rolls, death of, alluded to, 280.
Claudian, the poet, allusion to, 179.
Clayton, Robert, Bishop of Clogher, Bill presented by, 69, 70.
Clear, Cape, 410.
Clement, Thomas, saved from wreck of the Guardian, 353.
Clermont, Lady, 159.
Cleveland :
Duke of. See Fitzroy.
Mr., 131.
Clifford, Lady de, daughter of. See Southwell, Miss.
Clifton, Mr. [Attorney-General for Georgia], 249, 250.
Clinton, Sir Henry, commander in America, 143, 144, 145, 151, 152, 157, 162, 167, 173, 260, 321, 447.
letter to, 174.
letters to, alluded to, 149, 150.
comes to England, 128.
returns to America, and commands at New York, 135.
movements of, 139.
anxiety concerning, 146, 168.
measures of, criticised, 150 (2), 151.
message from, 153.
his jealous disposition, 171.
disagreement of, with Admiral Arbuthnot, 172.
rashness of, 174.
goes with the fleet to attack the French, 181, 182.
orders sent to, minute of, 290.
Cornwallis goes out to (1779), 319.
resignation of (1782), 273, 328.
Clive, Robert, Lord, letter from, 107.
Clogher, Bishop of. See Clayton.
Clonfert, Bishop of. See Young.
Cloyne :
Bishop of (1779), 156; (1789), 243.
See of, 237.
Cobham, Lord. See Temple.
Cochin, 374.
coast of, 349.
Dutch settlement at, 348 (2).
governor of, 374.
Cochran, Major, 327.
Cockerell, 349.
Thomas, 216.
Cochrane, Alexander, Rear-Admiral, 405.
letters from, 403 (2), 405, 406, 407.
letter to, 409.
instructions from, 408.
Codrington, Mr., 17.
Cæsar, Julius, allusions to, 426.
Coghill :
Dr., 57.
Marmaduke [Chancellor of Exchequer, Ireland], letter from, 66.
Coigny, Duc de, at Spa, 159.
Coimbatore, 357, 358.
camp at, letters dated from, 358, 359.
Coinage, suggestions concerning, 211.
Coitelada, 407.
Coke, Sir Thomas, Earl of Leicester, 41.
Colby, Captain, 314.
Colclough (Cocley) Cæsar, 57.
Cole, Christopher, 342.
Collier, Sir George, Admiral, 141, 162. plan of his attack, 228.
Cologne, Elector of, 255.
Colonies, the, in connexion with Lord Hillsborough, 256.
Colony causes, law of, 267.
Collingwood, Cuthbert, Rear-Admiral, 340, 399.
letters from, 399, 400, 401, 402, 412.
mentioned, 398.
report of, as to state of ship, 402.
Columbo, Governor of. See Vander Graff.
Commander-in-Chief, appointment of, 273, 328.
Commerce, paper on. See Knox.
Committee, the Secret (1742), 17.
Common Pleas :
Chief Justice of. See Wedderburn, Alex.
Court of, 300, 301.
Commons, House of, 2, 33, 172, 202, 227, 251, 257, 258, 262, 323, 333, 419.
address from, 377.
Bar of, Lord Melville at, 422.
business before, 270, 276, 291, 302, 320, 371.
censure of, legality of, discussed, 103.
commands of, alluded to, 391.
debates in, alluded to, 48.
disqualifications from sitting in, 197, 256.
expulsion from. See Wilkes. leadership of, 93, 276, 281. matters laid or to be laid before, 16, 39, 142. And see business before.
members of, 380.
——, privileges of, defended, 45.
petition to be presented in, 209.
resolution of, alluded to, 186.
Secretary of State should be in, 37.
Speaker of, 239.
speech of Lord Chatham in, alluded to, 95.
speeches in, mentioned, 102, 165, 260, 262, 268.
in relation to Byng's court-martial, 36.

Commons, House of—contd.
in relation to the taxing of the American Colonies. See American Colonies, taxing of. attacks upon Lord G. Germain in, 164. business of, goes on prosperously, 168.
Mr. Pitt proposed as leader of, 185.
in relation to the slave trade, 222.
a former; question whether it may be censured, 103.
Compeigne, in France, 115.
Compton, Spencer, Earl of Wilmington, President of the Council, 61.
letter from, 18.
Concord, Massachusetts, 118.
Condre, in the St. Lawrence, troops anchored at, 123.
Conflans, Admiral, 73.
Conformity Acts, alluded to, 245.
Connaught, 67.
people of, 57.
Connecticut, 140, 143, 257. inhabitants of, 288
Conolly, Mr., 243.
Conway:
Comte de, Governor of Mauritius, 345, 347, 360.
Henry Seymour, Secretary of State, 93, 250, 263.
——, his "tergiversations," 251.
——, the King's dislike of, 251, 252.
——, as general, 120.
——, resignation of, hoped for, 186, 189.
Cook, or Cooke:
Edward, Under Secretary of State, letters from and to, 227.
[Lieut. Edward], 362.
Captain James, going to the South Seas, 312.
Cooper:
Anthony Ashley, Earl of Shaftesbury, letter from, 24.
Anthony Ashley, Lord Ashley, President of the Council, 48.
Ashley, clerk of Parliament, 195.
Sir Grey, letters from, 122. 170, 172, 179.
Joshua, M.P. for co. Sligo, 64.
Mr., 258.
Coote:
Charles, Lord Bellamont, 171.
Sir Charles, junr., Commissioner for Ireland, 438.
Sir Eyre, Commander-in-Chief in India, 176.
Mr., 66.
Cope, Dr., 65.
Corbett, Thomas [secretary to Sir George Byng], 3.
Cork, 160, 163, 173.
Collector at, 62.
Corporation of, resolutions of, 71.
Dean of, livings of, 156.
Corner, Captain, of the Romney, 100.
Cornish miners, 25.
Cornish, [Admiral Samuel P.], 364.
Cornwall, [Admiral Charles], the late, 2.
Cornwallis:
Caroline, wife and widow of the Archbishop of Canterbury, 333.
——, letters from, 336, 344, 353, 354, 376.
Charles, 1st Earl, letters from, 297-299.
——, his death, 299.
Charles, 2nd Earl and 1st Marquis:
——, as Lord Brome, Lieut-Colonel [under Lord Granby], in a regiment in Germany, 297, 299.
——, ——, letter from, 298.
——, as 2nd Earl Cornwallis, 262, 301, 308, 309, 312, 336.
——, letters from, 308, 315 (2), 317, 319 (2), 321, 323-325, 333, 334, 337, 342-349, 360-362, 373-379.
——, ——, alluded to, 354.
——, letter to, 354.
—— his command in America, 128, 131, 153.
——, settlement made by, 313.
——, in the victory at Long Island, 315.
——, his return home hoped for, 316.
——, returns to America after his wife's death, 157, 319, 320.
——, his sorrow for her loss, 322, 323.
——, victory of, over Gates, 326.
——, is in good spirits, 327, 328, 333.
——, capitulation of, alluded to, 272, 327, 328.
——, in London, 328, 330,
——, his fondness for his children's society, 330.
——, will soon be "exchanged," 333.
——, Burgoyne's command will probably be offered to, 186.
——, to be governor and commander-in-chief in India, 334, 335, 337.
——, in India, his good health, 343, 352, 353.
——, his indulgence as regards payment, petitioned for, 346.
——, in relation to Dr. Wells, 350, 373, 374.
——, his proposed visit to Europe 351.
——, is going to Madras, 362.
——, congratulates the army, 366.
——, besieges and storms Bangalore, 366-368.
——, general orders by, 366.
——, satisfaction in England that he is commanding in person, 370.

Cornwallis—contd.
Charles, 2nd Earl—contd.
——, attacks Tippoo, 371, 376.
——, his anxiety to put an end to the war in India, 375.
——, fortress taken by, 376.
——, signs a peace with Tippoo, 377, 378.
——, is about to return home, 378, 380.
——, as Marquis Cornwallis, letters from, 382 (2), 384-387, 390, 393 (2), 397 (2), 400, 403-406, 409.
——, as Viceroy of Ireland, 393.
——, despondency of, 394.
——, negotiates the peace with France, 396, 397.
——, sent again to India, 406.
——, death of, 417.
——, in relation to his son-in-law, Mr. Singleton, 429.
——, his children, 319, 322, 323, 330. And see Charles, 2nd Marquis, and Singleton, Lady Mary.
Charles, 2nd Marquis :
——, as Lord Brome, 342, 343.
——, ——, letter from 354.
——, ——, at Eton, 355, 374.
——, ——, studies in Switzerland, 376, 380.
——, ——, after his marriage, 404, 405, 409.
——, as 2nd Marquis, 433.
——, letter from, 418.
——, cheated by his servants, 433.
——, wife of. See Lady Louisa, below.
——, children of, 392, 404, 405.
Lady Charlotte, 311 n. And see Madan, Lady Charlotte.
Lieut. Edward, letter from, 310.
Mrs. Edward, intimacy of, with Charles Townshend, 427.
Frederick, Archbishop of Canterbury, letter from, 321.
——, calms Lady Cornwallis's fears, 326.
——, will support Government, 331.
——, congratulations of, to Captain Cornwallis, 336.
Harry, son of the 1st Earl, illness and death of, 297, 298.
Elizabeth, Countess, afterwards Dowager Countess (wife of the 1st Earl), 307, 312, 318.
——, letters from, 297, 300-305, 307, 308, 316, 320, 323-326, 329, 331, 333, 336.
——, letters to, 315, 319, 323, 325.
——, her prudence in answering questions, 330.
——, spoken handsomely of, by the King, 331.
——, her good health, 319, 322, 335.
Cornwallis—contd.
Elizabeth (daughter of the Bishop of Lichfield), letters of, 392-394, 400, 406, 421.
——, presented at Court, 377.
——, proposed marriage of, 397.
——, ——, broken off, 400.
——, godmother to her brother's child, 425.
James (Jemmy), son of 1st Earl, afterwards Bishop of Lichfield, Dean of Windsor and Dean of Durham, 298-301, 305.
——, letters from, 299, 313, 320.
——, at Oxford, 298.
——, made fellow of Merton, 303.
——, his share of Cornwallis Island, 307, 309.
——, his intended marriage, 312.
——, as Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, 333, 334, 336, 346, 352, 355, 374, 388, 425, 428.
——, letters from, 328, 333, 335, 342, 343, 353, 356, 380, 389, 391, 425-434.
——, his management of the Earl's affairs, 343, 349, 356, 380.
——, as Dean of Canterbury, 321, 324.
——, as Dean of Windsor, 377.
——, dines with the Bishop of Winchester, 393.
——, preaches at Westminster Abbey, 426, 427.
——, as Dean of Durham, 427, 431, 432.
——, as formerly Chaplain of the Garter, 434.
——, his opinion of Brighton, Worthing and Hastings, 434.
——, sons of, 322, 355. And see James, below.
——, daughter of. See Elizabeth, above.
James, son of the Bishop of Lichfield, 392, 406.
——, letters from, 397, 425.
——, birth of his daughter, 425.
James, lieutenant of the Lion, 324.
——, resigns his place as Captain of the Crown, 349.
Jemima, Countess Cornwallis (wife of the 2nd Earl) 312.
——, letters from, 317, 318.
——, illness of, 318, 319.
——, death of, alluded to, 319, 322.
——, mother of, 318.
Lady Louisa, wife of Lord Brome, afterwards Marchioness Cornwallis, 392, 404, 405, 409.
Lady Mary (Molly), 298.
——, letters from, 306 (2), 309.
——, postscripts by, 301, 302.
——, marriage of, 310.
——, as Lady Mary Whitbread, letters of, 310, 311.

Cornwallis—contd
Mrs. (wife of James, senior), 313.
——, godmother to her grandchild, 425.
William (4th son of 1st Earl), lieutenant (1761), captain (1762), rear-admiral (1793), admiral (1799):
——, letter from, 366.
——, letters to, 297-434, passim.
——, has been in a sharp engagement, 298, 299.
——, at Barbados, 302.
——, shipwrecked, 308.
——, conduct of, praised, 309, 315, 319, 320, 321, 322, 324, 325, 326, 329, 330, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 365, 390, 391.
——, at Jamaica, 311, 320, 321.
——, the Canada offered to, 327.
——, as member for Eye, 329, 333.
——, his share in the victory against De Grasse, 334.
——, considers himself neglected, 338.
——, the Foudroyant offered to, 339.
——, appointed colonel of marines at Plymouth, 340.
——, goes as naval commander-in-chief to India, 342, 344, 345.
——, stands again for Eye, 353, 354, 356.
——, Lord Cornwallis to consult with, 354.
——, is desirous to leave India, 365.
——, returns to England, 388.
——, his retreat from the French fleet (1795), 389, 390, 391.
——, is "honourably out of the scrape," 389.
——, as commander of the Channel fleet, 398 et seq.
——, offers to go out "at any moment, and on board any ship," 404, 405.
——, order of battle signed by, 405.
——, superseded by Lord St. Vincent, 420.
——, his rank, 433.
——, addressed as Knight Grand Commander of the Bath, 434.
Cornwallis:
Island, 307.
Port, 349.
Coromandel coast, 346, 373.
Coronation oath, the, 69.
Corsica, "the affair of," 123.
ports in, 34.
fate of, feared for Ireland, 447.
Corunna, 33, 407, 409, 413. garrison of, 405.
Cotton:
Lady Augusta, 434.
Sir Charles, Vice-Admiral, 420.
——, letter from, 401.
Captain, 307, 316.
——, marriage of, 312, 314.
Willoughby, letter from, 434.
——, mother of, ibid.
Cottrell, Mr., 154.
Council, the. See Privy Council.
Courcy, Captain de, 400.
Court, the:
attendance at, 15.
divisions at, 23.
Court-martials, 369, 402.
Courts, clerk of. See Jamaica.
Cowan, Lieutenant, wounded at Bangalore, 368.
Cramahé, M., Lieut.-governor of Quebec, 169, 175.
Cranston, —, 334.
Cressener, G., 111, 112, 135, 144, 159, 169, 255.
letters from, 113, 116 (2), 117, 121, 123 (2), 128, 129.
family of, 113, 119, 120, 170.
wife of, illness and death of, 128, 129.
Cresswell, co. Stafford, 391.
Crim Tartary, 129.
Cromwell, Oliver, as Lord Lieut.-General of Ireland, commissioners of, 436.
——, letters from and to, 436 (2), 437.
——, proclamation by, 435.
——, surrender of places to, 436, 437.
——, death of, mentioned, 439.
Richard, proclamation, deposition and death of, mentioned, ibid.
Cronstadt, harbour of, 369.
Crown, the, rents belonging to, 96.
Crown Point, attack on, 35.
Carleton's arrival at, 126.
forces at, 131.
Crowther, John, chaplain, 353.
Cuba, 340.
Spanish fleet at, 184.
Cuiler, Major, 316.
Culford, Suffolk, Lord Cornwallis's house at, 305, 308, 309, 312, 353, 358, 397, 404.
letters dated at, 298, 397, 400, 405, 418, 606.
alterations at, 349.
Cullen, Mr., a general in the Dutch service, 120.
Cumberland, Duke of:
William Augustus, 310.
—— (the late), documents purloined for, 282.
Henry Frederick, 108, 253, 255.
——, negotiation of, with Pitt, alluded to, 252.
—— and Duchess, arrival of, in London, 313.
Cumberland, Richard, Secretary of the Board of Trade, 268, 269, 286. in Spain, 172.
verses of, 41.
Cunningham:
Captain Charles, of the Ariel, letter to, 366.
Captain, 388, 394.

Cunningham—contd.
General James, Governor of Barbados, 172, 174.
——, letter from, 180.
Major-General or General Robert, 125.
——, letters from, 179, 238.
——, and the Mutiny Bill in Ireland, 239.
——, brother of, 179.
—, at Dunkirk, 131.
Curaçoa, Curasoa, island of, 177.
Curour, India, camp at, letters dated from, 356, 358.
Currency, paper, notes concerning, 293.
Curtis, Sir Roger, as Captain of the Fleet, 369, 383.
Cushing (Cushen), John, Speaker of the Massachusetts' Assembly, arrest of, 270.
Custom House, the, 173. laws of, 94.
Customs :
assistant examinator of, 234.
Commissioners of, 197.
a place in the, desired, 6.
Cuthbert, Mr., as superintendent of sail-making for the navy, 356, 357.
hospital expenses considered by, 358.
agent of. See Souza.
Cyder Bill, debate upon, 280.

D

Dacres, Lieutenant, 126.
Dagowan, Peter, documents signed by, 216, 219.
Dalkeith, Lady, wife of Charles Townshend, 280.
Dalling, John, Governor of Jamaica, 188. drafts of, 164.
Dalrymple :
[Admiral John], in command at the Nore (1790), 356.
[Brig.-General William], 174.
Daniel, servant of Lady Cornwallis, 336.
Dantzig, 114.
Darby, Admiral George, 172.
fleet of, 175.
Darcy, Robert, Earl of Holdernesse, colleague of Duke of Newcastle as Secretary of State, 23, 44. journey of, to Wolfenbüttel, 29, 30. resignation of, reported, 41.
Dark, Lieutenant, wounded at Bangalore, 368.
Dartmouth, Lord. See Legge, William.
Dashwood, Sir Francis, 21, 48 (2), 49.
as Lord de Despenser, 124.
Davila, works of, alluded to, 33.
Dawson, his bank, 74.
Day [Thomas], returns of, about victuals, 163.
Deal, 364.
Deccan, the, Nizam of. See Nizam.
Deer Island, 229.
Deering, —, late deputy clerk of the Council in Ireland, 63.
De Grey :
Mr., 277, 306.
Thomas, Lord Walsingham, 186, 191, 200.
——, letter from, 202.
——, letters to, 198, 201.
Sir William, 268.
Deimar, —, 4.
Delaney, Captain, killed at the siege of Bangalore, 368.
Delaware river, 122, 143, 148.
capes of, 317.
islands in, 253.
Delgarno, Captain, 349.
Denbigh (Denby), Earl of. See Feilding.
Denmark :
[Christian VII.], King of, in England, 102. alliance with, alluded to, 18, 291.
armistice concluded with, 395.
forts of, 292.
Denoyer, George, dancing master, petition said to be addressed to, 16.
Derby, a confirmation at, 433.
Derbyshire, 389.
Desbarres, Governor of Prince Edward Island, 227.
Despenser, Lord de. See Dashwood, Sir Francis.
Detroit, Indian presents sent to, 294.
Devonshire, 17.
Duke of. See Cavendish, William.
Duchess of, 159.
Diamond harbour (Calcutta), 345, 384, 386.
Dickens, Mrs., 425.
Dickson :
Captain, son of, 363.
Mr., 61.
——, appointed collector at Cork, 62.
Digby, Admiral [Robert], 181, 327.
Dil[lon]?, in the Irish House of Commons, success of, 71.
Dindigul, 358 (2), 359 (2).
Diving-bell, unpleasant sensations in, 434.
Dixon, —, lawyer and Irish M.P., 56.
Dodington :
George [Lord of the Admiralty], letters to, 2, 3.
George Bubb, nephew to the above, afterwards Baron Melcombe of Melcombe Regis, papers of, 1-80.
——, letters of, 11, 18, 20, 22, 27-31, 33-36, 40-44, 47, 49, 50, 53.

Dodington, George Bubb—contd.
——, letters to, 1-80, passim.
——, house of, in London, 11.
——, houses of. See Eastwell; see La Trappe.
——, odes or verses to, 9, 10, 41.
——, receipt from, 39.
——, his brother member [for Bridgwater]. See Poulett.
——, as a Lord of the Treasury, kindness or friendship shown by, 4, 6.
——, interest of, requested, 6, 63.
——, his Epistle to Walpole, ridiculed, 6.
——, in relation to the Prince of Wales, 11-15, 20-22.
——, goes to Ireland, 13, 14.
——, and the proceedings against Sir Robert Walpole, 16, 17.
——, despondency of, in regard to public affairs, 18, 20.
——, resigns the treasurership of the navy, and becomes treasurer of the Chamber to the Prince of Wales, 20.
——, his dislike of fox-hunting and of gaming, 26, 27, 28.
——, on the character of an English gentleman, 27.
——, in relation to Henry Fox, 31, 32, 38, 40.
——, place offered to, by Newcastle, 31, 32.
——, meeting of, with Newcastle, 32.
——, his affection for Lord Halifax, 32.
——, books recommended by, 33.
——, again offered the treasurership of the navy, 40.
——, his defence of Lord George Sackville, 45.
——, created Lord Melcombe, 48, 49.
——, accident to, 49.
——, in relation to Lord Bute, 49-54.
——, as clerk of the Pells in Ireland, 55, 63.
——, his salary, 64, 65.
——, deputy of. See Love, Joseph.
Mrs., 22.
Dodsley, the Annual Register published by, 440.
Dominica, island of, 183, 184.
conquest of, 120.
enquiry concerning, in the House of Lords, 154.
memorial from proprietors of, 157 (2).
Dominos Bay, 408.
Donaghadee, 241.
Doneraile, Lady, case of, 63.
husband of, ibid.
Don Juan de Ulloa, castle of, at Vera Cruz, 161.
Donnington, letters dated at, 203 (2), 205.
Dorset, Duke of. See Sackville.
Dorset family, the, sympathy for, 74.
Dorsetshire, 17, 31.
Douglas, William, Duke of Queensbury, 344.
Douglas, Douglass :
Mr., suppositious birth of, 268.
Mr., paymaster to Lord Melville, 422.
Dover, 149.
passage from, to France, closed by the war, 159.
Down, Bishop of. See Smith.
Downs, the, 29, 364, 383, 410.
command in, 355.
D'Oyley :
Christian, Under Secretary for the Colonies, formerly Deputy Secretary at War, 127, 277.
——, letter from, 127.
Sir John, 394.
Drake, Francis Samuel, Admiral, 179. made a baronet, 334, 335.
as a Lord of the Admiralty, 345, 347
death of, 347, 352, 364.
Drayton, house of Lord George Germain, 273.
letters dated from, 128, 129, 140, 150, 155, 164, 168, 174, 175, 177, 180, 181, 189, 192.
Drogheda :
Corporation of, 57.
letters dated at, 442-444.
Dromoland, letters dated at, 233 (2).
Drummond, —, 144, 171.
Dublin, 68, 137, 167, 214, 241, 393, 400, 441.
Archbishop of, patronage of, desired, 156, 448.
Gazette sent to, 125.
letters dated from, 51, 55-80 passim, 110, 231-243 passim, 442, 444-449.
Lord Mayor of (1759), 71, 72.
——, (1779), 165. buildings and streets in :—
Castle, 62, 71, 238.
——, letters dated from, 58, 60, 80, 232, 234 (4), 237, 239, 240, 241.
Christ Church, treasurership of, 67.
Court of Chancery, 71.
Custom House, 62.
Foundling and Magdalen Hospitals, 442.
Harcourt Street, letters dated from, 155, 190, 192.
Henrietta Street, letters dated from, 73, 79.
Little Green, 445 (2).
Phœnix Park, letters dated from, 239, 393 (2).
St. Michael's, minister in charge of. See Murray, Samuel.
St. Patrick's, Dean of. See Swift.

Duckworth, Sir John, Admiral, letter from 409.
Dudley Island, 229.
Duff, Colonel, praise of, 367.
Dumanoir, Admiral, 413.
Dumourier, General, his threat to the National Convention, 384.
Dunbar, Major Philip, 61.
Duncan :
Admiral [Adam], 340.
Lady Mary, 143.
Duncannon, Lord (1735), 64.
And see Ponsonby, Frederick, Viscount.
Dundas :
Henry, Lord Advocate of Scotland, afterwards Treasurer of the Navy, 262, 272, 285, 371.
——, letters from, 340, 354.
——, letter to, 214.
——, promotion of, discussed, 186, 189.
—— able, but disliked, 201.
——, as Viscount Melville, 422-425, 432 (2).
——, letters from, 403-405.
——, appointment of [as First Lord of the Admiralty], 403.
——, his presidency of the Board of Control alluded to, 405.
——, trial of, 422.
——, as an "unplaced statesman," 425.
Robert Saunders, Lord Chief Baron of Scotland, 405.
——, letter from, 405.
Dungan, Galway, letter dated at, 113.
Dunk Montagu, George, Earl of Halifax, 84, 85, 165, 251, 252, 263, 282.
letters from, 36 (2), 38, 42, 44, 80.
letters to, 29-32, 36.
memorandum by, 32.
friendship of, with Dodington, 32, 51.
wishes for the Garter, 32.
[as President of the Board of Trade] sends Knox to Georgia, 246.
congratulations to (1756), 36.
Fox wishes him to take the Admiralty (1757), 37, 38, 39.
illness of, 42.
his departure from the Board of Trade, 86.
as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, 51, 52, 79, 86.
——, leaves Ireland, 80.
[at the Admiralty], appoints William Cornwallis to a sloop, 300.
Lady Cornwallis procures a recommendation from, 302-305.
children of, 42.
Dunkirk, Dunquerque, 131.
new voters at, 16.
Dunmore, Earl of. See Murray, John.
Dunn, Captain, 409.
Dunstable, letter dated at, 439.
Dupplin, Lord, See Hay.
Du Quesne, money bequeathed by, 427.
Durham :
Bishop of. See Barrington, Shute.
Dean of. See Cornwallis, James.
the Deanery at, described, 431.
Grand Chapter at, 432.
letters dated at, 431, 432.
residents at, 428.
has few of the inconveniences of a country town, 427.
Durham, county Palatine of, 99, 100.
Düsseldorf, letter dated from, 115.
Dutch, the, in connexion with America, 112, 129, 226.
at the Texel, 410, 411.
Dutch :
Admiral, has behaved with discretion, 165.
service, a general in. See Cullen.

E

Ealing, letters dated at, 220, 224, 227 (2), 228, 229, 230.
Earlsfort, Lord. See Scott, John.
Earth, the, revolution of, inquiries concerning, 230, 231.
East :
Anne, mother of Mr. East, 26, 27, 28, 33.
——, letter from, 30.
Mr., character of, 30.
——, letters addressed to, 27, 28, 33 (2).
——, father of, 27.
Eastbury, Berkshire, Dodington's house, 11, 14, 50.
letters dated at, 14 (2), 31, 34 (2), 35, 41, 44.
verses in praise of, 41.
East India Company, 107, 108, 291, 341, 351, 360, 361, 363, 366, 378, 412, 417.
agent of, 382.
chairman of, report sent by, 371. And see Lushington.
Court or Board of Control or Direction for, 214, 351, 371, 384.
——, president of (Dundas), 405.
——, sends Lord Cornwallis again to India, 406.
Court of Proprietors, 214.
Directors of, 346.
notes on, 291.
officers or servants of, 358, 388.
secretary of, 361.
tea sent out by, 269.
East India fleet or ships, 153, 356, 365, 366, 410.

East Indies, 107, 160, 340, 370.
business of, 251.
commander-in-chief in. See Cornwallis, Lord.
——, naval. See Cornwallis, Wm.
expedition from, to the Philippines, proposed, 354.
news from, 176.
Eccleshall Castle, letters dated at, 342, 391, 426, 428 (2), 430.
Eden, William, afterwards Lord Auckland, 122, 155, 158, 195, 199, 200 (2), 261, 277. communication of, alluded to, 227.
letters from, 194, 197, 227, 239 (2), 240.
letters to, 194, 225, 240.
ministerial jealousy of, alluded to, 265-267.
suggested as Under Secretary of State, 266. appointed Lord of Trade, 266.
suggested as commissioner for America (1776), 258.
as secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, 239.
proposed embassy of, to Spain, 200.
Edgecumbe [Commodore George], in the Mediterranean, 35.
Edhouse, Colonel, 299 (2).
Edinburgh, bankruptcy at, 383.
letter dated at, 340.
Edmundsberry, letter dated from, 235.
Edwardes, William, Lord Kensington, member for Haverfordwest, 212. his son [William], ibid.
Edwin, Lady Charlotte, maid of, 16.
Egmont, Earl of. See Percival.
Egmont Island, 159.
Egremont, Lord. See Wyndham.
Egypt, compared to Florida, 292.
Elden in Suffolk, 322.
letter dated at, 319.
Elizabeth, Queen, alluded to, 179, 180, 369.
Eliot, Mr., 93.
Elliot:
Sir Gilbert, daughter of, marriage of, alluded to, 266.
Admiral [John], 364, 369.
superintendent at New York, 173.
Elliott, Sir John, physician, 192.
Ellis:
Francis, nephew of Henry Ellis, appointment of, as his uncle's executor, 224.
Henry, Governor of Georgia, 81, 211, 245-250, 282, 283.
——, letters from, 86, 87, 95, 106, 109-112, 119, 134, 135, 137, 143, 158, 159, 169, 171, 176, 178, 190 (2), 214, 222-224.
——, going to England, 84.
——, death of, alluded to, 224.
Major, commission of, 171.
Mr., 183.
Mr., a friend of Henry Ellis, 106.
Ellis—contd.
Mr., agent for the Irish Linen Board, death of, 126.
Robert, brother of Governor Henry, 171.
Welbore, 276.
——, as Secretary of State, 209.
Elphin, Bishop of. See Synge, Dr.
Elphinstone:
Captain, letter from, alluded to, 398.
George Keith, Baron (afterwards Earl) Keith, Admiral, 411, 419.
Ely, Earl of. See Loftus.
Emperor, the:
[Charles VII.], provisions concerning, in the treaty of Hanau, 19.
[Francis], after the death of the Empress Maria Teresa, 271.
——, patent granted by, 24.
——, protection of, desired, 26.
[Joseph II.], views of, 177.
——, expected at Spa, 178.
——, proceedings of, 193.
——, in relation to the King of Prussia, 200.
——, is ambitious and poor, 291.
——, ambassadors of. See Imperial Ambassadors.
Empire, the, French forces in, 255. views of the people in, 129.
Empress, the. See Maria Teresa.
England:
the arts in, 11.
bank of, 108.
carrying trade of, 191.
climate of, 112.
counties of, Lord Lieutenants of, 100.
court of, King of Sweden's impression of, 170.
customs of, introduced into France, 88.
kings of, have no right to create independent principalities, 99.
imports and exports of, 232, 233, 234 (2).
in connexion with Russia, 116.
people of, are intoxicated with conquest, 53.
——, are firmly attached to the constitution, 383.
——, horror of, at the execution of the King of France, 384.
revenue of, 287, 288.
——, measures concerning, 89.
ruin of, prophecied, 442 (2), 444, 446, 448.
subjects of, excluded from French sea-ports, 158.
subsidies given by, to foreign princes, 30.
trade of, 286, 287. And see Trade.
——, effect of war on, 287.
England and France, war between:
(in 1755), notices of, 29, 34.
in Germany, 44, 431.
in America. See America.

English :
Channel, French ships in, 383.
gentleman, the character of a, 27.
traders, 293.
——, wives and children of, 294.
troops, valour of, 46.
——, at Naples, 224.
——, for Westphalia, See Westphalia.
——, in America. See America, North, British forces in.
Enniskillen, 441.
letters dated at, 440 (2).
Erode, or Errode, reduction of, 359 (2).
Erskine :
(a former) Earl of Mar, 16.
Sir Harry, husband of Wedderburn's sister, 267.
Laur?, wife of James Hamilton, 16.
Mr., 339.
—, in the household of Frederick, Prince of Wales, 16.
—, member for Portsmouth, 353.
Erwing, —, member of Council at Boston, 171.
Esher, letter dated at, 317.
Espiritu Sancto, harbour of, 159.
Estaing, Comte d', French Admiral, 144, 153, 162, 164.
and his fleet, movements of, 145, 148-151, 317, 322, 323.
Estwick, Mr., 181.
Eton school, 311, 353, 374, 376, 431.
captain of, 355.
letter dated at, 354.
Montem at, 355.
Europe, 349, 351. emigrants from, 224.
fleets of, 344.
fleet returning to, 151.
in connexion with the American Colonies, 146, 152.
inhabitants of, in North America, 288.
naval war in, 30.
peace in, anticipated, 364.
political aspect in, 214.
powers of, harmony amongst, 92.
troops of, 355.
war in, alluded to, 129.
European :
grenadiers, praise of, 367.
infantry, 359.
Euston, Earl of. See Fitzroy.
Evans, Mr., 421.
Ewart, [Joseph], arrival of, in Prussia, 371.
Exchequer :
Chief Baron of [Sir S. S. Smythe], 113.
Bills, proposed issue of, 211.
Chancellor of (1760), 75, 78 (2), And see Addington, Henry; Legge, Henry. matters in, 6, 7.
Exeter, 18.
assizes at, 17 (2).
traveller to, 17
Export and import duties, 292, 293.
"Extracts of the News," chiefly foreign affairs, 382.
Eye, Suffolk, 374, 380.
Members of Parliament for, 353, 354.
the Hon. W. Cornwallis, as member for, 329, 331, 333, 342, 343, 356, 397.
Eyre, Cornet Stratford, 61.

F

Fakenham, coach to, 173.
Falkland, Viscount. See Cary, Lucius.
Falkland Islands, 264, 312.
Falkner, Thomas, letter from, 160.
Falmouth, 411.
Family compact, the, alluded to, 53, 180.
Fane, Mr., proposed marriage of, 4, 5.
Fanning, Lieut.-General Edmund, Governor of Prince Edward Island, letters from, 216, 218, 219.
letters to, 218, 219.
as late Lieut.-Governor, 226.
Fanshaw, Captain, 322, 428.
at the battle with De Grasse, 332. appointment of, as commissioner, 352.
Farquharson, purser, saved from shipwreck, 353.
Faulkener, Admiral Jonathan, 369.
Feilding :
[Basil], Earl of Denbigh, supports Lord Bute, 280.
(Fielding), Capt. Charles, 151, 314.
——, married to Miss Finch, 314.
——, illness of, 339.
Ferguson, Colonel [Patrick], killed, 174.
Fermor, George, Earl Pomfret, 280.
Fernham [? Farnham, Suffolk], 343 (2).
Ferrars, Ferrers :
Lord de, 331.
Lady, 304, 305.
Ferrol, in Spain, 407-410, 413. arsenal at, 407, 408. garrison of, 405.
governor of, letter from, 409.
——, letter to, 408.
ships at, 412.
—— off, letters dated from, 403 (2), 405 (2), 410.
Fielding :
Capt. Charles. See Feilding.
Sir John, 318.
Lady, 406.
Filangieri, General Francis Antonio, 407.

Finch :
Daniel, Earl of Winchilsea, 24.
——, suggested for the Admiralty, 38.
——, accepts the Admiralty, 40.
Captain, of the Guards, death of, 136 (3).
[Sophia], wife of Captain Feilding, 314.
Finisterre, Cape, 150, 383, 419. rendezvous off, 414.
Finland, coast of, 395.
Fintona, near Omagh, Dr. Skelton's parish, 440.
church of, 443, 445.
discontent in, 448.
distress amongst the spinners and weavers of, 443, 445.
letters dated at, 440-445.
Presbyterians in, 443.
Fisher, John, Under-Secretary for the Colonies, 275, 283, 286.
letter from, 193.
Fishery Act, 233.
Fishing : rights of, in New Brunswick, 229 (2).
trade, letter in relation to, 208, 209.
Fishkill, General Washington at, 153.
Fitzgerald :
Lord Charles, made a peer [Lord Lecale], 393.
James, Earl of Kildare, 69.
Lady Margaret, marriage of, alluded to, ibid.
Mrs., her bounty, 443.
William Robert, Duke of Leinster, 265, 314.
——, differences of, with his brother, 393.
——, brother of, 314. And see Lord Charles, above.
William Thomas, letter from, 416.
Fitzgibbon, John, Attorney-General for Ireland, 243.
Fitzmaurice :
Mrs. [Hester Lyttelton], sister of Lord Westcote, 187, 188.
Fitzroy :
Augustus Henry, Duke of Grafton, 154, 260, 310.
——, his negotiations with Rockingham, 250, 251.
Charles, Duke of Grafton, 24.
George Henry, Earl of Euston, candidate for Parliament, 353.
William, Duke of Cleveland, 310.
Lord William, 414, 415.
Fitzwalter, Benjamin, Earl [the Lord Steward], 23.
Flanders, in relation to the Emperor, 19.
Fleet, the English, casual notices of, passim. And see Ships.
orders and arrangements in relation to. See under the names of Admirals, letters to and from.
Fleet, the English—contd.
(1756), not strong enough to beat the French, 35.
chased up the Channel by the French, 321.
victories of, under Rodney. See Rodney.
Western Squadron of, 262.
Fleming, Flemming :
Captain, 405.
Mrs., 87.
Fletcher, Sir Robert, letter of, alluded to, 129.
Fleury, Cardinal, 255.
Florence, letters dated at, 24, 25, 34, 42, 43.
Florida or the Floridas, 168.
description of, 292.
acquisition of, 282.
"Hints respecting the Settlement and Culture of," also paper concerning boundaries, 292.
restitution of, 291.
East, 230.
West, 158, 269, 290.
Gulf of, 200.
Florida Blanca, Count de, letter from, alluded to, 269.
Floyd, Colonel, 357, 359 (2).
Forbes, John, Admiral, letter from, 389.
Ford, Mr., note addressed to, 237.
Forster :
Capt. George, agreement of, with Arnold, touching prisoners, mentioned, 124 (2), 154.
Mr., 125.
Fortescue, Mr., 7.
Fortification Bill, 249.
Fort Island ("Mad Island"), attack on, alluded to, 315, 316.
Fort St. George, Madras, Government of, 357.
Presidency of, 348.
Fort William, letters dated at, 348, 382.
Fortified Island, East Indies, 375, 378.
Fox :
Lady Caroline, 34.
Charles James, 199, 384.
——, Bill of, to repeal the Marriage Act (1772), 288.
——, as Secretary for the Foreign Province (1782), 331.
——, his resignation (1782), 185, 187.
——, his attack on Lord Shelburne, 186.
——, in relation to the cession of Gibraltar, 189.
——, praise of, 203.
——, expected to succeed Pitt (1806), 417, 418.
——, looks as if he were dying, 422.
——, death of, alluded to, 430.
——, memoirs of, alluded to, 429, 430.

Fox—contd.
Henry, position taken by, at Court, 24.
——, letters from, 32, 33 (3), 36-40.
——, letters to, 31, 34, 35, 39-41.
——, promotion of (to be Secretary of State), 31, 32.
——, illness of, 34, 35.
——, his views in 1737, 37.
——, as Lord Holland, 282.
——, dismissal of, proposed, 253.
——, in relation to George Dodington. See Dodington.
Fraigneau, Mr., 33.
France, 25, 143, 176, 269, 274, 283, 303, 375.
King of. See Louis XV.; Louis XVI.
Faineant Kings of, alluded to, 172.
Queen of, 120, 382.
Dauphin of, 384.
ambassador of, 120, 122.
ambassador to. See Murray, Viscount Stormont. banking transactions in, 88.
cabinet of, 89.
coast of, 326.
——, expedition to (in 1758), 315.
commercial arrangements with, 196, 199, 200.
condition of, 45, 46, 89, 199, 313.
constitution of, changes in, 380.
council of, 178.
country of, described, 88.
court of, 43, 89, 119, 170, 200.
——, disposition of, 42.
——, in relation to the Cardinals, 117.
finances of, 176.
——, system of, 178.
fishermen in, 232.
islands of, 151, 293.
—— and fortifications of, in the West Indies, plan of, 282. marine trade of, 287.
ministers of, 199.
—— and officers of State go shooting, 88.
National Assembly of, 382.
National Convention in, menaced by Dumourier, 384.
possessions of, 184.
seaports of, English excluded from, 158.
stores of, destroyed, 153.
Swiss Guards in, 115.
tour in, alluded to, 10.
trade of, 235, 271.
——, loss of, 46.
treaty with, 15.
—— of commerce with, 199.
—— of peace with, preliminaries of, signed (1801), 396.
——, negotiated by Marquis Cornwallis, 396, 397.
and England, war between. See England.
France—contd.
state of (in 1752 and in 1764), 89.
danger of war with, 28.
effect of the late war upon (1763), 287.
in connexion with the American Colonies, 112, 119, 122, 129 (2), 144-148, 151, 152, 157, 158 (2), 160, 162, 165, 167, 168, 178, 201, 229, 284, 330.
in connexion with Russia, 116.
politics of (1774), 115.
exchanges with, suggestions for, 291.
in connexion with India, 346, 347, 348, 351.
commotions or distractions in (the French Revolution), 351, 370, 380, 382, 383.
as an ally of Tippoo Sultan, 365, 371. execution of the King in, 384.
new revolution in (1799), 214.
peace with, prospect of (in 1801), 395.
rupture with (1803), 217. war of, with Naples, anticipated (1805), 224.
France, Isle of, 360.
Francis, Dr., 282.
François or Françoise, Cape, 184, 322.
Frankland:
[Sir Thomas, senior], late postmaster-general, 15.
Sir Thomas, Lord of the Admiralty, 14.
——, letters from, 12, 15.
Franklin, Dr. Benjamin, 115, 149, 152, 187, 253.
letter from, alluded to, 257.
work by, on Electricity, 441.
Fraser, Mrs., 216.
Frederick, Prince of Wales, son of George II., 12.
letters from, 12 (3), 22.
letters to, 11, 14 (2), 20.
warrant from, 20.
in relation to Dodington. See Dodington. persons said to have influence over, 16.
applications to, 20, 21.
proposal in relation to, discussed, 21.
death of, alluded to, 51.
treasurer of the chamber to. See Dodington.
Frederick, Duke of York and Albany, 278, 279, 304, 383.
Frederick Island, 229.
French or the French:
at Spa, 113.
massacre of, in Italy, 384.
expulsion of, from Spain and Portugal (in 1808), 230.
Corsican ports to be given up to (1756), 34.
eagerness of, to recover "the reputation of their arms," 43.

French, the—contd.
trade of, to the Levant, put a stop to, 43.
victory over (by Prince Ferdinand), 44. attacks of, on the English Colonies (1760), 46. expedition of, to the West Indies (1782), 328.
French:
Admiral, 413. And see D'Estaing, Galissonière, Terney.
Ambassador. See France, ambassador of.
arsenals, 119.
Colonies, 286. And see under their names.
Court. See France, Court of.
fleet or ships, 35, 119, 126, 145, 148-151, 153, 164, 166, 168, 169, 181 (2), 185, 235, 274, 290, 317, 318, 321, 322, 323, 326, 328, 352, 383 (2), 386, 390, 399, 401 (2), 402, 409, 410, 413, 414, 416.
——, Byng's fight with (1756), 34.
——, taken, 29.
——, Rodney's victory over, verses on, 332.
——, Cornwallis's "escape" from, 389.
——, blockade of, at Brest, 398, et seq.
——, Strachan's success against, 413.
——, aid of, desired in Ireland, 447.
garrisons, 291.
gold, 444.
Government or Ministry, 120, 198.
guards, 114, 115.
influence in Italy, 223.
invasion, feared, 70, 441, 446.
islands. See France, Islands of. language, books in, 33.
manifesto, 119.
merchants, 119.
ministers (of Louis XVI.), 129.
noblesse, at Spa, 159.
officers, prisoners in England, parole demanded by, 178.
troops or army, 120, 255, 407, 414, 428.
——, augmentation of, 116.
——, expected by the Americans, 183.
——, withdrawal of, from Madras, 345.
——, expected in the Mauritius, 366.
Frere, John Hookham, English envoy at Madrid, 401.
"Fribble, Mr.," 27.
Friendly societies, 213.
Frognal, Lord Townshend's house at, 303. 309.
Fuller, Mr., 155.
Fundy, bay of, 220, 222, 227.
Furnace, Mr., 312.

G

Gage, Lieut.-General Thomas, Governor of Massachusetts, 115, 117, 118 (2), 257, 258.
recall of, 121.
Galicia, Captain-General of, 408, 409.
Galissonière, French Admiral, 33.
Galloway, Mr., 327.
Galphin, Mr., 293.
Galvez, Don, 184, 188.
Galway, "rummaging" the monasteries in, 61.
Gambier, Vice-Admiral James, 153, 394, 415.
Garcia, Diego, navigation of, 351.
Gardiner:
(Gardner), Luke, 65.
——, motion of, in the Irish Parliament (1778), 235.
Mr., letter to, 20.
And see Gardner.
Gardner:
Capt. Alan, 126, 340, 364, 369.
——, as Rear-Admiral, 383, 421.
——, made a Lord of the Admiralty, 347, 352, 364.
Captain (1805), 413.
—, at Cork (1801), 394.
Garlies, Lord. See Stewart.
Garter, the (the Blue Ribbon), asked for or desired, 32, 186. promised to Lord Weymouth, 264.
Knights of, 433, 434.
chaplain of, 434.
Gascoigne, Bamber, member of the Board of Trade, 110, 253.
Gates, Major-General Horatio, defeat of, 326.
Gazette, the, 123-125, 128, 135, 136, 139, 140, 162, 169, 173-175, 180, 316, 324, 326, 329, 390.
Geary, Admiral Francis, successes of, 168.
squadron of, 169.
Geils, Lieut.-Colonel, praise of, 367.
Gell, Rear-Admiral John, 383.
Geneva, travellers to, 29, 33.
Genoa, republic of, 34.
George I., his approval of Sir George Byng, 2, 3.
difficulty of conversing with, 3.
return of, to England, expected, 4.
dines with Sir Robert Walpole, 4, 5.
at New Park, 5. rebellion in reign of (i.e., the rising of 1715), 16.
George, Prince of Wales, afterwards George II., 3.
George II. (the King), 12, 30, 67.
address to, alluded to, 60.
bust of, 321.
levée of, 33.
paper presented to, 23.

George II.—contd.
"a crowd of family" to meet, 12.
The Irish Parliament offer an address to, on his daughter's marriage, 60.
and the two parties at Court, 24.
visit of, to La Trappe, alluded to, 29.
graciousness of, to the Duke of Newcastle, 31, 32.
in relation to Fox and Dodington, 31, 32, 33, 40.
in relation to ministers and the administration, 31, 37-41.
interview of, with Henry Fox, 36.
in relation to Lord George Sackville, 44, 45.
as Head of the Church, 70.
death of, 47.
George, Prince of Wales, afterwards George III., suggested marriage for, 30.
memorial concerning, 22.
George III., casual mention of, passim.
answer of, to the Declaration of Vienna, alluded to, 114. audiences given by, 164, 165, 261, 262, 273, 303, 304, 331, 419. birthday of, 391, 397.
——, review on, 392.
cabinet of, 145, 153, 155, 162, 163, 169, 173, 260.
coronation oath of, 245.
court of, 313, 314, 323, 377.
drawing-room of, 285, 394.
favour solicited from, 47.
health of, 356, 360, 404. help of, solicited for New Brunswick, 227.
household of, 404.
——, Steward of. See Howard, Earl of Carlisle. inquiries by, 128.
letters of, alluded to, 137.
letters to, 193, 195, 197, 200, 214. levée of, 253, 272.
loyalty to, in Ireland, 179.
matters laid or to be laid before, 178, 311, 329, 419, 420.
measures of, opposition to, 313.
——, supported by Knox, 212.
ministers of. See Ministry.
note by, 181.
petition to, 288.
popularity of, 343.
ships reviewed by, 345, 381.
speech of, to his Cabinet, 260.
speeches of, alluded to, 48, 92.
tact or "minute strokes" of, 256.
wishes or pleasure of, 109, 138, 152, 183, 186, 188, 191, 202, 250, 255, 256, 314, 403, 426. in relation to:— the Admiralty, 130.
the American Colonies, 92, 97, 117, 128, 132, 133, 139, 140, 146-151, 154-158, 169, 172, 174, 257, 259, 272.
George III.—contd.
General Burgoyne, 139, 277.
Edmund Burke, 448.
Lord Bute, 53.
General Conway, 251, 252.
Hon. William Cornwallis, 329, 334, 335, 338.
William Eden, 266.
Lord George Germain, 256, 272, 276.
George Grenville, 252 (2), 253.
Lord Hillsborough, 261, 263, 264, 265.
Ireland, 76, 78.
William Knox, 184, 192, 193, 195-197, 200, 201, 283, 285, 286.
Governor Lyttelton, 91.
Lord Melcombe, 79. his Ministers, 254, 256, 260, 264, 272, 278, 280, 281, 329, 330, 372.
New Brunswick, 214.
Lord North, 267, 273-276.
William Pitt, 278.
the Prince of Wales, 204, 205.
the Regency Bill, 251, 252.
Lord Rochford, 253.
Lord Rockingham, 261.
Spain, 355, 362.
Wilkes' respectful speech of, 300.
promises Greenwich Hospital to Rodney, 305. his jealousy of his Ministers, 254.
meets his Cabinet (1779), 260.
regrets his consent to the repeal of the Stamp Act, ibid.
the King of Sweden's friendly feelings towards, 170, 210.
illness of, 278, 279, 347.
arrangements for his resuming the government on his recovery, 279.
recovery of (1789), 242, 343, 345.
visit of, to Hanover, anticipated, 344.
visit of, to Plymouth, 345.
cannot alter the constitution of a court-martial, 369.
illness of (1811), 426.
daughters of, visit of, to Plymouth, 345.
George, Prince of Wales, afterwards George IV., 210, 356.
Lord Rawdon's connexion with. See Rawdon. his relations with the King. See George III. proper behaviour of, 191.
in relation to the King's illness and the Regency, 204, 242, 278, 279.
as Prince Regent, a present from, 431.
Georgia, 156, 181, 183, 184, 188, 189, 193, 196, 210, 244, 246, 282, 292, 322.
Acts passed in, 248, 249.
agent or agency for, 82. And see Knox; see Martin.

Georgia—contd.
agent for Indian affairs in, 84.
Assembly of, 82, 105, 156, 211, 246-249.
——, Speaker of. See Little, Wm.
Attorney-General for. See Clifton.
Council of, 86, 246-250.
——, clerk of. See Habersham.
Englishman gone out to, 444, 445. expense of living in, 84.
governors of. See Reynolds, John; Ellis, Henry; Wright, Sr. James.
improvements carried out by Knox in, 210, 211.
Knox's estate in, 121, 276.
Lord George Germain's plans concerning, 126. people of, 245 et seq., 288.
——, their attitude towards England, 291.
——, their burning of Knox in effigy, alluded to, 440.
petition for absence from, 106.
proceedings in, account of, 245-250.
——, in relation to finance, &c., 210, 211.
Provost Marshal of. See Knox, William. scouts in, 293.
successes in, 158.
Treasurer of, 211.
Germain, Lord George (formerly Lord Geo. Sackville, q. v.), Secretary for the Colonies (1775-82), afterwards Lord Sackville, 127, 149, 156, 162, 163, 167, 181, 198, 237, 268.
certificate by, 193.
draft by, of letter concerning Burgoyne's army, 290.
letters from, 122-145, 149-157, 160-162, 164-169, 171-181, 183, 185 187, 189 (2), 191 (2), 192 (3), 238.
letters to, 182, 294.
influence of, desired, 448.
instructions of, alluded to, 150.
matters related to, by the King, 261.
offices of, 256.
report of, concerning the American War, 275.
speech of, in reply to Sir Wm. Howe, alluded to, 262.
his appointment as Secretary for the Colonies, or American Secretary, 256.
in relation to America, 133, 143, 145, 146, 157, 160, 174, 228, 259, 275, 276.
Lord Howe's dislike to, 315. is to take the lead in the management of the American War, 314.
a great friend of Ireland, 236.
attacks upon, in the House of Commons, 164.
his account of a Cabinet meeting, 260, 261.
Germain, Lord George—contd.
plan for removal of, alluded to, 261.
opposition of, to Lord Hillsborough, 265. his dislike of William Eden, 266. speaks to the King concerning Lord North, 267.
in relation to Hussey's mission to Spain, 268, 269.
in relation to the Howes, 276, 277.
ceases to be Secretary, and is raised to the peerage as Lord Sackville, 183, 328.
removal of, account of, 272-276.
——, alluded to, 184.
his time of office alluded to, 195.
account of his death-bed, 193, 194.
son of, 192.
daughter of, marriage of, alluded to, 180.
children of, 194.
Germans in the United States, 226.
Germany, 23, 194, 297. affairs in, 384, 394.
Empress of. See Maria Teresa.
in connexion with the American Colonies, 230.
liberties of, 46.
politics of, 47.
posts to England from, stopped, 223.
war in, 52, 287.
Upper, troops marching from, 193.
Ghauts, the, 359, 378, 379.
Ghazepore, 417.
Gibraltar, 44, 125, 159, 160, 164, 172, 189, 269, 297, 299, 323, 337, 396, 399, 402, 407.
anxiety concerning, 2.
English fleet at, 34.
letter dated at, 310.
Straits of, 145.
Gillet, Mr., 386.
Glamorganshire, militia of, 47.
Glastonbury, Lord. See Grenville, James.
Glegg, Mr., son of chief magistrate of Montrose, 354.
Gloucester, William Henry, Duke of, announces his marriage, 108.
Gloucester, Dean of. See Tucker, Dr.
Glover:
Captain, 314.
R., letter from, 35.
Goa, in India, 374.
Godolphin, Sidney, Lord, Lord Treasurer, allusion to, 91.
Goldsworthy, —, 342.
Good Hope, Cape of, 351, 352.
Goodwin, Sir Robert, Commissioner for Ireland, 438.
Goran Castle, letter dated at, 436.
commander of, refuses to surrender it, 436.
Gordon:
the Duchess of, balls and dinners given by, 426.
Lieutenant, 421.
Mrs., 429.

Gore, John, letters from, 381, 417.
Gosselin, Captain, 388, 405 (2).
Grabowski [Gabarowsky], Colonel, 132.
Grafton, Duke of. See Fitzroy.
Grainge, letter dated from, 199.
Granard, family of, 242.
Grant :
Major-General James, 158.
Mr. Robert, 340.
Grantham, Lord. See Robinson, Thomas.
Granville, Earl of. See Carteret.
Grasse, Comte de, French Admiral, 179, 184, 185.
(Le Grass), squadron of, 177. verses on the fight with, 332.
Grattan, Henry, 239, 242.
Graves [Greaves], Admiral, 166-168, 180.
letter from, 182.
conduct of, discussed, 181, 182.
Gravina, French Admiral, 413.
Gray. See Grey.
Great Britain :
effect of Treaty of Peace (1763) on, 286.
fishermen of, 208.
nation of, praised by the King of Sweden, 170.
right of, to tax the Colonies, affirmed or discussed, 96, 118, 444.
trade of, in connexion with Ireland, 237, 238.
Great Seal, the, 133.
office of, 281.
Greaves, Admiral. See Graves.
Greece, art of, 10, 11.
Greek authors, alluded to, 32.
Greeks, Christian, importation of, to Florida, discussed, 292.
Greene [General Nathaniel], American commander, 177. his army, 181.
Greenland bounty, 232.
Greenwich :
letters dated at, 126, 419, 423.
Hospital (the hospital), promised to Sir George Byng, 3.
——, promised to Rodney, 305.
——, auditorship of, 266.
Royal College at, letter dated from, 395.
Gregg, Mr., 375, 376.
Grenada, 155.
loss of, alluded to, 320.
Grenadines, the, 123.
Grenan Castle, letter dated from, 436.
governor of, demands better terms, 436.
Grenville :
George, letters from, 94, 95, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 103, 104 (3), 106.
——, letter to, 89.
——, speech of, published without his consent, 104.
——, as treasurer of the navy, 45.
——, when First Lord of the Treasury [1763-5], 90, 91, 250-253, 280-281, 304.
——, administration of, alluded to, 121.
——, ——, end of, alluded to, 263.
—— Knox's connexion with, 90, 195, 283.
——, praise of, 90, 94, 95, 442.
——, his views on the taxation of the Colonies, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 104.
——, notice from, to the merchants, alluded to, 240.
——, in relation to Ireland, 241.
——, conversation with, 250.
——, his loyalty to his friends, 270.
——, death of, alluded to, 268.
——, brother of. See Richard Grenville, Lord Temple, below.
——, son of, 104.
George, Lord Temple, afterwards Marquis of Buckingham, 191 (2), 199.
——, letters to, 240, 241.
——, made Lord Lieutenant of Ireland [1782], 186, 189.
——, appoints his brother (William Wyndham Grenville), his secretary, 187.
——, as Marquis of Buckingham and (again) Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, letter from, 241.
——, his unpopularity, 242.
——, his return from Ireland, 278.
James, Lord Glastonbury, 434.
——, brother of, ibid.
Richard, Earl Temple, 37, 38, 251.
——, letters from, 124, 143.
——, as George Grenville's brother, 95.
——, expected not to live long, 281.
William Wyndham, afterwards Lord Grenville, letters from, 346, 354 (2), 355 (2), 362.
——, ——, alluded to, 360-362, 374.
——, letter to, 200.
——, made Chief Secretary for Ireland, 187.
——, as Secretary of State, 360, 361, 365.
Grenvilles, the, 418.
Gresdale, Surveyor, 56.
Gresson, Mr., his house at Dublin, 445 (2).
Grey :
the Hon. Charles, Commissioner of the Admiralty, 419, 428, 429.
——, letters from, 420 (3), 421.
General, 189.
——, declaration of, as to causes of failure of the American War, 263.
Grey, de. See De Grey.
Grimaldi, resignation of, alluded to, 127 (2).

Grosvenor :
Richard, Lord, afterwards Earl of, 89, 165.
——, visit of, to France, 282.
Mr., 165.
Mr. and Mrs., 94.
——, their daughter, ibid.
family of, 165.
Grove, the, letter dated from, 95.
Guadaloupe, victory at, 43.
Guémenée, or Guimenée :
Prince of, 112.
Princess of, 158.
Guicciardini, works of, alluded to, 33.
Guichen, Comte de, French Admiral, 166 (2).
fleet of, 168.
Guildford, Earl of. See North.
Guzzelhatty (or Gudgereddy) Pass, 359.

H

Habersham, Mr., Clerk of the Council in Georgia, 249.
Haddington, Earl of. See Hamilton, Thomas.
Hagley Park, letters dated at, 136, 187, 194-196, 213, 216, 217, 223, 226.
Hague, the, Prussian minister at, 200.
Haldane, —, with Lord Cornwallis in India, 378, 379.
Haldimand, General Frederick, accepts the government of Quebec, &c., 137, 138. cannot reach Quebec this winter, 139.
as Governor and Commander-in-Chief in Canada, 151 (3), 160, 175 (2), 284. conduct of, blamed, 169.
writes "volumes on the subject of economy," 295.
letters from, 294, 295.
letter to, 295.
papers sent to, 294.
Halifax, Lord. See Dunk Montagu.
Halifax, Nova Scotia, 144, 151, 227.
the French fleet going to, 322. island at, 309.
ships to or from, 100, 127, 149, 317.
Hambledon, manor of, co. Bucks, 16.
Hamburg, letters sent by, 223.
Hamilton :
Lady Archibald, 16.
Sir Charles, 405.
Lieut.-Governor [Henry], made prisoner [at Fort Sackville], 160.
——, recommendation of, 240.
Itta, petition of, 16.
——, father of. See Hamilton, James.
James, death of [in 1732], alluded to, 15.
Hamilton—contd.
James [killed in 1715], daughter of. See Hamilton, Itta.
——, wife of, 16.
James, Viscount Limerick, 69, 70.
John, Lord Belhaven, 15.
John, son of the Earl of Haddington, 15.
Mrs., 111.
Thomas, Earl of Haddington, letter from, 15. or Hambledon, Sir William de, 16.
Hammersmith, 31.
Dodington's house at. See La Trappe.
letters dated from, 28, 43.
Hammond :
Sir Anthony Snape, superseded [as Comptroller of the Navy], 419.
Captain, 400, 428.
Edward, refuses to surrender Goran, 436.
Hampshire, 364.
Hampton Court Palace, rooms in, desired, 434.
Hanau, treaty of, alluded to, 19.
Hancock [Handcock], John, a warrant to be issued for his apprehension, 270.
Hanover : defence of, 45.
George III. expected at, 344.
payments for, 252.
treaties concerning, alluded to, 32.
Hanoverian army, or troops, 43, 257.
Harcourt, Simon, Earl Harcourt, Governor to George, Prince of Wales, 22.
——, resignation of, 23.
——, as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, 232, 240.
——, letter to, 126.
Hardy, Sir Charles, Admiral, 322.
fleet of, 160 (2).
Hargood, Captain, 401.
Harland, Sir Robert, Captain and Admiral, 320. is taking a squadron to the East Indies, 264.
made a Lord of the Admiralty, 329.
Harmood, Harry, 39.
Harold, Edmund, Baron, letter from, 115.
Harrington, Earl of. See Stanhope.
Harris :
Sir James [ambassador at St. Petersburg], 271.
——, despatches from, alluded to, 272.
Mr., member of the Council of Georgia, 249.
Harrison, William, letter from, 62.
Hartington, Lord. See Cavendish.
Hartley [David, the younger], in relation to the American negotiations, 152. has "re-inforced faction," 154.

Harvey, General, 128, 134, 135.
Hastings, said to be an odious place, 434.
Hastings :
Francis, Earl of Huntingdon, 27, 204.
Archdeacon Thomas, letters from, 241, 242, 243.
——, in relation to the Knox family, 441, 444, 445.
——, is a great giver, 444.
Haughton (Horton), co. Northampton, Lord Halifax's house, 44.
letters dated at, 32, 36.
Havanna, or Havannah, the, 159, 168.
letters from, intercepted, 164, 322.
Haverfordwest, Members of Parliament for, 212.
Havre, papers relating to, wanted, 162.
Hawke, Admiral Sir Edward, 35, 73.
orders from, alluded to, 29.
accepts office of First Lord of the Admiralty, 264.
Hawkesbury, Lord. See Jenkinson.
Hawkshaw, Mr., his son George, 445.
Hawley, General, paper sent to, 23.
dragoons of, 61.
Hay :
Thomas, Viscount Dupplin [afterwards Earl of Kinnoull], letter to, 34.
Mr., 270.
Hayes, Mr., 380.
Hayter, Thomas, Bishop of Norwich, Preceptor to George, Prince of Wales, 22.
resignation of, 23.
Heaven, Milton's description of, alluded to, 230.
Hebrides, the, "colonizing" of, proposed, 291.
Heigelin, Christian, Danish consul, 224.
Helvoetsluys, packet of, 149.
Hemp and Flax, importation of, 292, 293.
Henley, Robert, Earl of Northington, and Lord Chancellor, 54, 159, 281.
Henry VI., King, 99.
Henry VII., Parliament of, alluded to, 76.
Henry Frederick, Duke of Cumberland, and his Duchess, are forbidden the Court, 313.
Hensol [co. Glamorgan], letters dated at, 45, 46, 48.
Herbert :
Captain (?), 314.
[Henry Arthur, of Muckross], marriage of, to Lord George Germain's daughter, 180.
Heron, Sir Richard [Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland], 156, 198, 235, 238, 239. goes to England, 236.
letters from, 234 (4), 237.
Heron, Sir Richard—contd.
correspondence with, alluded to, 199.
nephew of, made Dean of Cork, 156.
Herschel, Dr. William, letter to, 230.
letter from, 231.
Hertford, Congress removes to, 168.
Hertford, Earl and Marquis of. See Seymour.
Hervey, Captain or Admiral, 304, 314.
Hesse, Princess of, son of, 255.
Hessian :
General, 167.
——, demand of, 125.
troops, 123, 131, 153, 157, 257, 270.
——, clothing for, 135.
——, loss of, 129.
Highland transport, 124.
Hill :
Rowland, Lord, 432.
——, said to be going to America, 433.
Wills, Viscount, and [in 1751] Earl of Hillsborough, 41, 69, 239, 257, 271, 276, 280, 285.
——, letters from, 19, 39, 51, 108. 125, 128, 163, 188, 189, 193.
——, letter to, 18.
——, certificate of, in favour of William Knox, 193.
——, marriage of [1747], 69.
——, papers sent to, 238.
——, praise of, 443.
——, as comptroller to George II., 32.
——, as President of the Board of Trade, 256, 263, 264.
——, dismissal of, from the Board of Trade, 281.
——, as [joint] Postmaster-General, 241.
——, appointment of, as Secretary of State for the Colonies in 1768, alluded to, 264.
——, as Secretary of State for the Colonies, 95, 97, 101, 105-107, 183.
——, his resignation [1772], 108, 109.
——, ——, circumstances of, 253.
——, suggested as Secretary of State, 261.
——, his appointment as Secretary of State [1779], alluded to, 164 (2).
——, hopes of, for appointment as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, 264, 265.
——, his strivings for popularity (1780), 165.
Hill, letter dated from, 3.
Hill Park, Lord Hillsborough's house, letters dated from, 125, 128.
Hillsborough :
Earl of. See Hill, Wills.
Lady, 263.
letters dated at, 19, 108, 163, 188 189, 193.

Hinchinbrooke, Lord Sandwich's seat, 315.
letter dated at, 313.
Hindoos, customs of, Lord Macartney's acquaintance with, 212.
Hippesley, Mr., 380.
Hispaniola, troops at, 188.
Hoare :
Henry, grandson of Lord Lyttelton, 227.
Lady Hester, daughter of Lord Lyttelton, death of, 194.
Sir Richard Colt, husband of the preceding, 194 n.
——, infant son of, death of, 194.
Mr., banker, 309.
Hobart :
John, Earl of Buckinghamshire, appointment of, as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, alluded to, 265.
——, as Lord Lieutenant, 165, 234, 235, 237-240.
——, his encouragement of the malcontents, 447.
Robert, Lord, 217, 218, 226.
—, 210.
Hobartstown, proposed name of, for seat of new church, 218.
Hodgson :
Robert, letter from Charlotte Town signed by, 219.
Mr., plan of, 210.
Holdernesse, Lord. See Darcy, Robert.
Holland :
Admiral of, 165.
ambassador from, in England, 193.
ambassador to, post of, coveted by Eden, 261.
English forces serving in, 383.
fishermen in, 232.
fleet or ships of, 179, 328, 334, 374, 407.
States General of, assembly of, 255.
——, neutrality of, 165.
in relation to England, 177, 274, 365, 369.
rupture with (the Dutch business), in 1780, 173, 271, 272.
war with, 336.
preparations in, for war [1784], 193.
Holland, Lord. See Fox, Henry.
Hollond, Mr., removal of, from the Council of Bengal, 357.
Holroyd, John Baker, Lord Sheffield, letter from, 191.
Homer, "The Iliads" of, alluded to, 49.
Hood :
Sir Alexander, 355.
——, letter from, 361.
——, as Lord Bridport, defeats the French fleet, 390.
Lady, death of, 423.
Sir Samuel, afterwards Lord Hood, admiral, 178, 179, 329.
Hood, Sir Samuel—contd.
——, letters from, 327, 345, 351, 355, 363, 364, 371, 372, 379, 388, 395, 419, 423.
——, Admiralty letter signed by, 358.
——, rear-admiral in the fight with De Grasse, 332.
——, to be made an Irish peer, 334, 335 (2).
——, as Lord Hood, his Parliamentary election, 339.
——, as commander of Baltic squadron, 365, 369.
——, at sea [1792], 381, 382.
——, to command in the Mediterranean, 383.
——, his fleet, movements of, 384.
——, Bastia taken by, 388.
——, objects to the blockade of Brest, [in 1801], 395.
——, in relation to Admiral Cornwallis, 421, 422.
——, at Bath, "above 90 years of age," 433.
Samuel, 395.
Sir Samuel [1806], 419.
Hook, the. See Sandy Hook.
Hope, Captain, 424.
Hopkins, Richard, to be a Lord of the Admiralty, 329.
Horace, odes of, alluded to, 9, 10.
imitated, 9, 10.
Hore, Mr., ship's master, 308.
Hort, Dr., Josiah, made canon of Windsor, 50.
as Bishop of Kilmore, letters from, 60, 61, 63 (2).
Horton, house of the Earl of Halifax. See Haughton.
Hotham :
[Sir Charles], M.P., in Yorkshire, 15.
William, Commodore, afterwards Admiral, 143, 355, 369.
——, the Admiralty offered to, 347.
——, as Lord Hotham, 428, 431.
Houghton, Lieutenant, 296.
Howard :
Frederick, Earl of Carlisle, 155, 212, 265.
——, as Commissioner to America (1778), 266, 267, 277.
——, as head of the Board of Trade, 268.
——, as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, 239, 240.
——, to be made Steward of the Household, 331.
——, speech of, alluded to, 374.
Henry, Earl of Suffolk, Secretary of State, 109, 122, 130, 135, 145, 153, 154, 254, 256, 257, 266, 268.
——, George Grenville visits, 106.
——, at the Council Office, 110.
——, Lord G. Germain offers his resignation to, 141, 142.
——, secretary of, 122.

Howe:
Richard, Viscount, afterwards Earl Howe, letters from, 318, 339, 340 (2), 350, 372, 389, 391.
——, appointed as commander-in-chief of the fleet on the American station, 314.
——, as naval commander in America, 132, 143, 151.
——, hatred of, for Lord Sandwich and Lord George Germain, 315.
——, as commissioner to the American Colonies (1776), 133, 258.
——, ——, instructions for, 289.
——, allows rich prizes to pass unmolested, 131, 137.
——, in relation to D'Estaing and his fleet, 148, 150, 317.
——, movements of fleet under, at Sandy Hook and Rhode Island, 317.
——, as much respected as ever, 230.
——, not noticed at court, 323.
——, to be an English peer, and have the home fleet, 331.
——, in England (1778), 153, 330.
——, criticism of his conduct, 153.
——, inquiry concerning. See Sir William, below.
——, suggested for the Admiralty, 261.
——, Keppel's resignation would be acceptable to, 186.
——, in command in the Channel (1782), 187, 189, 335.
——, fleet of, "many ships short," 186.
——, is blocking the Dutch in the Texel, 334.
——, is "going out" (1789), 342.
——, the Queen Charlotte fitting for, 355.
——, in charge of the grand fleet, 364.
——, in connexion with William Cornwallis, 354, 421.
——, illness of, 369.
——, to command the Channel fleet (1793), 383.
Sir William, [Major] General in America, 121, 122.
——, as commander-in-chief, 128, 130–132, 136, 141, 142, 143 (2).
——, appointment of, approved, 260.
——, army of, 128, 137, 139, 140.
——, success of, alluded to, 316.
——, as Commissioner to the American Colonies (1776), 133, 258.
——, ——, letter to, alluded to, 126.
——, ——, instructions for, 289.
——, movements of, 135, 138, 139, 141, 270.
——, conduct of, discussed, 134, 138.
——, thanks his officers (1777), 132.
——, in relation to General Burgoyne, 277.
——, enquiry concerning his and Lord Howe's conduct, before the House of Commons, alluded to, 320, 447.
——, is a hero in Ulster, 447.
——, papers desired by [for the inquiry of 1779], 156.
——, his character has suffered by the inquiry, 320.
——, letter from, alluded to, 134.
——, letter to, alluded to, 144.
——, ——, draft of, 290.
——, anecdote about, 262.
Lady, 333.
Howth, Hill of, Ireland, 56.
Hudson River, 137, 147.
march towards, 153.
Hughes:
[Captain ?], 314.
Lady, 340.
Hull, Kingston-upon-, 405.
bank at, 382.
Hungary:
Francis, King of, 380.
Queen of. See Maria Teresa.
Huntingdon, 314.
Earl of. See Hastings.
Huske,—, 279, 280.
Hussey, Thomas, mission of, to Spain, 268, 269.
Hutchins, Captain Thomas, arrest of, 161.
letters from, 163 (2).
Hutchinson:
—, 380.
Thomas, Governor of Massachussets Bay, 113, 257.
Hyde Park, disputes in, 186.

I

Idle, Mr., 229.
Ilay, or Isla, Earl of. See Campbell.
Ilchester, Lord and Lady. See Strangways.
Imperial:
Ambassador to France, 116.
Court. See Vienna, Court of.
troops, movements of, 193.
Income tax, war rate of, 217.
Indemnity, Acts of, alluded to, 245, 369.
India, or East Indies, 120, 342. affairs of, letters in relation to, 344–350, 356–362, 366–368, 370–379, 384–387.
Commander-in-Chief [at sea], and other Naval officers in, 371. And see Cornwallis, Admiral William.
Company. See East Indian Co.

India—contd.
convoy for, 328.
Durbar in, 350.
English successes in, 119. And see Cornwallis, Earl.
fever in, 301.
Governor and Commander-in-Chief in. See Cornwallis, Earl.
a King's port needed in, 365.
Naval command in, no alteration to be made in, 342.
ships (Indiamen), 345, 370.
——or squadron sent to, 264, 341, 348, 355, 362, 363.
——, to be assembled at Bombay, 361 (2).
English forces in, or Indian army, 355 (2).
——, new regulations for, 388.
——, to be spared from, 354, 355, 361.
war in, 362, 372, 434. And see Tippoo; Mahrattas; Cornwallis.
Admiral Cornwallis wishes to leave, 364.
Marquis Cornwallis returns to, 406, and dies there, 417.
India Bill, opposition to, 207.
Indian (i.e., North American Indian): affairs, agent for, in Georgia. See Georgia.
——, Superintendent of. See Atkin.
department, Superintendent and Inspector General of, 295.
Indian seas, 355.
Indians, or North American Indians, the, 250, 253. assistance of, desired, 172.
Haldimand's account of, 175.
war with, 85.
Western rebellion of, 123.
tribes:
Chactaws, 158.
Chehaws, 293.
Chickasaws, 158.
Cherokees, 85, 86.
Creeks, 84, 85, 86, 158.
Cussitas, 293.
presents for, 167.
——, papers relating to, 293–296.
their name for the lion, 62.
Influenza, epidemic of, 216, 217.
Ingham, Rector of, 318.
Inverary, letter dated at, 4.
Ipswich, 404.
Ireland, 12, 110, 126, 275, 278, 392, 393, 410, 427.
account of, by Lord Rockingham, 261, 262. affairs of, letters and papers in relation to, 52, 55–80, passim; 231–245, passim; 440–449, passim.
——, are in a deplorable state, 236, 446, 447.
——, William Knox's connexion with. See Knox. assistance from, hoped for, 288.
Ireland—contd.
Attorney-General for. See Jocelyn, Robert; Tisdall, Philip; Scott, John; Fitzgibbon, John.
bankers of, 244.
banks in, 61.
——, stoppage of, 72, 74. And see Burton.
Bishops of, 244.
Chancellor of Exchequer in. See Boyle, Henry; Malone, Anthony.
the Church in, owes gratitude to Knox, 243.
Commander-in-Chief in. See Burgoyne, General.
——, post of, rumoured appointment to, 423.
Commissioners for (1660), 438.
Committee in, 234.
Common Pleas, Court of, 57.
——, Chief Justice of, value of his office, 59.
Constitution of, proposals concerning, 238.
Council of, 55, 57, 75, 76.
——, business before, 58, 59, 78.
——, deputy clerk of, 63.
Cromwell and his army in, 435–439.
Customs in, Acts of, 233.
——, debt of, 447.
——, commissioners and collectors of, 62.
discontent in, 446–449. distress in, 111, 443.
disturbance in, alluded to, 168.
election in, 232.
Exchequer of, 57.
——, Chief Baron of. See Marlay, Thomas; Bowes, John.
——, Barons of. See Wainwright, John; St. Leger, Sir John.
——, ——, income of, 59.
——, deputy Remembrancer of, 59.
financial suggestions for, 211.
fisheries in, 126, 231, 232 (2), 233.
——, proposal concerning, 208.
imports or exports of, 233–236, 243.
——, duties on, 232–234.
invasion of, feared, 446, 447.
independency desired by, 447.
King's Bench, Court of, 59.
——, Lord Chief Justice of. See Caulfield.
Lord Chancellor of. See West, John; Wyndham, Thomas, Lord; Jocelyn, Robert; Bowes, John.
Lord Hillsborough's estate in, 265.
Lord Justices of (1734), 62: (1760), 75, 76.
Lord Lieutenant of. See Sackville, Duke of Dorset; Cavendish, Duke of Devonshire; Stanhope, Earl of Chesterfield; Russell, Duke of Bedford; Dunk-Montagu, Earl of Halifax; Harcourt, Lord; Hobart Earl of Buckinghamshire; Bentinck, Duke of Portland; Grenville, Marquis of Buckingham.

Ireland—contd.
——, office of, vacant, 68, 264.
——, ——, argument concerning, 265.
——, secretary to, 239.
loyalty of, 179.
luxury and dissipation in, 239.
manufactures of, 234.
Master of the Rolls in. See Carter, Thomas; Singleton, Henry.
National Bank for, scheme for, 240 (2), 244.
Parliaments of:
(1731-60), 56-61, 64-66, 69-71, 73-76.
(1776) 231-233.
(1778) 234.
(1780) 238, 239.
(1781) 239.
(1789) 242, 243.
——, Acts or Bills in, alluded to, 57, 59, 75, 77, 80, 232-235.
——, —— money bills, 244.
——, ——, Septennial Bill, 52, 80.
——, ——. See also Pension Bill.
——, Committees of, 65, 66.
——, journals of, alluded to, 58.
——, money voted by, for the Lord Lieutenant, 73.
——, petition to, from the merchants, to be considered in Committee, 74.
——, House of Lords, or Upper House, proceedings in, 55, 57, 63, 69, 242 (2), 244.
—— —— adjournment of, 57.
—— —— books to be given to, 241.
—— —— expected addition of six members to, 243.
——, House of Commons, proceedings in, 52, 55-61, 66, 71, 76, 78, 232, 234, 235, 238, 239, 242-244.
——, ——, has sat all the holidays, 57.
——, ——, Speaker of (1734), 62; (1778), 234.
Pells office, Dodington's deputy in. See Love, Joseph.
——, clerk of, 65.
pensions in, 447.
plans for improvement of, 211, 236.
Presbyterians in, 443, 446.
priests in, scheme for limiting the number of, 69.
Primate of. See Boulter, Hugh; Stone, George.
Prime Serjeant of. See Singleton, Henry; Burgh, Walter Hussey.
proposals for the government of, 237.
prosperity of, 210.
Protestant dissenters in, discussion concerning, 69.
—— ——, their threatenings against England, 447.
Protestant ministers. See Ulster.
——, religion in, a scheme very useful to, 60.
Protestants in, bill for securing the titles of, 63.
Receiver-General in, 65.
rents in, 171.
Revenue Board of, 56.
——, commissioner on. See Medlycott.
Revenue office in, 82.
Roman Catholic Bishop in, 60.
——, priest, rescue of, ibid.
Roman Catholics of, supposed mischief brewing by, ibid.
—— ——, Bill for Relief of, alluded to, 235.
Secretary for. See Campbell, Lord Frederick; Heron, Sir Richard; Eden, William; Grenville, W. W.; Orde, Thomas.
Solicitor-General of. See Bowes, John; Carleton, Hugh; Ryder, Sir Dudley. state of, paper on, 231.
sympathy with America in, 447.
tithes in, 243.
trade of, 233-235, 237, 238, 243, 244, 258.
——, Acts or Bills concerning, alluded to, 233, 236, 237.
——, almost annihilated, 447.
——, papers on, 233, 237.
——, resolutions concerning, 238.
——, with Great Britain, 199, 262.
——, with the Colonies, 199, 221.
travellers to or from, 13, 96, 239.
Treasury of, 70.
—— order of 62.
troops from, 123, 127.
the "Union business" in 393.
Vicar-Apostolic in, 245.
Vice-Treasurer of, 65.
Ireton, Major-General Henry, letter to, 435.
Irish:
absentees, tax on estates of, proposed, 237.
brigade, the, 439.
business, the, meeting of Council on, 274.
fishermen, 208.
mails and packets, routes of, 241.
merchants and factors, 243, 244.
notes, 211.
peasants, poverty of, 236.
people at Spa, 135.
publications, effect of, on the people, 239.
regiment, in Staffordshire, 431.
Roman Catholics in Canada, 289. sailors, 400.
ships, should be declared English to all legal intents, 232.
soldiers, in the French army, 120.
spirits, or malt spirits, 233.

Irvine, or Irwine:
Sir John, 125, 142.
Mr., 171.
Italian language, the, books in, 33.
Italy, 2, 23.
Court of, 223.
English post stopped in, 223.
massacre of French in, 384.
peace in, 43 (2).
the Pope's Jubilee in, 112.
travellers to, 10, 26, 29.

J

Jackson.
Mr. Warde, intended marriage of, to Elizabeth Cornwallis, alluded to, 397.
——, engagement of, broken off, 400.
Mr., named as Commissioner for American Colonies, 258.
Jacobite, a, 16.
Jacobitism, preceptor of Prince of Wales accused of, 22.
Jamaica, island of, 120, 158, 164, 166–168, 175, 185, 303, 316, 322, 323, 330, 337, 381.
anxiety concerning the safety of, 162, 180, 188, 333.
assembly of, in relation to Governor Lyttelton, 90–92.
calamity in (1784), 340.
Captain Cornwallis at, or going to, 308, 320–322, 325.
Clerk of the Courts in, 254.
Council of, 90, 155.
General Assembly of, 89.
government of, 4, 5, 89.
Governor of, 209. And see Lyttelton, W. H.; Dalling, John; Campbell, Sir Archibald.
——, salary of, 188.
import tax in, 220.
letters dated from, 88, 90 (2), 91, 92. And see Spanish Town.
letters addressed to, 313, 314, 320, 321.
moneys to be repaid by, 164.
negroes in, 188.
ships or fleet of, 140, 153, 160, 177.
troops to be sent to, 155, 162, 166.
James I., King, time of, alluded to, 99.
James, Lieut.-Colonel, of the Artillery, report brought by, 121.
Jarvis. See Jervis.
Jenkinson, Charles, 134, 135, 137, 177.
"the Secretary at War," 167.
suggested as successor to Lord George Germain, 273, 276.
office held by [? at the Mint], 192.
as Lord Hawkesbury, 201, 401.
letter to, 208.
is able, but disliked, 201.
as Earl of Liverpool, at a Committee of the Privy Council, 215.
Jersey or the Jerseys, in North America, 141, 153, 171, 257.
Washington's army in, 134.
abortive expedition to ("that ridiculous parade"), 147.
Jervis (Jarvis):
Captain Sir John, afterwards Admiral and Earl St. Vincent, 337, 338.
——, made a Knight of the Bath, 335
——, his flag flying, 355.
——, is not to be employed, 369.
——, as Earl St. Vincent, 402, 425.
——, as Admiralty Commissioner, signature of, 399.
——, letters from, 394–397, 417–419, 425, 428.
——, suggested as First Lord of the Admiralty, 418.
——, in command of the Channel fleet, 419, 420.
——, said to be "selfish and dangerous," 422.
Captain W. H., 398.
——, letters from, 402, 403.
Jesuits, the, 117.
Moravians compared with, 444.
Jocelyn, Robert, Attorney-General for Ireland, letters from, 65 (2).
as Lord Chancellor of Ireland, letter from, 68.
Johnny Grote's house in Scotland, 419.
Johnson:
Colonel, 294.
Guy, Superintendent of the Indians, 294.
Sir John, 294, 295 (2).
Johnston or Johnstone:
Governor George, 152, 155, 323.
——, letter from, 158.
——, protest of, alluded to, 144.
Mr., paymaster at Trinchinopoly, frauds by, 358.
Jones:
Paul, adventurer, expected capture of, 162.
Sir Theophilus, troops "to be regimented by," 438.
Rev. —, application on behalf of, for a canonry of Windsor, 50.
Juliers, officers in, 16.
Jupiter, the planet, rate of rotation of, 230, 231.
Jutland, coast of, 395.

K

Kedjezee, Lord Cornwallis goes to, 386, 387.
Keith:
  Lord. See Elphinstone.
  Sir Basil, 135.
  Sir Robert Murray, Ambassador to Vienna, 123, 271.
Kelly, Captain, 340.
Kennebiche, the river, 230.
Kensington, Lord. See Edwardes, William.
Kensington Gore, letters dated from, 195 (2).
Kent, coast of, 383.
Kent:
  Sir Charles, estate of, 343.
  [William], design of, for Marlborough's monument, 10.
Ken-wood, Lord Leicester at, 41.
Keppel:
  Admiral the Hon. Augustus, afterwards Viscount Keppel, 308 (2), 310, 319, 322.
  ——, letters from, 307, 338 (2), 339 (2).
  ——, ——, alluded to, 145.
  ——, (Commander-in-Chief of the grand fleet, 1778), 144, 150 (2), 152.
  ——, ——, fleet of, 149.
  ——, suggested for the Admiralty, 261.
  ——, unpopularity of (1779), 320, 322.
  ——, First Lord of Admiralty, 329, 330, 335.
  ——, peerage conferred on, 331.
  ——, as Lord Keppel, speaks in the House of Lords, 335.
  ——, names a Commander for the East Indies, 337.
  ——, Lord Sackville hopes he will not resign, 186.
  [Lady Elizabeth], sister of the Admiral, marries Lord Tavistock, 310.
  William Anne, Earl of Albemarle, footman of, 16.
Kerr, William John, Marquis of Lothian, dismissal of, 343. daughters of, ibid.
Kew, meeting at, 54 (2).
—— Lane, letters dated from, 123–126, 134, 135, 137–139, 149–151.
Kieffer, Mr., 249.
Kildare, Lord. See Fitzgerald, James.
Kilkenny, letters dated from, 437 articles of surrender of, ibid.
Kilkenny, governor of. See Butler, Walter; Axtell, Col. Daniel.
  mayor and aldermen of, letter to, 437.
  county of, payments in, ibid.
Killaloe, bishopric of, 156.
Killidar, the. See Bangalore, Killidar of.
Kilmore, Bishop of. See Hort, Josiah.
Kiltenan, letter dated at, 436.
  surrender of the castle of, ibid.
King:
  Captain, 379.
  Captain E. Dunford, of the Endymion, 409.
  Mr., 241, 242 (2).
  Admiral Sir Richard, 355, 369.
  ——, letter from, 379.
Kingdom, Mr., Secretary at the Navy office. 392.
King's Bridge, American forces at and driven from, 126. 128.
Kingsmill, Captain Robert Brice, 369.
Kingston, Jamaica, 340.
Knole Park, the Duke of Dorset's seat, 125.
  letters dated from, 126, 141, 142.
Knowles, Sir Charles, 314.
Knox:
  James, brother of William, 441, 442.
  ——, wife of, money for, 445, 446.
  ——, ——, her brother Tom, 446.
  ——, children of, 441, 444, 445. And see Thomas, below.
  Letitia, wife of William, 92, 94 (2), 95, 102, 105 (2), 107, 108, 173, 197.
  ——, her marriage, 440.
  ——, her gift to the weavers of Fintona, 443.
  ——, pension granted to, 209.
  ——, father of, 108.
  Robert [brother of William], 125, 414.
  ——, letter to, 85.
  ——, recommended as agent for the Linen Board, 126.
  ——, his "pretensions at Bristol," 96.
  ——, death of, 190.
  [Thomas], brother of William, death of, 83.
  Thomas, eldest surviving son of William, 242.
  Thomas, eldest son of James, 441 (2), 442 (2).
  William, letters from, 82, 83, 85, 86, 87, 89, 105, 118, 123, 151, 153, 165, 166, 182, 183, 192–195 198, 200–203, 208–220, 224–230, 237, 240, 241, 244, 294, 295.
  ——, MSS. of, Report on, 81 et seq.
  ——, letters to, 81–204, passim, 293, 295, 296, 440–449.
  ——, abstracts by, of the Resolutions of Congress, 288.
  ——, baronetcy desired by, 200.
  ——, bounty of, to Dr. Skelton's parish, 445.

Knox, William—contd.
——, case of, 196.
——, certificates in favour of, 193.
——, claims of, as an American loyalist, 193, 196, 197.
——, estate in Wales bought by. See Slebech.
——, help of, desired, 441, 443, 444, 445, 449.
——, losses of, by the "American rebellion," 446.
——, memorials by, 295, 296.
——, notes, memoranda, or endorsements by, 205, 234, 236, 239, 290, 291, 293.
——, order of House of Lords concerning, 195.
——, papers by:
on the State of Ireland, 231.
on Irish questions, 233, 237, 238, 244.
on Catholic Emancipation, 245.
on the fortifications at Cherbourg, 288.
on the Revenue, ibid.
on Canada, 289.
on the war, 289, 290, 291.
project for settlement with the Colonies, 289.
"Ideas" in relation to a peace, 291.
on the evils of emigration, &c., ibid.
financial calculations, ibid.
in relation to exports and imports, 292.
——, papers by, in print:
"Considerations on the state of the Nation," 441.
"Defence of the Quebec Act," 202, 203.
"Extra Official State Papers," 222, 241–243.
——, documents printed in, 99, 225, 240.
"Helps to a right decision . . . in defence of the Treaty," 197, 199, 200.
"Hints relative to our Commerce," 89 n.
——, abstract of, 286.
——, sent to George Grenville, 89.
"Observations on the Liturgy," 203.
"Review of the American controversy," 203.
"Speculations," 217.
——, pension for, 196, 197, 209, (2).
——, petitions of, alluded to, 209, 215.
—— recommendation by, 237.
——, his slaves and plantation, 82, 192, 196.
——, speech of, on the Marriage Act, 288.
——, suggestions of, to improve the English possessions in North America, 220, 221.
——, views of, in relation to the slave trade, 203.
——, ——, in relation to the Chinese, 212.
——, ——, in relation to the East India Company, 214.
——, ——, in relation to the Bishops, 448, 449.
——, writings of, alluded to, 81, 83, 85, 88, 89, 91, 101, 104, 115, 197, 199, 202 (2), 209, 259, 282, 441, 442, 448.
——, appointed Provost Marshal of Georgia, 245.
——, in Georgia, 81–86, 245–250.
——, loses his father and brother, 83.
——, is struck by lightning, 85.
——, is appointed agent for Georgia, and returns to England, 86.
——, visit of, to Paris, 88, 282.
——, his connexion with George Grenville, 90, 195, 250, 283.
——, his marriage, 92, 440.
——, burnt in effigy in Georgia, 440.
——, illness of, 105, 445.
——, appointed Under Secretary of the American department, 106.
——, suggested as Commissioner to America (1776), 258.
——, his exertions for Ireland, praised, 126.
——, made J.P. for Middlesex, 181.
——, his loss of office, on the suppression of the American department, 183, 192, 283, 285, 286.
——, statement of his services and claims, 183, 196, 197.
——, report that he is to return to the Secretary's office ("his second marriage"), 190.
——, desires a baronetcy, 193, 200.
——, as High Sheriff of co. Pembroke, 195, 196.
——, wishes for a post in Ireland, 198.
——, assistance given by, to Lord Shelburne and Lord North, 199.
——, his criticism of Pitt's administration, 201.
——, the vehemence of his language objected to, 202, 206.
——, his attitude towards the Government, 212.
——, as agent for New Brunswick, 213–219, 224–229.
——, as agent for Prince Edward Island, 216–219, 225, 226.
——, portrait of, painted for the Assembly of Prince Edward Island, 216, 218.
——, suffers from the gout, 217.
——, executor for Governor Ellis, 224
——, his astronomical enquiries, 230.
——, his efforts on behalf of Ireland, 193, 231–245, passim.

Knox, William—contd.
——, his views in relation to the treatment of the Colonies, 257, 259.
——, Lord North's "kindness for," 274.
——, his relations with Lord Lansdowne, 281, et seq.
——, in connexion with presents to the Indians, 294–296.
——, sons of, 94 (2), 105 (2), 187. And see Knox, Thomas, above.
——, ——, death of, 98, 222.
——, father of, 446.
——, ——, death of, 83.
——, mother of, 446.
——, daughter of, 102.
——, brother-in-law of, 156.
Knyphausen, General, 167.
his march into the Jerseys, 171.
Koran, the, 223.

L

Labrador, 221.
Lacam, Mr., 344.
La Cerda, the Portuguese Minister to France, in London, 39.
Lacy, Marshall, at Spa, 112.
La Fayette, 153.
Laforcy, Sir John, 352.
La Lande, De, quotation from works of, 231.
Lambert, Chevalier, banker at Paris, 88.
Lambeth, 324, 331, 333.
House, letters dated at, 321, 336.
La Motte Piquet, French Admiral, 322, 324, 325 (2).
squadron of, 167.
Lansdowne, Marquis of. See Petty-Fitzmaurice.
Lanstinan, co. Pembroke, W. Knox's house at, 193.
Lascars, 386, 387.
Latin authors, alluded to, 33.
La Trappe, Dodington's house at Hammersmith, 31, 34, 37.
letters dated at, 29, 36, 40, 41, 50.
Laurens (Laurence) Henry, 173.
as President of the Congress, 200. papers of, taken, 173, 200, 271.
La Vera Cruz, 161, 406.
Lawe, George, recommended to Wm. Knox, 445 (2).
Lee:
Captain, 413.
[Charles], American General, 126.
——, as a prisoner, 136, 172, 316.
Robert, deputy clerk of the Council in Prince Edward Island, letters from Charlotte Town signed by, 219 (2).
Leeward Islands, the, 162 (2), 166–168, 180, 320, 352. squadron of, 160, 166.
Legge:
Captain, 406.
Henry Bilson, Chancellor of the Exchequer, 45.
William, Earl of Dartmouth, letters from, 113, 118, 120, 124, 136, 151, 162 (2), 164.
——, certificate from, 193.
——, suggested as Secretary of State for America, 107, 261.
——, at Sandwell, 107.
——, journey of, into Yorkshire, 108, 190.
——, as Secretary for America, 110 (2), 257, 258, 269, 289.
——, congratulated on prospect of peace, 113.
——, as Lord Privy Seal, 256.
——, opposes Lord G. Germain, 259.
——, goes to Bath, 151.
——, matters communicated to, 153.
Leghorn, people of, 43.
Leicester, Parliamentary contest in, 208.
Leicester, Earl of. See Coke, Sir Thomas; Townshend, George.
Leichtenstein, Prince and Princess, 178.
Leinster, land in, 113.
Leinster, Duke of. See Fitzgerald.
Le Maitre, sent with despatches, 127.
Lennox, Charles, Duke of Richmond, 251.
[as Secretary of State] retirement of, hoped for, 186, 189.
Leon, kingdom of, 161.
Governor and Viceroy of, 161.
missionaries in, ibid.
Leonard, ——, appointment of, as Chief Justice for New Ireland, approved, 169.
Leslie:
General, 174.
John, Earl of Rothes, commander of the forces in Ireland, 58.
Levant, the, trade to, 43.
Leveson-Gower (Leveson):
Edward, son of the admiral, 348.
Granville, 2nd Earl Gower, President of the Council, 154, 155, 253–256, 265.
——, as Marquis of Stafford, 197, 356.
John, 1st Earl Gower, is considered a cypher, 24.
Captain, afterwards Admiral, John, 314, 320, 330, 340 (2), 369.
——, letters from, 314, 319, 322, 347.
——, stands for Newcastle-under-Lyne, 353, 356.
——, has resigned the Admiralty, 347, 351.
——, death of, 381.
John, son of the Admiral, 381.
Mrs., wife of the Admiral, 333, 348, 381.

Lewis, Captain, 386.
Lewisham, letter dated at, 203.
Leyborne, William, Governor of Granada, 108, 109.
death of, 118.
Lichfield, 406, 432.
Bishop of. See Cornwallis, James.
Dean of. See Proby.
Cathedral, 431.
Bishop's Palace at, 427, 431.
diocese of, 432.
Liége, Bishop of, 255.
Lima, a rich ship from, 407.
Limerick:
mails of, 241.
surrendered soldiers to go to (1650), 436.
Limerick, Viscount. See Hamilton, James.
Lincoln:
Bishop of. See Prettyman.
election at, 210.
Lisbon, 112, 214, 406.
description of, 93.
earthquake of, 93, 94.
English minister at, 269.
letters dated at, 93–95, 98, 103–105.
Lisburn, Lord. See Vaughan, Wilmot.
Little, William, Secretary to the Governor of Georgia, and Speaker of the Assembly, 246, 247, 248.
Liturgy, the, 242.
Liverpool, 400.
African trade from, 233.
Liverpool, Earl of. See Jenkinson.
Livesay, Roger, of Wexford, recommended as a cornet, 439.
Lloyd, Dr. Christopher, desires Treasurership of Christ Church, Dublin, 67.
Loftus:
Captain, 136.
Lady Elizabeth, 427.
Henry, Earl of Ely, and his family, at Spa, 111.
Colonel [William], marriage of, to Lady Elizabeth Townshend, 353.
London:
casual notices, passim.
African Company in, 233. asylum for destitute girls in, 445.
balls and assemblies in, 1.
bankruptcies in, 382.
Bishop of. See Porteous.
Corporation of, 402, 403.
French minister of state in, 298.
letters dated from, passim.
Lord Mayor of, election of, 314.
luxury and extravagance in, 313, 427.
masquerade in, 310.
old books, difficulty of buying, in, 440.
patriotism of, 312, 314.
petition of, alluded to, 175.
ships of, 293.
travellers to and from, passim.
London and Westminster, streets, buildings, &c., in:
Albemarle Street, 330.
Almack's, card-playing at, 313.
Berkeley Square, 284.
——, Charles Street in. See Charles Street, below.
Bishopgate Street, Green Dragon in, 173.
Buckingham House, 303, 304.
——, called Queen's House, 191, 260, 272, 273.
Burlington Street, letters dated from, 403, 409.
Cavendish Square, Margaret Street in, 226.
Charles Street, Berkeley Square, Lady Mary Whitbread's house in, 310, 312.
——, letters dated from, 310, 311, 347.
Cheapside, Ironmonger Lane in, 316.
Chelsea, Little, 96.
Clifford Street, letter dated from, 313.
Coventry House, letter dated from, 434.
Craven Street, Strand, 149.
Downing Street, 266, 275.
Dover Street, letter dated from, 379.
Duke Street, letter dated from, 316.
Fleet Lane, 149.
Grafton Street, letters dated from, 318, 350, 372.
Great George Street, letters dated from, 95, 213.
Hanover Square, letter dated from, 390.
——, New Street in, 93.
Harley Street, Upper, letter dated from, 202.
Hertford Street, letter dated from, 391.
Hill Street, 308, 394.
——, letters dated from, 85, 298, 300, 305, 306, 308, 316, 392, 393, 397, 400, 425–427, 430, 431, 433, 434.
Holland House, letters dated at, 32, 33, 36.
Hyde Park, 41.
India House, 110.
Leicester House, 37.
——, letter dated at, 20.
Lloyd's Coffee House, 221.
Lotorie, the, 313.
Macaroni Coffee House, 313.
Manchester Street, letter dated from, 409.
Mansfield Street, letters dated from, 318, 319.
Mansion House, letter dated from, 402.
Mary Bone Street, Golden Fan in, 21.
May fair, chapel in, 344.
Mortimer Street, letters dated from, 394, 418, 419.

London and Westminster—contd.
Norfolk House [residence of Prince of Wales], nursery of, 16.
Northumberland House, letter dated at, 181.
Old Burlington Street, letter dated from, 327.
Old Palace Yard, letter dated from, 209.
Oxford Market, 161.
Palace Yard, letter dated from, 391.
Pall Mall, letters dated from, 20, 28, 33, 47, 53, 140, 143, 149, 152, 154–157, 164–167, 169, 172–174, 178, 179, 183, 192, 238.
——, Cabinet council held in, 127.
——, letter addressed to, 21.
Parliament House or St. Stephen's Chapel, 102.
Parliament Street, letters dated from, 149, 194.
Piccadilly, 64.
Portland Place, letter dated from, 421.
Portman Square, Mr. Whitbread's house in, 312.
——, letter dated from, 149.
Queen's House, the. See Buckingham House.
St. Giles, living of, 24.
St. James', Court of, 192.
——, Palace of, 54, 306, 352, 427.
—— Place, 210.
—— Square, letter dated from, 18.
St. Paul's, Thanksgiving Day at, 344.
Savile Row, letter dated from, 193.
Sergeants' Inn, house in, 224.
Seymour Place, letters dated from, 344, 353, 354, 376.
Seymour Street, Upper, Portman Square, letters dated from, 416, 425.
Sheffield Place, letter dated from, 191.
Soho Square, 210.
——, letters dated from, 203, 209, 213, 214, 217, 219, 244.
Somerset House, 3.
——, levée at, 306.
South Street, letter dated from, 314.
Tower, the, 300, 313.
——, letter dated from, 9.
——, prisoner in, 9.
Upper Brook Street, letter dated from, 296.
Weymouth Street, letter dated from, 377.
White's, gaming at, 313.
Whitehall. See Whitehall.
Wimpole Street, letters dated from, 328, 333, 343, 353, 380.
Winchester House, 393.
Longford, Earl of. See Pakenham.
Long Island, 126, 318. attack on, 139.
English victory at (Sept., 1776), 315.
letter dated from, 315.
Lords, House of, 191, 270, 273, 281 (2), 423. business before, or to be brought before, 195, 196, 198, 333.
debates in, alluded to, 280, 335.
message sent to, 251.
new members of, 48, 394.
Order of, 195.
Secretaries of State in, 39.
sermon preached before, 426.
speech in, alluded to, 186.
in relation to Admiral Byng, 37. attack upon Lord G. Germain in, 183.
in relation to the Slave trade, 222.
Lord Chancellor. See Bathurst; Pratt, Lord Camden; Henley; Thurlow; Wedderburn; Yorke, Earl of Hardwicke.
Lord Chief Justice. See Murray, Earl of Mansfield.
Lord Steward. See Fitzwalter, Earl; Churchill, Charles, Duke of Marlborough.
Lord Treasurer. See Godolphin, Sydney, Lord.
Loring, Captain, 136 (2).
his brother, the Commissary, 136.
Lothian, Marquis of. See Kerr.
Loughborough, Lord. See Wedderburn, Alexander.
Louis XV., King of France, goes shooting, 88.
Cardinal Fleury's advice to, 255.
death of, 444.
Louis XVI., King of France, 116 (2).
pacific sentiments of, 129.
affection of the people towards, 176. decree for deposing, 382.
execution of, 384.
Louisiana, acquisition of, 282.
Oreilly's cruelties in, 158.
Love:
Joseph, Dodington's deputy in the Pells Office, Ireland, resignation of, 55 (2).
——, letter from, 55.
Mr., collector at Mallow, to be made collector at Cork, 61, 62.
Lucerne, Marquis, letter to, alluded to, 284.
Lumley Sanderson, Thomas, Earl of Scarborough, warrant to, 20.
Lushington, Mr., chairman of the East India Company, illness of, 363.
Luther, Martin, mentioned, 70.
Lyne, Duc de, 255.
Lyons, travellers to, 23.
Lyttelton:
[Caroline], Lady Wescote, 2nd wife of William Henry, below, 187, 188.
[Caroline Anne], younger daughter of William Henry, 216.
[Charles], 2nd son of William Henry, birth of, 90.
George, secretary to the Prince of Wales, 16.
——, as Lord Lyttelton, 85.

Lyttelton—contd.
——, office offered to, 253.
[George Fulke], eldest son of William Henry, 188.
Hester, elder daughter of William Henry, 187. And see Hoare, Lady Hester.
William Henry, Governor of South Carolina, 246, 249.
——, letters from, 81 (2), 83, 85, 87, 88, 90–95, 98, 103–105, 136.
——, letters to, 82, 86.
——, his departure from South Carolina, 82.
——, Governor of Jamaica, 83, 85, 86.
——, his marriage, 86.
——, death of his wife, 90.
——, difficulties of, with the Jamaica Assembly, 90–92.
——, as ambassador to Lisbon, 93–95.
——, as Lord Westcote, letters from, 187 (2), 194–196, 213.
——, death of his daughter and her infant son, 194.
——, created Baron Lyttelton of Frankley (in 1794), 214 n.
——, letters from, 214, 216, 217, 223, 226.
——, his eighty-second birthday, 226.
——, agent of, 94.
——, grandson of. See Hoare, Henry.
——, godsons of, 94 (2), 105.
——, sister of. See Fitzmaurice, Lady.
William [Henry], son of the above, in the House of Commons, 227.

M

Macartney, George, Lord, despatches of [as Governor of the Caribbee Islands], alluded to, 141, 155.
letter to, concerning his embassy to China, 212.
Macbride, McBride [Capt. John], and the Plymouth election, 347.
as Rear-Admiral, in command in the Downs, 383.
Machiavelli, saying of, quoted, 46.
McHorath, James, letter from, 371.
Machray, —, 280.
Macirone, Rizzi and Joseph, 11.
McKenzie, James Stuart, 253.
MacKye [John Roe], 48.
Maclean, Colonel, sent out to take command in Nova Scotia, 127, 140, 151.
Macnamara [John], late M.P. for Leicester, 208.
Madan:
Charles, son of Dr. Spencer Madan, 354, 377, 378, 432.
——, attains the rank of Major, 381.
——, wife of, "a most charming woman," 432.
Lady Charlotte, 311.
——, letter from, 354.
Dr. Spencer, 311.
——, made Bishop of Bristol, 380.
——, as Bishop of Peterborough, death of, 431.
——, 1st wife of. See Lady Charlotte, above.
——, 2nd wife of, 432.
——, daughter of. See Warde, Charlotte.
Spencer [afterwards Dr.], eldest son of the above, at Westminster school, 311.
——, office of, at the Tower, 313.
——, in residence at Lichfield, 432.
——, sons of, ibid.
Madeira:
Island of, 328, 329, 383, 405 (2).
Road, 345.
Mad Island. See Fort Island.
Madras, 344–346, 349, 354 (2), 357–359, 360 362, 366, 368, 373, 375, 377–379, 385 (3), 387.
Commissioners going to, 135.
Council of, deposes and imprisons Lord Pigot, 129.
Governor of. See Medows; see Pigot. the late Governor of, 349. And see Campbell, Sir Archibald.
letters dated at, 349, 387.
Postmaster-General at, letter to, 371.
Madrid, 1, 269.
ambassador at. See Robinson, Thomas, Lord Grantham. envoys at. See Bubb, George; Frere, John Hookham.
Government Gazette of, 407.
Magistrates, Committee of, 213.
Magon, Rear-Admiral, killed at Trafalgar, 413.
Magri (near Sewendroog), Camp at, letter dated from, 375.
Mahie, French factory at, 347, 348.
Mahon, Port, 116.
Mahrattas, the, 346, 349, 360, 373, 417.
Maitland, Captain, 414.
Malabar, coast of, 342, 366, 373, 374, 385.
cruiser stationed on, 362. rebellion on, 346, 347, 348, 349.
Malaga, battle of, 372.
Malay language, letter written in, 364.
Mallow or Moyallow, collector at, 62.
Malone, Anthony, M.P. for co. Westmeath, 64–66.
as Chancellor of Exchequer, Ireland, 71. is returning to the Bar, 79.
Malta, 223, 399.
Malwan, Rajah of, 382.

Man, Isle of, 63.
legislature of, 238.
Mangalore, 373.
Manilla, 362.
Spaniards at, 355.
Mann:
Admiral, 162.
Horace, afterwards Sir Horace, ambassador to Tuscany, letters from, 24, 25, 42, 43 (2).
——, letter to, 43.
Sir Horace, nephew of the above, 425, 433.
——, letter from, 378.
——, as M.P. for Sandwich, 356.
——, illness of, 394.
Manners, Lord Robert, 334.
Manley, Mr., 15.
Manning, Mr., 363, 386, 387.
Mansfield:
Earl of. See Murray, William.
Sir James, 431.
Mar, Earl of. See Erskine.
Marble Hill, letter dated from, 124.
Maria Teresa, Queen of Hungary and Empress, 43, 46, 139.
mediation of, suggested, 271, 272.
death of, 271.
daughter of. See Marie Antoinette.
Marie Antoinette, Queen of Louis XVI. of France, 116.
Marines, the, 329.
Lieutenant-General of. See Palliser, Sir Hugh.
Market Hill, near Newry, letter dated at, 67.
Markham:
Captain, wounded at Bangalore, 368.
Colonel, Commissioner for Ireland, 438.
William, Archbishop of York, lands of, 193.
Marlay, Thomas, Chief Baron of Exchequer in Ireland, 57.
Marlborough:
Duke of. See Churchill, John.
Duchess of, masquerade of, 393.
Marriage Act, the, bill to repeal, 288.
Mars, the planet, distance of, from the sun, 230, 231.
Marsden, William, letters from, 398 (3).
Marseilles, 158, 169.
letters dated from, 111, 190 (2).
Hotel Dauphin at, 111.
Marshall, Samuel, appointment of, as executor to Henry Ellis, 224.
Marsham, Charles, Earl of Romney, death of, 427.
Martin, Martyn:
Henry, Commissioner at Portsmouth, made Comptroller of the Navy, 352, 353, 364.
Josiah, Governor of North Carolina, 177.
Mr., agent for South Carolina, 82, 86, 87.
Martinico, 168, 177, 179.
ill-success at, 43.
Marvel, on the frontiers of New Brunswick, 229.
Maryland, 139.
population of, 288.
the only colony where Roman Catholics have civil rights, 292.
Masham, Sam, letters from, 35, 36.
Masquerades, 102, 393.
Massachusetts or Massachusetts Bay, province of, 118, 143.
Assembly of, Speaker of. See Cushing.
charter of, 257.
population of, 288.
Massarano, Prince, does not wish to involve Spain in war, 264.
chaplain of, 268.
Massey, Eyre, commander in Nova Scotia, 124, 151.
Masulipatam, 349.
Matthews, Captain, 182.
Maurepas, Comte de, first minister of Louis XVI., 116.
Mauritius, the, island of, 345, 352, 360, 366, 385, 386.
Mawhood, Colonel, action of, 128.
Maxwell:
Lieutenant-Colonel, 367.
Major, recommendation of, 443.
Mr., prothonotary of Common Pleas, Ireland, 57.
Maylor, Mr., removal of, from the Council at Fort St. George, 357.
Maynard, Mr., late collector at Cork, 61, 62.
Mayo, county, Sheriff of, 60.
Mead, Sir Richard, in the Irish Parliament, 57.
letter from, 66.
Mediterranean Sea, the, 2, 304, 398, 402, 416.
English fleet in, 35.
——, needed or proposed for, 34, 369.
——, Lord Hood is to command, 383.
port in, 291.
seamen of, 145.
trade of, 159.
uncertainty of British supremacy in, 35.
Medlycott, Thomas, Commissioner for the Revenue in Ireland, letters from, 56 (2).
Medows, General William, commander-in-chief in India, 349 (2), 354, 357, 359, 360.
as probable successor to Lord Cornwallis, 354.
Lord Cornwallis's praise of, 367.
acts as second to Cornwallis, 368, 376.
Melaspina, Don Alexander, about to make a voyage round the world, 347.
Melcombe, Lord. See Dodington.
Melville, Viscount. See Dundas, Henry.
"Merry," Mr., allusions to, 13, 14.

Metcalfe, owner of a "vinegar concern," death of, 434.
Methodists, are "unknown, unknowable," 444.
Methuen [Paul], 1, 4.
Mexico, riches of, 161.
Spanish Government of, 161.
Michel, Monsieur, French Captain, 169.
Middlesex, Earl of. See Sackville, Charles.
Middlesex:
Commissioner of the Peace for, 181.
election for, 302.
Hospital, 117.
Middleton, Charles or Sir Charles, Comptroller of the Navy, 320.
letter from, 391.
resignation of, 352, 353, 364.
as Lord Barham, 415, 418.
——, letters from, 410–412.
Milbancke, Sir Ralph, daughter of, marries Lord Byron, 433.
Milford, Lord. See Phillips.
Milford Haven, 240.
Militia, the, 150.
complaints as to the treatment of, by government, 47.
Mill, Colonel, journeys of, 24.
Miller:
Joe, anecdote of, 35.
—, 33.
Milton, his "Paradise Lost" alluded to, 230.
Minden, battle of. See Sackville, Lord George.
Mines, copper and quicksilver, 24, 25.
Ministry, Ministers, Administration or Government:
[1752, Pelham's], "built on Whig principles," 22.
——, design against, 23.
[1757, on the fall of the Duke of Devonshire's], changes in, 37–40.
[1762, Dec., Lord Bute's], in relation to the Peace of Paris, 282.
——, views of, during the war, 287.
——, fall of, 304, 305.
[1763, Grenville's], 252.
——, Wilkes' contemptuous treatment of, 300.
——, ruin of [1765], 263.
——, called back, 252.
[1766, Grafton's or Chatham's], 263.
[1768, Grafton's], appointments in, 264.
——, difficulties of, 105.
[1770–1782, North's], 165, 260, 265, 277.
——, hopes of its success, 105.
——, angry with Rodney, 312.
——, Cabinet Council of, 272.
——, continues to rush to destruction, 317.
——, as the late, criticisms upon, 333, 336.
Ministry—contd.
——, fall of, 199, 272, 273, 329–331.
[1782, April, Rockingham's], appointments in, 329, 331.
——, sets out well, 333.
——, does not always draw together, 337.
[1782, July, Shelburne's], 329, 331.
——, appointments in, 186, 187.
[1783, June, Coalition of Portland and North], 191.
[1783–1801, Pitt's], during the King's illness, "all in a puzzle what to do," 279.
——, Knox neglected by, 200.
——, speech in favour of, 356.
——, grants from, 382.
——, no alterations in, 383.
[1804, Addington's], 404.
[1805, Pitt's], urges Lord Cornwallis to return to India, 406.
——, expects an invasion, 410.
[1806, Lord Grenville's], "the very wonderful changes," 419.
——, wishes Lord St. Vincent to command in chief, 420.
[1811, Perceval's], "the present," 429.
[1814] honest, and not deficient in ability, 433.
Minorca:
St. Philip's in, fort Major of, 61.
loss of, by England, 34, 73, 330.
desired by Russia, 291.
Miquelon, Isle of, 149, 286.
prize money, 157.
Mirebeau, Abbé de, his "L'ami des hommes," 90.
Missionaries, English, in Pensacola, 161.
Mississippi, the river, 135, 220.
navigation of, 200, 269.
settlements upon, 200.
Missouri, the river, 200.
Mitchell, his map of North America, 282.
Mobile, 158.
landing at, alluded to, 86.
Moira:
family of, 242.
Earl of. See Rawdon.
Moldavia, 117.
Moldivas, the, off the coast of India, 342.
Molé, Monsieur de, president of the Parliament of Paris, letter to, 286.
Molleson, William, letter from, 296.
Mollinedo, Monsieur de, Secretary to the Spanish Ambassador, 346.
Monck:
General George, afterwards Duke of Albemarle, letter from, on his march to London, 438.
George Paul, copy made by, 439.
——, document presented to, ibid.
—, the General's cousin, 439.
Monmouthshire, 56.

Montagu :
Admiral George, 140, 149.
——, letter from, 425.
——, ——, alluded to, 398.
——, claim of, 425 (2).
George Brudenell Montagu, Duke of, 154.
George Dunk, Earl of Halifax. See Dunk-Montagu.
John, Earl of Sandwich, 251, 252, 255, 302.
——, as a candidate for the High Stewardship of Cambridge (1764), 306.
——, as First Lord of the Admiralty, 124, 131, 141, 145 (2), 155, 166 (3), 167–169.
——, letters from, 182, 184, 313, 314, 327 (2).
——, wishes or views of, 125, 157, 165, 177, 181 (2), 335.
——, his dispute with the rest of the Cabinet, 130.
——, illness of, 179.
——, if he does not approve, difficulties occur, 180.
——, at meetings of the Cabinet, 260, 271, 272.
——, thanked by the King, 260.
——, removal of, proposed, 261.
——, intrigue against, 267, 273.
——, is hated by Howe, 315.
——, speaks kindly of William Cornwallis, 316, 326.
——, approaching dismissal of, 329,
——, son of, death of, alluded to, 315.
Montcalm, Marquis de, letters of, 286.
alluded to, 121.
Montgomery :
General, 124, 228.
Mr., 171.
Mr., quarrel of, with Elizabeth Pitt, 25.
Montigny, Monsieur, 360.
Montreal, attack upon, anticipated, 228.
Montrose, burgh of, chief magistrate of, 354.
Moore, Mr., 147.
Moorhouse, Colonel, killed at siege of Bangalore, 368.
Moors, the, Spanish victories over, alluded to, 408.
Moose, on the boundary line of New Brunswick, 229.
Moravian missions and their eccentricities, criticized, 444.
Morgan, Marcus Anthony, M.P. for Athy, 64, 65.
Morne, mountains of, in Ireland, 19.
Mornington :
Earl of. See Wellesley.
Lady, 318, 320, 336.
Morrice, Dr., Secretary of S. P. G., 226.
Morris, Mr., letter to, alluded to, 135.
rse, Mr., 163.
Morton :
Mr., Chief Justice of Chester, 268.
Mrs., 268.
Mountgarret, Viscount. See Butler.
Mount Kennedy, letter dated from, 179.
Moutray, Mrs., 340.
Mud Islands, 147.
Mulato regiments, 162.
Mulgrave, Earl of. See Phipps, Constantine John.
Munster, province of, Ireland, 67, 113.
orders for billeting cavalry in, 435.
Münster, Germany, 297.
Murray :
David, Viscount Stormont, ambassador to France, complaints made by, 132, 140.
——, as Secretary of State, 178, 180.
——, in relation to the New Ireland business, 172.
——, "a very composing speech" by, 356.
John, Earl of Dunmore [Governor of New York and Virginia], 122, 177.
Samuel, in charge of St. Michael's, Dublin, 448.
William, Earl of Mansfield, Lord Chief Justice, 37, 39 (2), 48, 255, 259.
——, letter from, 16.
——, decree reversed by, 73.
——, in relation to Lord Bute, 280.
Musgrave, Colonel Thomas, 357. made Major-General, 361.
Musquito shore, the, 290.
Mutiny :
Act, the late, alluded to, 102.
Bill [Irish, in 1780], 167, 238, 239.
Mysore country, the, 358, 359.
Tippoo Sultan in, 350.
the war in, 360–362.
the dreary wastes of, 378.
Mystick River, 120.

N

Nabob, the. See Arcot, nabob of.
Nagrs. See Sepoys.
Naples :
Charles, King of, becomes King of Spain, 43. See Spain, Charles III., King of.
Ferdinand IV., King of, 222–224. earthquake at, 223.
letters dated from, 2, 106, 222–224.
Sir William Stanhope's house in, 26.
travellers to, 11, 26.
Narbonne, Archbishop of, 112.

Narrows, the, of the Channel, ships in, 317.
Nassau, William Henry, Earl of Rochford, 25.
as Secretary for Southern Department, 253–255.
as Secretary for Northern Department, 108, 109. plan of, about Colonies, 172. retirement of, 256.
refusal of, to go to Ireland, 265.
office of (i.e., Secretary's office), 108. wife of, Lady Rochford, 25.
National debt, the, 66.
notes about, 291.
reduction of, 91, 199.
scheme concerning, alluded to, 85.
Navigation, Acts of, 96, 223.
Navy, the, 260, 273.
Board, 366, 419.
Commissioners of, 398.
Comptroller of. See Hammond, Sir A.; Middleton, Sir Charles; Martin, Sir Henry.
Comptrollership of, to be offered to Dodington, 32.
Office, examination at, 363.
——, Secretary at. See Nelson, Mr.; Kingdom, Mr.
Treasurer of. See Dodington, George; Grenville, George.
——, Dundas to be, "if he pleases," 186.
Sir Richard Strachan's plans concerning, 416.
Neckar, M. de, Finance Minister in France, 176.
fall of, 178.
Negus, Colonel, 4.
Nelson:
Capt. Horatio, afterwards Lord Nelson, 411, 416.
——, letters from, 339, 341 (2), 369, 388, 392, 398, 399, 401, 402, 410, 412.
——, letters to, 398 (2).
——, his dislike of Antigua, 340.
——, is happily married, 341.
——, wishes to serve under Cornwallis, ibid.
——, sends news to Cornwallis, 369.
——, in spite of his honours, sees little real happiness on this side the grave, 392.
——, his attack on the gunboats at Boulogne, 395.
——, goes to the Mediterranean, 398, 399.
——, hopes "that villain Buonaparte will be upset," 402.
——, his station off Cadiz, alluded to, 423, 424.
——, his wretched state of health, 410.
——, death of, at Trafalgar, 412.
Lady, 406.
Major [in Ireland, 1649], 436.
Mr., Secretary at the Navy Office, 392.
Nepean, Evan, 285.
letters from, 295, 401.
Nesbitt, Colonel, 373.
Netterville, Margaret. See Butler.
Neville, Nevil:
Mr., 111.
[Richard Neville Aldworth, secretary to the Embassy at Paris], called his Majesty's minister there, 282.
New Brunswick:
affairs of, discussed, 213.
agent for. See Knox, William.
Assembly of, 229.
church and ministers for, plans for, 226.
Committee for, letters to, 213, 229 (2).
Council of, 214, 215, 225.
——, clerk of. See Odell.
crown lands in, 224, 225.
Governor of, 214, 215, 225.
inhabitants of, 222, 224.
instructions sent to, 215 (2).
loyalists in, 224.
map of, 230.
opposition in, to Fishery Act, 228, 229.
produce or trade of, 220, 221, 227, 229 (2).
Province of, erected (1784), 214, 215.
unprotected state of, 227.
plan for safety of, 228.
Vice Admiralty Court in, Judge of. See Botsford, Mr.
Newcastle, Duke of. See Pelham-Holles.
New England:
coast of, 138.
colonies or provinces of, 142, 259.
——, governments of, 121, 257.
——, resolutions of, 95.
——, feeling in, ibid.
Governor of, 103.
people of, have called a convention, 103.
—— (New Englanders), trade of, 233.
troops of, 35, 134.
Newfoundland:
fishing and fishermen of, 208, 209, 233.
Governor of, 127.
ships of, 232.
ships sent to, 140.
station in, 379.
New Hampshire, 143.
inhabitants of, 288.
merchants of, 257.
New Ireland:
erection of province to be called, projected, 228.
business of, 172.
Governor and Chief Justice chosen for, 169.
New Jersey, inhabitants of, 288.
Newlands, Lymington, letters addressed to, 421, 423.

Newman, Mr., commission given to, 361.
Newmarket, 170, 310.
New Mexico, silver mines in 201.
New Orleans:
attack on anticipated, 158.
inhabitants of, 158.
New Park, 4.
Newport, letters dated at, 96.
New South Wales, wreck of vessel going to, 352.
Newspapers:
Auditor, 267.
Briton, ibid.
Circulation, 115.
Courier de l' Europe, 382.
Craftsman, 301.
Newton, Sir Isaac, 230.
New York, 131, 136, 137, 139, 141–144, 146, 149, 173, 174, 179, 181, 182, 184, 186, 187 (2), 316, 325.
Chief Justice in. See Smith.
Council of, 118.
Gazette, 131, 141.
Governor of. See Murray, Earl of Dunmore; Robertson, James.
inhabitants of, 288.
letters dated at, 147, 173, 321, 323.
merchants of, 257.
office of Secretary in, 184, 197. arrival of troops in, 123.
taking of, alluded to, 126.
Clinton in command at, 135, 153.
a convoy to sail for, 138.
anxiety that Clinton should not evacuate, 150, 151.
the large demands of, 169.
troops to be transported from, 284, 285.
Lord Cornwallis at, 318.
Island, letter dated at, 317. province of, 147.
——, may be restored to peace, 182.
Niagara, 228.
Indians at, presents for, 294, 295.
Niccolini, Marquis of, 44.
nephews of, 44.
Nicene Creed, discussed, 69.
Nicholls, Captain, 419.
Nixon, David, 57.
Nizam [of the Deccan], the, 360.
English connexion with, 346.
good disposition of, 349.
Noah's Ark, allusion to, 212.
Noleken (Nolkin), Baron, Swedish ambassador in England, 210.
Noncowrey Harbour, 349.
Nootka Bay, ships captured at, 361.
Nore, the, 356.
Norfolk:
coast of, 383.
member for, 306.
Lord Lieutenant for. See Townshend, Lord; Orford, Lord.
Norris, Dr., chaplain to Lord Spencer, 242.
North:
the Hon. Brownlow, Bishop of Winchester, 393.
——, infirm state of, 433.
Frederick, Lord, First Lord of the Treasury, 108, 122, 130, 131, 140, 142, 154, 161, 163, 168, 172, 326, 329.
——, letters from, 128, 139, 145, 146, 150, 154.
——, ——, to the King, alluded to, 261.
——, letter to, 192.
——, matters mentioned or to be mentioned to, or laid before, 120, 130, 134, 145, 155, 179, 269.
——, papers to be sent to, 111, 157, 167.
——, views or wishes of, 142, 149, 155, 157, 179, 187, 257.
——, ——, in relation to American independence, 152, 275.
——, house of, meetings at, 162, 302.
——, conduct of (in 1772), praised, 443.
——, scheme for overturning (1772), 254.
——, in relation to appointments in his ministry, 255, 256, 261, 264, 265.
——, proceedings or conduct of, in relation to the American department, complained of, 110, 122.
——, and the beginning of the American War, 257.
——, in relation to the instructions to Commissioners, and terms to be demanded of the Colonies, 259, 277, 278.
——, as a friend to Ireland, 236.
——, at meetings of the Cabinet, 260, 271, 272.
——, the King's gratitude to, and regard for, 260, 267.
——, in relation to Lord Howe, 262.
——, thinks of dissolving Parliament (1780), 324.
——, attack upon, in the House, 272.
——, in relation to Lord G. Germain, 273–276.
——, says that America is lost without chance of recovery, 275.
——, intentions of, a secret, 181.
——, in relation to Knox, 184, 189, 209, 272, 273.
——, the fall of his ministry, 329.
——, has the Cinque ports for life, 330.
——, in relation to Lord Shelburne's government, 184, 187.
——, political attachment to, 187, 212, 266, 430.
——, possibility of his again taking office, 189.
——, as Secretary of State [Coalition Ministry, 1783], 190, 192, 199.

North—contd.
Frederick, Lord, "dressing" given to, by Pitt, 191.
——, as Earl of Guildford, death of, 381.
Col. George Augustus, letter from, 190.
Northington, Lord. See Henley.
North Sea, the, 271, 383.
Norton, Sir Fletcher, Attorney-General, 280, 281. son of, appointment of as Minister to the Swiss Cantons, 281.
Norwich:
Bishop of. See Hayter.
meeting at, 306.
Nova Scotia, 220, 221, 222, 228, 151.
Bishop for, proposed, 200.
Council of, 101.
inhabitants of, 288.
loyalists in, 191.
plans for development or improvement of, 226, 227.
presents for Indians, sent to, 293.
refugees from, 215.
trade of, 227, 229.
Nugent:
Admiral Charles Edmund, 412, 429.
——, daughter of, 429.
Mrs. Charlotte, letters from, 417, 422.
General George, 423.
Robert [Craggs], Viscount, afterwards Earl of Clare, 95, 107.
——, letters from, 94, 96, 102, 113, 120, 128.
——, a Lord of the Treasury, 94.
——, appointment of, as First Lord of Trade [1768], 264.
Nutt, John, letter from, 199.
Nutting, —, 154.

O

Oakhampton, ships at, 169.
Oakeley, Sir Charles, goes out [as Governor] to Madras, 354.
as Governor of Madras, 385–387.
letter from, alluded to, 385.
his house, 379.
and Lady Oakeley, at the Palace at Lichfield, 427, 431.
Oates, Essex, letter dated at, 35.
O'Biern, Mr., chaplain to Lord Spencer, 242.
O'Brien:
Sir Lucius, 232, 234, 243.
—— letters from, 231–233, 236.
[William] marriage of, to Lady Susan Strangways, 307.
Odell, Mr., Clerk of the Council of New Brunswick, 213.
Oeyras, Count de, illness of, 95.
Ohio grant, the, 183, 253, 254, 264.
Oldham, Lieut.-Colonel, 359.
Old Spain, 322.
Oliver, Mr., appointment of, as Governor of New Ireland, 169 (2).
Omanny, Captain, 153.
O'Neill [O'Neal], territory of, 68.
Onslow:
George, Lord, 316.
[Capt. Richard ?], 337.
Ontario, Lake, 228.
Oran, fleet at, 12.
Orange [William VI.], Prince of, 173, 255.
Orde or Ord:
Sir John, letter from, 423.
Thomas, Secretary to the Treasury (1782), 285.
——, Chief Secretary in Ireland, 198.
Ordnance, Board of, 131, 169.
Oreilly [Alexander, Spanish General] his cruelties in Louisiana, 158.
Orford:
Earl of. See Russell; see Walpole.
Lady [widow of Robert Walpole, Earl of], 43 (2).
——, second husband of. See Shirley.
Organs in churches, remarks on, 448.
Orkneys, the, 291.
Orloff (Orlow), Count, 255.
Ormeshead, North Wales, 56.
Orpheus and Euridice, mention of, 81.
Orvilliers, Comte d', fleet of, 151.
Osborne:
Captain, 382.
Sir George, 125, 131.
Ossore or Oussore, fort of, 373.
camp near, letter dated from, 374.
Ostend packet, the, 149.
Oswald:
James, 37.
——, as a Lord of the Treasury, 85.
[Richard, negotiator of the Treaty with America], 191.
Oswego, 228.
Otaheité, 352.
Ottley:
Mr., 302.
Miss, ibid.
Ottolenghe, Mr., 249.
Oughton, Sir Adolphus, 58.
Oussore. See Ossore.
Owen:
Sir Hugh, 212.
or Barlow [Hugh], M.P. for Pembroke, 212.
Oxford, 298, 432.
Chancellorship of, contest for, 381.
Christ Church, prebend at, desired, 50.
Merton College, fellow of. See Cornwallis, James. politicians of, 301.

P

Paget:
Captain, 432.
Charles, son of preceding, ibid.
Pakenham:
Edward, Lord Longford, captain in the Navy, 320.
——, letters from, 328, 337.
the Hon. Thomas, Commander of the Juste, 392.
Palaghautcherry, 359 (2).
Palatine [Charles Theodore], Elector, 255.
Palermo, 224.
letter dated at, 392.
Palladio, allusion to, 41.
Palliser, Sir Hugh, Lieut.-General of Marines, 149, 314, 315, 332. has many friends, 165.
Palmer, Mr., 17.
Palmerston, Viscount. See Temple, Henry.
Papers:
On Peace or War, 290.
"Ideas" on peace prospects," 291.
And see Knox, Wm., papers by.
Paradise, Milton's description of, alluded to, 230.
Paraquay, 172.
Paris, 12, 159, 268.
American Commissioners at, 200.
banker of. See Lambert.
chargé d' affaires at. See Stanley, Hans.
English embassy at, secretary to. See Neville.
Gazette, 119.
William Knox at, 282.
letters dated from, 11, 30, 87, 111, 397.
mob rising in, 382.
news from, concerning war, 145, 171.
Peace of. See Treaty of.
Palais Royal at, 382.
Parliament of, President of. See Molé, Monsieur de. plaster of, 227.
riots in, 382, 383.
travellers to or from, 8, 10, 23, 26, 27, 87, 116.
Treaty or Peace of [1763], alluded to, 88, 152, 268, 286, 291.
——, preliminaries of, address moved for, upon (Dec., 1762), 281, 282.
treaty with America (1783), preliminaries of, signed in, 190 n.
troops at, 384.
Tuilleries, the, at, 382.
warlike feeling of, 129.
Parker:
Admiral, 290.
——, ships with, 317.
Parker—contd.
Admiral Sir Hyde, sen., his fight with the Dutch, alluded to, 186.
——, named for the Naval command in the East Indies, 337.
Sir Hyde, jun., captain of the fleet, 369, 383.
——, squadron of, 394.
John, Lord Boringdon, royal visit to, 345.
Admiral Sir Peter, 325.
——, letters from, alluded to, 175, 324.
——, ——, minutes of, 290.
Thomas, Lord Parker, 356.
Parliament (Commonwealth):
army of, in Ireland (1649), provost marshal of, 435.
——, soldiers in, ill-behaviour of, ibid.
appointment of Commissioners by (1660), 438.
in a good way of settlement, 439.
secluded members of, not to be re-admitted, 439.
Parliament (George II.), 31, 56.
Acts or bills of, alluded to, 6, 7, 36.
"materials laid before," in regard to Sir R. Walpole, 16.
Parliament (George III.), 141, 255, 262.
Acts or Bills of, alluded to, 369.
And see under their names.
Bills to be presented to, 258.
bounty granted by, 292.
Clerk of. See Cowper, Anthony Ashley. compensation to be granted by, 285, 286.
——, to American Loyalists. See American Loyalists. custom of, in relation to taxation and subsidies, 99, 100, 101.
elections for, 96.
——, discussed, 343, 353. And see Eye, Portsmouth, Wales.
——, great cost of, 103.
opening of, or approaching sessions of, 95, 121, 152, 172, 189, 195, 196, 203.
prorogation of, expected, 306, 307.
seats in, many vacancies in, 381.
——, patronage of, 330.
in relation to the American Colonies, 89, 114, 152 (2), 257–259.
demand for Sir Wm. Howe's exculpation by (1779), 353.
dissolution of, supposed to be determined on (1780), 324.
is much out of humour (1782), 329.
empowers the King to make regulations (1783), 190.
King's state declared to (1788), 279.
all goes on quietly in (1790), 353.
dissolution of, anticipated (1790), 354, 356, 360.
See also Lords, House of; Commons House of.

Parliaments, former, question whether they may be criticised, discussed, 103.
——, ——, action of, in regard to Ireland, 96.
Parnell, Sir John, letter from, 243.
letter to, 210.
Parsloe's, "dinner set" at, 208.
Parslow, General [John], 297.
a "very good sort of a man," 299.
Parsons, Mr., 149.
Partridge, Mr., medical man, 324.
Passamaquoddy Bay, islands in, 222, 227.
Patton, Admiral Philip, 411.
Paymaster. See Burke, Edmund; Barré, Isaac.
office of, 40, 186.
Payne:
Captain, 210.
Sir R[alph], 113.
Peers:
creation of, 197.
House of. See Lords.
Peister, Mr. de, dealings of, with the Indians, 294.
Pelham:
Henry, position and measures of [as First Lord of the Treasury, in 1753], 23, 24.
Mr. (1789), goes to Ireland, 242.
Pelham-Holles, Thomas, Duke of Newcastle, Secretary of State, 4 (2). document sent to, 23.
position and measures of [in 1753], 23, 24.
as First Lord of the Treasury, letters from, 31, 32.
in relation to Dodington, 31, 32.
does not know his own mind, 36.
proposed ministry of [in coalition with Pitt, 1757], 39, 40, 41.
and Pitt. See Pitt, William.
in relation to official appointments, 49, 251.
supposed views of, in relation to Lord Bute, 280.
Pellew, Sir Edward, 395.
letters from, alluded to, 398.
Pells, the, Clerk of. See Dodington.
Pembrokeshire, 200, 201, 212, 241.
address to the King sent up by, 200.
High Sheriff of. See Knox, William.
Peninsular War, the, 429.
bad health of the troops, 430.
Penn.
Mr., 253.
William, success of, in his colony of Pennsylvania, 211, 292.
Pennsylvania, 134.
inhabitants of, 288, 289.
merchants of, 257.
Penn's success in, 211, 292.
a sanctuary for the persecuted, 292.
Pennyfather, Mr., 60.
Penobscott, the river, 154, 227, 228, 230.
Pensacola, 135, 168. inhabitants of, must be armed, 158.
silver mines near, 161.
Pension Bill, 242.
Pensioners, band of, 331.
Percy [Smithson], Sir Hugh, Duke of Northumberland, 154.
letter from, 181.
intended resignation of, 253.
Percy letters, the, 132.
Perring, Sir John, Lord Mayor, letter from, 402.
Pery, Edmund [Sexton], letter from, 235.
as Lord Pery, 243.
Peterborough:
Bishop of. See Madan, Dr. Spencer.
Bishop's Palace at, letters dated from, 354, 431.
Petersburgh, treaty of, with Vienna, alluded to, 123.
Petre, Robert Edward, Lord, letter of, on behalf of the Roman Catholics, alluded to, 245.
Petrie, Mr., 132.
Petty-Fitzmaurice, William, Earl of Shelburne, borough vacant by his becoming a peer (1761), 49.
as President of the Board of Trade, 282.
——, resignation of, 305.
as Secretary for the Southern Department (1767), his office, 94.
his sympathy with America, 116. at Bath, 154.
in opposition, 260, 267.
as Secretary of State (1782), 199, 283–285, 329, 331, 337.
as First Lord of Treasury (July, 1782, et seq), 185–187, 189–192, 200, 228, 241, 286, 329, 331.
explains his creed in the house of Lords, 186.
called the Jesuit Earl, 190.
as Marquis of Lansdowne, 200, 369.
political anecdotes concerning, 281–286.
private secretary of, 284.
house of, 178.
Philadelphia, 120, 138–140, 143, 144, 147, 148, 168. evacuation of, by the English, 145, 146, 266.
letter dated at, 315.
Philip V., King of Spain, 130. niece of, ibid.
Philip, Don, eldest son of Charles III. of Spain, 43.
Philip and Mary, Parliament of, alluded to, 76.
Philippine Islands, the, 264, 355.
defences of, 355.
expedition against, proposed, 354.
Philips (Phillips):
Mr., M.P. in Ireland, 58.
[Sir Richard], Lord Milford, M.P., 212.
[Major General William], 126.

Phillipson, General [Richard Burton], proposed as member for Eye, 342. 343, 353, 354.
death of, alluded to, 381.
Phipps, Constantine John, Earl of Mulgrave, 329.
death of, 217.
Picton, corps of, embarked, 154.
Pigot:
George, Lord, Governor of Madras, 129.
Hugh, Rear-Admiral, made a lord of the Admiralty, 329.
——, is sent out to supersede Rodney in the West Indies, 334, 335.
[Colonel Robert], in command at New York, 135.
Pisa, letter dated at, 214.
Pitt:
Elizabeth, at Florence, 25 (2).
Hester, Countess of Chatham, death of, 217.
——, brothers of, 217. And see Grenville, Richard, George, and James.
John, Earl of Chatham, First Lord of the Admiralty, 356, 362, 364 (2), 365, 369.
——, letters from, 362, 370, 371 (2).
——, orders from, 358.
——, sends a squadron to the East Indies under Capt. Cornwallis, 340.
Sam, 5.
——, father and uncle of, 5.
Mr. [Thomas, of Boconnoc], of the Prince of Wales' party, 16.
Thomas, Lord Camelford, and his wife, grief of, on the death of their son, 352.
William, 4, 5.
——, daughter of, 5.
William, afterwards Earl of Chatham, comes to town (1756), 36.
——, expected dismissal of (March, 1757), 37–39.
——, negotiations for his return, 40, 41.
——, speech of, concerning American manufactures, quoted, 95.
——, his raising of war loans as Secretary of State (and Premier, 1758), alluded to, 100.
——, resignation of (October, 1761), 50.
——, the people's attitude towards (1762), 53.
——, interview of, with George III. (Aug., 1763), 303, 304.
——, negotiations with (1763, 1764), 252, 303–305.
——, his speech against the Stamp Act (Jan., 1766), alluded to, 92.
——, the King's complaint of his opposition to it, 260.
——, Conway's connexion with (1765), 251.
Pitt, William—contd.
——, as Lord Chatham, his return to office (1766), 263, 264.
——, recovery of, "from his long delirium" (1768), 264.
——, the Emperor's remark concerning, 177.
——, "that best of men in, and worst of men out of power," 446.
——, party of, in relation to Lord Bute, 53.
—— [and Newcastle], poem concerning, 47.
William, jun., letter to, 210.
——, bill of, 191.
——, papers sent to, by Knox, 199, 200, 202, 209.
——, peers created by, 394.
——, warrants presented by, to the King, 209.
——, "dressing" given by, to Lord North (June, 1783), 191.
——, would be mad to interfere in the disputes on the continent, (1787), 200.
——, his youth when he took office, alluded to, 201.
——, his choice of his colleagues, complained of, 201.
——, Knox's attitude towards, 201. 202.
——, Lord Rawdon's opinion of and estrangement from, 203, 204.
——, relations of, with Lord Chancellor Thurlow, 203, 204.
——, Thurlow's opinion of, 278.
——, "is all-powerful everywhere" (1790), 353.
——, popularity of, 356, 360.
——, appointment of, as Warden and Admiral of the Cinque Ports (1792), 381.
——, reported quarrel of, with Addington, 406.
——, in relation to Earl St. Vincent, 418, 419.
——, death of, 417, 418.
——, comparison of, with Fox, 429.
"Pizarro," a play, 392.
Planets, rotatory motion of, 231.
Plowden, letter dated at, 160.
Plymouth, 129, 310–312, 389, 392, 402.
Admiral Rodney at, 179.
Admiral Pigot at, 334, 335.
Colonel of Marines at, 340.
member for, 347, 352.
Port Admiral of, 414.
ships at or going to, 300, 338, 414.
Spanish vessels sent to, 409.
Dock, letter dated at, 345.
Sound, letter dated at, 408.
Pointe au Fer, 126.
Pointe du Sable, advance of Burgoyne and Philips to, 126.
Poland, 117.
division of, alluded to, 114.
election [of King] in, 15.

Pole :
Charles, 369.
Mr., and his nephew, 336.
——, death of, 328.
William Wellesley (q.v.) takes the name of Pole on his uncle's death, 328.
——, letter from, 390.
——, has not yet been heard of, 336.
——, his delight on Admiral Cornwallis' success, 389, 390.
——, his mother, 336.
Poles, persecution of, 381.
Polignac :
Count, 159.
Countess, 120.
Polish Colonel. See Grabowski.
Political anecdotes. 261 et seq.
Pollard, Mr., 295 (2).
Pollock, Mr., 283, 326.
Polygar, in the Carnatic, camp of, 350.
Pombal, Monsieur de, 130.
Pomfret, Lord. See Fermor.
Pondicherry, 347, 348, 358, 387. capture of, 120.
the French withdraw their military establishment from, 345.
siege of, to be commenced at once, 385 (2).
Ponsonby, Frederick, Viscount Duncannon, made a Lord of the Admiralty, 329.
Pontchartrain, Lake, 159.
Pool, Peter, letter to, 160.
Poor rates, 287, 288.
Pope, the [Clement XIII.], said to have been poisoned, 117.
Pope, Alexander, poet, 6.
Popery :
growth of, Acts to prevent, alluded to, 63.
laws concerning [Popery Laws], agitation in relation to, 235.
And see Roman Catholics.
Porte, the. See Turkey.
Porten, Sir Stanier, 184, 283.
Porteous, Dr. Beilby, Bishop of London, in relation to the Slave trade, 203.
Porter's Lodge, letter dated at, 391.
Portglenane, in Ireland, 441.
Portland, Duke of. See Bentinck.
Porto Rico, 269.
Port Patrick, 241.
Port Royal, 249.
Portsmouth (England), 321, 327, 399.
commissioner at. See Saxton.
——, the late. See Martin.
election matters at, 339, 343, 353.
letters dated at, 392, 425.
officers going to or from, 127, 245, 300, 314, 330, 409.
port of, opened to Russian ships, 116.
squadron sails from, 344.
Yard, letter dated from, 389.
Portsmouth (New Hampshire), abandonment of, 174.
Portugal, 194, 196, 426.
Queen of, 172.
Portugal—contd.
attack on, alluded to, 287.
British successes in, 428.
coast of, 127, 323.
Court of, in relation to the Cardinals, 117.
English Ambassador to. See Lyttelton, Wm. Henry.
French expelled from, 230.
in connexion with the American Colonies, 129 (2), 130.
letter from, alluded to, 430.
ships of, 374.
war of, with Spain, feared, 123.
——, in South America, 115, 130.
Portuguese Minister to France. See La Cerda.
Postmasters-General, the, 140. And see Frankland, Sir Thos., sen.
Post Office, the matter of the packet boats to be represented to, 140.
Poulett :
John, Earl Poulett, 18.
P. [sic, ? Vere], Dodington's brother member [for Bridgewater, 1742], 17.
Poultry Office, the, a place in, 56.
Powerscourt, Lord. See Wingfield, Edward.
Pownall, John, Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, 87, 106, 257, 258, 270, 282, 283, 285.
letters from, 105, 107 (2), 108 (3), 110 (3), 111 (3), 114, 115, 118 (2), 121, 122, 126, 127 (2), 141, 203, 213.
appointment of, alluded to, 95.
fees taken by, 183.
instructions drawn up by, relating to the Colonies, 259.
treatise of, alluded to, 99, 102.
Poyntz [? Stephen], 5.
Poynings' Law, alluded to, 77.
Pratt, Sir Charles, Attorney-General, 74 opinion of, 103.
in relation to the Stamp Act, 260.
as Lord Camden, 154.
letter to, 219.
Presbyterians, in Ulster, 443, 446.
Prescott :
Major-General [Richard], taken prisoner, 135–137.
(or Preston), convention with, mentioned, 154.
President of the Council. See Cooper, Lord Ashley ; Bathurst, Lord ; Russell, Duke of Bedford ; Leveson-Gower, Earl Gower ; Carteret, Lord Granville ; Compton, Earl of Wilmington.
Preston :
(or Prescott),. See Prescott.
Lieutenant-Colonel, 310.
Prestwich, John, afterwards Sir John, 439.
Prettyman (afterwards Tomline), George [Bishop of Lincoln and Dean of St. Paul's], patronage exercised by, 380.

Prettyman or Tomline, George, Bishop of Lincoln, William Pitt receives the sacrament from, 417.
Prevost (Prevot), Brig.-General Augustine, disputes of, with General Tonyn, 145. his success against the enemy, 158.
Price [Pryce]:
Charles, 156.
[? Governor of Georgia], 106.
Priestley, Dr. Joseph, at Bonn, 116.
Prince Edward Island (formerly St. Johns):
agent for. See Knox, William.
Assembly of, 216, 217, 219.
——, resolutions or Acts of, 216, 218 (2).
Assembly Room, letter dated from, 216.
civil officers of, 225.
clergy in, ibid.
Committee of Correspondence in, letter from, 219.
——, letter to, 217.
Council of, 216.
——, minute of, 219.
——, Deputy Clerk of. See Lee, Robert.
Governor of. See Desbarres.
——, fund provided for, 225.
letters dated from, 219, 225, 366.
Lieutenant-Governor of. See Fanning, Edmund. measures for improvement of, 222, 226.
new towns and churches for, proposed, 217, 218.
produce of, 221.
Prince of Wales' Island, 345, 346, 349, 372.
Privy Council:
Clerk of, letters to, 215, 220, 224, 228.
Committee of, 199.
——, resolutions of, 215.
the King's approbation signified by, 91. matters laid before, 253–255, 267.
meetings of, 256, 274.
orders in, alluded to, 190, 191, 430.
President of. See President.
Secretaries of, 254.
Privy Council office, 175.
Privy Counsellors, 270. presence of, at Royal Wedding, 306.
Privy Seal. See Legge, Lord, Earl of Dartmouth.
office of, disputes concerning, 256, 261.
Proby:
Captain, 298.
Dr. [Baptist], Dean of Lichfield, 354.
——, his wife and son, ibid.
Propagation of the Gospel, Society for:
in relation to the Slave trade, 203, 292.
grants from, desired, 225, 226.
Secretary of. See Morrice, Dr.
Protestant dissenters, Acts relating to, alluded to, 245.
Provence, winter in, 158.
Prowse:
Captain, 400.
Thomas, M.P. for Somersetshire, letters from, 16, 17 (2).
——, a member of the Secret Committee, 17.
Prussia, 365, 371.
[Frederick the Great], King of, 42 (2), 45, 116, 117, 123.
——, physician of. See Baylies.
——, victories of, 46.
[Frederick William III.], King of, 360, 371.
——, said to "talk much and do nothing," 200.
Prussia and Austria, united armies of, marching on Paris, 382, 384.
Prussian:
army or troops, 43, 129, 200.
——, has crossed the Rhine, 382.
minister, 200.
Pryce. See Price.
Psalmody, remarks on, 448.
Puget, Captain, his plan for destroying the French fleet, 404.
Pulteney, Sir William (afterwards Earl of Bath), arraigns the Ministers, 165.
Walpole's answer to, 104.
Puns, popularity of, 1.
Pynsent, Sir William, 17.
Pyrenees, the, passage over, 200.
Purefoy, Lieutenant, wounded at Bangalore, 368.
Putney, Mr. Pitt's death at, 418.

Q

Quadruple Alliance, the, 2.
Quebec, 123, 138, 139, 173, 220, 227, 228, 270, 284.
Act, Bill or Law, alluded to, 112, 138, 202. affairs of, neglect of, 111.
camp before, letters dated at, 286.
Constitution of, 202.
Governor of. See Haldimand, General.
letters dated at, 294, 295.
——, from, alluded to, 149.
siege of feared, 123 (3).
province of, ill-government of, 169.
——, Governor of. See Cramahé.
Queda, King of, letter from, 364.
Queensbury (Queenborough), Duke of. See Douglas.
Quiberon, Bay of, 397.
Quinze, game of, 313.

R

Ractal, Mr., nephew of Sir Richard Heron, 156.
Radstock, Lord. See Waldegrave.
Ragusean vessel, a, 408.
Rainham, Lord Townshend's house, letters dated at, 125, 140, 141, 173.
death of Lord Townshend at, 306.
Ralph, J., 20.
letters from, 21, 23.
Rame House, letter dated at, 425.
Ramsay, —, letters from, alluded to, 176.
Raphael, cartoons of, 49.
Raphoe, Bishop of [Nicholas Forster], 60.
Rapin Thoyras, History of, recommended, 33.
Ravenhill, Lichfield, letter dated at, 432.
Rawdon-Hastings, Francis, Lord Rawdon (afterwards Earl of Moira and Marquis of Hastings), letters from, 203 (2), 205, 210.
letter from, alluded to, 278.
suggested as Secretary for Ireland, 242.
peerage granted to, alluded to, 204.
his connexion with the Prince of Wales, 204, 205.
protests against Knox's vehement language, 206.
brother of, standing for Lincoln, 210. party of, 204–206, 278.
——, called "the Armed Neutrality," 208.
Raynall, Abbé, 178.
Rebellion of 1715, alluded to, 16.
Red Banks, 147.
Red Book, the, 326.
Redmond, Colonel, regiment of, 438.
Reformation, the, allusion to, 426.
Regency and Regency Bill, business of, 204, 207, 251, 279.
Regnier, —, bill of, alluded to, 305.
Regulating Bill, 257.
Riedesel (Reidhesel), Baron von, Major-General, troops under, 126.
Repnin, Prince, 255.
Restoration, the, alluded to, 58.
Retz, Cardinal de, writings of praised, 33.
Revenue laws, alluded to, 102.
Revolution of 1688, alluded to, 58.
Reynolds:
Captain, 402.
Col. John, letter from, 435.
——, articles of agreement by, 436.
John, late Governor of Georgia, 246–248.
Reynolds—contd.
Sir Joshua, picture by, 427.
Lord Albemarle's footman, 16.
Rhangapati Nauk, proposal of, 350.
Rhine, the, 382.
Rhode Island, 134, 135, 257, 315.
fleet for, 175.
French fleet at, 148, 171, 317. frigates burnt at, 318.
garrison of, 153.
inhabitants of, 288.
Rice:
son-in-law of Lord Talbot, appointment [as a Lord of Trade], given to, 49.
——, as a Lord of Trade, 87.
Mr., 135.
Rich:
Mr., 392.
Sir Thomas, 179.
Richards, ——, 5.
Richecourt, Count, 26.
Richelieu, Duke of, 34.
Richmond, Sir Robert Walpole's house at, 4, 5.
Ricketts, T. R., letter from, alluded to, 398.
Rickman, Mr., 339.
Rider. See Ryder.
Rigby, Richard, 41.
as paymaster of the forces, 254.
in relation to the examination called for by Sir W. Howe, 262.
animosity of, against Lord G. Germain, 272, 276.
Rio de Janeiro, disturbances in, 116.
Riow, Lieutenant E., in command of the Guardian, goes down with his ship, 352. letter from, ibid.
his mother and sister, 353.
Risbrack. See Rysbrack.
Roberts:
—, deputy Remembrancer of Exchequer in Ireland, 59.
[? Robertson], Governor, 154.
Robertson, James, Governor of New York, letter from, 173.
letter to, 182.
Robinson:
John, Secretary to the Treasury, 275
——, letters from, 149, 167 (2).
——, illness of, alluded to, 266.
Mr., Secretary of Marquis Cornwallis, 409.
Thomas, Lord Grantham, ambassador at Madrid, 152.
Rochetts, letter dated at, 397.
Rochford, Earl of. See Nassau.
Rochfort ships, 410, 411, 412, 413, 416.
Rockingham, Marquis of. See Watson-Wentworth.
Rodney, Admiral Sir George Brydges, 162, 166, 175, 184, 185, 312, 329, 330.
letters from, 195, 325, 337.

Rodney, Admiral—contd.
his friendly assistance to Lady Cornwallis, 305.
the King says he is to have Greenwich Hospital, 305.
is to command in the West Indies, 321, 323.
ships taken by, to Gibraltar, 323.
success of [against de Guichen], 167.
complains that his orders were not obeyed, 168.
character of, very high (after his engagement with de Guichen), 324.
does not praise any of his captains, ibid.
his capture of St. Eustatius, 177. arrival of, at Plymouth, 179.
his victory over de Grasse, 184, 334, 337.
——, verses on, 332.
to be made an English peer, 335 (2).
Rogers:
Dr., 60.
Mr., 336.
Rollin, History of, recommended, 33.
Rolls, Master of the. See Clarke, Sir Thomas; Sewell, Sir Thomas.
——, office of, vacant, 280, 281.
Roman Catholic regiments, proposed raising of, in Canada, 120, 289.
Roman Catholics:
in England, 235.
in Ireland. See Ireland.
in the American Colonies, only in Maryland have the "rights of men," 292.
their disavowal of persecution, 236.
Bills for repealing laws against, alluded to, ibid.
Emancipation of, paper on, 245.
Roman State, money affairs of, 244.
Romans, the, alluded to, 408.
Romanzow, Marshal, 114.
Rome:
letter dated from, 10.
traveller to, 26.
Romney, Earl of. See Marsham.
Rood Island, 149.
Rooke, Sir George, allusion to, 372.
Rose:
—, (1733–4), 59.
George, Secretary to the Treasury, 199, 286.
——, letter to and from, 209.
——, paper sent to, 291.
Ross:
Colonel, afterwards General, Alexander, aide-de-camp to Lord Cornwallis in India, 350, 357, 360, 376, 378, 379.
——, as General, 429, 433.
[? General], 426.
David, letter from Prince Edward Island signed by, 219.
Ross—contd.
Admiral Sir John Lockhart, anecdote of his sailors, 321.
Mrs., wife of the General, 429.
—, brings news from America, 326.
—, to fill the seat at Eye, 343.
Rosse, Ireland, letter dated at, 435.
Parliament soldiers near, ill-behaviour of, ibid.
Rothes, Earl of. See Leslie, John.
Rous, Sir John, member for Suffolk, 353.
Rowley, Admiral Sir Joshua, 339.
Roxburgh, burning of, 122.
Royal family, civilities from, 15.
Royal prerogative, powers given by, 207.
Royal Society, "Philosophical Transactions" of, for 1783, quoted, 231.
Rubens, Peter Paul, allusion to, 48.
Rumbold, Mr., 129, 176.
Russell:
Edward, Earl of Orford, Admiral, illness of, 2, 3.
——, letter from, 3.
Frederick, Marquis of Tavistock, marries Lady Elizabeth Keppel, 310.
John, Duke of Bedford, 37, 38, 39, 94.
——, Mr. Fox's great auxiliary, 24.
——, as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, (the Governor), 70.
——, ——, order of, alluded to, 72.
——, ——, vote of credit for, 73.
——, ——, "has little reason to be pleased" with his situation, 75.
——, ——, letters written to, after his return to England, alluded to, 76, 78.
——, as President of the Council (1763), 252.
——, in relation to the Duke of Grafton's ministry (1767), 250, 251.
——, friends or "clanship" of, 251, 254.
Mr., "old and infirm," 433.
Russia, 18, 194.
Catherine, Empress of, 116, 365, 369.
Ambassador Extraordinary of, 102.
Armed Neutrality projected by, 271.
hostility of Turkey towards, 129.
in relation to the House of Bourbon, 291.
mediation from, 173.
peace of, with Turkey, anticipated, or alluded to, 114, 116, 313.
a port in the Mediterranean desired by, 291.
trade with, 292, 293.
war with, likelihood of, discussed, 369, 372 (2).
Russian troops in Naples, 224.
Russians: assistance of, secured, 121.
at Spa, 159.

Ryder, Rider:
Sir Dudley, Solicitor-General for Ireland, 60.
Dr. John, Archbishop of Tuam, 111.
——, Mrs., his wife, 111.
Rysbrack (Risbrack), the sculptor, 10.
Rycaut or Ricaut. Paul, his Turkish History, 441.

S

Sable Isle, 149.
Sackville:
Charles, Earl of Middlesex (eldest son of Lionel Duke of Dorset), 20, 58, 63.
——, letter to, alluded to, 21.
Lord George (3rd son of Lionel, Duke of Dorset), his conduct at Minden, dismissal and court-martial, 44, 45.
——, burnt in effigy, 44.
——, court-martial on, objected to by Lord Chancellor Bowes, 74.
——, as "patentee officer," in Ireland, 63.
——, wishes to be secretary at war, 301.
—— as Lord George Germain and Viscount Sackville. See Germain.
John Frederick, Duke of Dorset, 125.
Lionel Cranfield, Duke of Dorset, as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, 57–64, 66.
——, letters from, 56, 58.
——, arrival of, in Ireland, 56.
——, his departure from Ireland, 61.
——, again Lord Lieutenant, 67.
——, is returning to England, ibid.
——, is reckoned a trimmer, 24.
Sagadahock River, 228.
Salano, Admiral, fleet of, 184, 185.
Salisbury, Lord George Sackville burnt in effigy at, 44.
St. Ann's, 123.
St. Aubyn, Sir J., 17.
St. Christopher's or St. Kitts, 322, 328, 333.
import tax in, 220.
St. Clair, Mr., made a judge, 15.
St. Domingo, 162, 167, 291.
St. Dominique, ship of, 169.
St. Eustatius (Eustatia), Rodney at, 177. taking of, alluded to, 334.
papers on, alluded to, 198.
St. Helena, letter dated at, 387.
St. Helens, 144.
the Hibernia at, 424.
St. John, Henry, Viscount Bolingbroke, attack of, upon the Bible, alluded to, 23.
friends and followers of, alluded to, 22.
St. John's, agent for, 229.
corporation of, petition from, alluded to, 229.
St. John's—contd.
—— (Canada) forces at, 126.
——, ——, garrison of, capitulations of, alluded to, 124.
—— (Island of) grants to loyalists in, 191. And see Prince Edward Island.
St. John's island (near Charlestown), 135, 183.
St. Lawrence:
Gulf of, 221, 233.
river, 160.
——, fishing in, 233.
——, navigation of, 220.
St. Leger, Sir John, Baron of Exchequer, Ireland, 59.
St. Lucie, island of, 166.
St. Mary's Cape, 410, 424.
St. P., 392.
St. Paul, island of, 342.
St. Pedro Bay, 407.
St. Phillip. fort of, in Minorca, siege of, 33, 34.
St. Pierre, island of 149, 286.
St. Real, Abbé, works of, alluded to, 33.
St. Vincent, Cape, 337.
St. Vincent, island of, letters received from, alluded to, 109.
capitulation of, 162.
death of Governor Leyborne at, 118.
Governor of, 125.
import tax in, 220.
Saltram, Lord Borringdon's house, 345.
Sandwell, Lord Dartmouth's seat, 108, 109.
letters dated at, 120, 124, 136, 151, 162 (2), 164.
Sandwich, Earl of. See Montagu, John.
Sandwich, in Kent, member for, 356.
Sandy Hook, 148.
fleet off, 317.
letter dated from, 182.
San Philipe, Castle of, Ferroll, 407.
Santander, 406.
Saratoga, 276.
Sardinia, King of, treaty of, mentioned, 15.
Sargent, Chambers & Co., bankers, 223, 224.
Sattamungalum, 359 (2).
Saumarez, Sir James, 395.
Saunders, Admiral Sir Charles, 299.
death of, alluded to, 315.
Savannah, Georgia, 156, 187, 188, 189, 246.
letters dated at, 82, 83, 85, 86.
Savoy, 384.
Saxham, Suffolk, 343.
Saxony, princes of, 117.
Saxton, Charles, afterwards Sir Charles, Commissioner at Portsmouth, 353, 364.
letters from, 389, 392.
Scarborough, Earl of. See Lumley Sanderson.
Scheldt, the, free navigation of, 272.
Schomberg, Mr., promotion of, to be post captain, 363.

Scotland, 303.
Lord Advocate of. See Dundas, Henry.
Lord Chief Baron of. See Dundas, Robert Saunders.
persons in, enquiries concerning land made by, 218.
rebellion in, alluded to, 68.
regiments of, 157.
trade with, 221.
Scott:
[George Louis], sub-preceptor to George Prince of Wales, 22.
John, Attorney-General, Ireland, 234, 238, 239.
——, letters from, 155, 190, 192.
——, letter to, 237.
——, note from, endorsing Sir Richard Heron's letter, 237.
Mr., British Vice-Consul, 224.
Tom, 300.
Scottish law and bar, 267.
Scrope, John, Secretary of the Treasury, letters from, 4, 5 (2).
Secker, Thomas, Archbishop of Canterbury, 203. chaplain of. See Porteous, Beilby.
Secretaries of State. See Pelham-Holles, Duke of Newcastle; Darcy, Earl of Holderness; Fox, Henry; Pitt, William.
——, "the two" [Pitt, and Holderness], 37.
——, should be in House of Commons, 37.
——, appointments as, made or proposed, 107, 268, 276.
——, requisitions of, for stores, &c., alluded to, 167.
——, ridiculed, 201.
——, memoranda concerning, 256.
——, "the three," behaviour of, at a Council meeting, 271.
——, excuses made for, 301.
——, office of, papers no longer in, 200.
——, Northern Department. See Montagu, Earl of Sandwich; Conway, H. Seymour; Thynne, Lord Weymouth; Nassau, Earl of Rochford.
——,——, the foreign business to be given to, 273.
——, Southern Department. See Stuart, Earl of Bute; Grenville, George; Lennox, Duke of Richmond; Montagu, Earl of Halifax; Petty, Earl of Shelburne; Thynne, Lord Weymouth; Nassau, Earl of Rochford; Howard, Earl of Suffolk; Murray, Viscount Stormont.
——, ——, proposal to throw the American Department into. See American Department, below.
——, ——, union of the American Department with, 283.
Secretaries of State—contd.
——, ——, Under Secretaries. See Wood, R.; Sutton, R.; Whateley, Thos.; Willes, Mr.
——, Home Department, 216. And see North, Lord; Petty, Earl of Shelburne; Grenville, W. W.
——, ——, office of, 213.
——, Foreign Department. See Fox, C. J.; Grenville, W. W.
——, for America and the Colonies. See Hill, Earl of Hillsborough; Legge, Earl of Dartmouth; Germain, Lord George; Ellis, Welbore.
——, ——, objection to regarding, as a Secretary of State, 256.
——, ——, Under Secretaries. See Pownall, John; Knox, William.
——, ——, Department of (American Department), 95, 240, 285.
——, ——, ——, proposal to merge in the Southern Department, 254, 273, 276, 283.
——, ——, ——, queries concerning, 448.
——, ——, ——, suppression of, 183, 196.
Send Grove, letter dated at, 342.
Senegal, despatches from, 155.
Sepoys, 360. corps of, 368.
fight with, 359.
Seres, nation called, at Pensacola, 161.
Seringapatam, 373, 375.
attack on, alluded to, 376.
camp near, letters dated from, 371, 376, 377, 378 (2).
Seve, near Paris, letter dated from, 197.
Severn, the river, 17.
Sewell, [Sir Thomas], made Master of the Rolls, 281.
Sewendroog, fortress of, taking of, 376.
Seyd Sing Sahib, one of Tippoo's general officers, 357, 359.
Seymour:
[Algernon] Earl of Hertford, 4.
Francis, Marquis of Hertford, 431.
Lord Hugh, 392.
Shaftesbury. See Cooper.
Shannon, Earl of. See Boyle, Richard.
Sharpe, Dr., letter from, 23.
Sheer, Captain, plan of, 210.
Sheffield, Lord. See Holroyd.
"Shelala" friends, 392.
Shelborne, Col. Thomas, Commissioner for the surrender of Kiltenan, 436.
Shelburne, Earl of. See Petty-Fitzmaurice, William.
Sheridan, [Richard Brinsley], 279.
Sheriffs, payments due from, 6, 7.
Shetland Islands, the, 291.
Ships, casual notices, passim:
ordnance brig, 122.
ordnance transports, 125 (2), 127, 138.
packet boats, bad state of, 140.

Ships, named:
Acasta, 409.
Achille, 409.
Active, 128.
Æolus, 415.
Agamemnon, 328.
Albion, 317.
Alexander, 328.
——, letter dated on board, 337.
Amazon, 295.
Amphion, 398, 399 (2).
Andromeda, 143.
Apollo, 317.
Ardent, 332
Ariel, sloop, 365, 366.
Asia, 315.
Assistance, 328, 379.
Atalanta, 365.
Barfleur, 355, 369.
——, letter dated on board, 2, 327.
Bedford, 317.
Bellisle, 399, 401, 402, 412.
——, taking of, 298.
Bellona, 413, 414.
Bien Aimée, 386, 387.
Boadicea, 400.
Bombay Castle, 330.
Boreas, letter dated on board, 339.
Bounty, run away with, by her crew, 352.
Boyne, 315.
Bridgewater, 371, 372.
Bristol, 129.
Britannia, 403.
Bute, 128.
Cæsar, 332, 414, 415, 416.
——, letters dated on board, 413, 415, 416.
Canada, 327, 330, 335, 337, 338.
——, letters sent to, 327, 329.
Canopus, 412.
Centurion, 317, 381.
Cerberus, 122, 318.
Charon, 327.
Chatham, 315.
Clyde, 394.
Colossus, 381, 400.
Concord, 387.
Conqueror, 317, 412.
Cornwall, 150, 317.
Courageous, 355.
Courageux, 413, 414.
Courière, taken by Royal Sovereign, 169.
Crown, 342, 344, 351, 379.
——, letter dated on board, 366.
——, resignation of captain of, 349.
Culloden, 317, 401.
——, letters dated on board, 401, 402.
Daphne, 323.
Defence, 424.
Defiance, 34.
Dispatch, 362.
Donegal, 399, 412, 415, 423.
Drake, 312, 387.
Duke, 369.

Ships, named—contd.
Duquay Trouin, 414.
Eagle, 314.
Earl Talbot, 381.
Egyptian, 405.
Endymion, 409.
Euridice, 334, 336, 348.
Euryalus, 412.
——, letter dated on board, 412.
Experiment, 164.
Fame, 317.
Formidable, 332, 369.
Flora, 318.
Fortune, 181.
Foudroyant, 338, 339 (2), 415.
Fougeux, 407.
Ganges, 339.
Gibraltar, 179, 421.
Glorieux, 332.
Goddard, Indiaman, 362.
Grafton, 317.
——, casting away of, 62.
Greyhound, 29.
Guadaloupe, 314, 317.
Guardian, lost, 352.
——, commander of. See Riou, E.
——, crew of, saved, 353.
Hector, 332.
Hero, 414.
Hibernia, letter dated on board, 424.
Hope, loss of, 125.
Houghton, 360.
Howe, 163.
Illustrious, 355, 369.
——, letter dated on board, 405.
Indombtable, 395.
Intrepid, 166.
Invincible, 317.
Isis, 131, 315, 317, 356, 393.
Jane, transport ship, 122.
Juno, 318.
Juste, 392.
Kent, 314.
Kingfisher, 318.
Lark, 318.
Latona, 405 (2).
Leopard, 356, 358, 373.
Leviathan, 412.
Lion, 318, 320, 321, 322, 324.
——, letter sent to, 327.
Lizard, lieutenant of, 123.
Loire, 414.
London, 355, 369.
Lucy, lugger, 406, 407, 408 (2).
Magnificent, 328, 394, 402 n.
Majestic, 395.
Malta, 424.
Maria, 295.
Mary Ann, 308.
Medea, 323.
——, captain of, 316.
Medusa, 409, 423.
——, letter dated on board, 417.
Melville Castle, 344.
Minerva, 362, 363, 379, 382, 385.
Minotaur, 400, 408.
Monmouth, 317.

Ships, named—contd.
Montagu, 337.
Mont Blanc, 414.
Naiad, 405.
Neptune, 400.
Niobe, 403.
Northumberland, Indiaman, 378, 400.
——, letters dated on board, 403, 405, 406, 407.
Olden Barnevelt, Dutch ship, 407.
Orion, 395.
Orpheus, 318.
Pallas, 314.
Perseverance, 365.
Phœnix, 360, 375, 413, 414, 415.
Pickle, 407 (2).
Pomona, 414.
Prince, 413.
Prince George, 415.
Prince of Wales, letters dated on board, 400, 410.
Princess Amelia, Indiaman, 370.
Princess Royal, 317, 355, 369, 415.
Queen, 383.
Queen Charlotte, 355, 383.
Raleigh, 312.
Ranger, 384.
Reasonable, 317.
Redoubtable, 407.
Renown, 317, 328.
Repulse, 406.
Resolution, 337.
Resolve, 375.
Revolutionnaire, 413.
Richmond, 127.
Romney, 100.
Romulus, 175.
Royal George, 355.
Royal Oak, 317.
Royal Sovereign, 169, 399.
——, letter dated on board, 361.
Russell, 317, 394.
St. George, 369, 383.
Sandwich, 323.
——, letter dated on board, 325.
San Josef, letter dated on board, 401.
Santa Margarita, 414.
Santander, Spanish brig, 406, 407.
Saturn, 355.
Scipion, 413.
Seahorse, 341.
Sirius, 400.
Somerset, 315.
Sovereign, 412.
Spartiale, 412.
Speke, hospital ship, 122.
Spencer, 412.
Stag, 299.
Sulivan, 345.
Sultan, 317, 340.
Superb, 412, 432.
Swallow, 373, 387, 388.
Swan, 378.
Swift, 308.
Swiftsure, 412.
Tartar, 153.
Thames, 358.
Ships, named—contd.
Thunderer, 175, 299.
Tigre, 412.
Tourville, 334.
Triton, 386.
Union, 126.
Valiant, 327, 355.
Venerable, 395, 399 (2), 400.
——, letters dated from, 399, 400.
Venus, 345.
Vestal, 349, 377.
Victory, 339, 355, 369, 383, 398 (3), 399 (2).
——, letters dated on board, 388, 398, 399, 401, 402, 410.
Ville de Paris (the French Admiral), 332, 334, 395, 396 (2), 401, 414, 420.
——, order of battle signed on board, 405, 421.
Viper, 346.
Warren Hastings, Indiaman, 360.
Wasp, sloop, 300.
Windham, new packet boat, 62.
Woodcote, 386, 387.
Zebra, 339.
Shirley, Mr., husband of Lady Orford, 43.
letter to, 44.
Shortland, Captain, 415.
Shrewsbury, 153.
Shuldham, Admiral, Commander on American station, 314, 315. created Lord Shuldham, 315.
Shuttleworth, Robert, 216.
Sicily, traveller to, 2.
Sims, Dr., a physician, 443.
Sinclair, Captain, 130.
Singleton:
Henry, Prime Serjeant of Ireland, 57, 66.
——, as late Master of the Rolls, Ireland, 74.
Mark (husband of Lady Mary Cornwallis), 392, 395, 429, 430.
Lady Mary, daughter of Marquis Cornwallis, 429.
——, letter from, 353.
——, not invited to the Queen's ball, 392.
——, going to a masquerade, 393.
Skelly, Major, 367. contest of, with Sepoys, 359.
Skelton:
Lieutenant, 405.
Dr. Philip, letters from, 440–449.
——, his parish. See Fintona.
——, publishes his collected works, 442.
—, pension for, 329.
Skinner, Captain, 183.
Slaves, in America, 82.
Slave trade, the, 202, 222.
arguments for, 291, 292.
Slebech, co. Pembroke, Knox's estate at, 194.
letter dated from, ibid.
Slipper, Captain, killed at Bangalore, 368.

Slough (near Windsor), letter dated from, 231.
Smith:
Dr. [Arthur], Bishop of Down, 69.
Brigadier, 137.
Chief Justice (in New York), 173.
Haddon, rector of Savannah, 189.
Lieutenant, promotion of, 420.
Mr. or Dr., in Ireland, 156, 232, 237.
Mr., 108.
Mrs., 95.
Captain [Thomas] in command of squadron in the Downs, 29.
Smuggling, prevention of, 89.
Sneyd, W. H. Lyttelton's agent (1769), 104, 105.
Solicitor-General. See Wedderburn, Alexander; Yorke, Charles.
appointments to office of, 268.
Somerset, Henry, Duke of Beaufort, 381.
Somerville, John, gunner saved from the wreck of the Guardian, 353.
Sophonisba, story of, alluded to, 8.
Sound, the, forts commanding, 292.
South Sea Bubble, alluded to, 59.
South Seas, the, 355. expedition to, 312.
Southwell, Miss, marriage of, 353.
Souza, Mr. de (agent to Mr. Cuthbert), 356.
Spa (Spaw), 87 (2), 110, 111, 119, 158, 159, 170, 257. anecdotes at, 255.
letters dated at, 111, 112, 119, 120, 134, 135, 137, 143, 159, 176, 178.
Spain, Kings of:
[Ferdinand VI.], death of, 43.
[Charles III., King of Naples], accession of, 43.
——, desires revenge upon the Algerines, 122.
——, pacific disposition of, 268.
——, eldest son of. See Philip, Don.
——, second son of, 43.
——, his carriage, 269.
——, natural brother of. See Filangieri.
[Charles IV.], is equipping ships for a voyage round the world, 347.
——, his "age and important affairs," 408.
——, convention with. See Spain, convention with, below.
Spain, 194, 196, 201, 274, 312.
armaments of, 127.
army from, expected by Americans, 183.
chief ministers of, 268.
coasts of, 127.
convention with, 362, 363, 365, 369.
Court of, 168, 200 (2), 269.
——, in relation to America, 200.
——, in relation to the Cardinals, 117.
declaration of, alluded to, 151, 267.
Spain—contd.
declaration of war by, against England, alluded to, 406, 408.
designs of, 175.
despatches from, alluded to, 33.
embassy to, proposed, 200.
envoy to. See Cumberland, Richard.
fleet of, 12, 120, 168, 290, 328. And see Spanish ships, below.
——, aid of, desired in Ireland, 447.
French expelled from, 230.
Government of, in New Orleans, 158.
——, in Mexico. See Mexico. manifesto of, 119. minister of, 200.
mission to. See Hussey, Thomas. navy of, 175.
neutrality of, 29.
peace with, 365.
people of. See Spaniards.
possessions of, 355 (2).
"Prince of Peace" in, 407.
——, proclamation issued by, 408.
ships of. See Spanish ships.
squadron of, 168, 407.
subjects of, sent to Ferrol, 409.
trade of, or with, 159, 271.
treaty with, 15.
troops of, 161.
war with, 287.
——, anticipated, 209, 223, 264, 318, 354–356, 360–363.
——, fears of, removed, 362, 363, 364.
——, declared, 406–408.
——, orders concerning, 423.
war of, with Portugal, feared, 115, 123.
in connexion with the American Colonies, 129 (2), 130, 145, 172, 268, 269.
in connexion with France, 150–152, 157, 160.
in connexion with Jamaica, 164.
position of, in regard to a peace (1781), 291.
has been tampering with the Northern powers, 364.
hostility of, towards England, feared, 369, 372.
invasion of Ireland by, feared, 446.
Spaniards, the:
character of, 160, 408.
successes of, 130.
Spanish:
fort, 407.
fleet. See Spain, fleet of.
General. See Oreilly.
ships, 407, 409, 410, 416, 423.
——, English vessels captured by, 354.
Spanish Town, Jamaica, letters dated from, 87, 184, 188.
militia of, 185.
Spartel, Cape, 395.

Spencer:
George John, Lord Althorpe, to be elected for Surrey, 331.
——, as [2nd] Earl Spencer, 242.
John [1st] Earl, estates of, 331.
Lady, 389.
Mr. and Mrs. at Spa, 159.
Spike, Peter, letter signed by, 348.
Spithead, 127, 130, 157, 301, 365. fleet at, 370, 372, 420 (2).
guardships at, 355.
letter dated at, 361.
Spotswood [Alexander], late Governor of Virginia, 4.
Stackpoole Court, 212.
Stade, shipping of troops from, 123.
Staffordshire, 347.
pottery trade in, 431.
Stamp Act, the, 89, 92 (2). repeal of, alluded to, 260, 270, 440.
Stanhope:
James, Lord, letter from, 1.
Philip Dormer, Earl of Chesterfield, as late Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, 68.
——, is brought into good humour, 5.
William, Earl of Harrington, 24.
Sir William, in Italy, 26.
——, nephew of, 26.
Stanley:
Hans, chargé d'affaires at Paris, letter from, 49.
——, his embassy to Russia, alluded to, 102.
Mr., 47.
Mr., at Spa, 134, 135.
Stannard [Eaton], Recorder of Dublin, 66 (2).
Staten Island, attack on, 139 (2).
ships at, 327.
Steel, —, 304.
Stephens, Philip, Secretary to the Admiralty, 166, 169, 304, 333, 336, 363.
letter to, 182.
——, alluded to, 175.
as Sir Philip, signature of, 399.
Stewart:
Andrew, 268.
C., member of the House of Assembly, Prince Edward's Island, documents signed by, 216, 219.
——, departure of, pressed, 217.
——, in England, 226.
George, Lord Garlies, 415.
John, 216.
Lieutenant-Colonel, 395.
Robert, Viscount Castlereagh, 227.
——, letter to, 227.
Stikeman, Thomas J., letter from, 224.
Stockbridge, turnpike of, 39.
Stole, groom of, disputes concerning office of, 256.
Stone:
Andrew, 255.
[Andrew], sub-governor to George, Prince of Wales, 22.
Stone—contd.
Dr. George, Archbishop of Armagh (the Primate), 52, 69 (2), 75.
——, sympathy of, for Lord G. Germain, 74.
Lieutenant, 322, 327.
Stoneland Lodge, house of Lord George Germain, 191, 277.
letters dated at, 122, 129–133, 136, 138, 143–145, 157 (4), 160 (2), 161, 166–169, 171–173, 175, 176, 179, 185–187, 191 (2).
Stopford, Captain, letter from, alluded to, 389.
Stott, Captain, 312.
Stourhead, Lord Westcote's daughter dies at, 194.
Stowe, co. Bucks, the residence of Lord Temple, 81.
Strachan, Captain, afterwards Admiral Sir Richard, 345, 349, 361 (2), 362, 375, 377, 379, 418, 423.
letters from, 413, 415, 416.
success of, over French ships, 413.
Strafford, Earl of. See Wentworth.
Strangways:
Stephen Fox, Earl of Ilchester, and Lady Ilchester, 307.
Susan, their daughter, marriage of, ibid.
Stuart:
Lieutenant-Colonel Charles, in India, 358, 359, 367.
——, letter signed by, 348.
John, Earl of Bute, 22, 41.
——, letters from, 49 (2), 51, 52, 54 (2).
——, letters to, 47 (3), 49, 50 (2), 53.
——, indisposition of, 52.
——, metrical epistle to, discussed, 50.
——, praise of, 42, 48.
——, request to, 50.
——, saving of, concerning the Colonies, 282.
——, speech of, alluded to, 52.
——, verses in relation to, 47.
——, uncle of. See Argyll, Duke of.
——, in relation to Dodington, 49, 51, 53, 54.
——, alluded to as "Pollio," 50.
——, attacks upon, 53.
——, his credit with the King, ibid.
——, in relation to the Regency Bill, 251, 252.
——, resignation of (1763), 252.
——, is believed still to "have the lead" (1764), 306.
——, Administration of, alluded to, 267, 268.
——, ——, blow given to, by the Cyder Bill, 280.
John, "Superintendent for the Southern District," paper from, 293.
Will, 4.
——, office expected by, 4, 5.
—, 164,

Stubbs [? George, the painter], 8.
Subsidies to foreign princes objected to, 30.
Suez, 361.
Suffolk, 312.
no fox-hunting in, 310.
opposition in, against members, 353.
Suffolk, Lord. See Howard, Henry.
Sugar Bill, 239.
Sullivan, Major-General John (American army), his march across the Jerseys, 141.
Sumerus, Sir John [? Sir James Saumarez], 411.
Sun, relation of, to the Earth, Knox's inquires concerning, 230, 231.
Surrey, election in, 331.
Sussex, coast of, 383.
Sutton:
Captain, 375, 396.
Charles Manners, Archbishop of Canterbury, 226.
R., Under Secretary of State for Southern Department, (1772) 107, 108.
Sir Richard, 283, 284.
Sweden, 18, 291.
King of, [Gustavus Adolphus III.], 170, 210.
——, assassination of, 379.
——, brother of, [Duke of Sudermania], Regency settled on, 379.
revolution in, alluded to, 170.
trade with, 292, 293.
as an ally of Russia, 369.
Swift, Dr. Jonathan, Dean of St. Patrick's, his attack on Dodington, 63, 64, 65. saying of, quoted, 172.
comparison with, 442.
Swiss:
Cantons, Minister of. See Norton.
Guards, in France, 382.
Switzerland, 111.
Sydney, Lord. See Townshend.
Symonds, —, 417.
Synge, Doctor [Edward], Bishop of Elphin, speech of, 70.

T

Talbot:
Charles, Attorney-General, 7.
William, Lord Talbot, 42, 59, 331.
——, letters from, 45, 46, 48 (2).
——, letter to, alluded to, 21.
——, illness of, 264.
——, son-in-law of, 87.
Tallyrand, Lord Cornwallis dines with, 397.
Tankerville, Earl of. See Bennet, Charles.
Taylor, Mr., 168, 374, 378.
intelligence of, concerning the fleet, 168.
Tellicherry, 366, 373.
Temple:
Colonel, recommended for a regiment in Ireland, 438.
Earl. See Grenville, Richard.
Henry, Viscount Palmerston, 59.
Sir Richard, Viscount Cobham, does not wish to go into opposition, 19.
Tenot, Captain, killed at Bangalore, 368.
Terney (Tearney), M., French Admiral, 168, 171, 326.
Texel, the, 410.
Dutch fleet in, 179, 334.
Thanksgiving day, on the King's recovery (1789), 344.
Thelbeare, Dr., case of, 103.
Thomas, Miss, 95.
Thompson, Dr., 23, 54.
Thomson, James, 9.
letters from, 7, 9.
his views on poetry, 8.
his tragedy of Sophonisba, 8.
his travels [as tutor to Mr. Talbot], 8, 10.
Thong, a surgeon's mate, 314.
Thornton, Mrs., 177 n, 179.
Thurlow, Edward, Attorney-General (afterwards Lord Chancellor), 142, 256, 268, 270, 276, 277.
letters from, 142, 154, 203.
letters to, 203, 237.
opinion of, alluded to, 130 (2).
the grant of his peerage, alluded to, 228.
promotion of, to the Great Seal, alluded to, 268.
as Lord Chancellor, 173, 205, 207, 260, 271, 272, 278. will probably form the next administration, 191.
on bad terms with Mr. Pitt, 203, 204.
advice of, in the King's illness, 279. responsibility of, as regards the regency, ibid.
levées of, 271.
political anecdotes concerning, 269–271, 276–279.
sayings of, 270, 271.
Thurston, Mr., estate of, 380.
Thynne, Thomas, Lord Weymouth, Secretary of State, 132, 154, 155, 161, 256, 260, 264, 265, 267.
American Department offered to, 107, 255. plan for giving him the Privy Seal, alluded to, 261.
Ticonderoga, 126, 131, 133–137, 140.
Tidd, William, quarter-master of the Guardian, saved from shipwreck, 353.
Timoleon, story of, alluded to, 8.
Tippoo, Sultan of Mysore, his proceedings against the Rajah of Travancore, 346, 348. his tributary rajahs, nearly in rebellion, ibid.
war with, 348–350, 355, 362, 365, 367, 368, 370, 371, 373–376.

Tippoo, Sultan of Mysore—contd.
vanquishing of, anticipated, 361.
termination of hostilities with, anticipated, 364, 377–379.
treaty of peace signed by, 378.
army of, 358, 368, 371.
territories of, 347, 348. And see Mysore.
Tisdall, Philip, Attorney-General, Ireland, 75, 111, 135, 137.
Tobago, 162, 166.
choice of Lieutenant Governor for, 132.
Tomline, George Prettyman. See Prettyman.
Tonyn, Admiral, dispatches of, 145.
Torbay, 168, 396, 397, 401.
fleet at, 172.
letters sent to, 394, 417.
Tott, Baroness de, appointed to paint Knox's portrait, 217.
Toulon, squadron of, or ships at, 35, 116, 143–145, 150, 399, 416, 424.
Town meetings, prevention of, alluded to, 257.
Townshend:
Charles, 2nd Viscount Townshend, 4.
Charles, 3rd Viscount, brother of Lady Cornwallis, 303.
——, death and will of, 306.
Charles, 2nd son of 3rd Viscount, 92, 264, 306.
——, letter from, 327.
——, letter to, 87.
——, ——, alluded to, 336.
——, as First Lord of Trade, 221.
——, anecdotes concerning, 279–281.
——, compared with his brother, the Marquis, 427.
——, children of, 306.
——, portrait of, 427.
Charles (son of William, 3rd son of the 2nd Viscount), Secretary at Madrid, and afterwards Lord Bayning ("Madrid Charles"), 306.
Charles, brother of Lord Sydney (Exchequer Charles), his generosity to his nephew, 353.
Lady Elizabeth, daughter of Marquis Townshend, marriage of, 353.
——, as Lady Elizabeth Loftus, 427.
George, 4th Viscount, and (in 1787) Marquis, 309, 318, 356, 380.
——, letters from, 93, 125, 140, 141 (2), 149, 173, 377.
——, ——, alluded to, 324.
——, ——, his inheritance from his father, 306.
——, is declining very fast, 356.
——, appointment of as Lord Lieutenant for Norfolk, 376.
——, inferior to his brother in parts, but superior in principle, 427.
——, death of, 428.
George (eldest son of the Marquis), Earl of Leicester, appointment of, in the Mint, 356.
Townshend—contd.
Admiral George, 305.
Isaack, death of, reported, 305.
Lord James, 418.
John, Lord of Admiralty, 329.
John Thomas, eldest son of Lord Sydney, marriage of, 353.
Lady, 173, 377, 418, 423, 427.
Thomas, brother of Lady Cornwallis, 309.
——, death of, alluded to, 324.
Thomas (son of the preceding), as Secretary at War, 329, 331.
——, letter to, 295.
——, ——, alluded to, ibid.
——, as Viscount Sydney, removal of, 351.
——, eldest son of. See John Thomas, above.
William, son of Marquis Townshend, 377.
William, 216.
family, matches in, 353.
——, sad state of, 427, 429.
Trade and Plantations, Committee for, 224, 228.
Trade:
Board or Lords Commissioners of, 87, 110, 181, 229, 230, 253, 254, 266, 268. See Eden; see Rice.
——, proposition of, 293.
——, Secretary of. See Cumberland, Richard.
——, to be absorbed into the Southern Department, 283.
First Lord of. See Clare, Lord; Hillsborough, Lord; Shelburne, Lord; Townshend, Charles.
——, office of, 107, 218, 264.
——, Lord Hillsborough's resignation of, 281. international, 194, 195.
Trafalgar, Cape, 424. battle of, 412, 421.
Transubstantiation, declaration against, 245.
Traponia, letter dated from, 2.
Travancore, 347, 348.
Rajah of, an ally of England, 346, 348.
——, ambassador from, in the British camp, 360.
Treasury, the, 7, 134, 136, 149, 167, 172, 179, 196, 197, 213, 252, 253, 260, 286.
First Lord. See under names of First Ministers.
——, Office of, 185, 254.
Lords Commissioners of, or Board, 6, 253, 294, 295. And see Dodington, George; Nugent, Lord Clare; Oswald, James.
——, letters to, 295, 296.
——, ——, alluded to, 125.
——, order sent by, to Ireland, 61.
——, ridicule of, 201.

Treasury, the—contd.
money received or due from, 6. offices in, 83, 91.
payments from, 6.
secretaries of, 254. And see Orde, Thomas; Robinson, John; Scrope, John.
Treaty of 1667, alluded to, 152.
Treaty of Paris (1st), alluded to, 152.
(2nd), with America (1783). See America, treaty of peace with.
Trentham, 347, 353.
Trenton, capture of, alluded to, 128.
Hessians at, 270.
Trevylian, Sir J., 17.
Trichinopoly, 358.
Trieste, 223.
Trimlet, Richard S., midshipman, saved from the wreck of the Guardian, 353.
Trincomalé, 385.
troops to be sent to, 346.
Trotter:
Mr., 62.
[John Bernard], his Memoirs of Fox, 429, 430.
Troubridge (Trowbridge):
Captain, 356, 358, 375.
Sir Thomas, Admiralty Commissioner, 399.
Tryon, Governor, 128, 132, 143, 174.
Tuam, Archbishop of:
[Dr. Brown], 159.
See Ryder, John.
Tucker:
Dr. [Josiah], Dean of Gloucester, letter from, 236.
——, is for giving up the American Colonies, 444.
Mr., 34.
Tullamore, Lord. See Moore, Charles.
Tunbridge Wells, 107, 121, 122, 157.
travellers to, 87, 113.
Turgot, Monsieur de, Bureau of, 176.
Turin, traveller to, 34.
Turkey or the Porte:
Sultan or Grand Seigneur of, 114, 129.
Grand Vizier of, 114.
peace of, with Russia, anticipated, (1771), 313.
treaty of, with Russia (1774), 114, 116.
troops of, defeat of, 114.
in regard to Crim Tartary, 129. war of, with Russia (1791), 365, 370.
Turner, Sir Charles, 4.
Turnham Green, letters dated at, 21, 23.
Tuscany:
English ambassador to. See Mann, Horace.
Government of, 43.
mines in, 24.
ships of, 43.
Tweed, the river, 432.
Tynninghame, letter dated from, 15.
Tynte, James, letters from, 63, 67.
Tyrrel, Admiral, 300.

U

Ulster, 113.
dissenting ministers in, are blowing the trumpet of rebellion, 448.
Uniformity, Act of, alluded to, 69.
Up Park, letter dated at, 6.
Ushant, 410, 412.
order of battle issued off, 405.
Uvedale, Captain, 324.

V

Vandals, 408.
Vander Graff, Mr., Governor of Columbo, 348.
Vane:
Gilbert, Lord Barnard, 13.
[William, Lord Vane], 12.
Vanneck [Sir Joshua?], opposes Bunbury and Rous in Suffolk, 353.
Varlo, Major, 339.
Vaudreuil, Marquis de, 159.
Vaughan:
Major-General Sir John, 157, 164, 171, 177.
——, troops of, 166.
Wilmot, Earl of Lisburn, 333.
——, letter of, alluded to, 175.
Vaux, Mr. de, 250.
Vellore, in the Carnatic, 350.
Venice, 26.
Doge of, 207.
State of, 180.
Venner, Mr., 229.
Vera Cruz. See La Vera Cruz.
Vergennes, M. de [French Minister], 132
letter of, alluded to, 284.
Versailles, Court of, 119.
Verses:—
Odes to Mr. Dodington, 9, 10.
One Epistle, 9.
On the Fight between Rodney and De Grasse, 332.
Vertôt, Abbé de, works of, alluded to, 33.
Vesuvius, eruption of, 223.
Vienna, 123, 177.
Court of (the Imperial Court), 43, 116, 117 (2), 123 (2), 129.
——, declaration of, alluded to, 114.
messenger sent to, 271.
Vigo, 408, 413.
Villa Franca, 34, 348.
Villaret, Admiral, 397.
Villeneuve, Admiral, defeated and taken prisoner at Trafalgar, 412.
Vingt-un, game of, 313.

Virgil, poems of, alluded to, 8.
Virginia, 177 (2), 179, 181.
Assembly of, declaration of, concerning taxation, 92.
Governor of. See Murray, Earl of Dunmore; Spotswood, Alexander. lands in, grant of, applied for, 253.
people of, 113, 288.
secretary of, office of, 254.
ships from, 137.
Washington marching towards, 180.
Voltaire, works of, alluded to, 33.
quotation from, 135.
Vouges, Charles, 282.

W

Wadman, Arthur, saved from shipwreck, 353.
Wainwright, John, Baron of Exchequer in Ireland, letters from, 56, 59, 61, 62, 64, 67 (2).
Walcheren, fleet off, 432.
Waldegrave:
James, Earl Waldegrave, 4.
——, appointed Governor to George, Prince of Wales, 23.
Lady, marriage of, to the Duke of Gloucester, 108.
Sir William, Lord Radstock, letter from, 421.
Wales:
Prince of. See George.
Princess Dowager of. See Augusta. elections in, 212.
ships of, 233.
traveller to, 49.
unimproved tracts of land in, 291.
Wallace, Sir James, letter from, alluded to, 334.
Wallachia (Valachia), 117.
Wallajoubad, camp near, 350.
Waller:
Edmund [afterwards Cofferer of the Household], 5.
——, letter from, 19.
——, paper sent to, 21.
Sir Hardress, Commissioner for Ireland, 438.
Walpole:
George, Earl of Orford, as late Lord Lieutenant for Norfolk, 376.
Horace, in France, 255.
Robert or Sir Robert (afterwards Earl of Oxford), 4.
——, letter from, 4.
——, answers of, to Pulteney, alluded to, 104.
——, favour solicited from, 15.
——, government of, alluded to, 91.
Walpole, Sir Robert—contd.
——, houses of. See Chelsea; see Richmond.
——, influence with, requested, 56.
——, recommendation by, 62.
——, rhyming epistle to, 5.
——, the King dines with, 4, 5.
——, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, 5.
——, in relation to the Earl of Strafford, 6, 7.
—— ("the Minister)," in relation to Frederick, Prince of Wales, 14, 15.
——, letter in relation to the proceedings against (in 1742), 16, 17.
——, his widow. See Orford, Lady.
Walsingham:
Captain, 166–168, 175.
Lord. See De Grey.
War:
Council of, 182.
Office, the, 125 (2), 276.
Secretary at. See Barrington, Lord; Jenkinson, Charles; Townshend, Thomas.
——, Deputy. See D'Oyley.
Warde:
Charles, son of General Warde, 432.
Charlotte, wife of the General (daughter of the Bishop of Peterborough), letters from, 431, 432 (2).
——, another son of, 409.
General George, 432.
——, postscript by, ibid.
Warley Camp, letter dated from, 390.
Warren:
Lady Borlase, 433.
——, daughter of, ibid.
Joseph, American leader, 270.
Washington, General George, 134, 136, 138, 139, 147, 150, 153, 284. belief in England that he will not fight the King's troops, 140, 141.
at Fishkill, 153.
march of, to Virginia, 180.
intends to attack Carleton, 186.
is supposed to be in the pay of France, 187.
will be called to settle something amongst the wild leaders, 192.
if he died, there would probably be a civil war, 383.
army of, 134, 139, 140, 147, 153, 174.
Waterford, 241 (2).
See of, 237.
Waterland, his pamphlets, 441.
Watson:
[Deputy Clerk of the Council in Georgia], 249.
Captain (?), has had the palsy, 314.
Mr., letter of, alluded to, 139.
Mr., works published by, 442.
(Wattson), Mrs., 21.
Watson-Wentworth, Charles, Marquis of Rockingham, failure of his attempt to form a ministry (1767), 93, 250, 251.

Watson-Wentworth, Charles, Marquis of Rockingham—contd.
audience of, with George III., 261, 262.
as first minister (1782), 329, 335.
his praise of Captain Cornwallis, 336. party of, "the shattered remains of," 185.
Watts, Lieutenant, 421.
Weaver [John], Commissioner for Ireland, 438.
Wedderburn, Alexander, afterwards Lord Loughborough, appointment of, to be Solicitor-General, 268.
as Solicitor-General, 256, 265, 270, 277, 278.
opinion of, alluded to, 130 (2), 131.
appointment of, to be Attorney-General, 268.
as Attorney-General, 157, 228, 261, 262, 267.
in relation to Lord Hillsborough, 164. appointment of, as Chief Justice of Common Pleas, alluded to, 267.
as Lord Loughborough and Lord Chancellor, his support of Shelburne's government, 191.
his attempts to "conciliate things" in England, 384.
sister of, 267.
Weldon, Captain Thomas, Fort Major of St. Philip's, in Minorca, 61.
Welles, Lord. See Knox, Thomas.
Wellesley:
Garrett, Earl of Mornington, letters from, 316, 318.
——, his wife, Lady Mornington, 316.
William. See Wesley.
Wells, Rev. Dr. Christopher, recommended as Chaplain for the Crown, 342. appointment of, as field postmaster, 374.
letters from, 349, 356, 358 (2), 359, 373.
document copied by, 367.
death of, 376.
Welsted, Leonard, letter from, and poem by, 9.
Wentworth:
Thomas, 1st Earl of Strafford, alluded to, 48.
Thomas, Earl of Strafford, letters from [1729, 1730], 6, 7 (2).
Wesley or Wellesley (Westly), William, 2nd son of 1st Earl of Mornington, 316, 318, 321, 324, 336.
his uncle, Mr. Pole, leaves him his name and estate, 328.
as William Wellesley Pole. See Pole.
his mother, 336.
West, John, Lord Chancellor of Ireland, letters from, 55 (2).
Westcote, Lord. See Lyttelton, William Henry.
West Indies, the, 151, 166, 323, 334, 421.
anxiety concerning affairs in, 158, 163, 164, 167, 317, 320.
Capt. Cornwallis going to or in, 301, 303, 304, 319, 335.
commerce of, committee on, 229.
English Admirals in, 300.
—— expeditions to, 154, 214.
—— fleet or squadron going to or in (West India fleet), 302, 330, 369, 410.
—— ——, victory of. See Rodney, victory of, over De Grasse.
—— islands of, 187. And see under their names.
—— ——, defence of, to be considered, 127.
—— ——, governors of, and the question of letters of marque, 130, 131.
—— ——, an Act for regulating commerce with, to be prepared, 190.
—— ——, probability that America may capture, 148.
—— ——, cruisers needed to give security to, 155.
—— ——, stranger duties in, 220.
—— superiority in, 274.
—— troops in, 109.
estates in, failure of, in consequence of the war, 426, 427.
French squadron at or going to, 127, 153.
—— returning from, 410 goods from, 209.
offices in, 171.
planters in, 191, 293.
—— and merchants of, desire to import goods in American ships, 219.
Rodney to command in, 321, 323.
ships going to or from, 317, 328, 364, 392.
storms in, alluded to, 312.
trade of, 220, 222, 233, 236.
——, with the United States, 190, 191.
trading ships of, convoy for, 337.
Westminster:
Abbey, 426, 427.
——, prebend in, desired, 50, 51.
——, prebendaries of. See Cornwallis, James; Blair, Dr. John.
Broad Way, Blue Anchor in, 441.
Palace Yard, letter dated from, 227.
School, 311.
And see London and Westminster, streets, buildings, &c., in.
Whitehall, 120, 283.
letters dated at, 4, 127, 190, 193, 240, 295 (2), 346, 354 (2), 355 (2), 362.
Weston, —, office held by, 192.
Westphalia, rumour that troops are to be sent to, 39.
Wetherell, Mr., 234.
Wetzlar, chamber of, 123.

Wexford, General Monck's affairs in, 439.
Weymouth, Lord. See Thynne, Thomas.
Weymouth, review at, 381.
Wharton :
American petitioner, 253, 254.
Mr., 161.
Samuel, 149.
Whately, Thomas, Under Secretary of State, death of, alluded to, 265.
Wheelock, —, 108.
Whetham, Col. Nathaniel, with General Monck, 439.
Whitbread :
Lady Mary (Cornwallis), letters from, 310 (2), 311 (2).
——, death of, 310 n.
Samuel, husband of Lady Mary Cornwallis, 310, 311 (2), 312.
——, his daughter, illness of, 312.
——, ——, her grandmother, ibid.
Whitby :
Captain John, 356, 362, 379, 396, 409.
——, has been in action, 391.
——, mentioned by Lord Nelson, 399, 401, 402.
——, joins Admiral Cornwallis, 402 (2), 405.
——, ill-health of, 421.
——, his father, 391.
Mrs., wife of Captain Whitby, 409, 423, 434
Theresa, their daughter, 428.
——, marries Frederick Cornwallis West, of Ruthin Castle, 428 n.
White :
Henry, letter from, 147.
Capt. Victor, commissioner for surrender of Kiltenan, 436.
William, 339.
White Plains, La Fayette at, 153.
Wilberforce, William, success of, respecting slave trade, 222.
Wilkes, John, 115, 116, 301, 442.
his imprisonment, prosecution and discharge, 104, 300–302.
expulsion of, from the House of Commons, 104.
goes to see his daughter in France, 303.
returns to England, 306.
furiously attacked and badly defended, 312.
expected election of, as Lord Mayor, 314.
Willes or Wills :
Edward, Bishop of Bath and Wells, son of, to be under Secretary of State, 108.
Sir John, Attorney-General, 60.
William the Conqueror, proceedings of, alluded to, 99.
William III., 24, 179.
grant of, alluded to, 6.
William Augustus, Duke of Cumberland, brother of George II., 23. paper purloined for, from the French "bureaux," 282.
Williams :
Mr., 6.
Mr., Inspector-General of the Customs in the American Colonies, 100.
Williams Wynn, Sir Watkin, 17. letter from and to, 18.
Wills. See Willes.
Williamson, —, in the East India Company's service, 388.
Wilmington, Earl of. See Compton, Spencer.
Wilmot, —, in Ireland, 192.
Wimbledon, letters dated from, 404, 405.
Winchester, Bishop of. See North, Brownlow.
Winchilsea or Winchelsea, Lord. See Finch.
Windham. See Wyndham.
Windsor, 146.
audience at, 419.
canons of. See York, Dr.; Hort, Dr.
canonry at, desired, 50, 51.
Dean of. See Cornwallis, James.
Dean's house at, 377.
the Royal family (Royal neighbours) at, ibid.
Windward Islands, 158.
Wingfield, Edward, Lord Powerscourt, 70.
Winkley, Mr., 302.
Winslow, General, marches to attack Crown Point, 35.
Wolfenbüttel, court of, Lord Holdernesse's mission to, 29.
Wolfenden, Thomas, Georgia, 444, 445.
Wolsey, Cardinal, allusion to, 422.
Wood :
Robert, Under Secretary of State, 283.
—, official going to Georgia, 246.
Woodfall, Mr., 114.
Woodland Castle, letter dated at, 432.
Worcester, prebend of, 51.
Worlington or Worlington Cottage, letters dated from, 122, 170, 172, 179.
Worthing, 434.
an excellent place for sea bathing, 429.
letters dated at, ibid (2).
Wotton, Bucks., George Grenville's house at, 250.
letters dated from, 94, 97–104, 252.
Wrede [ ], 12.
Wright, Sir James, Governor of Georgia, 86, 92, 126, 156.
his extraordinary plans, 126.
has come home, 187.
his negroes, 188.
Wrotham, Kent, 320.
Wycombe, [co. Bucks.], Lord Shelburne's borough of, 49
Wyndham, Windham :
Sir Charles, Earl of Egremont, death of, 252.

Wyndham—contd.
Thomas, Lord Wyndham, Lord Chancellor of Ireland (1734), 57, 59, 62.
——, letter from, 66.
Mr., 390.
Wynnstay, letter dated from, 18.

Y

Yonge:
Harry, 87.
Mr., of Savannah, 249.
And see Young.
York, Archbishop of. See Markham, William.
Yorke, York:
Charles, Solicitor-General, 74.
——, choice of office offered to, 280, 281.
Dr., late canon of Windsor, 50.
Sir Joseph, 255, 271.
——, suggested as Secretary of State, 261.
Sir Philip, afterwards Baron and Earl of Hardwicke, Attorney-General, 7.
——, as Lord Hardwicke and Lord Chancellor, 23, 24, 31, 36, 40, 41, 73, 281.
——, death of, 306.
Yorke—contd.
Philip, son of the above, 2nd Earl of Hardwicke, candidate for the High Stewardship of Cambridge University, 306.
Yorkshire, elections in (1733), 15.
tour in, 108.
traveller to, 109.
Young:
Dr. Edward, poet, 8, 9.
——, letters from, 50 (2).
——, verses altered by, 50.
Admiral [James], 131.
Matthew, Bishop of Clonfert, his talents and exemplary character, 398.
Mrs., widow of the above, ibid.
——, son of, ibid.
Walter, as Post Captain, 323.
Admiral [Sir William], 415, 432.
Yverdun in Switzerland, 376, 380.

Z

Zartoriski, Prince and Princess, 255.
Zinzendorf, writings of, alluded to, 444.